The directory, who found itself every day more and more firmly established, began to seek for the approbation of moderate and well-conducted minds. It felt it to be its duty to visit with severity this outburst of the Jacobin faction. The constitution and the existing laws afforded them the means, and it resolved to put them in action for this purpose. In the first place, it caused several numbers of Babœuf's paper to be seized, as tending to the subversion of the constitution; it then caused the society of the Pantheon to be closed, as also many others formed by the jeunesse dorée, and appropriated for dancing and reading newspapers; these latter were situated in the Palais-Royal and the Boulevard des Italiens, and known as the Société des Beaux Arts, Salon des Princes, and Salon des Arts. There was little to fear from them, and they were included in the measure for no other purpose than to show the impartiality of its application. The ordinance was published and executed on the 8th Ventôse (February 27, 1796). A resolution called for by the five hundred added another restriction to those which were already imposed by the constitution upon the popular societies: they were not to be composed of more than sixty members.

The minister Benezec, accused by both parties, tendered his resignation. The directory refused to accept it, and wrote him a letter complimenting him upon his services. The letter was published. The new system of maintaining the public was kept up; the indigent, the fundholders, and the public functionaries, who had not a thousand crowns' income, were alone supplied with rations. Something was likewise done for the unfortunate annuitants, who were always paid in paper. The two councils decreed that they should receive ten for one in assignats; a very insufficient increase, for the assignats were worth no more than the two hundredth part of their nominal value.

The directory added to those measures it had just then taken, that of at last recalling the conventionalist deputies on mission. They were replaced by government commissioners. These commissioners, when with armies or administrations, represented the directory, and superintended the execution of the laws. They no longer possessed, as formerly, unlimited powers in the armies, except in an emergency, or in cases to which the power of the general did not extend; such as a requisition for provisions or troops, they could also adopt resolutions in matters which would not admit of delay, which were in that case carried into execution, subject to the future approbation of the directory. Complaints having been made against numerous functionaries appointed by the directory immediately upon its installation, it enjoined its civil commissioners to keep an eye upon them, to note the complaints that were made against them, and to point out those whom it would be proper to dismiss.

In order to keep a watchful eye upon the factions, who now compelled to conceal themselves, would probably act in the dark, the directory created a special ministry of police.

The police is a subject of importance in troublous times. The three preceding assemblies had appropriated a numerous committee to this office; the directory did not consider that it ought to be left among the subordinate duties of the ministry of the interior, and proposed to the two councils to erect it into a separate branch of the ministry. The opposition urged that it was an inquisitorial institution, which might be very truly said, as also that it was an institution unfortunately inseparable from factious times, and especially where those factions were pertinacious, and obliged to plot in secret. The plan was approved. The deputy Cochon was called upon to fill this new ministry. The directory also would have desired some new laws to regulate the liberty of the press. The constitution declared it to be unlimited, with the exception of those regulations which might become necessary for repressing its excesses. The two councils, after a solemn discussion, rejected every bill for restraining this liberty. In this discussion the scene was reversed. The advocates of the revolution, who should have advocated unlimited liberty, demanded the means of restriction; and the opposition, whose secret sentiments inclined rather to monarchy than to the republic, voted for unlimited liberty; so much are parties governed by their interest! Notwithstanding all this, the decision was a wise one. The press may be unrestricted without danger; truth alone is formidable; falsehood is impotent; the greater it magnifies, the more it exhausts itself. There never yet was a government that was overturned by a lie. What could it matter if a Babeuf did extol the agrarian law, if a Quotidienne did vilify the grandeur of the revolution, slander its heroes, and seek to restore banished princes! All the government had to do, was only to let them declaim; eight days' exaggeration and lies wear out all the pens of pamphleteers and libellers. But a government must have time and philosophy before it can recognize these truths. The time perhaps had not arrived for the convention to understand them. It was true that the directory, now more tranquil and more settled, ought to have begun to comprehend and practise these truths.

The last measures of the directory, such as the closing of the society of the Pantheon, the refusal to accept the resignation of Benezec, the recall of the conventionalists on mission, and the change of certain placemen, produced the best effect; they imparted confidence to those who really dreaded the terror; they condemned to silence those who affected to dread it, and they satisfied well-disposed minds who wished the government to make itself independent of all parties. The regularity and activity of the operations of the directory contributed more than any thing else to gain its esteem. People began to look for peace, and to assume the idea of stability from the existing system. The five directors were surrounded by a certain degree of state. Barras, a fashionable man, did the honours of the Luxembourg. He may be said, in some measure, to have acted herein for his colleagues. Social life presented much the same appearance as in the preceding year; it exhibited a singular medley of conditions, great freedom of manners, an unrestrained taste for amusements, and extraordinary luxury. The withdrawing-rooms of the director were frequented by generals, whose education and fortune had been completed in two years; contractors and men of business, who had enriched themselves by speculations and thievery; exiles who had returned and were seeking to connect themselves with the government; men of superior talents, who began to have confidence in the republic, and wished to have a situation under it; and lastly, of intriguers, who were running after favour. Women, of whatever extraction they might be, came to these withdrawing-rooms to display their charms, and exert their influence at a moment when any thing might be demanded and obtained. If sometimes social life was deficient in that decorum and self-control, which is now so strongly insisted upon in France, and which are the fruit of a polished, tranquil, and exclusive society, there prevailed an extreme freedom of mind, and that profusion of correct ideas which the sight and the practice of great things suggests. The men who composed that society were entirely free from antiquated rules; they did not repeat insipid sayings by rote; what they knew, they had learned by their own experience. They had witnessed the greatest events in history. They had taken a part, they were still taking part, in them; and it is easy to figure to oneself what such objects of attention must have excited in youthful, ambitious, and sanguine minds. There shone in the first rank young Hoche, who from a private in the French guards had become in one campaign general-in-chief, and had bestowed on himself in two years the most finished education. Handsome, of polished manners, renowned as one of the first captains of his time, and scarcely twenty-seven years of age, he was the hope of the republicans, and the idol of those females smitten with beauty, talent, and glory. By his side was already remarked young Bonaparte, who had not yet acquired fame, but whose services at Toulon and on the 13th Vendémiaire were well known, whose character and person excited astonishment by their singularity, and whose understanding made a great impression by its originality and vigour. In this society, where Madame Tallien displayed her charms, and Madame Beaularnais her grace, Madame de Stüel exhibited all the brilliancy of her intellect, elevated as it was by the associations of the time and of liberty.

Those young men called to bear rule in the state, chose their wives, some from among the ladies formerly of rank, who deemed themselves honoured by the selection, others out of the families enriched by the times, who were desirous of ennobling wealth by honourable alliances. Bonaparte had just married the widow of the unfortunate general Beaularnais. Every body looked forward to making his fortune, and thought it would be great. Numerous were the openings now presented. The war upon the continent, the war at sea, the tribune, the magistracy, in short a great republic to defend and govern—these were grand objects of ambition, worthy to inflame every mind! The government had recently made a valuable acquisition; it was that of an ingenious and profound writer, who had devoted his youthful talents to reconcile opinion with the new republic. M. Benjamin Constant had recently published a pamphlet, intitled, De la Force du Gouvernement, which had produced a great sensation. He therein demonstrated the necessity of rallying round a government which was the only hope of France and of all the parties.

The regulation of finances was still occupying the attention of government more than any thing else. The measures recently adopted were no more than putting off the evil day. There had been transferred to the present government a certain quantity of national property for sale, the power of letting the great forests, the forced loan, and the copper-plate from which the assignats had been worked off, had been left with it as a last resource. To anticipate the produce of these different resources, it had, as we have seen, created sixty millions of treasury orders, something like Exchequer bills or royal bons, payable out of the first money that should come into the public coffers. But these orders it was extremely difficult to make current. The bankers, who met to settle a plan for a national bank, secured on the national property, hung back when they heard the outcries yelled forth by the patriots against jobbers and contractors. The forced loan was levied much more slowly than could have been believed. The assessment rested on extremely arbitrary principles, since the loan was to be raised from the wealthiest classes; every one appealed against the assessment, and each individual portion of the loan occasioned an altercation with the collectors. In two months, scarcely a third of it had been got in. Some millions in money, and some thousand millions in paper had been collected. On the partial failure of this resource, recourse was had once more to the last appliance left to the government for making up for the deficiency of all the others, the copper-plate of the assignats. The issues had amounted during the last two months to the unheard-of sum of forty-five thousand millions. Twenty thousand millions had scarcely provided one hundred millions, for the assignats were not worth more than the two hundredth part of their nominal value. The public absolutely would have nothing to do with them, for they were good for nothing. They could not be made available for the payment of debts which were unsettled; they could not operate as a discharge for more than half the farm rents and taxes, for the other half was payable in kind; they were refused in the markets, or else taken at their reduced value; lastly, they were taken in the sale of the national property for no more than the price they bore in the markets, the sales by auction always causing the offer to rise in proportion to the depreciation of the paper. It was therefore out of the question to use them in any manner that could make them valuable. An issue, of which the extent was not known, made every body look forward to some extraordinary numerical characters which would make the amounts more moderate. Thousands of millions signified at most millions. This fall, which we have already alluded to, when the government refused to prohibit the sale of the national property by auction, was now realized.

Those minds on which the revolution had impressed its prejudices, for all systems and all powers do impress them, were for raising the assignats by setting apart a great quantity of national property as a gage for their redemption, and by using violent measures to effect their currency. But there is nothing which it is so impracticable to re-establish as the credit of paper money: it was therefore found absolutely necessary to renounce the assignats.

One may ask why the paper money was not immediately abolished, by reducing it to its real value, which was about two hundred millions at most, and by requiring payment of the taxes, and for the national domains, either in money or in assignats, according to the course of exchange? Money was in fact again making its appearance, and that somewhat plentifully, especially in the provinces; thus it was a great error to apprehend its scarcity; for the paper reckoned at two hundred millions in the currency; but another reason prevented the abandonment of the paper money. The only resource, it must always be recollected, consisted in the national estates. Their sale seemed neither certain or near at hand. Unable therefore to wait till their value should come spontaneously to the exchequer by sales, it was necessary to represent it by anticipation in paper, and to issue it for the purpose of withdrawing it afterwards; in a word, it was necessary to expend the price before it was received. This necessity of expending before a sale had taken place, turned the attention of the government towards the idea of creating a new species of paper money.

The notes, which were a special incumbrance upon each estate, would induce long delays, because it was requisite that they should bear reference to each estate; moreover, they would depend on the will of the taker, and would not remove the real difficulty. A paper was devised, which, by the name of mandats (orders for payment), was to represent a fixed value in land. Every estate was to be delivered without sale by auction, and upon a mere memorandum (procès-verbal), for a price in mandats equal to that of 1790 (twenty-two times its annual worth). Mandats, to the amount of two thousand four hundred millions, were to be created, and domains to the like amount, according to the estimate of 1790, were to be immediately appropriated for their payment. Thus these mandats could not undergo any other variation than that of the estates themselves, since they represented a fixed quantity thereof. They assuredly could not be on a par with money, for the domains were not worth so much as in 1790; but at any rate, they must have the same value as the domains.

It was resolved to employ part of these mandats to withdraw the assignats. The plate of the assignats was broken up on the 30th Pluviôse (February 19): forty-five thousand five hundred millions had been issued. By the different returns, whether from loans or arrears, the circulating quantity had been reduced to thirty-six thousand millions, and was soon to be further reduced to twenty-four thousand. These twenty-four thousand millions, in reducing them to one thirtieth, represented eight hundred millions: it was decreed that they should be exchanged against eight hundred millions in mandats, which was fixing the assignat at one thirtieth of its nominal value; four hundred millions more in mandats were to be issued for the public service, and the remaining twelve hundred were to be deposited in the chest with three keys, to be taken out by decree when and as they were wanted.

This creation of mandats was a reimpression of the assignats, with a lower figure, another denomination, and a fixed value with respect to the national property. It was as if there had been created, besides the twenty-four thousand millions that were to be left in circulation, another forty-eight thousand millions, which would have made seventy-two thousand; it was as if it had been settled that these seventy-two thousand millions should be taken in payment for property, for thirty times their value in 1790, which would suppose two thousand four hundred millions' worth of property charged as a pledge for repayment. Thus the figure was reduced, the relation they were to bear to the estates fixed, and the name changed.

The mandats were created on the 26th Ventôse (16th March). The national estates were to be sold immediately, and delivered to the bearer of the mandat on a mere memorandum or minute (procès-verbal). Half the price was to be paid in the first decade, the remainder in three months. The national forests were set apart, and the two thousand four hundred millions of national property were taken out of those estates of less than three hundred arpents. Those measures which the adoption of a paper money render necessary were immediately taken. The mandat being the money of the republic, every thing was to be paid for in mandats. Debts payable in money, rents, interest of capital, the assessed taxes, the arrears excepted, the state annuities, the pensions and salaries of the public officers, were all to be paid in mandats. Great discussions took place with respect to the land-tax. Those who foresaw that the mandats might fall, as the assignats, desired that, to ensure to the state a certain return, the land-tax should continue to be paid in kind. They were reminded of the difficulties of the collection, and it was decided that this tax should be paid in mandats, as well as the customs, the registration and stamp duty, posting duties, &c. But the government did not confine itself to that. It was deemed right to accompany the creation of the new paper with the usual severities that attend compulsory values; the government declared that silver and gold should no longer be considered as merchandize, and that paper could thenceforward not be sold against gold and gold against paper. After the experiments that had been made, this was a wretched expedient. Another had been very recently adopted that was scarcely less so, and which injured the directory in the public opinion: this was the closing of the exchange. It ought to have known that the closing of a public market does not prevent a thousand others from being established elsewhere.

In making mandats the new money, and putting them every where in the place of money, the government committed a serious error. Even in keeping up its value, the mandat could never come up to the standard of money. The mandat was worth, if they desired it, as much as the land, but it could not be worth more. Now land was worth no more than half its value in 1790; even a patrimonial estate worth one hundred thousand francs would not have fetched fifty thousand in money. How could one hundred thousand francs in mandats have been worth one hundred thousand in money? This difference then ought at least to have been admitted. The government therefore could not help finding, independently of all the other causes of depreciation, a primary miscalculation, arising from the depreciation of the national estates.

The pressure was so great, that promises of mandats were uttered until the mandats themselves were ready to be issued. These promises instantly went at a value far inferior to their nominal value. Every body was extremely alarmed, and said to themselves that the new paper, which was to do such great things, was about to fall like the assignats, and to leave the republic without any resource. There was, however, a cause for this anticipated fall, and it might very soon have been removed. It was requisite that instructions should be addressed for the use of the local administrations, for their guidance in the extremely complicated cases that must arise from the sale of the national estates upon a mere procès-verbal, and this labour consumed much time and delayed the commencement of the sales. During this interval the mandat fell, and it was said that its value would fall with such rapidity, that the state would decline to open the sales, and let the national estates go for nothing at all; that it would be the same with the mandats as it had been with the assignats that they would be gradually reduced to nothing and that then they would be taken in payment for national property, not at the value at which they were issued, but at their reduced value. The malignants suggested that the new paper was but a lure, that the national estates would never be sold at all, and that the republic wanted to keep them for herself, as an apparent and perpetual pledge for whatever paper she chose to issue. The sales, nevertheless, were opened. The subscriptions were numerous. The mandat of one hundred francs had fallen to fifteen. It rose again successively to thirty, forty, and in some places to eighty-eight francs. Hopes therefore were for a moment entertained of the success of the new operation.

It was amidst the factions secretly conspiring against it that the directory entered upon its labours. The agents of royalty had continued their secret plottings. The death of Lemaitre had not dispersed them. Brottier, who was acquitted, had become the chief of the royalist agents. Duvorne de Presle, Laville-Heurnois, and Despernelles, had joined him, and secretly formed the royal committees. These wretched agitators had no more influence than in time past; they intrigued, loudly demanded money, wrote a great many letters, and promised wonders. They always acted as the intervening parties between the pretender and La Vendée, where they had numerous agents. They were very pertinacious in their opinions, and observing the insurrection quelled by Hoche, and ready to expire under his attacks, they more than ever kept to the system of doing every thing, even at Paris, by a movement in the interior. They bragged, as in the time of the convention, of being in communication with several deputies of the new third, and they alleged that they ought to temporize, to labour public opinion by the newspapers, to vilify the government, and to make such arrangements that the elections of the next year should bring in a new third of deputies entirely counter-revolutionary. Thus they flattered themselves that they should destroy the republican constitution by means of the constitution itself. This plan was certainly the least chimerical, and it is the one that affords the most favourable idea of their intelligence.

The patriots, on their part, were preparing plots, but they were only dangerous in proportion to the means they had at their disposal. Driven from the Pantheon, absolutely condemned by the government, which had separated itself from them, and had turned many of them out of their places, they had declared against it and become its irreconcilable enemies. Finding themselves closely followed and watched, they had found no other resource than to conspire with the utmost secrecy, and in such a manner that the leaders of the conspiracy should remain absolutely unknown. They had chosen four to form a secret directory of public welfare. Babœuf and Drouet were of the number. The secret directory was to communicate with twelve principal agents, entirely unacquainted with one another, and who were to organize societies of patriots in all the quarters of Paris. These twelve agents, each thus acting by himself, were forbidden to name the four members of the secret directory; they were to speak and to enforce obedience in the name of a mysterious and supreme authority, which was instituted to direct the efforts of the patriots towards what was called the happiness of all (bonheur commun). In this manner the connecting threads of the conspiracy could scarcely be laid hold of; for supposing one was seized, the others would always remain in obscurity. This organization was constituted in conformity with Babœuf's plan: societies of patriots existed all over Paris, and through the intervention of the twelve principal agents, received the impulse of an unknown authority.

Babœuf and his colleagues were considering what method should be employed to effect what they called the deliverance, and in whom the authority should be reposed, when they should have killed the directory, dispersed the councils, and put the people in possession of their sovereignty. They still experienced too many misgivings as to the provinces and public opinion, to run the risk of an election, and to convoke a new assembly. They merely wanted to appoint an assembly composed of chosen Jacobins taken from each department. They were to make this selection themselves, and to complete the assembly by adding to it all the Mountaineers of the old convention who had not been re-elected. Even these Mountaineers did not seem to them to be a sufficient guarantee, for many of them had adhered, in the latter days of the convention, to what they termed liberticide measures, and had even accepted office under the directory. Nevertheless, they had concluded by agreeing to admit into the new assembly sixty-eight of those who were considered the purest. That assembly was to possess itself of all the powers until the happiness of all was ensured.

They thought it best to have some understanding with the unselected conventionalists, most of whom were in Paris. Babœuf and Drouet entered into communication with them. They frequently discussed the means by which their measures could be effected. The conventionlists considered those proposed by the insurrectional directory as too extravagant. They wished for the re-establishment of the old convention, with the organization prescribed by the constitution of 1793. At last they came to some conclusion, and the insurrection was fixed for the month of Floral (April, May). The means which the secret directory purposed to make use of were terrible indeed. In the first place, this secret directory had put itself in correspondence with the principal cities of France, so that the revolution might be simultaneous and consistent throughout France. The patriots were to issue from their quarters, bearing banners whereon were to be inscribed these words: Liberté, Égalité, Constitution de 1793, Bonheur commun. Whoever should resist the sovereign people was to be put to death. The five directors were to be slain, together with certain members of the five hundred, and the general of the army of the interior; they were then to make themselves masters of the Luxembourg, the treasury, the telegraph, the arsenals, and the dépôt of artillery at Meudon. To induce the people to rise, and no longer pay them with empty promises, all the inhabitants in easy circumstances were to be forced to lodge and entertain every man who should have taken part in the insurrection. The bakers and the wine dealers were to be required to furnish the people with bread and drink, for which an indemnity was to be paid them by the republic, upon pain of being hanged at the next lamp in case of refusal. Every soldier who should go over to the side of the insurrection should have his equipments as his own property, be paid a sum of money, and be at liberty to return to his home. The insurgents hoped in this manner to gain all those who disliked the service. As for professed soldiers, who had acquired a taste for war, they were to allow them to plunder the houses of the royalists. To keep up the armies to their complement, and to replace those who should go to their homes, they proposed allowing the soldiers such advantages as would induce the spontaneous enlistment of a multitude of new volunteers.

We see what a hideous and maddened combination of ideas these desperate spirits had conceived. They had appointed Rossignol ex-general of La Vendée, to command the Parisian army of insurrection. They had tampered with that police legion which constituted part of the army of the interior, and was entirely composed of patriots, gendarmes of the tribunals, and old French guards. In fact, this legion did mutiny, but prematurely, and was disbanded by the directory. Cochon, the minister of the police, who was watching the progress of the conspiracy, which had been communicated to him by an officer of the army of the interior whom the insurgents had desired to gain over, suffered it to proceed that he might apprehend all its leading members. On the 20th Floral (9th May), Babœuf, Drouet, and the other chiefs and agents, were to meet at a cabinet-maker's in the Rue Bleu. Officers of police, stationed in the neighbourhood, apprehended the conspirators, and immediately took them to prison. They also apprehended the ex-conventionalists Laignelot, Vaudier, Amar, Ricord, Choudieu, Buonarrotti the Piedmontese, Antonelle an ex-member of the legislative assembly, and Pelletier de Saint Fargeau, brother of him who had been assassinated. Application was forthwith made to the two councils to impeach Drouet who was a member of the five hundred; and the whole of the prisoners were sent before the high national court, which was not yet constituted, but which the government immediately set about organizing. Babœuf, whose inordinate conceit was only equalled by his fanaticism, wrote an extraordinary letter to the directory, which showed in a striking manner the diseased state of his mind. "I am a power," he wrote to the five directors; "therefore fear not to treat with me as with an equal. I am the chief of a formidable sect, which you will not destroy by sending me to death, and which, after my execution, will be only more exasperated and more dangerous. You have yet but a single thread of the conspiracy; the apprehension of a few individuals is to no purpose, leaders will always be found. Spare yourselves an useless effusion of blood; you have not as yet made any great noise, make no more, treat with the patriots: they have not forgotten that you were formerly sincere republicans; they will forgive you, if you will but concur with them in the salvation of the republic."

The directory took no notice of this extravagant letter, but ordered the depositions to be taken. These preliminary proceedings were likely to occupy considerable time, for it was resolved that all the forms should be duly observed. This last act of vigour completely confirmed the directory in public opinion. The end of the winter was at hand; the factions were watched, and kept within bounds; the business of the country was conducted with zeal and efficiency; the renewed paper money was the only thing that occasioned uneasiness; the directory had nevertheless provided temporary resources towards making the first preparations for the campaign which was now about to be opened. In fact, the season for military operations had now arrived. The English ministry, always astute in its policy, had behaved towards the French government in the manner public opinion seemed to require from the English government. The English ministers directed Wickham, then agent in Switzerland, to address some insignificant questions to Barthélemy, the minister of France. This overture, made on the 17th Ventôse, (March 8th, 1796,) was evidently to ascertain whether France was disposed for peace, whether she would consent to a congress for discussing its articles, and whether she would intimate beforehand the principal bases on which she was resolved to treat.

Such mode of proceeding by Pitt had nothing else in view beyond appearing to satisfy his own nation, in order that if France refused his overtures he might be justified in calling for more sacrifices. Had Pitt really been sincere, he would not have confided this overture to an agent without giving him commensurate powers; he would not have proposed an European congress, which, from the complicated nature of the questions, would be unable to conclude upon any thing, and which, moreover, France had already refused to Austria, through the intervention of Denmark; lastly, he would not have inquired on what bases the negotiation was likely to be opened, since he knew that, according to the constitution, the Netherlands had become part of the French territory, and that the existing government could not consent to their separation. The directory, unwilling to be treated as simpletons, caused the following answer to be given to Wickham; that neither the form or the object of this procedure were likely to induce a belief of its sincerity; that, nevertheless, in order to demonstrate its own pacific intentions, the directory consented to give a reply to questions which did not deserve any; and declared it was willing to treat, but on no other bases than those fixed by the constitution. This was announcing in a conclusive manner that France would never relinquish Belgium. The letter of the directory, written with temper and firmness, was immediately published together with that of Wickham. This was the first instance of a frank and firm diplomacy, divested of all idle vaunting.

Every one approved of the conduct of the directory, and on both sides preparations were made in Europe for renewing hostilities. Pitt demanded of the English parliament a new loan of seven millions sterling, and he did his utmost to negotiate another of three millions for the emperor. He had done much to persuade the king of Prussia to withdraw from his neutrality, and to engage again in the conflict. He had offered him funds, and had represented to him, that on the termination of the war when all parties would be exhausted, he would possess a decided superiority. The king of Prussia, (Florent.

1796 May.
Pratich.)

Position of the republic as to its military operations.

THE DIRECTORY.

Bonaparte promoted to the command of the army of Italy.

621

not desirous of relapsing into his former errors, would not suffer himself to be misled, and persisted in his neutrality. One part of his army, stationed in Poland, was employed in strengthening his new acquisitions; the other, drawn up along the Rhine, was ready to defend the line of neutrality against any of those powers who should break it, and to take under its protection such of the states of the empire as should claim the Prussian mediation. Russia, always liberal of promises, sent as yet no troops, and was employing herself in organizing the portion of Poland that had fallen to her share.

Austria, puffed up with her successes at the close of the preceding campaign, looked forward to the war with sanguine hopes, and indulged in the most presumptuous expectations. The general to whom she owed this slight return of fortune, had nevertheless been dismissed, in spite of the splendour of his triumphs. Clorfait had displeased the aulic council, and had been succeeded in the command of the army of the Lower Rhine by the young archduke Charles, of whom great hopes were entertained, without his exhibiting any earnest of his future talents. He had displayed in the preceding campaigns the qualities of a good officer. Wurmsier still commanded the army of the Upper Rhine. To decide the king of Sardinia to continue the war, a considerable reinforcement had been sent to the imperial army which was fighting in Piedmont, then under the command of general Beaulieu, who had gained great reputation in the Netherlands. Spain, beginning to enjoy peace, closely watched the new struggle that was about to commence, and now, more enlightened respecting her true interests, her inclinations were in favour of France.

The directory, like all new governments, zealous, and anxious to render its government illustrious, meditated important projects. It had put its armies into better order, but it had only been able to send them men, without furnishing them with the necessary supplies of provision. All Belgium had been laid under contribution for the maintenance of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, extraordinary exertions had been made to supply the army of the Rhine, in the midst of the Vosges, with provisions. But there no means of conveyance could be obtained; nor had it been practicable to furnish fresh horses for their cavalry. The army of the Alps had lived upon the stores taken from the Austrians after the battle of Loano; but it was destitute of shoes and clothes, and its pay was in arrear. The victory of Loano had thus remained unproductive of results. The armies of the western provinces were, thanks to the attention of Hoche, in a better state than any of the others, without however being provided with all that they needed. But notwithstanding this, state of destitution, our armies, accustomed to hardships, to live by expedients, and moreover inured to war by their glorious campaigns, were yet in a state to attempt great things.

The directory was contemplating, we say, the execution of extended designs. It was anxious to finish in the spring the war in La Vendée, and then to take the offensive on every point. Its object was to take the armies of the Rhine into Germany, in order to blockade and besiege Mentz, to complete the subjugation of the princes of the empire, to separate Austria, to transfer the theatre of war to the midst of her hereditary states, and to quarter its troops upon the enemy in the rich valleys of the Maine and the Neckar. With respect to Italy, it entertained still greater designs, as suggested by general Bonaparte. As no advantage had been gained from the victory of Loano; according to that young officer, the French ought to gain a second, make the king of Sardinia determine upon a peace, or else take his states from him, next cross the Po, and then wrest from Austria the fairest ornament of her crown, Lombardy. There would be the theatre of decisive operations, there they might strike the most painful blow against Austria, obtain an equivalent in conquests to pay for the Netherlands, compel a peace, and perhaps bestow liberty upon that fine country Italy. In addition to all this, the most destitute of our armies would be maintained and refreshed in the heart of the most fertile country in the world.

The directory, coinciding with these ideas, made some changes in the command of its armies. Jourdan retained the command he had so well deserved at the head of the army of the Sambre and Meuse. Pichegru, who had betrayed his country, and who was already suspected of the treason, was succeeded by Moreau, who commanded in Holland. Pichegru was offered the embassy to Sweden, which he refused. Beurnonville, who had lately returned from captivity, replaced Moreau in the command of the French army in Holland. Schérer, against whom a dissatisfaction existed because he had not made the most of the victory of Loano, was dismissed. The government wanted a young and enterprising man to exert himself in a bold campaign. Bonaparte, who had already distinguished himself in the army of Italy, and who moreover seemed to be so impressed with the advantages of a march beyond the Alps, appeared to be the most fit person to succeed Schérer. He was therefore promoted from the command of the army of the interior to take the command of the army of Italy. He immediately set out to repair to Nice. In the fulness of his ardour and high spirits, he declared at starting, that in a month he would be either at Milan or at Paris. This ardour savoured of rashness, but in a young man, and in a hazardous enterprise, it was a good omen.

Similar changes had been wrought in the three armies which occupied the insurgent provinces. Hoche, who had been summoned to Paris, to settle with the directory a plan for putting an end to the civil war, had there obtained the most deserved favour, and had received the highest testimonies of esteem. The directory, acknowledging the excellence of his plans, had approved of them all; and that no one might have it in his power to thwart their execution, it had consolidated the three armies of the coast of Cherbourg, the coasts of Brest, and of the west, into one, under the style of the army of the coasts of the ocean, and had invested him with the command in chief. This was the greatest army of the republic, for it amounted to one hundred thousand men, extended over several provinces, and required in the commander a concentration of powers civil as well as military, and altogether extraordinarily special. So great a command was the strongest proof of confidence that a general could experience. Hoche certainly deserved it.

Endued at the age of twenty-seven with numerous great qualities, military as well as civil, and those not unfrequently calculated to endanger liberty; at the same time entertaining a noble ambition, he had not that guilty hardihood which can hurry an illustrious commander to aspire to more than the quality of citizen; he was a sincere republican, and equalled Jourdan in patriotism and integrity. Liberty might applaud him without trembling for his successes, and desire the continuance of his victorious career.

Hoche had scarcely passed a month in Paris, before he returned to the west, that he might complete the pacification of La Vendée by the end of winter or the beginning of spring. His plan of disarming and pacification had been reduced into articles, and embodied in an ordinance of the directory. It was agreed, in conformity with this plan, that a disarming body should surround the insurgent provinces, and scour them one after the other. Until their complete pacification, they were to be subjected to military law. All the towns were declared in a state of siege. It was recognized as a principle that the army was to live at the expense of the insurgent country; consequently Hoche was authorized to levy the taxes and the forced loan, either in kind or in coin as best suited him, and to form stores and chests for the supply of the army. The towns, which it was the object of the neighbouring countries to starve out, were to be provisioned in a military manner by columns attached to the principal among them. Pardon was granted to all those rebels who should lay down their arms. As for the chiefs, such of them as should be taken with arms in their hands were to be shot; those who should submit were to be either confined or kept under surveillance in towns appointed for that purpose, or sent out of France. The directory, approving Hoche's plan, which consisted in first pacifying La Vendée before entering into the consideration of Brittany, authorized him to finish his operations on the left bank of the Loire, before he should bring back his troops to the right bank. So soon as La Vendée should be completely reduced, a disarming line of troops was to inclose Brittany, from Granville to the Loire, and thus advance from one end to the other of the peninsula of Brittany to the extremity of the Finistère. It was for Hoche to regulate the period when these provinces, appearing to him to be reduced, should be relieved from military law, and restored to the constitutional system.

Hoche, on his arrival at Angers, towards the end of Nivôse (the middle of January), found his operations greatly deranged by his absence. The success of his plan depending particularly on the manner in which it should be executed, made his presence indispensable. His place had been ill supplied by general Willot. The line of disarming had made but little way. Charette had crossed it, and had again passed over to his rear. The regular system of victualling had not been well attended to; the army had frequently been in want of necessities, had relapsed into insubordination, and had committed acts calculated to alienate the inhabitants. Sapinaud, after making, as we have seen, a hostile attempt on Montaigu, had obtained from general Willot an absurd sort of treaty, to which Hoche could not be a consenting party.

Lastly, Stofflet still playing the part of prince, and Bernier that of prime minister, were recruiting themselves with the deserters who had left Charette, and were making underhand preparations. The cities of Nantes and Angers were in want of provisions. The patriots who had fled from the surrounding country were crowded together there, and indulged themselves at the clubs in furious declamations worthy of Jacobins. It was further reported that Hoche had been recalled to Paris for no other purpose than to be cashiered. Some said that he had been dismissed as a royalist, others because he was a Jacobin.

His return put a stop to these rumours, and repaired all the evils occasioned by his absence. He recommenced his disarming system, caused the stores to be replenished, and the towns to be victualled; he declared them all in a state of siege; and from that time being authorized to exercise a military dictatorship therein, he closed the Jacobin clubs formed by the refugees, and particularly a society known at Nantes by the appellation of Chambre ardente. He refused to ratify the treaty accorded to Sapinaud; he occupied his country, and left it for himself to consider whether he should quit France, or haunt the woods under the penalty of being shot if he were taken. He hemmed in Stofflet more closely than ever, and renewed the pursuit of Charette. He entrusted to adjutant-general Travot, who with great intrepidity exhibited all the activity of a partisan, the task of pursuing Charette with several columns of light infantry and cavalry, so as to leave him neither rest or hope.

Pursued night and day, Charette had now no means of escape left for him. The inhabitants of the Marais, disarmed and closely watched, could no longer help him. They had already delivered up seven thousand muskets, several pieces of cannon, and forty barrels of powder, and they were no longer in a condition to renew hostilities. Even had they been able so to do, they would not willingly have done so, because they felt comfortable in the tranquillity they enjoyed, and because they were afraid to expose themselves to fresh havoc. The peasants came and gave information to the republican officers of the road Charette had gone, and the hiding-places where he was for a moment laying his head; and when they could secure some of those who accompanied him, they brought and delivered them up to the army. Charette, attended by scarcely a hundred devoted servants, and followed by a few women who administered to his pleasures, had nevertheless no thoughts of surrendering. Being extremely mistrustful, he sometimes caused his hosts to be put to death, when he was fearful of their betraying him. It was said that he ordered a curé to be put to death whom he suspected of having betrayed him to the republicans. Travot fell in with him several times, killed about sixty of his men, several of his officers, and among the rest his brother. He had now only about forty or fifty men left.

While Hoche was thus causing Charette to be unceasingly harassed, and was following up his disarming system, Stofflet with consternation found himself surrounded on all sides, and was fully sensible that when Charette and Sapinaud were destroyed, and all the Chouans had made their peace, the sort of princely state he had arrogated to himself in Upper Anjou would no longer be endured; he considered that it would be too late for him to make up his mind when all the royalists were exterminated. Alleviating as an excuse an ordinance made by Hoche, he again raised the standard of revolt and resumed hostilities. Hoche was at this moment on the banks of the Loire, preparing to set out for the Calvados, that he might form a judgment from personal observation of the state of Normandy and Brittany. He immediately deformed his departure, and made his preparations for getting rid of Stofflet, before his rebellion could acquire any importance. Hoche was not after all sorry that Stofflet himself had given him a good reason to break the treaty. This war gave him little trouble, and authorized him to treat Anjou in the same manner as the Marais and Brittany. He despatched his columns from several points at once, from the Loire, the Layon, and the Nantes Sevre. Stofflet pressed on all sides, could not long keep his ground any where. The peasants of Anjou were still more sensible of the comforts of peace than those of the Marais; they had not responded to the call of their old chief, and had left him to begin the war with the profligates of the country, and the emigrants with whom his camp was filled. Two considerable bodies which he had collected were dispersed, and he found himself obliged to run, like Charette, to the woods. But he had neither the pertinacity or the adroitness of that leader, and his district was not so favourably disposed for concealing a troop of marauders. He was betrayed by his own creatures. Lured to a farmhouse upon pretext of a conference, he was seized, bound, and given up to the republicans. It is generally supposed that his trusty minister, the abbé Bornier, had a hand in this treachery. The capture of this leader was of great importance, on account of the moral effect it would produce in those parts. He was conveyed to Angers; and after undergoing an examination, he was shot, on the 7th Vendée (26th of February), in the presence of a vast concourse of people.

This news occasioned great rejoicings, and thus evidently pointed to the termination of the civil war in these unhappy countries. Hoche, in the midst of the very arduous duties this kind of warfare demanded, had occasion to be utterly disgusted. The royalists, as a matter of course, called him a villain and a blood-drinker, although he used the most legal measures to destroy them; but the patriots themselves annoyed him by their cunningness. The refugees of La Vendée and Brittany, whose phrenzy he had checked, and whose indolence he discouraged by ceasing to give them food after they were safe in returning to their fields, denounced him to the directory. The authorities of those towns which he had placed in a state of siege, complained of the establishment of the military system, and also denounced him. Communes subjected to amercements, or to the military levy of the taxes, complained in their turn. There was an incessant chorus of complaints and remonstrances. Hoche, whose temper was irritable, was several times driven to despair, and formally tendered his resignation. The directory refused it, and soothed him by renewed demonstrations of confidence and esteem. They made him a national present of two fine horses, a present which was not merely an acknowledgment, but a most serviceable assistance. This young general, who was fond of pleasure, who was at the head of an army of one hundred thousand men, and who disposed of the revenues of several provinces, was frequently in want of common necessities. His salary, paid in paper, was reduced to nothing. He was in want of horses, saddles, and bridles, and he asked for permission to take, on paying for them, six saddles, six bridles, some horseshoes, a few bottles of rum, and some leaves of sugar, from the stores left by the English at Quiberon: an admirable example of delicacy, which our republican generals frequently demonstrated, but which became less frequent according as our acquisitions became more extended, and as our military habits were becoming corrupted by the effect of conquests and the manners of a court.

Being encouraged by the government, Hoche continued his efforts for bringing his exertions to a conclusion in La Vendée. The complete pacification was entirely dependant upon the capture of Charette. That leader, reduced to extremity, made a request to Hoche for permission to go to England. Hoche consented to this, in conformity with the authority given him by the ordinance of the directory concerning those chiefs who should make their submission. But Charette had made this application merely to gain a short respite, and had no intention of availing himself of the permission. The directory, on its part, had made up its mind not to pardon Charette, because it conceived that this famous leader would always be a bugbear to the country. They wrote to Hoche, desiring him not to grant him any favour. But when Hoche received these new orders, Charette had already declared that his application was nothing more than a feint to obtain a little rest, and that he would not sue for pardon from republicans. He had again gone to the woods.

Charette could not long escape the republicans. Pursued by columns of infantry, watched by troops of disguised soldiers, informed against by the inhabitants, who were anxious to save their country from devastation, tracked in the woods like a wild beast, he fell on the 2nd Germinal (March 23) into an ambuscade laid for him by Travot. Armed to the teeth, and surrounded by some brave followers, who strove to cover him with their own bodies, he defended himself like a lion, and at length fell, after receiving several sabre wounds. He would not deliver his sword to any but the brave Travot, who treated him with all the respect due to such extraordinary courage. He was taken to the republican head-quarters, and received to table by Hédouville, the head of the staff. He conversed with great serenity, and showed no concern about the fate that awaited him. Conveyed first to Angers, he was afterwards removed to Nantes, to end his life in the same place that had witnessed his triumph. He underwent an examination, when he answered with great calmness and propriety. He was questioned concerning the alleged secret articles of the treaty of La Jannaye, and he confessed they never existed. He neither attempted to palliate his conduct or to justify his motives; he acknowledged that he was in the service of royalty, and that he had done his utmost to overthrow the republic. He exhibited great dignity and unconcern. When led forth to execution, amidst an immense concourse of people, who were not sufficiently generous to forget his having brought upon them the miseries of a civil war, he retained all his assurance. He was covered with blood, had lost three fingers in the last encounter, and carried his arm in a sling. A handkerchief was wrapped round his head. He would neither suffer his eyes to be bandaged, or kneel down. Standing erect, he removed his arm from the sling, and gave the signal. He instantly fell dead. This was on the 9th Germinal (March 29th). Thus died that celebrated man, whose indomitable courage brought so many calamities upon his country, and would have done him honour in a better cause. Compromised by the last attempt at invasion which had been made upon these coasts, he would not give in, and was driven to desperation. He manifested, it is said, the strongest resentment against the princes he had served, and by whom he considered himself as abandoned.

The death of Charette caused as much joy as the greatest victory over the Austrians would have done. His death put an end to the civil war. Hoche, conceiving that there was nothing more to be done in La Vendée, withdrew from it the greater part of his troops, to take them beyond the Loire, and disarm Brittany. Nevertheless, he left forces sufficient to repress the solitary outrages which ordinarily accompany civil wars, as also to effect the complete disarming of the country. Before he passed into Brittany, he had to quell rebellious movements which had burst forth in the vicinity of Anjou, towards Berry. This occupied him for a few days; he then proceeded with twenty thousand men into Brittany, and in conformity with his design, he inclosed it with a vast cordon from the Loire to Granville. The wretched Chouans could not withstand so powerful and so well concerted a manœuvre; Séepeaux, between the Vilaine and the Loire, was the first to tender his submission. He delivered up a considerable quantity of arms. In proportion as the Chouans were driven back towards the sea, the more desperate they became. Being without ammunition, they fought hand to hand, with daggers and bayonets. At length they were driven completely up in a corner to the sea. The people of the Morbihan, long since detached from Puisaye, laid down their arms. The other divisions followed this example one after the other. The whole of Brittany was speedily reduced in its turn, and Hoche had nothing to do but to distribute his hundred thousand men into numerous cantonnements, that they might watch the country, and victual themselves more readily. All that now remained for him to attend to simply consisted in matters of administration and police. All that he wanted now was a few months' efficient and temperate government to soothe animosities and re-establish tranquillity. Notwithstanding the furious outcry of all the parties, Hoche was feared, beloved, and respected, in the country, and the royalists began to be well disposed towards a republic that was so worthily represented. The clergy, in particular, whose confidence he had managed to gain, were wholly devoted to him, and gave him correct information of all it concerned him to know. Every thing betokened peace and the termination of these horrible calamities. England could no longer reckon upon the provinces of the west for attacking the republic through the medium of internal dissensions. On the contrary, England witnessed in these countries one hundred thousand men, half of whom now became available for active service, and might be employed in some enterprise injurious to her. Hoche, in fact, was contemplating a vast design, which he reserved for the middle of the summer. The government, extremely gratified by the service he had just rendered, and desirous of rewarding him for the repulsive task he had so ably performed, caused it to be declared, both in regard to himself and to the armies who gained such important victories, that the army of the ocean and its commander had deserved well of the country.

Thus La Vendée was in a state of peace by the month of Germinal, before any of the armies had taken the field. The directory could now attend without distraction to its great operations, and even obtain from the districts near the sea efficient reinforcements.

CHAPTER III.

CAMPAIGN OF 1796.—CONQUEST OF PIEDMONT AND LOMBARDY BY GENERAL BONAPARTE. BATTLES OF MONTENOTTE AND MILLESIMO. THE PASSAGE OF THE BRIDGE OF LODI. ESTABLISHMENT AND POLICY OF THE FRENCH IN ITALY.—MILITARY OPERATIONS IN THE NORTH.—PASSAGE OF THE RHINE BY GENERALS JOURDAN AND MOREAU. BATTLES OF BADSTADT AND ETTLINGEN.—THE ARMY OF ITALY TAKES ITS STAND UPON THE ADIGE AND THE ARMY OF GERMANY UPON THE DANUBE.

THE fifth campaign of liberty was about to commence. It was to be opened upon the two finest military theatres in Europe—on those most diversified with impediments of art or nature, and lines of defence or attack. These were, on the one hand, the extensive valley of the Rhine, and the two transverse valleys of the Maine and the Neckar; and on the other, the Alps, the Po, and Lombardy. The armies that were now going to fall in line, were the most warlike that had ever been seen under arms; they were sufficiently numerous to cover the ground on which they were to act, but not sufficiently so to render combinations useless, and thus confine the war to a mere invasion. They were commanded by young generals, disengaged from the pedantry of routine, emancipated from obsolete habits, but yet well informed, and elevated by great events. Every thing, therefore, concurred to render the conflict hard-fought, diversified, fertile in combinations, and worthy of public attention.

The plan of the French government was, as we have seen, to invade Germany, so as to quarter its armies upon the enemy's country, to separate the princes from the empire, to invest Mentz, and to threaten the hereditary states. It purposed at the same time to make a bold attempt upon Italy, with a view to quarter its armies there, and to wrest that rich country from Austria.

Two fine armies, of from seventy to eighty thousand men each, were sent to the Rhine under the command of two celebrated generals. About thirty thousand half-starved soldiers were committed to an unknown, but bold young man, to try his fortune beyond the Alps.

Bonaparte arrived at the head-quarters at Nice on the 6th Germinal (March 27). Every thing there was in a deplorable state. The troops were reduced to the last degree of distress. Without clothes, without shoes, without pay, and sometimes without food, they nevertheless endured their privations with extraordinary fortitude. In accordance with that inventive spirit which characterizes the French soldier, they had formed a regular system of plunder, and descended by turns and in bands into the plains of Piedmont to procure provisions. There were no horses whatever to serve the artillery. In order to maintain the cavalry, they had been sent to the rear to the banks of the Rhone. The thirtieth horse and the forced loan had not yet been levied in the south, on account of the troubles. All that Bonaparte had received, which was to serve all his wants, were two thousand louis in money and a million in bills, part of which were protested. In order to supply himself with what was necessary, negotiations were opened with the Genoese government, so as to obtain from it some assistance. No satisfaction for the outrage on the Modeste frigate had yet been made, and to satisfy that violation of neutrality, the senate of Genoa was required to consent to a loan, and to deliver up to the French the fortress of Gavi, which commands the road from Genoa to Milan. The recall of the Genoese families banished for their attachment to France was likewise insisted upon. Such was the state of the army when Bonaparte arrived thither.

The army presented quite a different appearance in respect of the men. They were for the most part soldiers who had been hastily sent off to the armies at the time of the levy en masse, well informed, young, accustomed to privations, and inured to war by the gigantic conflicts in which they had been engaged amid the Pyrenees and the Alps. The generals were in no wise inferior to the soldiers. The principal were Masséna, a young man of Nice, of uncultivated mind, but collected and intelligent in danger, and of indomitable perseverance; Augereau, formerly a fencing-master, whom great bravery and skill in managing the soldiers had raised to the highest rank; Laharpe, an expatriated Swiss, combining information with courage; Serrurier, formerly a major, methodical and brave; lastly, Berthier, whom his activity, his precision in attending to details, his geographical acquirements, and his capacity for measuring with the eye the extent of a ground or the numerical force of a column, rendered eminently qualified for a useful and convenient head of the staff.

This army had its barracks (dépôts) in Provence; it was ranged along the chain of the Alps, connecting itself by its left with Kellermann's army, protecting the pass of the Tende, and stretching towards the Apennines. The effective army amounted at most to thirty-six thousand men. Serrurier's division was at Garosio, beyond the Apennines, to watch the Piedmontese in their intrenched camp of Ceva. The divisions of Augereau, Masséna, and Laharpe, forming a mass of about thirty thousand men, kept on this side the Apennines.

The Piedmontese, to the number of twenty or twenty-two thousand men, and under the command of Colli, were encamped at Ceva, on the back of the mountains. The Austrians, to the number of thirty-six or thirty-eight thousand, were advancing by the roads of Lombardy towards Genoa. Beaulieu, who commanded them, had distinguished himself in the Netherlands. He was an old man who still exhibited the ardour of youth. The enemy had therefore about sixty thousand men to oppose to the thirty thousand whom Bonaparte had to bring into line; but the Austrians and the Piedmontese were far from being on good terms with each other. According to the old plan, Colli wanted to protect Piedmont; and Beaulieu desired to keep himself in communication with Genoa and the English.

Such was the respective force of the two parties. Although Bonaparte had already distinguished himself with the army of Italy, he was considered far too young to command it. Of a short slight figure, without any peculiarity in his appearance beyond Roman features and his steady and piercing eye, there was nothing in his person or past life that seemed remarkable. He was received without any great show of attention. Masséna owed him a grudge for having gained an influence over Dumerbion in 1794. Bonaparte addressed the army in energetic language. "Soldiers," said he, "you are ill-fed and almost naked. The government owes you much, but can do nothing for you. Your patience, your courage, do you honour, but procure you neither benefit nor glory. I am going to lead you into the most fertile plains in the world; you will there find large cities, rich provinces; you will there also obtain honour, glory, and wealth. Soldiers of Italy, would your courage fail you?" The army hailed this language with delight: young generals who all had their fortune to make, poor and adventurous soldiers desired nothing better than to see the beautiful countries thus promised them. Bonaparte made an arrangement with a contractor, and procured for his soldiers a part of their pay which was in arrear. He gave to each of his generals four louis in gold, which shows what was then the state of their fortunes. He next removed his head-quarters to Albenga, and made all the authorities proceed along the coast under the fire of the English gunboats.

The plan to be followed was the same that had suggested itself the year before at the battle of Luno. To penetrate by the lowest pass of the Apennines, and to separate the Piedmontese from the Austrians by bearing strongly on their centre,— such was the very simple idea that Bonaparte conceived on a survey of the localities. He commenced operations in such good time, that he had hopes of surprising his enemies and throwing them into disorder. However, he was not able to anticipate them. Before he arrived, general Cervoni had been sent forward upon Voltri, quite close to Genoa, to intimidate the senate of that city, and to compel them to consent to the demands of the directory. Beaulieu, apprehensive of the result of this step, lost no time in getting into action, and brought his army to Genoa, partly on one slope of the Apennines, partly on the other. Bonaparte's plan therefore still remained practicable, excepting his intention of surprising the Austrians. Several roads led from the back of the Apennines to their slope towards the sea: in the first place that which runs by the Bocchetta to Genoa, then that of Acqui and Dego which crosses the Apennines at the pass of Montenotte and falls into the basin of Savona. Beaulieu left his right wing at Dego, despatched his centre under d'Argenteau to the pass of Montenotte, and proceeded himself with his left by the Bocchetta and Genoa, upon Voltri, along the sea-side. Thus his position was the same as that of Devins at Loano. Part of the Austrian army was between the Apennines and the sea; the centre under d'Argenteau was on the very summit of the Apennines, at the pass of Montenotte, and was connected with the Piedmontese encamped at Ceva, on the other side the mountains.

The two armies, putting themselves in motion at the same time, met by the way, on the 22nd Germinal (April 11), at the sea-side. Beaulieu fell in with the advanced guard of Laharpe's division, which had been despatched upon Voltri, to alarm Genoa, and repulsed it. D'Argenteau, with the centre, crossed the pass of Montenotte, with the intention of falling at Savona upon the centre of the French army, during its supposed march towards Genoa. At Montenotte he found only colonel Rampon, at the head of twelve hundred men, and obliged him to fall back into the old redoubt of Montelegrino, which stopped up the road to Montenotte. The brave colonel, sensible of the importance of this position, retired within the redoubt, and obstinately resisted all the efforts of the Austrians. Thrice was he attacked by the whole of the enemy's infantry, and thrice did he repulse it. Amidst the most galling fire he called upon his soldiers to swear that they would die in the redoubt rather than give it up. The soldiers swore, and remained all night under arms. This act of courage saved the plans of general Bonaparte, and in all probability the future success of the campaign.

Bonaparte was at this moment at Savona. He had not caused the pass of Montenotte to be intrenched, because no one ever intrenches himself when he has made up his mind to take the offensive. He learned what had occurred during the day at Montelegrino and Voltri. He immediately became sensible that the moment was come for putting his plan in execution, and took his measures accordingly. That same night he drew back his right, which was formed by Laharpe's division, and at that very time engaged along the sea-side with Beaulieu, and sent it by the road to Montenotte to meet d'Argenteau. He despatched Augereau's division upon the same point, to support the division of Laharpe. Lastly he made Masséna's division march by a by-road to the other side of the Apennines, so as to bring it into the very rear of d'Argenteau's division. On the morning of the 23rd (April 12), all his columns were in motion; himself stationed on an elevated knoll, he saw Laharpe and Augereau marching to join d'Argenteau, while Masséna was making his way upon his rear. The Austrian infantry made a brave resistance; but surrounded on all sides by superior forces, it was put to the rout, and left two thousand prisoners and several hundred dead on the field. It fled in disorder towards Dego, where the rest of the army was.

Thus Bonaparte, whom Beaulieu supposed had intended to file off along the coast to Genoa, had suddenly slipped away, and proceeding by the road which crosses the Apennines, had broken through the enemy's centre, and victoriously debouched beyond the mountains.

In his eyes, no good had been done in overwhelming the centre, unless the Austrians were cut off for ever from the Piedmontese. He proceeded on the same day (23rd) to Carenra, to render his position more central between the two allied armies. He was in the valley of the Bormida, which runs into Italy. Lower down, before him, and at the extremity of the valley, were the Austrians, who had rallied at Dego, guarding the road from Acqui into Lombardy. On his left, he had the narrow passes of Millesimo, which join the valley of Bormida, and in which the Piedmontese were guarding the road to Ceva and Piedmont. It was requisite, therefore, that at one and the same time, his left should force the narrow passes of Millesimo, so as to take possession of the Piedmont road, and that in front he should take Dego, to open for himself the road to Acqui and Lombardy. Then master of both roads, he would have completely cutoff the allies from each other, and might at pleasure rush upon them singly or altogether.

On the morning of the next day, the 24th (April 13), he put forward his army in advance; Augereau, towards the left, attacked Millesimo, and the divisions of Masséna and Laharpe advanced into the valley towards Dego. The impetuous Augereau dashed with such spirit upon the narrow passes of Millesimo, that he forced them, entered, and reached the extremity before general Provera, who was posted on a height, had time to retreat. The latter was posted in the ruins of the old castle of Cossaria. Finding himself surrounded, he attempted to defend himself there; Augereau surrounded and summoned him to surrender. Provera began to parley, and wanted to treat. It was of importance not to be stopped by this obstacle, and the troops immediately attacked the post. The Piedmontese poured upon them a deluge of stones, and rolled down enormous rocks, which crushed whole lines. The brave Joubert, nevertheless, encouraged his men, and climbed the height at their head. On arriving within a distance, he fell, shot by a cannon-ball. At this sight, the soldiers fell back. They were obliged to encamp in the evening at the foot of the height; here they protected themselves by some felled trees, and kept watch the whole night to prevent Provera's making his escape. On their part, the divisions sent to engage at the bottom of the valley of the Bormida, had in the mean time marched upon Dego, and made themselves masters of the outworks. The morrow was to be the decisive day.

Accordingly, on the 25th (April 14), the attack again became general on all points. On the left, Augereau, in the narrow pass of Millesimo, repulsed all the efforts made by Colli to extricate Provera, fought him the whole day, and drove Provera to desperation. It ended by the latter laying down his arms at the head of fifteen hundred men. Laharpe and Masséna, on their part, fell upon Dego, where the Austrian army had been reinforced, on the 22nd and 23rd, by regiments from Genoa. The attack was terrible. After several assaults, Dego was taken; the Austrians lost part of their artillery, and left four thousand prisoners, among whom were twenty-four officers.

During this action, Bonaparte had remarked a young officer, named Lannes, who charged with great intrepidity. He made him colonel on the field of battle.

After four days' fighting, the army had need of repose; but scarcely had the soldiers rested from the fatigues of battle before the clangour of arms was again heard. Six thousand grenadiers of the enemy made their way into Dego, and carried against us this post which had cost us so much trouble to get. They were one of the Austrian divisions which had been left on the maritime slope of the Apennines, and were returning across the mountains. So great was the confusion, that this division had made its way into the middle of the French army before the danger was known. The brave Wukassovich, who commanded these six thousand grenadiers, thinking he should save himself by a bold stroke, had carried Dego. We had therefore to begin the battle again, and to renew the efforts of the preceding day. Bonaparte galloped to the spot, rallied his columns, and pushed them forwards upon Dego. Their progress was stopped by the Austrian grenadiers; but they returned to the charge, and at length led on by adjutant-general Lanusse, who put his hat on the point of his sword, they forced their way into Dego, and recovered their conquest, together with some hundreds of prisoners.

Thus Bonaparte was master of the valley of the Bormida; the Austrians fled towards Acqui, upon the road to Milan; the Piedmontese, after they had lost the narrow passes of Millesimo, retired upon Ceva and Mondovi. He was master of all the roads; he had nine thousand prisoners, and spread consternation before him. By skilfully managing the mass of his forces, and bringing them to bear alternately upon Montenotte and upon Millesimo and Dego, he had crushed the enemy in every place by making himself stronger than the enemy on every point. This was the moment for forming a great resolution. Carnot's plan enjoined him not to trouble himself about the Piedmontese, in order that he might dash upon the Austrians. Bonaparte thought the Piedmontese army deserved more consideration, and was not inclined that it should be left in his rear; he was moreover sensible that only one more attack would destroy it; and he deemed it more prudent to complete the destruction of the Piedmontese. He did not therefore enter the valley of the Bormida, and descend towards the Po after the Austrians; he took the left road, forced his way into the narrow passes of Millesimo, and followed the road to Piedmont. Laharpe's division alone was left in the camp of San Benedetto, commanding the course of the Belbo and the Bormida, and keeping watch upon the Austrians. The soldiers were worn out with fatigue; they had fought on the 22nd and 23rd at Montenotte, on the 24th and 25th at Millesimo and Dego; they had lost and retaken Dego on the 26th, had rested only on the 27th, and were again marching on the 28th upon Mondovi. During these rapid marches, there had not been time to distribute the regular allowance, the soldiers were entirely destitute, and they committed acts of spoliation. Bonaparte, indignant, was exceedingly severe upon the marauders, and displayed as much energy in re-establishing discipline as in pursuing the enemy. Bonaparte had gained in a few days the entire confidence of the soldiers. The generals of division yielded to his opinion. They listened with attention, nay with admiration, to the terse and figurative language of the young captain. On the heights of Monte-Zemoto, which had to be crossed to reach Ceva, the army perceived the lovely plains of Piedmont and Italy. The French armies beheld the Tanaro, the Stura, the Po, and all those rivers that run into the Adriatic; they beheld in the back-ground the Upper Alps covered with snow, and were lost in the contemplation of those beautiful plains of the *land of promises. Bonaparte was at the head of his soldiers; he was affected, "Mannibal," he exclaimed, "crossed the Alps; as for us, we have gone round them." This saying made the object of the campaign intelligible to all. What splendid expectations then opened before our eyes!

Colli defended the intrenched camp of Ceva no longer than was necessary to somewhat delay our march. This excellent officer had contrived to encourage his soldiers, and to keep up their spirits. He had no longer any hope of beating his formidable enemy; but his object was to retreat foot by foot, and to give the Austrians time to come to his relief, in rejoining them by a circuitous march, as they had promised him. He halted behind the Cursaglia, in advance of Mondovi. Serrurier, who on the opening of the campaign had been left at Garesio to watch Colli, had just rejoined the army. Thus one more division was added. Colli was protected by the Cursaglia, a deep and rapid stream, which falls into the Tanaro. On the right, Joubert endeavoured to cross, but he narrowly escaped being drowned in the attempt. In the front, Serrurier attempted to cross the bridge of Saint Michael, in which he succeeded; but Colli, suffering him to make the attack, fell upon him unawares with his best troops, drove him back upon the bridge, and made him pass over the river in confusion. The situation of the army was awkward. On its rear was Beaulieu, who was preparing himself anew; and it was necessary to succeed against Colli as speedily as possible. However, it scarcely seemed practicable to carry the position if it were vigorously defended. Bonaparte ordered a fresh attack to be made on the following day. On the 2nd Floréal (April 21), he marched to the Cursaglia, where they found the bridges abandoned. The only object Colli had in making the defence of the preceding day was to delay the retreat. He was surprised in line at Mondovì. Serurier decided the victory by taking the principal redoubt, that of La Bicoque. Colli left behind him three thousand killed or prisoners, and pursued his retreat. Bonaparte arrived at Cherasco, an ill-defended place, but important from its position at the confluence of the Stura and the Tanaro, and easy to make defensible with the artillery taken from the enemy. In this position, Bonaparte was twenty leagues from Savona his point of departure, ten leagues from Turin, and fifteen from Alexandria.

* An expression made use of by Bonaparte.

There was great confusion at the court of Turin. The king, who was very obstinate, would not yield. The ministers of England and Austria beset him with their remonstrances, and persuaded him to shut himself up in Turin, to send his army beyond the Po, and thus to imitate the great examples of his ancestors. They terrified him with the revolutionary influence which the French were likely to exercise in Piedmont; they demanded for Beaulieu the three fortresses of Tortona, Alexandria, and Valenza, that he might shut himself up and defend himself in the Delta they form on the banks of the Po. This was the very thing the king [of Sardinia] chiefly opposed. The idea of giving his three principal fortresses to his ambitious neighbour of Lombardy, was to him insupportable. Cardinal Costa made him decide on throwing himself into the arms of the French. He represented to him the impossibility of resisting so rapid a conqueror, the danger of irritating him by a protracted defence, and thus driving him to revolutionize Piedmont, and all this to minister to a foreign and even inimical ambition, that of Austria. The king yielded, and caused overtures to be made by Colli to Bonaparte. They reached Cherasco on the 4th Floréal (April 23rd); Bonaparte had not power to sign a peace, but he was capable of signing an armistice, and he resolved upon doing so. He had not deviated from the plan of the directory, which had for its object the reduction of the Piedmontese; nevertheless, he had not proceeded so as to effect the conquest of Piedmont, but merely to protect his rear. To conquer Piedmont he must have taken Turin, and he had neither the requisite artillery, or forces sufficient to furnish a blockading corps, and to keep an effective army in reserve. Besides all this, the campaign would then have been confined to a siege. By keeping up a good understanding with Piedmont, with the necessary guarantees, he might securely fall upon the Austrians and drive them out of Italy. Those about him said that he ought not to accede to any terms, that he ought to dethrone a king who was a kinsman of the Bourbons, and diffuse the French revolution in Piedmont. This was the opinion of many soldiers, officers, and generals, in the army, and especially of Angereau, who was born in the faubourg Saint-Antoine, and retained the opinions he had formed there. Young Bonaparte thought otherwise. He felt the difficulty of revolutionizing a monarchy which was the only military one in Italy, and in which old habits and modes of thinking were preserved unchanged; he could have no motive in raising up obstacles in his route; his object was to make a rapid march to the conquest of Italy, which depended on the destruction of the Austrians, and their being driven out beyond the Alps. He would not, therefore, do any thing that might render his situation confused, and delay his march.

Consequently, he assented to an armistice; but he added that, in the relative state of the armies, an armistice would be ruinous to him unless he had certain guarantees for the security of his rear given him; accordingly he required that the three fortresses of Coni, Tortona, and Alexandria, should be given up, together with all the stores they contained, which would be useful to his army, and for which the republic were to account; that the roads of Piedmont should be thrown open to the French, which would considerably shorten the distance between France and the banks of the Po; that a victualling establishment should be prepared on these roads for the troops that should pass that way; and lastly, that the Sardinian army should be distributed among the fortresses, so that the French army might have nothing to fear from it. These conditions were agreed to, and the armistice was signed at Cherasco on the 9th Floréal (April 20th), with colonel Lacoste and count Latour.

It was agreed that plenipotentiaries should set out immediately for Paris to treat for a definitive peace. The three fortresses demanded were given up, with immense magazines. From that moment the army had its line of operation protected by the three strongest places in Piedmont; it had safe and commodious roads, much shorter than those running through the Riviera of Genoa; it had abundance of provisions; it was reinforced by a multitude of soldiers, who at the news of victory quitted the hospitals; it possessed a numerous artillery, taken at Cherasco, and from the different places, and also a great number of horses; in short, it was provided with every thing; and the promises of the general were fulfilled. During the first few days after the entrance of the army into Piedmont it had plundered, because the rapidity of its marches had prevented the distribution of provisions. Hunger being satisfied, order was restored. The count de Saint-Marsan, the Piedmontese minister, visited Bonaparte, and managed to please him; even the king's son was anxious to see the young conqueror, and lavished testimonies of esteem, which deeply affected Bonaparte. Bonaparte replied with great tact to the compliments he received; he dismissed all apprehensions from their minds in regard to the intentions of the directory, and the dangers of revolution. He was sincere in his protestations, for he already entertained an idea, which he adroitly suffered to peep forth in subsequent interviews. Piedmont had marred her interests by allying herself with Austria; it was to France that she ought to ally herself; France was her natural friend, for France separated from Piedmont by the Alps could not desire to possess herself of Piedmont; on the contrary, she was able to defend Piedmont against the ambition of Austria, and even minister to her aggrandizement. Bonaparte could not suppose that the directory would consent to give any part of Lombardy to Piedmont; for it was not yet conquered, and there could exist no desire of making such a conquest, save for the purpose of making it an equivalent for the Netherlands; but a vague hope of aggrandizement might dispose Piedmont to ally herself with France, which would have procured us a reinforcement of twenty thousand excellent troops. Bonaparte promised nothing, but he managed by a few words to excite the covetousness and the hopes of the cabinet of Turin.

Bonaparte, who with a peremptory disposition combined a vigorous and lofty imagination, and was fond of making an impression, wished to proclaim his successes in a new and striking manner: he sent Murat, his aide-de-camp, to present with great solemnity to the directory twenty-one colours taken from the enemy. He then addressed the following proclamation to his soldiers:

"Soldiers! in a fortnight you have gained six victories, taken twenty-one pair of colours, fifty-five pieces of cannon, several fortresses, and conquered the richest part of Piedmont; you have made fifteen thousand prisoners*, and killed or wounded more than ten thousand men; you had hitherto been fighting for barren rocks, rendered famous by your courage, but of no service to the country; you this day compete by your services with the army of Holland and of the Rhine. Destitute of every thing, you have supplied all your wants. You have gained battles without cannon, crossed rivers without bridges, made forced marches without shoes, bivouacked without brandy, and often without bread. Republican phalanges, the soldiers of liberty alone, could have endured what you have endured. Thanks be to you for it, soldiers! your grateful country will have to thank you for its prosperity; and if when conquerors at Toulon, you predicted the glorious campaign of 1793, your present victories predict one still more glorious. The two armies which so lately attacked you so boldly, are flying affrighted before you; the perverse men who mocked at your distress, and rejoiced in their heart at the triumphs of your enemies, are confounded and trembling. But, soldiers, you have done nothing so long as any thing yet remains to be done. Neither Turin or Milan is yours; the ashes of the conquerors of Tarquin are still trampled upon by the murderers of Basseville! There are said to be among you some whose courage is diminishing, and who would prefer returning to the summits of the Apennines and of the Alps. No; I cannot believe it. The conquerors of Montenotte, Millesimo, Dego, and Mondovi, are burning with impatience to bear the glory of the French people to distant climes!"

When these intelligences, these colours, and these proclamations arrived one after the other at Paris, the rejoicing was infinite. On the first day, it was a victory that opened the Apennines, and produced two thousand prisoners; on the second it was a still more decisive victory, that cut off the Piedmontese from the Austrians, and produced six thousand prisoners. The following days brought news of further successes: the destruction of the Piedmontese army at Mondovi, the submission of Piedmont at Cherasco, and the certainty of a speedy peace, which gave room to expect others. The rapidity of these successes, and the number of the prisoners, surpassed every thing that had yet been seen. The language of these proclamations called up the associations of antiquity, and astonished the public mind. Every body was inquiring who this young general was, whose name, known to some appreciators of merit but unknown to France, now for the first time blazed forth. They could not pronounce it correctly at first, and they said with joy, that the republic saw new talents daily springing up to render her illustrious and to defend her. The councils three several times declared that the army of Italy had deserved well of the country, and decreed a fête to Victory, for the purpose of celebrating the prosperous commencement of the campaign. The aide-de-camp sent by Bonaparte presented the colours to the directory. The ceremony was impressive. Several foreign ambassadors were on that day received, and the government appeared surrounded by a consideration quite new to it.

Piedmont having submitted, general Bonaparte had nothing to hinder him from marching in pursuit of the Austrians, and hastening to the conquest of Italy. The news of the victories of the French had deeply agitated all the states of that country. He who was about to enter thither should be a profound politician as well as a great captain, in order to conduct himself there with prudence. Every body knows the face of country it exhibits to one emerging from the Apennines. The Alps, the loftiest mountains in our part of Europe, after describing an immense semicircle to the west, in which they include Upper Italy, turn short and run all at once in an oblique line towards the south, thus forming a long peninsula washed by the Adriatic and the Mediterranean. Bonaparte coming from the west, and having crossed the chain at the point where it lowers and runs off, by the name of the Apennines, to form the peninsula, had before him the beautiful semicircle of Upper Italy, and on his right that long narrow peninsula which forms Lower Italy. A number of petty states divided that country, which is always sighing for an united government, without which it can have no existence as a great nation.

Bonaparte had passed through the state of Genoa, which is situated on this side of the Apennines, and Piedmont, which is on the other side. Genoa, an ancient republic, founded by Doris, was the only one of all the Italian governments that retained any real energy. Placed for the last four years between the two belligerent armies, it had contrived to maintain its neutrality, and had thus secured all the advantages of commerce. Between its capital and the coast, it numbered nearly one hundred thousand inhabitants; it generally kept from three to four thousand troops; in case of emergency, it could arm all the peasants of the Apennines, and from them obtain an excellent militia; and it was wealthy, from its vast revenues. Two parties divided it; the party adverse to France had gained the ascendancy, and expelled several families. The directory had to require the recall of these families, and an indemnity for the outrage committed on the Majesta frigate.

On leaving Genoa, and stretching to the right into the peninsula, along the southern slope of the Apennines, fertile Tuscany first meets the eye, situated on the two banks of the Arno, in the mildest climate, and in one of the best sheltered parts of Italy. One portion of this tract formed the small republic of Lucca, peopled with one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants; the rest formed the grand duchy of Tuscany, governed recently by the archduke Leopold, and now by the archduke Ferdinand. In this country, the most enlightened and the most polished of Italy, the philosophy of the eighteenth century had kindly germinated. Leopold had there accomplished his admirable legislative reforms, and had tried with success experiments most honourable to humanity. The bishop of Pistoja had also commenced a sort of religious reform by propagating Jansenist doctrines there. Although the revolution had alarmed the weak and timid minds of Tuscany, yet it was there that France had most admirers and friends. The archduke, although an Austrian, had been one of the first princes in Europe to recognise the republic. He had a million of subjects, six thousand troops, and a revenue of fifteen millions. Unfortunately Tuscany was the least able of all the principalities to defend itself.

* In fact, scarcely more than ten to twelve thousand.

After Tuscany, came the states of the church. The provinces subject to the Pope, situated on both sides of the Apennines, and extending to the Adriatic and the Mediterranean, were the worst governed in Europe. They had only their fine system of agriculture, handed down from remote ages, known to all Italy, an excellent substitute for the opulence of trade, from which she had been long excluded. Excepting in the legations* of Bologna and Ferrara, where a profound contempt for the government of priests prevailed, and at Rome, the ancient abode of science and the arts, where a few nobles had participated in the philosophy of all the great persons of Europe, the minds of men had remained in the most disgraceful barbarism. A superstitious and ferocious populace, together with idle and ignorant monks, composed that population of two million and a half of subjects. The army amounted to four or five thousand men, and every one knows what sort of an army that was. The Pope, a vain, ostentatious prince, jealous of his authority and that of the holy see, entertained an intense hatred for the philosophy of the eighteenth century; he thought he was restoring to the chair of St. Peter part of its influence by the display of great magnificence, and he had also undertaken works serviceable to the arts. Reckoning upon the majesty of his person, and the persuasion of his words, which was great, he had some time since undertaken a journey to Vienna, to bring back Joseph II. to the doctrines of the church, and to counteract the philosophy which seemed to have the sole possession of the mind of that prince. This expedition had not been successful. The pontiff, in the plenitude of his disgust at the French revolution, had launched his anathema against her, and preached a crusade. He had even tolerated the murder of Basseville, the French agent in Rome. Excited by the monks, his subjects shared his hatred against France, and were seized with all the rage fanaticism could induce, when they heard of the success of our arms.

* Legation in this sense signifies a provincial district governed by a Legate, having exclusive jurisdiction, just as we should say the bishopric of Durham, the duchy of Lancaster, &c. Trans.

The extremity of the peninsula and Sicily compose the kingdom of Naples, the most powerful state in Italy, bearing the strongest analogy to Rome, both in its ignorance and barbarism, and still worse governed, if possible. A Bourbon reigned there, a mild, imbecile prince, devoted to one pursuit—the amusement of fishing. This occupation entirely absorbed his time; and while he was indulging his favourite amusement, the government of his kingdom was abandoned to his wife, an Austrian princess, sister of the queen of France. This princess, a woman of a capricious disposition and ill-regulated passions, having a favourite who was in the pay of the English, the minister Acton, conducted the affairs of the kingdom in a reckless manner. The English, whose policy it always was to gain a footing on the continent, by domineering over the petty states bordering on its coasts, had endeavoured to acquire the supreme influence at Naples, as well as in Portugal and Holland. They excited the hatred of the queen against France, and with that hatred inspired her with the ambition to rule Italy. The population of the kingdom of Naples consisted of six millions of inhabitants; the army, of sixty thousand; but differing in every respect from the orderly and brave soldiers of Piedmont, the Neapolitan soldiers, nothing else than lazzaroni, without conduct and without discipline, had the usual cowardice of armies totally neglected. Naples had always promised to send thirty thousand men to the army of Devins, and had sent no more than two thousand four hundred cavalry, well mounted and in good condition.

Such were the principal states situated in the peninsula on the right of Bonaparte. Facing him, in the semicircle of Upper Italy, there was first, on the slope of the Apennines, the duchy of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, comprising five hundred thousand inhabitants, keeping three thousand troops, furnishing a revenue of four millions, and governed by a Spanish prince, formerly a pupil of Condillac, but who, in spite of a sound education, had fallen under the yoke of monks and priests. A little further to the right, likewise on the declivity of the Apennines, were the duchies of Modena, Reggio, and Mirandola, peopled with four hundred thousand inhabitants, having six thousand men under arms, and subject to the last descendant of the illustrious house of Este. This distrustful prince had conceived such alarm at the spirit of the age, that by the mere force of his apprehensions he had become a prophet, and had foreseen the revolution. His predictions were cited. In his terror he had taken good care to fortify himself against the slings and arrows of fortune, and had amassed immense wealth by draining his dominions. Avaricious and timid, he was despised by his subjects, the most sharp-witted and the most malicious in Italy, and the most inclined to embrace the new modes of thinking. Further on, beyond the Po, came Lombardy, governed for Austria by an archduke. This beautiful and productive plain, situated between the waters of the Alps which fertilize it, and those of the Adriatic which bring to it the wealth of the east, covered with corn, rice, pastures, herds of cattle, and rich beyond all the provinces in the world, was dissatisfied with its foreign masters. It was Guelph at heart, notwithstanding its long slavery. It contained twelve hundred thousand inhabitants. Milan was always one of the most enlightened cities in Italy. Less favoured with respect to the arts than Florence or Rome, it was nevertheless more closely allied with the intelligence of the north, and contained a great number of persons who wished for the civil and political regeneration of the people.

The last state in Upper Italy was the ancient republic of Venice. This republic, with its old aristocracy inscribed in the golden book (Livre d'or), its state inquisition, its silence, its jealous and wary policy, was no longer a formidable power either to its subjects or its neighbours. With its provinces on the continent, situated at the foot of the Tyrol, and the provinces of Illyria, she numbered nearly three millions of subjects. She could raise so many as fifty thousand Slavonians, good soldiers, because they were well-disciplined, well kept, and well paid. She was rich in hereditary wealth, but it is well known that for two centuries her commerce had traversed the ocean, and borne her treasures to the islands of the Atlantic. She hardly possessed a few ships; and the passages of the lagoons were almost choked up. However, she still possessed great revenues. Her policy consisted in amusing her subjects, in lulling them by pleasure and repose, and in observing the strictest neutrality in regard to the neighbouring powers. Yet the nobles of the continent were jealous of the golden book, and bore with impatience the yoke of the nobility intrusted in the lagoons. At Venice itself, the citizens, who were an opulent class, began to think. In 1793, the allied powers had forced the senate to declare against France; they had complied, but had reverted to their neutral policy, so soon as treaties were set on foot with the French republic. As we have previously noticed, Venice had been as anxious as Prussia and Tuscany to send an ambassador to Paris. At this time also, in compliance with the request of the directory, it had just given notice to the head of the house of Bourbon, at that time Louis XVIII., to quit Verona. That prince had accordingly departed, declaring that he should insist on the restitution of some armour given by his ancestor Henry IV. to the senate, and on the obliteration of the name of his family from the pages of the golden book.

Such was Italy at that time. The general spirit of the age had made its way thither, and inflamed many minds. All the inhabitants did not wish for a revolution, particularly those who recollected the frightful scenes that had dyed our revolution in blood; but all wanted, though in different senses, a reform; and there was not a heart that did not experience emotion at the idea of the independence and unity of the Italian father-land. That population of husbandmen, tradesmen, artists, nobles, the priests alone excepted, who know no country but the church, was fired with the hope of seeing all the divisions of the country united into one, under the same government, either republican or monarchical, but Italian. In good sooth, a population of twenty million souls, possessing excellent sea-coasts and soil, great sea-ports and magnificent cities, might well constitute a glorious and powerful state! All it wanted was an army. Piedmont alone, always engaged in the wars of the continent, had brave and well-disciplined troops. Doubtless, nature was far from having denied natural courage to the other parts of Italy; but natural courage is nothing without a strong military organization. Italy had not a single regiment that could stand the sight of the French or Austrian bayonets.

On the approach of the French, the enemies of political reform had been struck with consternation; its advocates had been transported with joy. The entire mass was in anxiety; it had vague, uncertain presentiments; it knew not whether to hope or to fear.

Bonaparte on entering Italy was instructed and his object was to drive out the Austrians. His government being desirous as we have said of procuring peace, intended to conquer Lombardy, for no other purpose than to restore it to Austria, and to force her to cede the Netherlands. Bonaparte could not therefore think of liberating Italy. Besides, with some thirty thousand men, how could he avow a political object? Still, if the Austrians were driven beyond the Alps, and his power firmly established, he might exercise great influence, and in the course of events attempt great things. If, for instance, the Austrians, beaten at all points, on the Po, on the Rhine, and on the Danube, were obliged to cede even Lombardy, if the people in their ardour for freedom were to declare for liberty on the approach of the French armies, then great prospects would open for Italy. But in the mean time Bonaparte had no business to publish any particular object, in order not to irritate the princes whom he left in his rear. His intention, therefore, was not to demonstrate any revolutionary motive, but at the same time not to restrain imagination in its career, and to await the effects of the presence of the French upon the Italian people.

It was on this principle he avoided encouraging the discontented in Piedmont, because he there saw a country opposed to revolution, a strong government, and an army whose alliance might be serviceable to him.

The armistice of Cherasco had been scarcely signed before he was again upon the road. Many persons in the army disapproved of his marching forwards. What! said they; we are but thirty odd thousand; we have neither revolutionized Piedmont or Genoa; we have in our rear those governments, our covert enemies, and we are going to attempt the passage of a great river, such as the Po, to dash across Lombardy, and perhaps by our presence decide the republic of Venice to throw fifty thousand men into the scale! Bonaparte's orders were to move forward, and he was not a man to hang back with a bold order, but he obeyed it because he approved of it, and he had excellently digested reasons for its approval. Piedmont and Genoa would embarrass us much more, said he, if they were in revolution; thanks to the armistice, we have now a road secured by three fortresses; all the governments of Italy will be reduced if we can but drive the Austrians beyond the Alps; Venice will tremble if we are victorious at her side, the sound of our cannon will even decide her to ally herself with us; we must advance, then, not only beyond the Po, but likewise the Adda and the Mincio, to the line of the Adige; there we will besiege Mantua, and we will make all Italy tremble on our rear. The head of the young general, heated by his march, conceived even still more gigantic projects than those which he vowed to his army. He wanted, after having destroyed Beaulieu, to make his way into the Tyrol, to cross the Alps a second time, and to dash into the valley of the Danube, for the purpose of joining there the armies which had started from the banks of the Rhine. This colossal and imprudent plan was a tribute which a great and justly reasoning mind could not but pay to the two-fold presumption of youth and success. He wrote to his government, so that he might be empowered to carry it into execution.

He had taken the field on the 20th Germinal (April 11), the reduction of Piedmont had been perfected on the 9th Floréal (April 28) by the armistice of Cherasco; it had occupied him eighteen days. He set out immediately in pursuit of Beaulieu. He had stipulated with Piedmont that Valenza should be delivered up to him, that he might pass the Po at that place; but this condition was a feint,—it was not at Valenza that he wanted to cross the river. Beaulieu receiving intelligence of the armistice, had thought to possess himself by surprise of the three fortresses of Tortona, Valenza, and Alexandria. All he succeeded in doing was to surprise Valenza, into which he threw the Neapolitans; then seeing that Bonaparte was advancing rapidly, he hastened to recross the Po, that he might place that river between himself and the French army. He went and encamped at Valeggio, at the confluence of the Po and the Tésino, near the point of the angle formed by those two rivers. He there threw up some intrenchments, to fortify his position and oppose the passage of the French army.

Bonaparte, on quitting the dominions of the king of Sardinia, and entering those of the duke of Parma, received the envoys of that prince, who came to solicit the forbearance of the conqueror. The duke of Parma was related to Spain; some consideration therefore was to be shown to him, which, after all, was by no means foreign to the intentions of the general. Still he might subject him to some of the rights of war. Bonaparte received his envoys at the passage of the Trebbia. He affected some anger because the duke of Parma had not seized the opportunity of making peace, while Spain, his relative, was treating with the French republic. He then granted an armistice, demanding a tribute of two millions in money, of which the chest of the army was much in need; sixteen hundred horses, for the artillery and the baggage; a great quantity of wheat and oats; leave to pass through the duchy; and the establishment of hospitals for the sick at the expense of the prince. The general did not confine himself to this; he regarded and had a great admiration of the arts as an Italian; he well knew how much they add to the splendour of an empire, and the moral effect they produce on the imagination of men. He demanded twenty pictures, to be chosen by French commissioners and transferred to Paris. The envoys of the duke, too happy in appeasing at this price the anger of the general, consented to every thing, and lost no time in performing the conditions of the armistice. Nevertheless they offered a million to save the picture of Saint-Jerome. Bonaparte said to the army: "This million we should soon spend, and we shall get many more by our conquests. A masterpiece is everlasting; it will be an ornament to our country." The million was refused.

Bonaparte having obtained the advantages of conquest without its troubles, pursued his march. The condition inserted in the armistice of Cherasco, relative to the passage of the Po at Valenza, and the direction of the principal French columns towards that town, induced a belief that Bonaparte would attempt the passage of the river in its neighbourhood. While the main body of his army was already collected at the point where Beaulieu was expecting him to cross, on the 17th Floréal (May 6), he took together with a body of three thousand five hundred grenadiers, his cavalry and twenty-four pieces of cannon, descended along the Po, and arrived on the morning of the 18th at Placentia, after a march of sixteen leagues and of thirty-six hours. The cavalry had seized as it went along all the boats which it found on the banks of the river, and had brought them to Placentia; it had also taken a great quantity of forage, and the medical stores of the Austrian army. A barge carried the advanced guard commanded by colonel Lannes. That officer had no sooner reached the opposite side, than he dashed with his grenadiers upon some Austrian detachments, which were hastily coming up on the left bank of the Po, and dispersed them. The rest of the grenadiers crossed the river in due order, and began to construct a bridge for the passage of the army, which had received orders to descend in its turn to Placentia. Thus by a feint and a bold march, Bonaparte found himself beyond the Po, with the additional advantage of having turned the Tésino. In point of fact, had he crossed higher up, besides the difficulty of doing so in the face of Beaulieu, he would have come upon the Tésino, and have had to effectuate his passage over that also. But at Placentia there was no such inconvenience, for the Tésino at that point is united with the Po.

On the 18th of May, Liptai's division, the first to receive the intelligence, proceeded to Fombio, at a little distance from the Po, on the road to Pizzighitone. Bonaparte, not intending that it should be allowed to establish itself in a position round which the entire Austrian army was going to rally, and where he might be compelled to stand the attack with the river Po at his back, hastened to attack it with all the forces that he had about him. He rushed upon this division, which had intrenched itself; he dislodged it after a sanguinary action, and took from it two thousand prisoners. The rest of the division gained the road to Pizzighitone, and went to shelter itself in that place.

On the evening of the same day, Beaulieu, apprised of the passage of the Po at Placentia, came up to the support of Liptai's division. He knew nothing of the misfortune that division had met with; he fell in with the French advanced posts, was warmly received, and obliged to retreat in the utmost haste. Unfortunately the brave general Laharpe, so useful to the army for his intelligence and his intrepidity, was killed by his own soldiers amidst the darkness of the night. The whole army regretted the loss of this brave Swiss, whom the tyranny of Berne had brought into France.

The Po being crossed, the Tésino turned, and Beaulieu beaten and no longer able to keep the field, the route to Milan was open. It was natural that a conqueror of twenty-six should be impatient to enter that city. But Bonaparte was desirous, above all, to utterly defeat Beaulieu. To do this, he meant not merely to fight him; he meant to get at his rear, to cut off his retreat, and to oblige him, if possible, to lay down his arms. That he should not fail in his object, he had to anticipate him at the passage of the rivers. A great number of rivers flow from the Alps, and cross Lombardy in their way to the Po and the Adriatic. After the Po and the Tésino come the Adda, the Oglio, the Mincio, the Adige, and a great many more. Bonaparte now had before him the Adda, which he had not been able to turn as he did the Tésino, because he could not have crossed the Po but at Cremona. The passage of the Adda is at Pizzighitone, but the remains of Liptai's division had just thrown themselves into that place. Bonaparte hastened to go up along the Adda, so as to get to the bridge of Lodi. Beaulieu was there some time before him. It was impossible, therefore, for Bonaparte to get before him at the passage of that river. But Beaulieu had not with him at Lodi more than twelve thousand infantry and four thousand horse. Two other divisions, under Colli and Vukassovich, had made a circuit to Milan, to throw a garrison into the citadel, and were then to return to the Adda, to cross it at Cassano, considerably above Lodi. By endeavouring then to cross the Adda at Lodi, notwithstanding the opposition of Beaulieu, Bonaparte might possibly reach the other bank before the two divisions, which were to pass over at Cassano, had perfected their movement. In that case he might have some expectations of being able to cut them off.

Bonaparte came up before Lodi on the 20th Floréal (May 9). That town is situated on the same bank along which the French army had to come. Bonaparte caused it to be suddenly attacked, and got into it in spite of the Austrians. The latter then quitted the town, retired by the bridge, and went to rejoin the main body of their army on the other bank. It was this bridge they had to pass over, on leaving Lodi, in order to cross the Adda. Twelve thousand infantry and four thousand horse were drawn up on the opposite bank; twenty pieces of artillery enfiladed the bridge; a cloud of sharpshooters were posted on the bank. It was not customary in war to brave such difficulties: a bridge defended by sixteen thousand men and twenty pieces of artillery was an obstacle that nobody would have thought of getting over. The entire French army had sheltered itself from the fire behind the walls of Lodi, awaiting the orders of the general. Bonaparte sallied from the town, surveyed the banks of the river, amidst a shower of balls and grape-shot, and, having resolved upon his plan, returned to Lodi to put it in execution. He ordered his cavalry to go up the Adda and to endeavour to ford it above the bridge, he then caused a column of six thousand grenadiers to be formed: he went through the ranks, encouraged them, and communicated extraordinary courage by his presence and his address. He then ordered them to debouch by the gate that opened on the bridge, and to march at a running pace. He had calculated that from the rapidity of the movement the column would not have time to suffer much. This formidable column closed its ranks and debouched by running over the bridge; a tremendous fire was poured upon it, the entire head of the column was thrown down. Nevertheless the column advanced; having reached the middle of the bridge, it hesitated; but the generals encouraged it by their words and by their example. It recovered itself, advanced, rushed upon the guns, and killed the gunners who attempted to defend them. At this moment, the Austrian infantry approached in its turn to support its artillery; but, after what it had just done, the terrible column were no longer afraid of bayonets; it dashed upon the Austrians at the moment when the cavalry, which had found a ford, was threatening their flanks, overthrew them, and took two thousand prisoners.

This most daring exploit struck the Austrians with astonishment; but unfortunately it proved of no avail. Colli and Vukassovich had succeeded in gaining the causeway of Brescia, and could no longer be cut off. If the result had failed, at least the line of the Adda was carried, the courage of the soldiers was elevated to the highest pitch, and their devotion to their general was unbounded. In their gaiety they devised a singular practice, which serves to illustrate the national character. The oldest of the soldiers assembled one day, and seeing that their general was very young, they thought they would make him pass through every grade of promotion; at Lodi they called him corporal, and when he appeared in the camp, they saluted him by the title, since become so famous, of the little corporal. We shall find them hereafter conferring others upon him, according as he merited them.

The Austrian army had made good its retreat upon the Tyrol; it would have been useless to follow it. Bonaparte then resolved to turn back upon Lombardy, to take possession of and to organize it. The remains of Liptai's division had intrenched themselves at Pizzighitone, and might convert it into a fortification. He proceeded thither to drive them from the place; he then sent Masséna before him to Milan; Augereau fell back to occupy Pavia. He wished to overawe that great city, celebrated for its university, and to exhibit there one of the finest divisions of the army. Serrurier's and Laharpe's divisions were left at Pizzighitone, Lodi, Cremona, and Cassano, to protect the Adda.

Bonaparte now thought of repairing to Milan. On the approach of the French army, the partisans of Austria, and all those who were terrified at the reputation of our soldiers, who were reported to be as barbarous as they were brave, had fled and covered the roads to Brescia and the Tyrol. The archduke had set out, and had been seen to shed tears on leaving his beautiful capital. The greater part of the Milanese indulged their expectations, and awaited our army with the most favourable inclinations. When they had received the first division commanded by Masséna, and saw that those soldiers, whom report painted in such frightful colours, respected property, conducted themselves quietly with regard to persons, and manifested the kindly feelings natural to their character, they were filled with enthusiasm, and treated them with the utmost kindness. The patriots assembled from all parts of Italy, awaited the young conqueror, whose exploits were so rapid, and whose Italian name was so soft of pronunciation. They immediately despatched the count de Melzi to meet Bonaparte, and to promise him obedience. A national guard was formed and clothed in the three colours, green, red, and white. The duke de Serbelloni was appointed to command it. A triumphal arch was erected to welcome the French general. On the 26th Floréal (May 15), a month after the opening of the campaign, Bonaparte made his entry into Milan. The whole population of that capital went forth to meet him. The national guard was under arms. The municipality came and delivered to him the keys of the city. Acclamations accompanied him all the way to the Serbelloni palace, where accommodations had been prepared for him. He had now won the hearts of the Italians, as well as of the soldiers, and he was now enabled to act by moral force quite as powerfully as by physical force.

It was not his intention to stay long in Milan, any more than he had done at Cherasco after the submission of Piedmont. He meant to stay there time enough to temporarily organize the province, to extract from it the resources requisite for his army, and to put every thing in order, in regard to the places on his rear. His intention still was to hasten afterwards to the Adige and Mantua, and, if possible, to make his way into the Tyrol and the other side of the Alps.

The Austrians had left two thousand men in the citadel of Milan. Bonaparte caused it to be immediately invested. It was agreed with the commandant of the citadel that he should not fire upon the city, for it was Austrian property, which he had no motive in destroying. The operations of the siege were forthwith commenced.

Bonaparte, without entering into any specific engagement with the Milanese, or promising them an independence which he could not insure to them, nevertheless held out sufficient hopes to excite their patriotism. He spoke to them in energetic language, and said that, to obtain liberty, they must first deserve it by assisting in the utter separation of Italy from Austria. He instituted provisionally a municipal administration; he caused national guards to be everywhere formed, in order to commence the military organization of Lombardy. He next occupied himself with the wants of his army, and was obliged to make the Milanese pay a contribution of twenty millions. This measure appeared to him vexatious, because it must necessarily retard the march of the public mind; but, after all, it was not taken in very bad part, and it was moreover indispensable. Owing to the magazines found in Piedmont, and to the corn furnished by the duke of Parma, the army had abundance of provisions. The soldiers grew fat, they had good bread and good meat to eat, and excellent wine to drink. They were satisfied, and began to observe strict discipline. It only remained to clothe them. Still wearing the old clothes they had in the Alps, they were in rags, and no longer caused an impression, save by their renown, their martial bearing, and their admirable discipline. Bonaparte soon discovered new resources. The duke of Modena, whose states bordered upon the Po, below those of the duke of Parma, despatched envoys to obtain the same terms as the latter. This old avaricious prince, seeing all his predictions verified, had fled to Venice with his treasures, leaving the government of his dominions to a regency. Not wishing however to lose them, he sought a negotiation. Bonaparte could not grant peace, but he was at liberty to grant armistices, which were much the same in effect, and which rendered him master of all the states of Italy. He required ten millions, supplies of all kinds, horses and pictures.

With those resources obtained from the country, he established on the banks of the Po large stores, hospitals furnished with necessaries for the accommodation of fifteen thousand sick, and replenished all the chests of the army. Considering that he himself was rich enough, he even sent off some millions to Genoa for the directory. As he knew, moreover, that the army of the Rhine was in want of funds, and that this state of destitution prevented it from taking the field, he sent by way of Switzerland a million to Moreau. This was an act of good fellowship, that did him both honour and service; for it was of importance that Moreau should take the field, to prevent the Austrians from directing their principal forces against Italy.

Bonaparte was still more confirmed in his plans when he surveyed all these things. It was not necessary, in his opinion, to march against the princes of Italy; all he had to do was to act against the Austrians only. So long as a good defence could be made against the latter, so as to prevent their return into Lombardy, all the Italian states, trembling under the ascendancy of the French army, would be reduced one after the other. The dukes of Parma and Modena had submitted. Rome and Naples would do the same, if he did but continue master of the entrances into Italy. It was at the same time the better policy to hold out expectations to the people, and, without overthrowing governments, to wait till the subjects should rise of themselves. But while he was engaged on these correct ideas and these extensive operations, one of the most vexatious oppositions was about to stop his progress. The directory was enchanted with his services; but Carnot on reading his despatches, written with energy and precision, but in an imaginative style, was alarmed at his gigantic designs. He very properly considered that the desire to traverse the Tyrol and to cross the Alps a second time was too extravagant a scheme, nay even impracticable; but in his turn, and by way of setting the young general right, he conceived another far more dangerous. Lombardy being conquered, Bonaparte ought, according to Carnot, to fall back into the peninsula, to go and punish the Pope and the Bourbons of Naples, and to drive the English from Leghorn, where the duke of Tuscany suffered them to bear rule. To effect this, Carnot, in the name of the directory, ordered the army of Italy to be divided into two; one part to be left under Kellermann in Lombardy; the other was to march upon Rome and Naples under the command of Bonaparte. This unfortunate plan re-enacted the blunder the French have always committed, that of advancing far into the peninsula before they were masters of Upper Italy. It is not with the Pope or with Naples that the possession of Italy has to be disputed, but with the Austrians. Now, the line of operation at that time was not on the Tiber, but on the Adige. Impatience to effect conquests always urged us on to Rome and Naples, and while we have been overrunning the peninsula, we have always found the road closed in after us. It was natural that republicans should wish to chastise a pope and a Bourbon; but they committed the same blunder as the ancient kings of France.

Bonaparte, in his plan for forcing himself into the valley of the Danube, had considered nobody but the Austrians. This was in Bonaparte the excess of conviction in a sound but inexperienced mind; he could not therefore after such a conviction consent to march into the peninsula; besides, aware of the importance of unity of direction in a conquest which required as much political as military genius, he could not endure the idea of sharing the command with an old general, brave but of moderate abilities, and very conceited. This was in him that proper egotism of genius that is anxious to perform its task alone, because it is conscious that no one but itself is capable of performing it. He behaved here as in the field of battle; he hazarded his future prospects, and tendered his resignation in a letter equally respectful and bold. He knew well that the directory durst not accept it; but it is certain that he much rather preferred resignation, to obedience in this respect, because he could not consent to suffer his own reputation as well as the army to be thrown away in the execution of a vicious plan.

Opposing the most luminous reasoning to the errors of the director Carnot, he said that the French ought to continue to make head against the Austrians, and occupy themselves with nobody else; that a more division, supported in the rear upon the Po and Ancona, would be sufficient to intimidate the peninsula, and force Rome and Naples to sue for quarter. He prepared immediately to leave Milan, to hasten to the Adige, and to lay siege to Mantua. He there proposed to wait for fresh orders from the directory and for a reply to his despatches.

He published a new proclamation to his soldiers, which could not fail to appeal strongly to their imagination, and which was also calculated to make a powerful impression upon the pope and the king of Naples:

"Soldiers! you have rushed like a torrent from the top of the Apennines; you have overthrown, dispersed every thing that opposed your progress. Piedmont, delivered from Austrian tyranny, has returned to her natural sentiments of peace and friendship for France. Milan is yours, and the republican flag waves throughout all Lombardy. The dukes of Parma and Modena owe their political existence to your generosity alone. The army which proudly threatened you finds no longer any barrier to secure it against your courage; the Po, the Tesino, and the Adda have not stopped you for a single day; those highly-vaunted bulwarks of Italy have proved insufficient; you have passed them as rapidly as the Apennines. These successes have produced joy in the bosom of the country; your representatives have ordered a fête dedicated to your victories, celebrated as they are in all the communes of the republic. There your fathers, your mothers, your wives, your sisters, your sweethearts are rejoicing in your achievements, and proudly boast that you belong to them. Yes, soldiers! you have done much, but is there nothing more left for you to do? Shall it be said of us, that we knew how to conquer, but not how to make the most of the victory? Shall posterity reproach you with having found a Capua in Lombardy? But I see you already running to arms. Well! let us go! we have still forced marches to make, enemies to subdue, laurels to gather, injuries to revenge. Let those who have whetted the daggers of civil war in France, who have basely assassinated our ministers, who burned our ships at Toulon—let them tremble! The hour of vengeance has arrived; but let not the people be alarmed; we are friends of the people every where, and more particularly of the descendants of the Brutuses, the Scipios, and the great men whom we have taken for our models. To re-establish the capitol, to set up there with honour the statues of the heroes who rendered it celebrated; to rouse the Roman people, benumbed by centuries of slavery;—such will be the fruit of our victories. They will form an epoch with posterity: you will have the immortal glory of changing the face of the finest portion of Europe. The French people, free, and respected by the whole world, will give to Europe a glorious peace, which will indemnify her for the sacrifices of all kinds that she has been making for the last six years. You will then return to your homes, and your fellow-citizens, pointing to you, will say, He belonged to the army of Italy."

Bonaparte stayed no longer than eight days at Milan; he left it on the 2d Prairial (May 22) to return to Lodi, and to advance towards the Adige.

While Bonaparte was pursuing his march, an unexpected event suddenly recalled him to Milan. The nobles, the monks, the servants of the fugitive families, and a multitude of creatures of the Austrian government, got up a revolt against the French army. They spread a report that Beaulieu, having been reinforced, was at hand with sixty thousand men; that the prince of Condé was coming through Switzerland upon the rear of the republicans, and that they were on the brink of destruction. The priests availing themselves of their influence over some of the peasantry, who had suffered from the transit of the army, excited them to take arms. Bonaparte being no longer in Milan, the moment was deemed propitious for carrying the revolt into execution, and for raising all Lombardy on his rear. The garrison of the citadel of Milan gave the signal by a sortie. The tocsin was immediately rung throughout the whole surrounding country; and armed peasants repaired to Milan, to make themselves masters of the city. But the division which Bonaparte had left to blockade the citadel quickly forced the garrison to fall back within its walls, and drove out the peasants who showed themselves there. In the environs of Pavia the insurgents were more successful. They entered that city, and made themselves masters of it, in spite of the three hundred men whom Bonaparte had left in garrison there. These three hundred men, exhausted or sick, shut themselves up in a fort, to escape being slaughtered. The insurgents surrounded the fort, and summoned it to surrender. A French general passing at that moment through Pavia, was seized, and obliged, while a dagger was held to his throat, to sign an order commanding the garrison to open its gates. The order was signed and executed.

This revolt might produce disastrous consequences. It might provoke a general insurrection and bring ruin on the French army. The public mind of a nation is always more advanced in the cities than in the country. While the population of the cities of Italy was declaring for us, the peasants, excited by the monks, and suffering severely from the transit of the armies, were most unfavourably inclined towards us. Bonaparte was at Lodi, when, on 4th Prairial (May 24th), he received intelligence of the occurrences at Milan and Pavia; he immediately turned back with three hundred horse, a battalion of grenadiers, and six pieces of cannon. Order was already restored in Milan. He pursued his route to Pavia, sending the archbishop of Milan before him. The insurgents had pushed an advance guard as far as the village of Binasco, which Lannes dispersed. Bonaparte, being sensible that it behoved him to act with promptitude and energy, in order to check the evil in its birth, set this village on fire, that the sight of the flames might strike terror into Pavia. On arriving before that city he halted. It contained thirty thousand inhabitants; it was inclosed within an old wall, and was occupied by seven or eight thousand insurgent peasants. They had closed the gates and manned the walls. To take this city with three hundred horse and one battalion was no easy matter; yet there was no time to lose, for the army was already on the Oglio, and needed the presence of its general. In the night, Bonaparte caused a threatening proclamation to be posted on the gates of Pavia, in which he said that a misguided mob without any effective means of resistance, was defying an army triumphant over kings, and meant to bring destruction on the people of Italy; that, adhering to his intention of not making war upon the people, he would pardon this act of madness, and leave a door open for repentance; but that those who should not instantly lay down their arms, should be treated as rebels, and their villages burned. The flames of Binasco, he added, ought to teach them a lesson. In the morning, the peasants, who were masters of the city, refused to surrender it. Bonaparte ordered the walls to be swept with grape and howitzer shot; he then brought up his grenadiers, who broke open the gates with hatchets. They forced their way into the city, and had to sustain a combat in the streets. The resistance, however, was not long. The peasants fled, and left unfortunate Pavia to the wrath of the conqueror. The soldiers, with loud shouts, demanded leave to pillage. Bonaparte, by way of making a severe example, allowed them three hours' pillage. They were scarcely a thousand men, and they could not do any great mischief in so large a city as Pavia. They fell upon the goldsmiths' shops, and secured a considerable quantity of jewellery. The act most to be condemned was the pillage of the Monts-de-Piété; but fortunately, in Italy, as in every other country where there is a poor and vain aristocracy, the Monts-de-Piété were full of articles belonging to the higher classes of the country. The houses of Spallanzani and Volta were preserved by the officers, who themselves guarded the dwellings of these illustrious scholars; an example doubly honourable to France and to Italy.

Bonaparte then let loose three hundred horse upon the surrounding country, and cut down a great number of the insurgents. This prompt severity produced universal submission, and overawed the party in Italy which was hostile to liberty and to France. It is a sad thing to be reduced to the necessity of employing such means; but Bonaparte was obliged to do it, to save his army and the future prospects of Italy from being sacrificed. The party of the monks trembled; the sufferings of Pavia, passing from mouth to mouth, were magnified; and the French army recovered its formidable renown.

This affair over, Bonaparte lost no time in returning to rejoin the army, which was on the Oglio, and about to enter the Venetian territory.

On the approach of the French army, the question so much agitated in Venice, whether to take part with Austria or France, was discussed anew by the senate. Some of the old oligarchy, who had retained some degree of energy, would have wished the republic to form an immediate alliance with Austria, the natural protector of all the old despotisms; but they apprehended in the future Austrian ambition, and at the moment the cannon of France was most to be dreaded. Besides, they would have themselves to resort to arms, a resolution exceedingly repugnant to an enervated government. Some young members of the oligarchy, equally energetic, but less obstinate than their elders, wished to adopt the most courageous resolves. They proposed to raise a formidable armament, but solely to maintain the neutrality, and with fifty thousand men to intimidate any one of the powers who should violate the Venetian territory. This was a strong resolution, but too strong to be adopted. Some prudent persons, on the contrary, proposed a third course, namely, an alliance with France. Battaglia, the senator, a man of an acute, sagacious, and temperate mind, offered reasons which the course of events has almost made prophetic. In his opinion neutrality, even an armed neutrality, was the worst of all determinations. It was impossible to make themselves respected, whatever force they displayed; and not having attached either of the parties to their cause, they would sooner or later be sacrificed by both. It was absolutely necessary therefore to decide either for Austria or for France. Austria was for the moment driven out of Italy; and even supposing her to possess the means of returning, she could not do so in less than two months, during which time the republic might be destroyed by the French army; moreover, the ambition of Austria was always more to be dreaded by Venice. She had always envied her provinces in Illyria and Upper Italy, and would seize the first opportunity to take them from her. The only guarantee against this ambition was the power of France, who wanted nothing from Venice, and who would always have an interest in defending her. France, it was true, professed principles which were repugnant to the Venetian nobility; but it was time at last to reconcile themselves with some indispensable sacrifices to the spirit of the age, and to make those concessions to the nobles of the continent which could alone bring them back to the republic and to the Golden Book. With some slight modifications in the ancient constitution, they might satisfy the ambition of all classes of Venetian subjects, and attach France to them; furthermore, should they take arms for the latter, they might hope, perhaps, to be rewarded for the services which they should have rendered by the spoils of Austria and Lombardy. In every case, repeated Buttaglin, neutrality would be the very worst course for all parties.

This opinion, the wisdom of which time has demonstrated, too deeply wounded the pride and the prejudices of the old Venetian aristocracy to be adopted. It must also be observed that sufficient reliance was not placed on the duration of the French power in Italy, to induce Venice to ally herself with France. There was an ancient Italian adage which said that Italy was the grave of the French, and they feared lest they should afterwards find themselves exposed, without defence, to the wrath of Austria.

Of these three courses, the most convenient, and that most conformable with the ancient habits and the weakness of this old government, was preferred, namely, an unarmed neutrality. It was decided that the chief officers of state should be sent to meet Bonaparte, to assure him of the neutrality of the republic, and to claim the respect due to the Venetian territory and subjects. There was a great terror of the French, but they were known to be good tempered, and sensible to kind treatment. Orders were issued to all the agents of the government, to receive and to treat them in the best manner possible, and to study the officers and generals in order to gain their good will.

Bonaparte, on his arrival in the Venetian territory, had as much need of prudence as Venice herself. This power, though in the hands of an enfeebled government, was still great. It behoved him not to alienate it to such a degree as to compel it to take up arms; for then Upper Italy would be no longer tenable for the French. But it was also requisite, while observing the neutrality, to compel Venice to suffer us to remain upon her territory, to allow us to fight there, and even to supply ourselves with provisions, if possible. She had allowed the Austrians to pass through her territories; that was the reason to be given for our doing as we chose, and demanding every thing, while she was continuing within the limits of neutrality.

Bonaparte, on entering Brescia, published a proclamation, in which he declared that, in passing through the Venetian territory in pursuit of the imperial army, to which a transit had been allowed, he should respect the territory and the inhabitants of the republic of Venice; that he should make his army observe the strictest discipline; that whatever it should take should be paid for; and that he should not forget the old ties which united the two republics. He was very cordially received by the Venetian providitori of Brescia, and pursued his march. He had crossed the Oglio, which runs next after the Adda; he arrived before the Mincio, which, issuing from the lake of Garda, winds through the plain of the Mantuan, then, after a course of some leagues, forms a new lake, in the midst of which Mantua is situated, and at last falls into the Po. Beaulieu, reinforced by ten thousand men, had posted himself on the line of the Mincio, to defend it. An advanced guard of four thousand foot and two thousand horse was drawn up in advance of the river, at the village of Borghetto. The mass of the army occupied the position of Valeggio, beyond the Mincio; the reserve was a little farther behind at Villa Franca; and detachments guarded the course of the Mincio, above and below Valeggio. The Venetian town of Peschiera is situated on the Mincio, at the very point where it issues from the lake of Garda. Beaulieu, who wished to have that place, in order to more firmly support the right of his line, deceived the Venetians, and upon pretext of obtaining a passage for fifty men, surprised the town, and placed in it a strong garrison. It had a bastioned enclosure and eighty pieces of cannon.

Bonaparte, in advancing upon this line, wholly neglected Mantua, which was on his right, and which he had not yet time to blockade, and supported his left towards Peschiera. His plan was to cross the Mincio at Borghetto and Valeggio. To this end, it was requisite that he should deceive Beaulieu in regard to his intention. On this occasion he had recourse to the same stratagem as at the passage of the Po. He directed one corps upon Peschiera, and another upon Lonato, so as to annoy Beaulieu on the Upper Mincio, and to make him suppose that he designed to cross at Peschiera, or to turn the lake of Garda. At the same time, his most serious attack was pointed against Borghetto. That village, situated in advance of the Mincio, was, as we have stated above, guarded by four thousand foot and two thousand horse. On the 9th Prairial (May 29) Bonaparte commenced the engagement. He had always had great trouble to make his cavalry fight. It was not accustomed to charge, because this movement was not so much in use, and it was besides intimidated by the high reputation of the German cavalry. Bonaparte was determined to make it fight at all events, because he attached great importance to the services that it was capable of rendering. In advancing upon Borghetto, he distributed his grenadiers and his carabiniers on the right and left of his cavalry; he placed the artillery in the rear, and having thus enclosed it, he launched it upon the enemy. Supported on either side, and led on by the impetuous Murat, it performed prodigies, and put to flight the Austrian squadrons. The infantry then attacked the village of Borghetto and took it. The Austrians, retiring from it by the bridge leading from Borghetto to Valeggio, attempted to break it down. In fact they managed to destroy one arch. But some grenadiers, led on by general Gardanne, plunged into the Mincio, which was fordable in some places, and crossed it, holding their muskets above their heads, in defiance of the fire from the opposite heights. The Austrians fancied that they beheld the column of Lodi, and retired without destroying the bridge. The broken arch was repaired, and the army was enabled to cross. Bonaparte instantly started off, to ascend the Mincio with Augereau's division in pursuit of the Austrians; but they declined battle the whole day. Leaving Augereau's division to continue the pursuit, he returned to Valeggio, where he found Masséna's division beginning to make their soup. All at once the charge sounded, and the Austrian hussars dashed into the middle of the village. Bonaparte had scarcely time to escape. He mounted a horse, and soon ascertained that this was one of the enemy's corps left to guard the Lower Mincio, and which was ascending the river to rejoin Beaulieu in his retreat towards the mountains. Masséna's divisions ran to arms, and gave chase to this division, which however succeeded in rejoining Beaulieu.

The Mincio was thus crossed. Bonaparte had decided for a second time the retreat of the Imperialists, who ultimately were driven into the Tyrol. He had gained an important advantage, that of making his cavalry fight, who now no longer feared the Austrian cavalry. He considered this as a great point gained. Before his time cavalry was not much used, and he had thought that it might be rendered very serviceable by employing it to cover the artillery. He had calculated that the light artillery and the cavalry employed on proper occasions were capable of producing the effect of a mass of infantry ten times stronger. He began already to exhibit a great regard for young Murat, who knew how to make his squadrons fight; a qualification he then considered as very rare among the officers of that army. The surprise which had put his person in jeopardy suggested another idea, namely, to form a corps of picked men, which, under the name of guides, were to accompany him every where. In this case, his personal safety was but a secondary consideration in his own eyes; he perceived the advantage of having always at hand a devoted corps ready for the boldest exploits. We shall in fact observe that he determined great events by sending out twenty-five of these brave fellows. He gave the command of this body to a cavalry officer, possessing great coolness and intrepidity, and afterwards well known by the name of Bossières.

Beaulieu had evacuated Peschiera, to make his retreat to the Tyrol. A battle had taken place with the Austrian rear-guard, and it was not till after a very brisk action that the French army entered the town. The Venetians having been unable to recover it from Beaulieu, it had ceased to be neutral, and the French were authorized to establish themselves there. Bonaparte knew that the Venetians had been deceived by Beaulieu, but he resolved to avail himself of that fact to obtain from them all that he wished. He wanted the line of the Adda, and more particularly the important city of Verona, which commands the river; but above all, he wanted to obtain supplies.

The proveditore Foscarelli, an old Venetian oligarch, greatly attached to his prejudices and thoroughly opposed to France, was commissioned to repair to Bonaparte's head-quarters. He had been told that the general was highly enraged at what had happened at Peschiera, and report represented his wrath as a thing to be dreaded. Binasco and Pavia attested his severity; two armies destroyed, and Italy conquered attested his power. The proveditore arrived at Peschiera exceedingly alarmed; and on setting out he wrote to his government; May God be pleased to accept me as a victim! He was charged with the special mission of preventing the French from entering Verona. That city, which had afforded an asylum to the pretender, was in the most painful anxiety. Young Bonaparte, who was subject to violent fits of passion, and who also knew how to feign them, omitted nothing to increase the terror of the proveditore. He inveighed vehemently against the Venetian government which pretended to be neutral, and could not make its neutrality respected, and which, in suffering the Austrians to seize Peschiera, had exposed the army to the loss of a great number of brave fellows before that place. He said that the blood of his companions in arms cried for vengeance, and a signal vengeance they must have. The proveditore made every excuse for the Venetian authorities, and then came to the main point, which was Verona. He declared that he had orders to forbid both the belligerent powers the entry into that city. Bonaparte replied that it was then too late; that Masséna had already marched thither; that perhaps at that very moment he was setting fire to it, to punish a city which had had the insolence to consider itself for a moment as the capital of the French empire. The proveditore again renewed his solicitations, and Bonaparte, affecting to be somewhat mollified, replied that all he could do, if Masséna had not already carried the place by storm, was to grant a delay of twenty-four hours, after which he would employ bombs and cannon.

The proveditore retired in the utmost consternation. He returned to Verona, where he announced the fact that the French must be received. On their approach, the wealthiest inhabitants, conceiving that they should not be forgiven for the residence of the pretender in their city, fled in great numbers to the Tyrol, carrying with them their most valuable effects. The Veronese, however, soon regained confidence, on seeing the French, and convincing themselves with their own eyes that these republicans were not so barbarous as rumour had represented them.

Two other Venetian envoys arrived at Verona to see Bonaparte. Selection had been made of two senators, Erizzo and Battaglia, for this purpose. The latter was the person of whom we have already spoken as desiring an alliance with France, and it was hoped at Venice that these new ambassadors would succeed better than Foscarelli in pacifying the general. He did in fact receive them much more favourably than Foscarelli; and now that he had attained the object of his wishes, he affected to be satisfied, and to consent to listen to reason. What he wanted for the future was provisions, and, if possible, even an alliance between Venice and France. He had to be by turns overbearing and engaging. He was both. "The first law for men," said he, "is to live. I would gladly spare the republic of Venice the burden of feeding us; but since the fortune of war has obliged us to come hither, we are forced to live where we happen to be. Let the republic of Venice furnish my soldiers with what they need; she may afterwards settle with the French republic." It was agreed that a Jew contractor should procure for the army all that it wanted, and that Venice should secretly pay this contractor, that she might not appear to violate the neutrality by supplying the French. Bonaparte then adverted to the subject of an alliance. "I have just occupied the Adige," said he; "I have done so because I must have a line, because that is the best, and because your government is incapable of defending it. Let it arm fifty thousand men, let it post them on the Adige, and I will restore to it the towns of Verona and Porto Legnago. For the rest," added he, "you must be pleased to see us here. What France sends me to do in these parts is entirely for the interest of Venice. I am come to drive the Austrians beyond the Alps, perhaps to constitute Lombardy an independent state; can any thing more advantageous be done for your republic? If she would unite with us, no doubt she would be handsomely rewarded for that service. We are not making war upon any government; we are the friends of all those who shall assist us to confine the Austrian power within its proper limits."

The two Venetians retired, struck by the genius of this young man, who, alternately threatening and caressing, imperious and supple, and conversing on all subjects, military and political, with as much profundity as eloquence, demonstrated that the statesman was as precocious in him as the warrior. "That man," they observed, writing to Venice, "*will some day exercise an overweening influence over his country ."

Bonaparte was at length master of the line of the Adige, to which he attached so much importance. He attributed all the blunders committed in the ancient campaigns of the French in Italy to the injudicious choice of the defensive line. Lines are numerous in Upper Italy, for a multitude of rivers run from the Alps to the sea. The largest and the most celebrated of them, the Po, which traverses all Lombardy, was in his opinion bad, as being too extensive. In his opinion, an army could not guard a stream fifty leagues in length. A point might always open the passage of a large river. He had himself crossed the Po a few leagues from Beaulieu. The other rivers, such as the Tésino, the Adda, the Oglio, falling into the Po, mingled with it, and had the same inconveniences. The Mincio was fordable, and besides, that river also fell into the Po. The Adige alone, coming from the Tyrol, and running to the sea, covered all Italy. It was deep, and had only one channel of no great extent from the mountains to the sea. It was covered by two fortified places, Verona and Porto Legnago, which were very near each other, and which, without being strong, were capable of withstanding a first attack. Lastly, on leaving Legnago, it traversed impassable morasses, which covered the lower part of its course. The rivers farther on in Upper Italy, such as the Brenta, the Piave, the Tagliamento, were fordable; and besides, were turned by the high road from Tyrol, which debouched behind them. The Adige had the advantage of being placed at the outlet of that road which runs through its own valley.

Such were the reasons that decided Bonaparte in favour of that line, and an immortal campaign has demonstrated the accuracy of his judgment. This line being occupied, he now had to think of commencing the siege of Mantua. This place was situated on the Mincio; it was behind the Adige, and was covered by that river. It was regarded as the bulwark of Italy. Situated amidst a lake formed by the waters of the Mincio, it communicated with the main land by five dikes. Notwithstanding its ancient fame, this fortress had inconveniences which diminished its real strength. Seated in the midst of marshy exhalations, it was subject to fevers; in the next place, the extremities of the raised roads (*têtes de chaussées) being carried, the besieged would be driven back into the place, and might be blockaded by a corps far inferior to the garrison. Bonaparte calculated upon taking it before a new army could come to the assistance of Italy. On the 15th Prairial (June 3rd), he ordered the têtes de chaussées, one of which was formed by the suburb of Saint-George, to be attacked, and carried them. From that moment, Serrurier could with eight thousand men blockade a garrison composed of fourteen thousand, ten of which were under arms and four in the hospitals. Bonaparte caused the operations of the siege to be commenced, and the whole of the Adige to be put in a state of defence. Thus, in less than two months he had conquered Italy. The question now was to keep it. But there the doubt lay, and this was the touchstone by which the young general was to be tried.

The directory had just replied to Bonaparte's letters on the plan for dividing the army and marching into the Peninsula. The ideas of Bonaparte were too correct not to strike Carnot's mind, and his services too brilliant to allow of his resignation being accepted. The directory hastened to write to him, to approve of his plans, to confirm him in the command of all the forces acting in Italy, and to assure him of the entire confidence of the government. If the magistrates of the republic had possessed the gift of prophecy, they would have done well to accept the resignation of this young man, though he was right in the opinion which he supported, and though his retirement would have deprived the republic of Italy and of a great captain; but at the moment they beheld in him nothing but youth, genius, and victory, and they experienced that interest and consideration which all these things were calculated to inspire.

The directory imposed on Bonaparte a single condition, and that was to make Rome and Naples sensible of the power of the republic. All the sincere patriots in France insisted on this. That pope, who had anathematized France, preached up a crusade against her, and suffered her ambassador to be assassinated in his capital, certainly deserved chastisement. Bonaparte, now at liberty to act according to his own interpretation, alleged that all these results could be obtained without quitting the line of the Adige. While one part of the army was guarding that line, and another was besieging Mantua and the citadel of Milan, he wanted with one single division supported by columns in its rear upon the Po, to make the whole Peninsula tremble, and to force the pontiff and the queen of Naples to sue at the throne of republican clemency. News arrived that a strong army, detached from the Rhine, was on its road to dispute the possession of Italy with her conqueror. This army, which had to pass through the Black Forest, the Voralberg, and the Tyrol, could not arrive in less than a month. Bonaparte had therefore time to finish every thing in his rear without removing too far from the Adige, and so as to be able by a mere retrograde march to bring himself again in face of the enemy.

* Tête in this sense means that extremity which is nearest the enemy—as tête de pont, another military term which frequently occurs in these details of warlike operations, signifies that end or extremity of the bridge which is on the enemy's side. Trans.

* This prediction was made the 5th June, 1796.

It was indeed time that he should consider what was to be done with the rest of Italy. The presence of the French army there called forth opinions with extraordinary rapidity. The Venetian provinces could no longer endure the aristocratic yoke. The city of Brescia manifested a strong inclination to revolt. Throughout all Lombardy, and especially in Milan, public opinion was making rapid progress. The duchies of Modena and Reggio, the Legations of Bologna and Ferrara, would no longer have either their old duke or the pope. In return, the adverse party became more hostile. The Genoese aristocracy was very unfavourably disposed, and were considering how they could execute some adverse movements on our rear. Gerola, the Austrian minister, was the secret instigator of all these designs. The state of Genoa was full of petty feuds, holden of the empire. The Genoese nobles invested with these feuds collected deserters, banditti, Austrian prisoners who had contrived to escape, and the Piedmontese soldiers who had been disbanded, and formed irregular troops of light infantry known by the name of Barbets. They infested the Apennines at the place where the French army had entered; they stopped the couriers, plundered our convoys, slaughtered the French detachments when they were not numerous enough to defend themselves, and kept the road to France in a disturbed state. In Tuscany, the English had made themselves masters of the port of Leghorn, owing to the protection of the governor, and French commerce was treated as that of an enemy. Lastly, Rome was making hostile preparations; England promised her a few thousand men; and Naples, always agitated by the caprices of a violent queen, promised a formidable armament. The imbecile king, leaving his amusement of fishing for a short time, had publicly implored the aid of Heaven. He had in a solemn ceremonial stripped himself of his royal ornaments, and hid them at the foot of the altar. The whole populace of Naples had applauded this act, and uttered horrible yells, and a multitude of wretches, incapable of handling a musket or facing a French bayonet, demanded arms, and insisted on marching against our army.

Although these movements caused no alarm in Bonaparte, so long as he had means of employing six thousand men, he had no time to lose in repressing them, before the arrival of the new Austrian army, which called for the presence of all his forces on the Adige. Bonaparte began to receive from the army of the Alps some reinforcements, which allowed him to employ fifteen thousand men in the blockade of Mantua and of the citadel of Milan, and twenty thousand in protecting the Adige, and to despatch a division upon the Po, to execute his plans relative to the south of Italy.

He repaired first to Milan, to cause the trenches to be opened around the citadel, and to hasten its surrender. He ordered Augereau, who was on the Mincio, very near the Po, to cross that river at Borgo Forte, and to march upon Bologna; and he directed Vaubois to proceed from Tortona to Modena with four or five thousand men, who had come from the Alps. In this manner he could send eight or nine thousand men into the Legations of Bologna and Ferrara, and threaten the entire Peninsula.

He awaited for some days the subsiding of the inundations on the Lower Po, before he set his columns in motion. But the court of Naples, as imbecile as it was violent, had passed from a state of fury to dejection. On receiving intelligence of the recent victories of the French in Upper Italy, it had sent Prince Belmonte-Pignatelli to make its submission to the conqueror. Bonaparte referred the question of peace to the directory, but he thought it right to grant an armistice. It did not suit him to push on so far as Naples with a few thousand men, and especially while he was in the act of waiting for the arrival of the Austrians.

It was enough for him at that moment to disarm that power, to deprive Rome of its support, and to embroil it with the allied powers. He could not impose levies on it, as he did on the petty princes whom he had entirely in his power, but it engaged to open all her ports to the French, to withdraw from England five sail of the line, and a great number of frigates furnished by her; and lastly, to withdraw from Austria the two thousand four hundred horse who were serving in her ranks. This division of cavalry was to remain sequestered in the power of Bonaparte, who was to have a right to make it prisoner on the first violation of the armistice. Bonaparte knew very well that such terms would not please the government; but at the moment it was of consequence to him that he should not be harassed in his rear, and he demanded no more than he believed would ensure it. The king of Naples having submitted, the pope could not resist; so that at that time the expedition to the right of the Po reduced itself, just as he desired, to an expedition of a few days, and he returned to the Adige.

He signed this armistice, and then set out to cross the Po, and to put himself at the head of the two columns, which he was leading against the states of the Church, Vaubois' column coming from the Alps to reinforce him, as well as Augereau's, which was making a retrograde movement from the Mincio upon the Po. He attached great importance to the situation of Genoa, because it was placed on one of the two roads leading to France, and because its senate had always demonstrated energy. He was aware that he ought to have demanded the expulsion of twenty feudatory families of Austria and Naples to ensure the supremacy of France in that state; but he had no orders on that subject, and he was, moreover, afraid of revolutionizing. He contented himself, therefore, with addressing a letter to the senate, in which he insisted that the governor of Novi, who had protected the banditti, should be punished in an exemplary manner, and that the Austrian minister should be driven from Genoa. He then required an absolute explanation, "Can you," he asked, "or can you not, clear your territory of the murderers who infest it? If you cannot take mea-

1796.
June.
(Messidor.)

Conduct and policy of Bonaparte in Italy.

THE DIRECTORY.

Conduct and policy of Bonaparte in Italy.

641

suors, I will take them for you. I will cause the towns and villages to be burned in which a murder shall be committed; I will cause the houses to be burned that shall afford an asylum to the murderers, and punish in an exemplary manner the magistrates who shall tolerate them. The murder of a Frenchman shall bring woe upon whole communes who have not prevented it." As he was well aware of the delays attending diplomacy, he sent Murat, his aid-de-camp, to carry his letter, and to read it himself to the senate. "There must be," he observed, writing to Faypoult, the minister, "some kind of communication that shall electrify these personages." At the same time he despatched Lannes with twelve hundred men to inflict punishment upon the imperial fiefs. The mansion of Augustin Spinola, the principal instigator of the revolt was burned. The Barbets taken in arms were shot without mercy. The senate of Genoa, in consternation, displaced the governor of Novi, dismissed Gerola the minister, and promised to guard the roads by its own troops. The Neapolitan government sent Vincent Spinola to Paris, to come to an arrangement with the Directory in respect of all matters in dispute, the indemnity due for the Moderate frigate, the expulsion of the feudatory families, and the recall of the exiled families.

Bonaparte next proceeded to Modena, where he arrived on the 1st Messidor (June 19th), and on the same day Augereau entered Bologna.

The enthusiasm of the Modenese was extreme. They went forth to meet him, and sent a deputation to compliment him. The principal amongst them beset him with solicitations, and implored him to emancipate them from the yoke of their duke, who had carried off the fruits of his exactions to Venice. As the regency left by the duke had faithfully adored to the terms of the armistice, and Bonaparte had no reason to exercise the rights of conquest on the duchy, he could not satisfy the Modenese; it was, moreover, a question which in policy had better be deferred. He contented himself with holding out hopes, and recommended them to be quiet. He set out for Bologna. The fort of Urbino was on his route; and this was the first fortified town belonging to the pope. He caused it to be summoned; the citadel surrendered. It contained sixty pieces of cannon, of large calibre, and a few hundred men. Bonaparte sent off this heavy artillery for Mantua, to be employed in the siege. He arrived at Bologna, whither Augereau's division had preceded him. The rejoicings of the inhabitants were most animated. Bologna is a city of about fifty thousand souls, magnificently built, celebrated for its artists, its scholars, and its university. Affection for France, and hatred for the Holy See, were there carried to the highest pitch. Bonaparte was not afraid to suffer sentiments of liberty to burst forth at that place; for he was in the possessions of a declared enemy, the pope, and it was in every respect allowable that he should exercise the right of conquest. The two Legations of Ferrara and Bologna beset him with their deputies; and he granted them a provisional independence, promising to get it recognized at the peace.

The Vatican was in alarm, and immediately sent a negotiator to make the best terms he could.

D'Azara, the Spanish ambassador, celebrated for his abilities and his partiality for France, and the minister of a friendly power, was selected for this purpose. He had already negotiated for the duke of Parma. He arrived at Bologna to lay the tiara at the feet of the victorious republic. Consistent with his original design, Bonaparte, who would not yet either pull down or build up, required in the first place that the Legations of Bologna and Ferrara should remain independent, that the city of Ancona should receive a French garrison, that the pope should give twenty-one millions in corn and cattle, and one hundred pictures or statues: these terms were accepted. Bonaparte had a long conversation with D'Azara, and left him full of enthusiasm. He wrote a letter, in the name of the republic, to Orsini, the celebrated astronomer, desiring to see him. That modest and erudite man was dumbfounded in the presence of the young conqueror, and evinced his respect by his confusion. Bonaparte neglected no opportunity of showing his respect for Italy, and to awaken her pride and her patriotism. This was not the act of a barbarous conqueror, come to commit spoliations, but a hero of liberty, come to rekindle the torch of genius in the ancient land of civilization. He left Mongo, Bertholet, and the brothers Thouin, whom the directory had sent to him, to select the articles destined for the museums of Paris.

On the 8th Messidor (June 26) he crossed the Apennines with Vaubois's division, and entered Tuscany. The duke in alarm sent his minister Manfredini to him. Bonaparte assured him as to his intentions, which he kept secret. Meanwhile his column proceeded by forced marches to Leghorn, entered the city unawares, and took possession of the English factory. Spannochi, the governor, was seized, thrust into a post-chaise, and sent to the grand-duke, with a letter explaining the motives of this act of hostility committed against a friendly power. The grand-duke was informed that his governor had violated every law of neutrality, by injuring French commerce, by affording an asylum to the emigrants and to all the enemies of the republic; and it was added, that out of respect for his authority, he left to him the office of punishing a bad minister. This act of vigour proved to all the neutral states that the French general would take their government into his own hands if they could not manage it themselves. There was no possibility of seizing all the vessels of the English, but their trade was extremely injured. Bonaparte left a garrison at Leghorn, and appointed commissioners to see that every thing belonging to the English, the Austrians, and the Russians, was given up. He then repaired in person to Florence, where the grand-duke gave him a magnificent reception. Having passed three days there, he recrossed the Po, on his return to his head-quarters at Roverbella, near Mantua. Thus twenty days, and one division moving en echelon on the right of the Po, was sufficient to overawe the powers of Italy, and insure tranquillity during the renewed contests he had still to maintain against the Austrian power.

While the army of Italy was performing in such a glorious manner the task allotted it in the general plan of the campaign, the armies of Germany had not yet put themselves in motion. The difficulty of forming stores and procuring horses had kept them hitherto inactive. Austria, on her part, whose interest it was to have opened the campaign in a vigorous manner, was most unaccountably behindhand in her preparations, so that she would not be in a state to commence hostilities before the middle of Prairial (the beginning of June). Her armies were on a formidable footing, and far superior to ours. But our successes in Italy had obliged her to detach Wurmser with thirty thousand of her best troops from the Rhine, to set about collecting and re-organizing the wrecks of Beaulieu's army. The Aulic council, who had resolved to take the offensive, and to make the heart of our provinces the theatre of war, from that time only thought of keeping the defensive, and opposing our invasion. It would even have availed itself of a continuance of the armistice; but it was declared at an end, and hostilities were to commence on the 12th Prairial (May 31).

We have already given an idea of the theatre of war. The Rhine and the Danube issuing, the one from the high Alps, the other from the Alps of Swabia, after nearing each other in the environs of the Lake of Constance, separate, and run, the first of them towards the north, and the second towards the east of Europe. Two transverse and almost parallel valleys, those of the Maine and the Neckar, form as it were two passes through the chain of the Swabian Alps into the valley of the Danube, or from the valley of the Danube into that of the Rhine.

This theatre of war and the plan of operation which it allowed were not then so well known as they now are, thanks to the models they have since afforded. Carnot, who directed our plans, had created a theory from the celebrated campaign of 1794, which had gained him so much glory in Europe. At that period the enemy's centre, entrenched in the forest of Mormalle, being impregnable, the French had filed off upon his wings, and by attacking them had obliged him to retreat. This example was deeply engraven on Carnot's memory. Endowed with an innovating but systematic mind, he had created a theory in conformity with that campaign, and was persuaded that it was always requisite to act at once on both wings of an army, and to strive invariably to detach them. Military men have considered this idea as a real advance in military science, and as being far preferable to the system of *cordon*s, tending to attack the enemy at all points; but in Carnot's mind it was converted into a settled and dangerous system. The circumstances which here presented themselves held out a still stronger inducement to follow this system. The army of the Sambre and Meuse, and that of the Rhine and Moselle, were both placed upon the Rhine at points very far distant from one another; two valleys ran off at these points, and debouched upon the Danube. These then were adequate motives for Carnot to form the French into two columns; one of which, ascending along the Maine, the other along the Neckar, should thus contrive to fall upon the wings of the imperial army, and to force them to retrograde upon the Danube. He therefore directed generals Jourdan and Moreau to set off, the former from Dusseldorf, the latter from Strasburg, and to advance separately into Germany. As a great captain and a shrewd critic have remarked, and as facts have since proved, to form oneself into two divisions was at once to give the enemy the power as well as the idea of concentrating himself, and of overwhelming with the entire mass of his forces one or other of these two divisions. Clerfaut had nearly performed this manoeuvre in the late campaign, by first driving Jourdan back upon the Lower Rhine, and then falling upon the lines of Mentz. If even the enemy's general had not been a superior man, we forced him to adopt this plan, and furnished him with an idea his own talent ought to have suggested.

The invasion was therefore settled on this defective arrangement. The means of execution were as badly conceived as the plan itself. The line which separated the armies ran up the Rhine from Dusseldorf to Bingen, then described an arc from Bingen to Mannheim, by the base of the Vosges, and followed the Rhine again to Bâle. Carnot's intention was that Jourdan's army, debouching by Dusseldorf and the extremity of the bridge (tête de pont) of Neuwied, should cross, to the number of forty thousand men, to the right bank to get at the enemy there; that the remainder of that army, twenty-five thousand strong, setting out from Mayence, under the command of Moreau, should ascend the Rhine, and fling off in the rear of Moreau, should furtively cross the river in the environs of Strasburg. Generals Jourdan and Moreau joined in representing the inconveniences of this plan to the directory. Jourdan, reduced to forty thousand men on the Lower Rhine, might be overwhelmed and destroyed, while the rest of his army would lose incalculable time in ascending from Montz to Strasburg. It was much more natural that the passage near Strasburg should be effected by the right extremity of Moreau. This mode of proceeding was quite as consistent with secrecy as the other, and would not occasion a loss of valuable time to the armies. This modification was admitted. Jourdan, availing himself of the two fortified extremities of the bridge (deux têtes de pont) he had at Dusseldorf and Neuwied, was to cross first, to draw the enemy upon him, and thus to divert his attention from the Upper Rhine, where Moreau had to effect a passage by main force.

The plan being thus fixed, preparations were made for putting it into execution. The armies of the two nations were nearly equal in force. Since the departure of Wurmser, the Austrians had on the whole line of the Rhine one hundred and fifty and a few odd thousand men, cantoned from between Bâle up to the environs of Dusseldorf. The French had as many, without reckoning forty thousand appointed to protect Holland, and maintained at their own expence. There was, however, a difference between the two armies. The Austrians had in their one hundred and fifty thousand men, nearly thirty-eight thousand horse, and one hundred and fifteen thousand foot. The French had more than one hundred and thirty thousand foot, but at most only fifteen or eighteen thousand horse. This superiority in cavalry gave the Austrians a great advantage, especially in retreating. The Austrians had another advantage, that of being commanded by a single general. Since the departure of Wurmser, the two imperial armies had been placed under the supreme command of the young archduke Charles, who had already distinguished himself at Turcoing, and from whose talents much was augured. The French had two excellent generals, but acting separately, at a great distance from one another, and under the direction of a cabinet two hundred leagues from the theatre of the war.

The armistice expired on the 11th Prairial (May 30). Hostilities commenced by a general reconnoitring of the advanced posts. Jourdan's army extended, as we have seen, from the environs of Mentz to Dusseldorf. He had at Dusseldorf a forte de pont for debouching on the right bank; he could then ascend between the Prussian line of neutrality and the Rhine, to the banks of the Lahn, with a view to proceed from the Lahn to the Maine. The Austrians had from fifteen to twenty thousand men under the prince of Wirtemberg scattered between Mentz and Dusseldorf. Jourdan caused Kléber to debouch by Dusseldorf with twenty-five thousand men. That general made the Austrians fall back, beat them on the 16th Prairial (June 4) at Altenkirchen, and ascended the right bank between the line of neutrality and the Maine. When he had proceeded to the height of Neuwied, and had covered that debouche, Jourdan, availing himself of the bridge which he had at that point, crossed the river with part of his troops, and rejoined Kléber on the right bank. He thus found himself with nearly forty-five thousand men on the Lahn, on the 17th (June 5). He had left Moreau with thirty thousand men before Mentz. The archduke Charles, who was near Mentz, on learning that the French were repeating the irruption of the preceding year, and were again debouching by Dusseldorf and Neuwied, crossed with part of his forces to the right bank, to oppose their march. Jourdan purposed to attack the corps of the prince of Wirtemberg before he should be reinforced; but being obliged to defer his intention for a day, he lost the opportunity, and was himself attacked at Wetzlar on the 19th (June 7). He proceeded along the Lahn, having his right on the Rhine, and his left on Wetzlar. The archduke, pressing with the mass of his forces on Wetzlar, beat his left extremity, formed by Lefèvre's division, and obliged it to retreat. Jourdan, beaten on the left, was obliged to support himself on his right, which was close to the Rhine; and was thus driven toward that river. To avoid being thrown into it, he must attack the archduke. In this event he would be obliged to fight with his back to the Rhine; he might thus, in case of defeat, have to regain with difficulty his bridges at Neuwied and Dusseldorf, and perhaps suffer a fatal defeat. A battle would therefore be dangerous and perhaps useless, since he had accomplished his object by attracting the attention of the enemy, and drawing off the Austrian forces from the Upper to the Lower Rhine. He thought it best therefore to fall back, and gave orders for retreat, which was effected coolly and firmly. He recrossed at Neuwied, and directed Kléber to descend again to Dusseldorf, and there return to the left bank. He recommended to him to march slowly, but not to involve himself in any serious action. Kléber, finding himself too closely pressed at Ukerath, and hurried away by his martial feeling, instantly faced about, and made a vigorous but fruitless attack upon the enemy; after which he regained his intrenched camp at Dusseldorf. Jourdan in advancing for the purpose of afterwards falling back, had performed a thankless task for the benefit of the army of the Rhine. Misinformed persons might in fact consider this manœuvre as a defeat; but the devotedness of that brave general disregarded every consideration, and he waited to resume the offensive, till the army of the Rhine should have derived the required advantage from the diversion that he had just effected.

Moreau, who had displayed a discretion, firmness, and coolness not often perceptible in the operations in which he had been previously engaged in the north, made the necessary arrangements for duly performing his task. He had resolved to cross the Rhine at Strasburg. This large fortress was an excellent point to start from. He could there collect a great number of boats and troops, and a large quantity of provisions. The woody islands which impede the course of the Rhine at this point favoured the passage of the river. The fort of Kehl, situated on the right bank, might be easily surprised: once in our possession, it might be repaired and employed to protect the bridge which was to be thrown across before Strasburg.

Every thing being prepared for this purpose, and the attention of the enemy being directed to the Lower Rhine, Moreau ordered, on the 26th Prairial (June 14), a general attack on the intrenched camp of Mannheim. The object of this attack was to fix upon Mannheim the attention of general Latour, who commanded the troops of the Upper Rhine under the archduke Charles, and to confine the Austrians within their line. This attack, directed with skill and vigour, was perfectly successful. Immediately afterwards, Moreau despatched part of his troops to Strasburg. It was reported that they were going to Italy, and provisions were bespoken for them all through Franche-Comté, in order to cause the report to be believed. Other troops set out from the environs of Huningen to descend to Strasburg; and these it was asserted were going into garrison at Worms. These movements were so concerted, that the troops should arrive at the destined point on the 5th Messidor (June 23). Accordingly, on that day twenty-eight thousand men were collected, either in the Polygon of Strasburg, or in the environs, under the command of general Desaix. Ten thousand men were to endeavour to cross below Strasburg, in the environs of Gambsheim; and fifteen thousand were to pass from Strasburg to Kehl. On the evening of the 5th (June 23), the gates of Strasburg were shut, that information of the passage might not be given to the enemy. In the night, the troops proceeded in silence towards the river. The boats were taken into the Mabile arm of the river, and from the Mabile into the Rhine. The large island of Ehrlen-Rhine afforded considerable assistance to the passage. The boats landed there two thousand six hundred men. These brave fellows, to avoid giving an alarm by the report of fire-arms, rushed with the bayonet upon the troops distributed over the island, pursued them, and did not allow them time to break down the little bridges which connected this island with the right bank. They crossed these bridges close upon the enemy; and though neither the artillery or the cavalry could follow them, they ventured to debouch by themselves in the extensive plain which borders the river, and approached Kehl. The Swabian contingent was encamped at some distance at Willstelt. The detachments which came up from that quarter, and especially the cavalry rendered the situation of the French infantry, that had been so venturesome as to debouch on the right bank, very critical. It hesitated not however to despatch the boats which had brought it, for the purpose of getting assistance, and thus to compromise its retreat. More troops came up; they advanced upon Kehl, attacked the intrenchments with the bayonet, and carried them. The artillery found in the fort was immediately turned upon the enemy's troops coming from Willstelt, and they were repulsed. A bridge was then thrown over from Strasburg to Kehl, and finished the next day, the 7th (June 25th). The whole army now crossed it. The ten thousand men sent to Gamburg were unable to attempt the passage, on account of the rising of the river. They went up to Strasburg, and crossed there by means of the bridge which had been just before thrown over it.

This operation had been executed with secrecy, precision, and boldness; but the distribution of the Austrian troops from Bâle to Mannheim served materially to diminish the difficulty and the merit of it. The prince of Condé was with three thousand eight hundred men in the direction of the Upper Rhine, at Breisach; the Swabian contingent, to the number of seven thousand five hundred, was at Willstelt, at the height of Strasburg; and nearly eight thousand men under Starras were encamped between Strasburg and Mannheim. The enemy's forces, therefore, were not formidable at this point, but this advantage was peculiarly owing to the secrecy of the passage, and that secrecy to the prudence with which it had been prepared.

This situation afforded occasion for the most splendid triumphs. If Moreau had acted with the rapidity of the conqueror of Montenotte, he might have fallen upon the corps scattered along the river, destroyed them one after the other, and even managed to overwhelm Latour, who recrossed from Mannheim to the right bank, and who at the moment had at most no more than thirty-six thousand men. He might thus have put the whole army of the Upper Rhine hors de combat, before the archduke Charles could return from the banks of the Lahn. History shows us that despatch is all-powerful in war, as in all situations of life. Anticipating the enemy, it destroys in detail; striking blow after blow, it gives him no time to recover himself, destroys his self-control, and deprives him of his presence of mind and courage. But this celerity, of which we have just seen such glorious examples on the Alps and on the Po, pre-supposes something more than mere activity; it presumes a great object, a great mind to conceive it, and great passions to venture upon its accomplishment. No great exploit is to be accomplished without the aid of the passions, and without the ardour and the boldness they impart to reflection and zeal. Moreau, a man of luminous and resolute mind, did not possess that impetuous ardour which in the tribune, in war, and in all situations, hurries men away, and elevates them in spite of themselves to great fortunes.

Moreau was occupied from the 7th to the 10th Messidor (June 25th to the 28th) in getting his divisions together on the right bank of the Rhine. Saint-Cyr's division, which he had lost at Mannheim, was coming by forced marches. While waiting for that division, he had in his own hands fifty-three thousand men, and he saw some twenty thousand scattered around him. On the 10th (June 28th) he ordered the attack on ten thousand Austrians intrenched on the Renchen, beat them, and took eight hundred prisoners. The wreck of this division fell back on Latour, who was ascending the right bank. On the 12th (June 30th) Saint-Cyr having arrived, the whole army was beyond the river. It presented a mass of seventy-one thousand men, of whom sixty-three thousand were infantry and six thousand were cavalry. Moreau gave the right to Ferino, the centre to Saint-Cyr, the left to Desaix. He stationed himself at the foot of the Black Mountains.

The Swabian Alps form a chain which, as is well known, turns the Danube to the east and the Rhine to the north. It is through these mountains that the Neckar and the Main make their windings towards the Rhine. These are mountains of moderate height, covered with wood, and intersected by narrow defiles. The valley of the Rhine is separated from that of the Neckar by a chain called the Black Mountains. Moreau, transferred to the right bank, was now at the foot of these Black Mountains. He would have to pass over them before he could debouch in the valley of the Neckar. The Swabian contingent and Condé's regiment were ascending towards Switzerland, to guard the upper passes of the Black Mountains. Latour, with the principal corps, was coming from Mannheim for the purpose of securing the lower passes by Radstadt, Ettlingen, and Pforzheim. Moreau might without inconvenience have disregarded the detachments retiring toward Switzerland; and if he had borne down with the entire mass of his forces upon Latour, he must infallibly have overwhelmed him. He might then have debouched as conqueror in the valley of the Neckar, before the archduke Charles. But, as a prudent general, he committed to Ferino the duty of following with his right the detached corps of the Swabians and of Condé; he despatched Saint-Cyr with the centre direct for the mountains, for the purpose of occupying certain heights, and himself skirted the foot of them to descend to Radstadt before Latour. This march was the result both of his own caution and of Carnot's plan. He wished to protect himself at every point, and at the same time to extend his line towards Switzerland, that he might be ready to support by the Alps the army of Italy. Moreau set himself in motion on the 12th (June 30th). He marched between the Rhine and the mountains, over an unequal country thick with woods and intersected by torrents. He advanced with circumspection, and did not arrive at Radstadt till the 15th (July 3d). He was still in time to overwhelm Latour, who had not yet been rejoined by the archduke Charles. That prince, after receiving intelligence of the passage, was coming by forced marches with a reinforcement of twenty-five thousand men. He left thirty-six thousand on the Lahn, and twenty-seven thousand before Mentz, to make head against Jourdan, the whole under the command of general Wartensleben. He made all possible haste, but the heads of his columns were still at a great distance. Latour, after leaving a garrison in Mannheim, had at most thirty-six thousand men. He was ranged along the Murg, which falls into the Rhine, having his left at Gernsbach, in the mountains; his centre at their foot, towards Kuppenheim, a little in advance of the Murg; his right in the plain along the woods of Niederbühl, which extend to the banks of the Rhine; and his reserve at Radstadt. It would have been imprudent in Latour to fight before the arrival of the archduke Charles. But feeling more confident in his position, he was for making a stand, for the purpose of covering the great road which leads from Radstadt to the Neckar.

Moreau had only his left wing with him: his centre, under Saint-Cyr, had stayed behind, to take possession of some posts in the Black Mountains. This circumstance made up for the inequality of the forces. On the 17th (July 5) he attacked Latour. His troops behaved with great intrepidity, carried the position of Gernsbach on the Upper Murg, and penetrated to Kuppenheim, towards the centre of the enemy's position. But in the plain his divisions found it difficult to debouch under the fire of the artillery and in the front of the numerous Austrian cavalry. They nevertheless came up to Niederbühl and Radstadt, and succeeded in making themselves masters of the Murg at all points. A thousand prisoners were taken.

Moreau halted on the field of battle, without caring to pursue the enemy. The archduke had not yet arrived, and he could still have overwhelmed Latour; but, finding his troops too much fatigued, he deemed it necessary to bring Saint-Cyr to him, that he might act with a greater mass of force; and he waited till the 21st (July 9) before making a new attack. This interval of four days allowed the archduke to arrive with a reinforcement of twenty-five thousand men, and afforded the enemy an equal chance in the conflict.

The relative position of the two armies was nearly the same. They were both in a line perpendicular with the Rhine, with one wing in the mountains, the centre at the foot of them, and the left in the woody and marshy plain which lays along the river. Moreau, who was slow of apprehension, but soon convinced, because he retained that even temper which allowed him to correct his errors, became sensible, when engaged at Radstadt, of the importance of bringing his principal exertions to bear in the mountains. In fact, he who could obtain the possession of them would have the outlets to the valley of the Neckar, the principal object in dispute; he could also fall upon his adversary, and drive him into the Rhine. Moreau had an additional reason for fighting in the mountains; this was his superiority in infantry, and his inferiority in cavalry. The archduke was quite as sensible as himself of the importance of establishing himself there, but he had in his numerous squadrons a strong reason too for keeping in the plain. He corrected the position taken by Latour; he stationed the Saxons in the mountains, to extend his line in front of Moreau; he sent reinforcements to the level eminence (plateau) of Rothensol, on which his left had fortified itself; he deployed his centre at the foot of the mountains in advance of Malsch, and his cavalry in the plain. He meant to attack on the 22d (July 10). Moreau anticipated him, and attacked him on the 21st (July 9).

General Saint-Cyr, whom Moreau had brought back to him, and who formed the right, attacked the level eminence of Rothensol. He displayed that precision, and that aptitude of manœuvring, which distinguished him throughout his glorious career. Being unable to dislodge the enemy from a formidable position, he surrounded him with riflemen, and then made the experiment of charging, and feigned a flight, to induce the Austrians to quit their position and to pursue the French. This stratagem was successful; the Austrians, seeing the French advance, and then flee in disorder, dashed after them. General Saint-Cyr, who had troops ready, then launched them upon the Austrians, who had quitted their position, and made himself master of the plateau. From that moment he kept advancing, intimidated the Saxons destined to attack our right, and obliged them to fall back. At Malsch, in the centre, Desaix had a brisk action with the Austrians, took and lost that village, and finished the combat by taking possession of the terminating heights that run towards the base of the mountains. In the plain our cavalry had not been engaged, and Moreau had kept on the skirt of the woods.

The battle was therefore indecisive, excepting in the mountains. But that was the important point; for, in following up his successes, Moreau might extend his right wing around the archduke, take from him the avenues to the valley of the Neckar, and drive him into the Rhine. It is true that the archduke, if he lost the mountains which were his chief support, could in his turn deprive Moreau of the Rhine, which was ours; he might renew his effort in the plain, beat Desaix, and, advancing along the Rhine, blow Moreau into the air. On these occasions it is the least bold who is compromised; it is he who fancies that he is out off who really is so. The archduke deemed it prudent to retire, lest he might by a hazardous movement compromise the Austrian monarchy, which had no other support than its army. This resolution, which led to the retreat of the imperial armies, and exposed Germany to an invasion, has been censured. We may admire those glorious and noble flights of genius which obtain great results at the expense of great dangers; but we must not regulate our actions by their example. Prudence is no more than a duty in the situation in which the archduke was, and we cannot blame him for having retreated, in order to reach the valley of the Neckar before Moreau, and thus protect the hereditary states. Accordingly, he immediately formed the resolution of abandoning Germany, which no line was capable of protecting, and ascending the Maine and the Neckar to the grand line of the hereditary states, that of the Danube. This river, covered by the two fortresses of Ulm and Ratisbon, was the bulwark upon which Austria could most depend. In concentrating his forces there, the archduke was at home, à cheval on a large river, with forces equal to those of the enemy, with the power of commanding operations on both banks, and of overwhelming one of the two invading armies. The enemy, on the contrary, was far from home, at an immense distance from his protecting point, without that superiority of forces which compensates for the danger of remote position, with the disadvantage of a frightful country to traverse for invasion or retreat; and lastly, with the inconvenience of being divided into two divisions and commanded by two generals. Thus the Imperialists would gain in approaching the Danube all that the French would lose. But to insure all these advantages, the archduke should arrive at the Danube without defeat; and after that, it was to retire with firmness, but without exposing himself to the risk of any engagement.

After leaving garrisons at Mentz, Ehrenbreitstein, Cassel, and Mannheim, he ordered Wartensleben to retire foot by foot through the valley of the Maine, and to gain the Danube, fighting daily, and sufficient to keep up the confidence of his troops, but not enough to hazard them in a general action. He did the same with his own army; he took it to Pforzheim in the valley of the Neckar, and halted there no longer than was requisite to collect his artillery, and to allow it time for retreat. Wartensleben fell back with thirty thousand foot and fifteen thousand horse; the archduke with forty thousand infantry and eighteen thousand cavalry; amounting, in the whole, to one hundred and three thousand men. The remainder was in fortresses, or had fled off by the Upper Rhine into Switzerland, before general Ferino, who commanded Moreau's right.

No sooner had Moreau influenced the retreat of the Austrians, than Jourdan's army again crossed the Rhine at Dusseldorf and Neuwid, making its movements as it had always done, and proceeded towards the Lahn, so as to subsequently debouch into the valley of the Maine. The French armies advanced therefore in two columns along the Maine and the Neckar, following the two imperial armies, which made a most admirable retreat. The numerous squadrons of the Austrians, hovering in the rear-guard, overawed by their mass, protected their infantry from our assaults, and frustrated all our efforts to break their line. Moreau, who had no fortress to mask on leaving the Rhine, marched with seventy-one thousand men. Jourdan, who had to blockade Mentz, Cassel, and Ehrenbreitstein, and who had been obliged to devote twenty-seven thousand men to these various purposes, marched with only forty-six thousand, and was hardly superior to Wartensleben.

According to Carnot's defective plan, it was still necessary to extend our line beyond the wings of the enemy, that is to say, to depart from the essential object, that of a junction of the two armies. This junction would have enabled the French to bring upon the Danube a mass of one hundred and fifteen or twenty thousand men,—an enormous, an overwhelming mass, which would have thrown out all the calculations of the archduke, foiled all his efforts to concentrate himself, crossed the Danube before his face, taken Ulm, and from that protecting point threatened Vienna, and shaken the imperial throne*.

* The reader is referred to the arguments of Napoleon, which he has illustrated by such notable precedents.

In conformity with Carnot's plan, Moreau was to be supported by the Upper Rhine and the Upper Danube, and Jourdan towards Bohemia. Moreau was furnished with an additional reason for supporting himself on this point, namely, the possibility of communicating with the army of Italy by the Tyrol, which presupposed the execution of the gigantic plan of Bonaparte, very properly discountenanced by the directory. As Moreau wished at the same time not to be too far separated from Jourdan, and to extend his left hand to him while he gave the right to the army of Italy, he was seen on the banks of the Neckar occupying a line of fifty leagues. Jourdan, on his part, directed to extend his line in front of Wartensleben, was obliged to separate from Moreau; and as Wartensleben, a mere ordinary general, comprehending nothing of the archduke's plan, instead of approaching the Danube, proceeded towards Bohemia with the intention of protecting it, Jourdan, in order to stretch his line beyond Wartensleben's, was obliged to extend himself more and more. Thus the two hostile armies were both doing contrary to what they ought to have done. There was this difference between Wartensleben and Jourdan, that the former neglected an excellent order, and the latter was obliged to comply with a bad one. Wartensleben's fault was his own, Jourdan's was that of Carnot the director.

Moreau fought a battle at Caustadt for the passage of the Neckar, and then penetrated into the defiles of the Alb, a chain of mountains separating the Neckar from the Danube, as the Black Mountains separate it from the Rhine. He cleared these defiles, and debouched in the valley of the Danube, about the middle of Thermidor (the end of July), after a month's march. Jourdan, after proceeding from the banks of the Lahn to those of the Maine, and fighting a battle at Friedberg, halted before the city of Frankfurt, which he threatened to bombard unless it were given up to him immediately. The Austrians complied only on condition of a suspension of hostilities for two days. This truce would allow them to cross the Maine, and to gain a considerable start; but it would save an interesting city, the resources of which might prove serviceable to the army. Jourdan assented to it. The place was given up on the 28th Messidor (July 16). Jourdan levied contributions on this city, but acted with great moderation, and even displeased his army by the forbearance he exhibited to an enemy's country. The report of the opulence in which the army of Italy lived, had inflamed the imaginations of the army, and excited a wish to live in the same manner in Germany. Jourdan ascended the Maine, made himself master of Wurtzburg on the 7th Thermidor (July 25), and then debouched beyond the mountains of Swabia, on the banks of the Naab, which falls into the Danube. He was nearly on a level with Moreau, and at the same time, that is, about the middle of Thermidor (the beginning of August), Swabia and Saxony had acceded to the neutrality, sent agents to Paris to treat for peace, and consented to the levy of contributions. The Saxon and Swabian troops retired, and thus reduced the Austrian army by about twelve thousand men, in good sooth of little use, and mere fighters without spirit.

Thus, about the middle of summer, our armies, masters of Italy, the whole of which they controlled, masters of half of Germany, which they had overrun as far as the Danube, threatened Europe. It was two months since La Vendée had been subdued. One hundred thousand men were in the west, and fifty thousand of them might be detached in any direction. The promises held out by the directorial government could not be more gloriously fulfilled.

CHAPTER IV.

INTERNAL STATE OF FRANCE TOWARDS THE MIDDLE OF THE YEAR 1796, (YEAR IV.)—FINANCIAL EMBARRASMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT. FALL OF THE "MANDATS" AND PAPER MONEY.—ATTACK ON THE CAMP AT GRENELLE BY THE JACOBINS.—RENEWAL OF THE FAMILY COMPACT WITH SPAIN, AND INTENTION TO FORM A QUADRUPLE ALLIANCE.—AN EXPEDITION TO IRELAND DESIGNED.—NEGOTIATIONS IN ITALY—HOSTILITIES CONTINUED, ARRIVAL OF WURMSER ON THE ADIGE; VICTORIES OF LONATO AND CASTIGLIONE.—OPERATIONS ON THE DANUBE; BATTLE OF NERDSHEIM; MARCH OF THE ARCHDUKE AGAINST JOURDAN.—MARCH OF BONAPARTE TO THE BRENTA; BATTLES OF ROVERÉDO BASSANO AND SAINT-GEORGE; RETREAT OF WURMSER INTO MANTUA. RETURN OF JOURDAN TO THE MAINE; BATTLE OF WURTZBURG; MOREAU'S RETREAT.

FRANCE had never appeared greater abroad than during this summer of 1796; but her internal situation was far from corresponding with her external brilliancy. Paris exhibited a singular spectacle; the patriots, furious ever since the apprehension of Babouf, Drouot, and their other chiefs, execrated the government, and no longer desired the republic should gain victories, since they proved beneficial to the directory. The declared enemies of the revolution stoutly denied them to be victories; the men who were indifferent to her success affected not to believe them. Some recently enriched upstarts, who derived their wealth from jobbing or contractorship, displayed unbounded luxury, and manifested the most ungrateful indifference for that revolution which had made their fortune. This moral state of things was the inevitable result of a general lassitude in the nation, of inveterate passions in the parties, and of cupidty excited by a financial crisis. But still there were republicans and enthusiastic Frenchmen, who retained their old sentiments, whose hearts were rejoiced by our victories, who so far from denying them, on the contrary hailed the tidings of them with delight, and pronounced with affection and admiration the names of Hoche, Jourdan, Moreau, and Bonaparte. These were desirous that fresh efforts should be made, and that the malignants and indifferents should be obliged to contribute with all their means to the glory and the greatness of the republic.

In order to tarnish the brilliancy of our triumphs, the parties set about vilifying the generals. They were particularly inveterate against the youngest and the most talented, Bonaparte, whose name had in two months become so glorious. He had, on the 13th Vendémiaire, struck great terror into the royalists, and they did not spare him in their newspapers. It was known that he had manifested a very imperious disposition in Italy; people were struck by the manner in which he treated the states of that country, granting or refusing at pleasure armistices which decided peace or war; they knew that, without making the treasury the means of distribution, he had transmitted funds to the army of the Rhine. They therefore took delight in maliciously reporting that he was intractable, and that he was about to be removed. There would have been a great general lost to the republic, and a renown that became displeasing, cut short in its outset. Accordingly, the malignants assiduously diffused the most absurd reports. They went so far as to allege that Hoche, who was then in Paris, was going off to arrest Bonaparte in the midst of his army. The government wrote a letter to Bonaparte, contradicting these rumours, wherein it repeated the assurance of its entire confidence. The government caused this letter to be published in all the papers. The brave Hoche, incapable of any mean jealousy of a rival who in two months had raised himself far above the greatest generals of the republic, wrote to disavow the part that had been ascribed to him. It may not be amiss to quote this letter, so honourable to the two young heroes. It was addressed to the minister of police, and was made public.

"Citizen minister,—Men who either concealed or unknown during the first years of the foundation of the republic, now think only of seeking the means of destroying it, and speak of it merely to slander its firmest supporters, have for some days past been spreading reports most injurious to the armies, and to one of the general officers who commanded them. Can they then no longer attain their object by corresponding openly with the horde of conspirators resident at Hamburg? Must they, in order to gain the patronage of the masters whom they are desirous of giving to France, vilify the leaders of the armies? Do they imagine that these, as weak as in times past, will suffer themselves to be calumniated without daring to reply, and to be accused without defending themselves? Why is Bonaparte then the object of the wrath of these gentry? Is it because he has beaten their friends and themselves in Vendémiaire? Is it because he is annihilating the armies of kings, and furnishing the republic with the means of bringing this honourable war to a glorious conclusion? Ah! brave young man, where is the republican soldier whose heart does not burn with the desire to imitate thee? Courage, Bonaparte! lead our victorious armies to Naples, to Vienna; reply to thy personal enemies by humbling kings, by shedding fresh lustre over our armies, and leave to us the task of upholding thy glory!

"I have smiled with pity on hearing a man, in other respects of very shrewd understanding, express an alarm which he does not feel, respecting the powers conferred on the French generals. You are acquainted with almost all of them, citizen minister. Which of them is it, supposing him even to possess sufficient authority over his army to induce it to march against the government—which of them is it, I ask, who would ever attempt to do so, without being immediately crushed by his comrades? The generals are scarcely acquainted, scarcely correspond with one another. Their number ought to make people easy respecting the designs which are gratuitously ascribed to one of them. Who is ignorant how powerfully envy, ambition, and hatred influence men? and I believe I may add love of country and honour. Cheer up, then, ye modern republicans!

"Some journalists have carried their absurdities so far as to state that I am going to Italy to arrest a man whom I esteem, and with whom the government has the greatest reason to be satisfied. It may be asserted that in the time in which we live, few general officers would undertake the duty of gendarmes, though many may be disposed to combat the factious and the factions.

"During my stay in Paris I have seen men of all opinions. I have been enabled to appreciate some of them at their just value. Some there are who think that the government cannot proceed without them. They raise an outcry, that they may obtain places; others, though nobody cares about them, imagine that their destruction has been sworn. They cry out, to render themselves interesting. I have seen emigrants, more Frenchmen than royalists, weep with joy at the recital of our victories; I have seen Parisians throw doubts upon them. It has appeared to me that one party, during but without means, was desirous of overthrowing the present government, in order to introduce anarchy in its stead; that a second, more dangerous, more adroit, and which numbers friends every where, was aiming at the destruction of the republic, in order to give back to France the rickety constitution of 1791, and a thirty years' civil war; and lastly, a third, if it is capable of despising the other two, and assuming over them that empire which is conferred on it by the laws, will conquer them, because it is composed of genuine, laborious, and upright republicans, whose means are talents and virtues, because it numbers among its partisans every good citizen and the armies, who assuredly have not been conquering for these five years merely to suffer the country to be enslaved."

These two letters silenced all the reports, and compelled the malignants to be silent.

Amidst its glory, the government excited pity by its poverty. The new paper-money had kept its ground but for a very short time, and its fall deprived the directory of an important resource. It will be recollected, that on the 25th Ventôse (March 16th) two thousand four hundred millions of mandats had been created, and chargeable upon a corresponding value in national domains. One part of these mandats had been appropriated to the withdrawing of the twenty-four thousand millions remaining in currency, and the remainder to provide for accruing purposes. It was, in some measure, as we have observed, a new impression of the old paper, with a new title and a new numerical symbol. The twenty-four thousand millions in assignats were withdrawn from circulation by eight hundred millions in mandats; and instead of creating forty-eight thousand millions more in assignats, one thousand six hundred millions in mandats were created. The difference was, therefore, in the title and in the numerical symbol. The same difference also existed as to the funds out of which they were payable; for the assignats, from the effect of the sales by auction, did not represent a determinate value in national property; the mandats, on the contrary, as they were capable of procuring estates on the mere offer of the price in 1790, represented exactly enough the sum of two thousand four hundred millions worth of that property. All this did not prevent their fall, which is attributable to various causes. France would not have any more paper, and would no longer put faith in it. Now, let the guarantees be ever so ample, if nobody cares about them, they are as though they did not exist. Then, the numerical symbol of the paper, although reduced, was not sufficiently so. There was a conversion of twenty-four thousand millions in assignats into eight hundred millions in mandats; the old paper, therefore, was reduced to one thirtieth, and it ought to have been reduced to the two hundred and twentieth to insure its practical reduction, for twenty-four thousand millions were not worth more than one hundred and twenty millions at the most. To throw them back into circulation for eight hundred millions, by converting them into mandats, was an error. It is true that there was appropriated to them a like value in national property; but an estate which in 1790 was worth one hundred thousand francs, would not at this time sell for more than thirty thousand or twenty-five thousand; and consequently the paper bearing this new title and this new symbol, even had it exactly represented national estates, must like them be worth no more than one-third of the money. Now, to attempt to make it circulate at par, as had been done, was again to propound a fallacy. Thus, if there had even been a possibility of restoring confidence to the paper, the exaggerated opinion of its value must still have made it fall; thus, although its currency was forced upon every one, it was not for one moment entertained. The violent measures which could have been enforced in 1793, were at this time powerless. Nobody did business but for money. That money which was supposed to be hoarded or carried abroad, supplied the currency. That which had been concealed now came forth; that which had quitted France returned. The southern provinces were full of piastres, which came from Spain, and were introduced among us from necessity. Gold and silver came, like all commodities, whithersoever the demand attracts them; only their price is higher and keeps up till the quantity is sufficient and the want supplied. Some acts of dishonesty were also committed by paying in mandats, because the laws, giving the forced currency of money to paper, permitted its use in the discharge of written engagements; but scarcely any one ventured to do so, and as for all contracts, they were made for money. In the markets nothing was to be seen but gold and silver, and the wages of the lower classes were paid in no other manner. One would have said that there was no paper in France. The mandats got into the hands of none but speculators, who received them from the government, and sold them to the purchasers of national domains.

In this manner the financial crisis, although in existence so far as concerned the state, had almost ceased with respect to individuals. Commerce and industry, availing themselves of the first moment of tranquillity, and of some communications reopened with the continent as a consequence of our victories, began to resume some activity.

It is not, as governments have had the vanity to assert, merely necessary to encourage production in order that it may prosper; all it requires is, not to be impeded. It avails itself of the earliest opportunity to display itself with wonderful activity. But if the circumstances of private individuals were rendered more easy, the government, that is to say, its leaders and agents of all kinds, military men, high placemen, or magistrates, and its creditors, were reduced to extreme distress. The mandates which were given to them were of no service in their hands; they could make but one use of them, namely, pass them to speculators in paper, who took one hundred francs for five or six, and afterwards sold these mandates to the purchasers of national property. Thus the annuitants were perishing of hunger; the functionaries were giving up their places, and contrary to all usual usage, instead of soliciting appointments, people were resigning them. The armies of Germany and Italy, quartered upon the enemy, were protected from the general want; but the armies of the interior were in extreme distress. Hoche had nothing wherewithal to maintain his soldiers but the provisions levied in the provinces of the west, and he was obliged to keep up the military system in those provinces, in order to have a right to levy the supplies in kind. As for the officers and himself, they had not wherewithal even to clothe themselves. The victualling service established in France for the troops marching through the country had frequently failed, because the contractors would no longer make advances. The detachments sent from the coasts of the ocean to reinforce the army of Italy had been stopped by the way. Hospitals were even seen shut up, and the unfortunate soldiers who filled them turned out of that asylum which the republic should have provided for their infirmities, because they could no longer be supplied either with medicines or with food. The gendarmerie was entirely disorganized. Being neither clothed or equipped, it had nearly ceased to perform its office. The gendarmes, in order to save their horses, which were not replaced, no longer protected the roads; those brigands, who are always so numerous after civil wars, infested them. They broke into farmhouses, and frequently penetrated into the towns, and there committed robbery and murder with unheard-of audacity.

Such was the internal state of France. The particular character of this new crisis was the distress of the government in the midst of the improving circumstances of private individuals. The directory subsisted entirely on the wrecks of the paper, and a few millions which its armies sent to it from abroad. General Bonaparte had already remitted thirty millions, and sent it one hundred fine carriage-horses to contribute somewhat to its state.

The directory now began seriously to think of destroying the whole scheme of paper money. To do this, its currency must no longer be forced, and the taxes must be received in real value. The directory therefore declared on the 28th Messidor (July 16), that every one might bargain in whatever money he pleased; that the mandates were in future to be taken only at their actual current value, and that this currency should be daily ascertained and published by the treasury. At length the directory ventured to declare that the taxes should be paid in specie or in mandates at the course of exchange; there was but one exception, and that was the land-tax. When the mandates were created, it was to be collected in paper and no longer in kind. The government now began to be sensible that it would have been better to continue to collect it in kind, because amidst the fluctuations of the paper they would at least have obtained provisions. It was therefore decided, after long discussions and several plans rejected one after the other by the ancients, that in the frontier departments or those contiguous to the armies, the taxes might still be demanded in kind; that in other places they should be paid in mandates, at the current price of corn. Thus corn was valued in 1790 at ten francs the quintal; it was valued at the present time at eighty francs in mandates. Every ten francs of assessment, representing a quintal of corn, would now pay eighty francs in mandates. It would have been much more simple to require payment in money, or in mandates at the current value; but upon this the government durst not yet venture; it began therefore to return, but not without some hesitation, to an actual money system.

The forced loan was not yet entirely got in. The supreme authority had no longer that arbitrary energy which could have insured the prompt execution of such a measure. There remained nearly three hundred millions to be collected. It was settled that in payment of the loan and taxes mandates should be taken at par, and assignats at the rate of one hundred for one, but for a fortnight only; and that after the expiration of this term, paper should be taken only at the current value. This was one way of encouraging those who were in arrear, to make up their payments.

The abolition of the mandates being declared, it was no longer possible to take them as an entire payment for the national domains which were appropriated to them; and the bankruptcy which it had been predicted would befall them as well as the assignats became inevitable. In fact, it was publicly stated, that inasmuch as the mandates issued for two thousand four hundred millions had fallen far below that value, and were not worth more than two hundred or three hundred millions, the state would no longer give the promised value in national property, namely, two thousand four hundred millions. The contrary had been maintained, in the hope that the mandates would keep up to a certain value; but one hundred francs falling to five or six francs, the state could no longer give land, worth one hundred francs in 1790, and thirty or forty francs at that time, for five or six francs. Here again was the same kind of bankruptcy that the assignats had experienced, and the nature of which we have already explained. The state then did what is done at the present day by a sinking fund, which buys in at the course of the exchange, and which, in case of an extraordinary fall, would buy in perhaps at fifty what might have been purchased at eighty or ninety. In consequence, it was decided on the 8th Thermidor, that the last fourth part of the national domains appropriated by the law of the 26th Ventôse (that which created the mandates) should be paid for in mandates at the current value, and by six equal payments. As it had been contracted for at eight hundred millions, this fourth was of course two hundred millions.

The paper-money system therefore was drawing near to its conclusion. It may be asked for what purpose the government had made this second trial of assignats, which had so short a duration and so little success. We are generally too apt to judge of measures of this description, without duly considering the circumstances which have influenced them. An apprehension that money would be wanting had, no doubt, contributed to the creation of the mandates; and assuming it had no other reason, the government would have been much to blame, for there never can be any want of money; but the fact was, the government had been peculiarly impelled by the imperative necessity of living upon the produce of the national property, and of anticipating their sale. It was necessary to send their value into the currency before it was purchased, and for this purpose to issue it in the form of paper. The resource had indeed not been great, because the mandates had fallen so speedily; but at any rate the government had lived upon it for four or five months. And is this nothing? The mandates must be considered as a new discount of the value of the national domains, and as an expedient till these domains could be sold. We shall see how much distress the government had still to undergo before it could realize their sale for money.

The treasury was not deficient in resources speedily demandable; but it was with these resources as with the national estates—they had to be brought into ready money. The treasury had yet to receive three hundred millions of the forced loan; three hundred millions of the land-tax for the year, that is to say, the whole amount of that tax; twenty-five millions of the tax on moveable property; the whole farm-rent of the national domains, and the arrears of that rent, amounting together to sixty millions; various military levies; the price of the moveable property of the emigrants; sundry arrears; lastly, eighty millions of foreign paper. All these resources, added to the two hundred millions of the last fourth of the purchase-money of the national estates, amounted to one thousand one hundred millions,—an enormous sum, but difficult to realize. To complete its year, that is, to go on till the 1st Vendémiaire, it wanted only four hundred millions; it would be saved if out of the one thousand one hundred it could have immediately realized four hundred. For the following year, it had the ordinary taxes, which it hoped to collect all in money, and which, amounting to some five hundred millions, covered what were called the ordinary expenses. For the war expenses, if a new campaign were necessary, it had the remainder of the one thousand one hundred millions just mentioned, and of which it would not spend this year more than four hundred; lastly, it had the new contracts of the national domains. But the difficulty still was, how were those sums to be got in. Ready money never consists of any thing but the proceeds of the year; now it was difficult to raise them at once by the forced loan, by the tax on land and moveables, and by the sale of the national estates. The government set about collecting the taxes, and gave the directory the extraordinary power of pledging Belgian estates for one hundred million in money. The treasury orders, a kind of royal buns, whose object was to discount the proceeds of the year, had shared the fate of all the paper. Being unable to avail himself of this resource, the minister paid the contractors with treasury warrants, which were payable out of the first monies to be got in.

Such was the indigence of this government so glorious abroad. At home the parties were still exciting domestic agitation. The submission of La Vendée had greatly abated the hopes of the royalist faction; but the Paris agents were only more than ever convinced of the merit of their old plan, which consisted in not having recourse to civil war, but in seducing public opinion, and in gaining a gradual influence over the councils and the authorities. This it was they laboured in their journals. As for the patriots, they had arrived at the highest point of indignation. They had favoured the flight of Drouet, who had found means to escape from prison, and they meditated new plots, notwithstanding the discovery of Babœuf's. Many old conventionalists and Thermidorians, formerly connected with the government which they had themselves formed the day after the 13th Vendémiaire, began to be discontented. There was a law passed, as we have observed, that ordered the non-elected ex-conventionalists and all dismissed placemen to quit Paris. The police, by mistake, sent warrants to arrest four conventionalists, members of the legislative body. These warrants were acrimoniously censured in the five hundred. Tallien who at the time of the discovery of Babœuf's plot had loudly declared his adhesion to the system of the government, exclaimed bitterly against the police of the directory, and against that feeling of distrust so pointedly exhibited against the patriots. His habitual opponent, Thibaudeau, replied to him; and after a very warm discussion and some recriminations, each relapsed into sullen ill-humour. Cochon the minister, his agents, and his police spies, were peculiarly hated by the patriots, who had been the first that experienced his vigilance. Besides all this, the course to be pursued by the government was clearly pointed out; and if it was decidedly hostile to the royalists, it was also quite as unconnected with the patriots, that is, with that portion of the revolutionary party who wanted to return to a more democratic republic, and who considered the present system too mild for the aristocrats. But with the exception of the state of finances, the situation of the directory, who was not identified with the parties, but rather curbing them with a strong hand, and supported by fine armies, was very cheering and splendid.

The patriots had already made two attempts, and been twice foiled, since the installation of the directory. They had endeavoured to re-open the club of the Jacobins at the Pantheon, and they had seen it shut up by the government. They next hatched a mysterious plot under the direction of Babeuf; they had been discovered by the police, and deprived of their new leaders. Still they continued their agitation, and thought of making one last attempt. The opposition, in again attacking the law of the 3rd Brumaire, excited their rage in an increased degree, and impelled them to a final struggle. They had already endeavoured to corrupt the police legion. That legion had been disbanded, and converted into a regiment, which was the 21st dragoons. They wished to try the fidelity of this regiment, and hoped by gaining it over, to draw with it the whole army of the interior, encamped in the plain of Grenelle. They purposed at the same time to excite a commotion by firing muskets in Paris, by scattering white cockades in the streets, by shouting, Vive le Roi! and by thus inducing a belief that the royalists were in arms for the destruction of the republic. Their intention then was to avail themselves of this pretext to run to arms, make themselves masters of the government, and get the camp of Grenelle to declare in their favour.

On the 12th Fructidor (August 29) they carried part of their plan into execution, fired petards, and threw some white cockades about the streets. But the police, who had been prepared for this movement, had taken such precautions, that they found it impossible to excite any commotion. They were not however discouraged; and some few days afterwards, on the 23rd Fructidor (September 9), they resolved to fully accomplish their designs. Thirty of the principal assembled at the Gros-Caillois, and resolved that very night to collect a mob in the quarter of Vaugirard. That quarter, near the camp of Grenelle, was full of gardens, and intersected by walls; it afforded lines behind which they could assemble and make a stand, in case they should be attacked. Accordingly, in the evening, they collected to the number of seven or eight hundred, armed with muskets, pistols, swords, and sword-sticks. This assemblage comprehended all the most determined men of the party. There were among them some dismissed officers, who headed this concourse in their uniforms and epaulettes. There were also some ex-conventionalists, in the costume of representatives, and even, it was said, Drouet, who had been concealed in Paris ever since his escape. An officer of the guard of the directory, at the head of ten horse, was patrolling in Paris, when he was informed of the concourse collected at Vaugirard. He hastened thither with his little detachment; but he had hardly come up before he was received with a discharge of musketry, and assailed by two hundred armed men, who made him turn back and gallop off. He went immediately to order the guard of the directory to be put under arms, and sent an officer to the camp of Grenelle to give the alarm. The patriots lost no time, and, the alarm being given, repaired in all haste to the plain of Grenelle, to the number of some hundreds. They bent their steps towards the quarters of the 21st dragoons, formerly the police legion, and endeavoured to gain it over by saying that they had come to fraternize with it. Malo, a chef d'escadron, who commanded that regiment, immediately left his tent, mounted his horse half-dressed, rallied around him some officers and the first dragoons whom he met with, and charged with drawn swords those who talked of fraternizing with him. This example decided the soldiers; they ran to their horses, dashed upon the mob, and very soon dispersed it. They killed and wounded a great number of persons, and apprehended one hundred and thirty two. The uproar of this conflict roused the whole camp, which was instantly under arms, and spread alarm throughout Paris. But every body felt relieved so soon as they understood the result, and the folly of the attempt. The directory immediately ordered the prisoners to be imprisoned, and applied to the two councils for authority to make domiciliary visits, for the purpose of apprehending in certain quarters many of the rioters whose wounds prevented their leaving Paris. As they formed part of an armed mob, they were to be tried by the military tribunals, and were handed over to a commission, which began by ordering a certain number of them to be shot. The organization of the high national court had not yet been completed; and its installation was again pressed, in order that the proceedings against Babeuf might commence.

This sudden outbreak was looked upon in its proper light, that is to say, as one of those imprudent acts which are the distinguishing characteristics of an expiring party. The enemies of the revolution alone affected to attach great importance to it, that they might have a new occasion to raise an outcry against terror, and to spread alarm. Generally speaking, people were not much frightened; and this vain attack proved more distinctly than all the other successes of the directory that its establishment was firmly settled, and that the parties must no longer entertain any hopes of effecting its destruction.

Such were the events that were occurring in the interior.

While fresh battles were about to be fought abroad, important negotiations were preparing in Europe. The French republic was at peace with several powers, but in alliance with none. The detractors, who had asserted that it would never be recognized, now said it would for ever be without allies. By way of replying to these malicious insinuations, the directory thought of renewing the family compact with Spain, and projected the scheme of a quadruple alliance between France, Spain, Venice, and the Porto. By these means, the quadruple alliance, composed of all the powers of the south, against those of the north, would command the Mediterranean and the East, annoy Russia, threaten the rear of Austria, and raise up a new maritime enemy against England. It would moreover procure great advantages for the army of Italy, by insuring it the support of the Venetian squadron, and of thirty thousand Slavonians.

Spain was the easiest of the three powers to decide. She had grievances against England that dated from the commencement of the war. The principal of these were the conduct of the English at Toulon, and the secrecy observed towards the Spanish admiral, at the time of the expedition against Corsica. Spain had still greater grievances to complain of since the peace with France. The English had insulted her ships, intercepted supplies intended for her, violated her territory, taken up positions that threatened her American possessions, violated the custom-house regulations in her colonies, and openly endeavoured to excite them to revolt. These causes for discontent, added to the splendid offers of the directory, which made her expect some possessions in Italy, and the victories which allowed her to give credit to the accomplishment of these offers, at length decided Spain to sign on the 2nd Fructidor (August 19th) a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with France, on the basis of the family compact. By this treaty, those two powers mutually guaranteed to each other all their possessions in Europe and in the Indies; they reciprocally promised one another assistance to the extent of eighteen thousand infantry, and six thousand cavalry, fifteen first-rate ships, fifteen seventy-fours, six frigates, and four cutters. This aid was to be furnished at the first requisition of either of the two powers that should be at war.

Instructions were sent to our ambassadors to represent to the Porte and to Venice the advantages in store for them, in concurring in such an alliance.

The French republic, therefore, was no longer cut off from the rest of the world, and she had raised up a new foe against England. Every thing predicted that a declaration of war by Spain against England would soon follow the treaty of alliance with France.

The directory was preparing for Pitt embarrassments of quite another description. Hoche was at the head of one hundred thousand men, distributed along the coast of the [Atlantic] Ocean. La Vendée and Brittany were reduced: he was burning with impatience to employ these forces in a manner more worthy of himself, and to add new exploits to those of Weissenburg and Landau. He suggested to the government a design he had long contemplated,—that of an expedition to Ireland. Now, said he, that we have driven civil war from the coast of France, we must transfer that scourge to the shores of England, and, by raising the Catholics in Ireland, repay her the evils she did us in raising the Poitevins and the Bretons. The occasion was favourable; the Irish were more than ever alienated on account of the oppressive conduct of the English government; the people of the three kingdoms were suffering severely from the war; and an invasion, in addition to the other evils they were already enduring, might probably carry them to the last degree of exasperation. Pitt's finances were in a tottering state; and the enterprise under the conduct of Hoche might be productive of the most important consequences. The plan was at once received. Truguet, minister of the marine, a good republican and a talented minister, seconded it by all the means in his power. He collected a squadron in the harbour of Brest, and did every thing the state of the finances allowed him towards fitting it out in a suitable manner. Hoche selected all the best troops from his army, and marched them to Brest, to put them on board. Care was taken to give different accounts of this expedition. At one time it was an expedition to Saint-Domingo; at another it was an expedition to Lisbon, in order to drive the English out of Portugal, acting in concert with Spain.

England, who had her suspicions as to the object of these preparations, became seriously alarmed. The treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between Spain and France forbade her new dangers; the defeats of Austria caused her to apprehend the loss of this powerful and last ally; her finances were extremely impoverished; the bank had contracted its discounts; capital began to fail; and the loan opened for the emperor had been stopped, to prevent further funds from leaving the country. The ports of Italy were closed against English vessels; the Spanish ports were also about to be closed; and those of the [German] Ocean as far as the Texel already were so. Thus the commerce of Great Britain was specially threatened. To all these difficulties were added those of a general election; for the parliament, now verging on its seventh year, was to be totally re-elected. The elections took place amidst the shouting of curses against Pitt and the war.

The empire had almost entirely abandoned the cause of the allied powers. The states of Baden and Württemberg had just signed a definitive peace, allowing the belligerent armies transit through their territories. Austria was alarmed on seeing two French armies on the Danube, and a third on the Adige, which seemed to close Italy against her. She had sent Wurmser with thirty thousand men, to collect several reserves in the Tyrol, to rally and reorganize the wrecks of Beaulieu's army, and to descend into Lombardy with sixty thousand soldiers. She had, as she conceived, less to apprehend from this quarter, and so far felt relieved, but she was exceedingly alarmed for the Danube, and directed all her attention thither. To prevent alarming reports, the Aulic council had forbidden public events to be talked of at Venice; it had organized a levy of volunteers, and laboured with extraordinary activity to fit out and arm fresh troops. Katharine, who always made promises and never performed them, had rendered one service; she had guaranteed Galicia to Austria, and this arrangement had enabled the latter to withdraw her troops from that country, in order to convey them towards the Alps and the Danube.

Thus France on every side terrified her enemies, and every body looked with impatience for the result of the fortune of war in the neighbourhood of the Danube and the Adige. On the immense line which extends from Bohemia to the Adriatic, three armies were about to encounter three others, and decide the fate of Europe.

In the mean time a suspension of hostilities had been made the subject of a negotiation in Italy. Peace had been made with Piedmont, and the armistice had been succeeded, two months afterwards, by a treaty. This treaty engaged for the absolute cession of the duchy of Savoy and of the comté of Nice to France; the destruction of the forts of Susa and Brunetta, situated at the outlet of the Alps; the occupation during the war of the fortresses of Coni, Tortona, and Alexandria; a free transit for the French troops through the states of Piedmont; and the supply of what was necessary for these troops during their march. In addition to this, the directory, at the suggestion of Bonaparte, wanted an offensive and defensive alliance with the king of Sardinia, in order to have ten or fifteen thousand men of his army.

But this prince in return asked for Lombardy, which France could not yet dispose of, and which she had always intended should serve as an equivalent for the Netherlands. This concession being refused, the king would not consent to an alliance.

The directory had not yet concluded any thing with Genoa; discussions were still going on relative to the recal of the exiled families, to the expulsion of the families feudatories of Austria and Naples, and to the indemnity for the Modeste frigate.

With Tuscany our relations were amicable; but the means employed towards the Leghorn merchants, to obtain a declaration of the merchandise belonging to the enemies of France, had sown the seeds of discontent. Naples and Rome had sent agents to Paris in conformity with the terms of the armistice; but the negotiation of the peace was attended with considerable delay. It was evident that the powers were waiting, before concluding it, to see what turn the war would take. The people of Bologna and Ferrara were still as enthusiastic as ever in favour of that liberty that had been provisionally conferred upon them. The regency of Modena and the duke of Parma were immovable. Lombardy awaited with anxiety the result of the campaign. Urgent applications had been addressed to the senate of Venice, with the double intent of inducing it to concur in the plan of a quadruple alliance, and of obtaining a useful auxiliary to the army of Italy. Besides direct overtures, our ambassadors at Constantinople and Madrid had made indirect proposals, and had strongly insisted upon them with the legations of Venice, for the purpose of demonstrating to them the advantages of the plan; but all these schemes had proved fruitless. Venice detested the French ever since she had seen them in her territory, and their ideas had been diffused amongst her population. She no longer confined herself to an unarmed neutrality. On the contrary, she was actively preparing herself for hostilities. She had given orders to the commandants of the islands to despatch the disposable ships and troops into the lagoons; and she had sent for the Slavonian regiments from Illyria. The providitore of Bergamo was secretly arming the superstitious but brave peasants of the Bergamasco. Funds were collected by the twofold means of taxes and voluntary donations.

Bonaparte thought that at this juncture his course would be to dissemble with all, to protract the negotiations, to endeavour to prevent things from coming to a conclusion, and to appear ignorant of all hostile proceedings, till fresh battles should have settled the question whether we were to stay or be driven out of Italy. There was no necessity for him to agitate those questions which had to be settled with Genoa, and to persuade her that the French were content with the satisfaction obtained, in order that they might find a friend in her in case of retreat. There was no motive to displease the duke of Tuscany by the conduct that was pursued at Leghorn. Bonaparte could never have been of opinion that a brother of the emperor's ought to be left in that duchy, but he did not wish to alarm him prematurely. Garreau and Salicetti, the commissioners of the directory, having issued an order for the departure of all the French emigrants from the environs of Leghorn, Bonaparte wrote a letter to them, in which, without any regard to their quality, he severely reprimanded them for having overstepped their powers and affronted the duke of Tuscany by usurping the sovereign authority in his dominions. With respect to Venice also, he was desirous of maintaining the status quo; though he complained loudly of some murders committed on the high roads, and of the preparations which he saw making around him. His object in keeping the quarrel open was to keep himself well supplied, and to coin a reason for americing the republic in a few millions, if he should beat the Austrians. "If I am victorious," he wrote, "a mere express will be sufficient to put an end to all the difficulties that are raised up against me."

The citadel of Milan had fallen into his power. The garrison had surrendered; all the artillery had been transferred to Mantua, where he had got together a considerable train of ordnance. He was very desirous to bring the siege of that fortress to a conclusion before the new Austrian army should come up to its relief; but in this he could hardly expect to succeed. He employed in the blockade no more than the number of troops that was indispensably necessary, on account of the fever that raged in the environs. Nevertheless he hemmed in the place very closely, and was preparing to attempt one of those surprises which, according to his own expression, depend upon a goose or a dog; but the waters of the lake were so low, that the passage of the boats that were to carry his disguised troops could not be effected. He then renounced for the moment the intention of making himself master of Mantua; besides, Wurmser was coming, and it was requisite to attend to that which was most urgent.

The army, which had entered Italy with some thirty thousand men or thereabouts, had received but small reinforcements to repair its losses. Nine thousand men had come from the Alps. The divisions drafted from Hoche's army had not yet been able to traverse France. Owing to this reinforcement of nine thousand men, and to the sick who had left the military dépôts of Provence and the Var, the army had retrieved its losses and was even reinforced. It amounted to nearly forty-five thousand men, distributed upon the Adige and around Mantua, at the moment when Bonaparte returned from his march into the peninsula. The diseases which seized the soldiers before Mantua reduced it to about forty or forty-two thousand men. This was its strength in the middle of Thermidor (the end of July). Bonaparte had left merely military dépôts at Milan, Tortona, and Leghorn. He had already driven out of the field two armies, one of Piedmontese and the other of Austrians, and now he had to fight a third army more formidable than the preceding.

Wurmser came up at the head of sixty thousand men. Thirty thousand were drafted from the Rhine, and were composed of troops in fine condition. The remainder was formed of the wreck of Beaulieu's army, and of battalions from the interior of Austria. Upwards of ten thousand men were shut up in Mantua, exclusive of the sick. Thus the whole army comprehended more than seventy thousand men. Bonaparte had nearly ten thousand around Mantua, and had therefore no more than about thirty thousand to oppose to the sixty who were about to debouch from the Tyrol. With such an inequality of force, it required extraordinary bravery in the soldiers, and a most fertile genius in the general, to restore the balance.

The line of the Adige, to which Bonaparte attached so much importance, was about to become the theatre of the struggle. We have already stated the reasons which induced Bonaparte to prefer it to every other. The Adige was not so long as the Po or those rivers which, falling into the latter, blend their line with that of the Po; after flowing a short distance it ran directly to the sea; it was not fordable, neither could it be turned by the Tyrol, like the Brenta, the Piave, and the rivers higher up towards the extremity of Upper Italy. This river has been the theatre of such glorious events, that we must describe its course with some attention.

The streams of the Tyrol form two lines,—the line of the Mincio, and the line of the Adige,—nearly parallel, and mutually supporting each other. A portion of these streams forms in the mountains an extensive and long lake, called the Lake of Garda. The streams from this lake flow to Peschiera, cross the plain of the Mantuan, become the Mincio, form another lake around Mantua, and, pursuing their course, at length fall into the Lower Po. The Adige, formed by the streams from the upper valleys of the Tyrol, runs beyond the preceding line. It descends through the mountains in a direction parallel to the lake of Garda, debouches into the plain in the environs of Verona, then runs parallel to the Mincio, excavates for itself a wide and deep bed as far as Legnago, and a few leagues beyond that town is no longer confined between steep banks, and can spread itself out into impassable inundations, which obstruct the entire space comprised between that point and the Adriatic. Three routes presented themselves to the enemy. One crossing the Adige as high as Roveredo, before the commencement of the lake of Garda, turned round that lake, and led behind it to Salò, Gavardo, and Brescia. Two other routes, running from Roveredo, followed the two banks of the Adige, in its course along the lake of Garda. The one on the right bank ran between the river and the lake, passed through the mountains, and entered the plain between the Mincio and the Adige. The other, following the left bank, and running outside the Adige, debouched into the plain towards Verona, and thus led to the front of the defensive line. The first of the three routes, that which crosses the Adige before the source of the lake of Garda, afforded the advantage of turning at the same time the two lines of the Mincio and of the Adige, and leading to the rear of the army that was protecting them. But it was not very passable; it was accessible to mountain artillery only, and therefore it might serve for a diversion, but not for an operation upon which every thing was to depend. The second, which descended from the mountains between the lake and the Adige, crossed the river at Rivalta or Dolce, a point where it was scarcely at all defended; but it wound its way in the mountains, through positions easily defended,—those of La Corona and Rivoli. The third running beyond the river to the middle of the plain, debouched outside, and led to the best defended part of its course, that from Verona to Legnago. Thus all three routes presented very great difficulties. The first could be only occupied by a detachment; the second, passing between the lake and the river, came upon the positions of La Corona and Rivoli; the third abutted upon the Adige, which has a wide deep bed from Verona to Legnago, and is defended by two fortresses, eight leagues distant from one another.

Bonaparte had stationed general Sauret, with three thousand men, at Salò, to protect the road which debouches on the rear of the lake of Garda. Masséna, with twelve thousand, intercepted the road which runs between the lake of Garda and the Adige, and occupied the positions of La Corona and Rivoli. Despinis, with five thousand, was in the environs of Verona; Augereau, with eight thousand, at Legnago; Kilmaine, with two thousand horse and light artillery, as a reserve, in a central position at Castel Novo. There it was that Bonaparte had fixed his head-quarters, so as to be at an equal distance from Salò, Rivoli, and Verona. As he attached great importance to Verona, which had three bridges over the Adige, and inasmuch as he had his misgivings as to the intentions of Venice, he resolved to make the Slavonian regiments quit that place. He pretended that they were in hostility with the French troops; and upon pretext of preventing quarrels, he insisted on their leaving the city. The proclamaire complied, and the French garrison alone was left in Verona.

Wurmser had transferred his head-quarters to Trent and Roveredo. He detached twenty thousand men under Quaradanovich, to take the road that turns the lake of Garda and debouches upon Salò. He took forty thousand with him, and distributed them upon the two roads that run along the Adige. Some were to attack La Corona and Rivoli, others to debouch upon Verona. He believed that in this manner he could entirely surround the French army, which, being attacked at one and the same time, on the Adige and on the rear of the lake of Garda, would be in danger of being forced on its front, and of being cut off from its line of retreat.

Public report had anticipated the arrival of Wurmser. Throughout all Italy his coming was expected, and the party hostile to the independence of Italy exhibited great joy and presumption. The Venetians manifested a satisfaction they could no longer repress. The places of public resort were covered with Slavonian soldiers, and they, holding out their hands to the passengers, asked for the price of the French blood they were going to shed. In Rome, the agents of France were insulted; the Pope, grown bolder by the hope of speedy deliverance, ordered the carriages laden with the first instalment of the contribution imposed upon him to turn back; he even despatched his legate to Ferrara and Bologna. Lastly, the court of Naples, still as senseless as ever, trampling upon the conditions of the armistice, sent its troops to march to the frontiers of the Roman states. On the other hand, the most painful anxiety prevailed in all the towns devoted to France and to liberty. Tidings from the Adige were impatiently looked for. The Italian imagination, which magnifies every thing, had exaggerated the disproportion of the forces. It was said that Wurmser was coming with two armies, one of sixty, the other of eighty thousand men. People asked one another how that handful of French could possibly withstand such a mass of foes; and they repeated the famous proverb, that Italy was the grave of the French.

On the 11th Thermidor (July 29) the Austrians came upon our outposts and surprised them all. The corps which had turned the lake of Garda debouched upon Salò, whence it repulsed general Sauret. General Guyeux was left alone there with a few hundred men, and shut himself up in an old building, which he refused to quit, though he had neither bread or water, and scarcely any ammunition. Along the two roads which run by the side of the Adige the Austrians advanced with the same advantage: they forced the important position of La Corona, between the Adige and the lake of Garda; they made a passage in the same manner by the third road, and came to debouch before Verona. Bonaparte, in his head-quarters at Castel Novo, received intelligence of all these things. Couriers succeeded one another without intermission, and on the following day, the 12th Thermidor (July 30), he was apprised that the Austrians were marching from Salò upon Brescia, and that thus his retreat upon Milan was excluded; that the position of Rivoli was forced, as well as that of La Corona; and that the Austrians were about to cross the Adige at all points. In this alarming situation, having lost his defensive line and his line of retreat, he could hardly do any thing than consider how to effect his escape. This was the first time he had experienced adversity. Whether he was affected by the excess of the danger, or was ready to adopt a daring resolution, he was desirous of sharing the responsibility with his generals; for the first time he asked their opinion and called a council of war: all of them were for retreating. Without any point of support before them, having lost one of the two roads to France, there was not one who deemed it prudent to hold out. Angereau alone, to whom these days were the most glorious of his life, strongly insisted on trying the fortune of arms. He was young and sanguine; he had learned in the faubourgs to speak with fluency the language of camps, and he declared that he had good grenadiers who would not retire without fighting. Although he was far from being a judge as to the resources which the situation of the armies and the nature of the ground still presented, he was governed solely by the dictates of his courage, and he warmed by his military ardour the genius of Bonaparte. The latter dismissed his generals, without expressing his own opinion, but his plan was formed. Although the line of the Adige was forced, and the line of the Mincio and the lake of Garda turned, the ground was so favourable that it still presented resources to a resolute man of genius.

The Austrians, divided into two bodies, were descending along the two shores of the lake of Garda; their junction was to be effected at the extremity of the lake, and, on their arrival there, they would have sixty thousand men to overwhelm thirty thousand. But by concentrating himself at the extremity of the lake, Bonaparte might prevent their junction. If then he were to form with sufficient rapidity a principal mass, he might overwhelm the twenty thousand who had turned the lake, and then return to the forty thousand who had filed between the lake and the Adige. But, in order to occupy the extremity of the lake, he must bring back thither all the troops from the Lower Adige and the Lower Mincio; he would have to withdraw Angereau from Legnago, and Serrurier from Mantua, for it was impossible to keep so extended a line. It was a great sacrifice; for he had been besieging Mantua for two months, he had brought thither a great train of ordnance, the place was about to surrender, and, by allowing it to revictual itself, he should lose the fruit of protracted operations, with his prey almost within his grasp. However, Bonaparte did not hesitate, and between two objects knew how to seize the most important, and to sacrifice the other; a simple resolution, which is decisive of not only the great captain, but the great man. It is not only in war, but also in politics and in all situations of life, that men in proposing to themselves two different objects, in their desire to attain one as well as the other, miss both. Bonaparte possessed the natural faculty, so great, and so rarely to be met with, of distinguishing between the choice and the rejection. Had he attempted to keep the whole course of the Mincio, from the point of the lake of Garda to Mantua, the enemy would have broken through his line; and if he had concentrated himself upon Mantua to cover it, he would have had to fight seventy thousand men at once,—sixty thousand in front, and ten thousand in rear. He gave up Mantua, and concentrated his force at the extremity of the lake of Garda. Orders were immediately sent to Angereau to quit Legnago, and to Serrurier to leave Mantua, in order to bring up all their forces towards Valeggio and Peschiera on the Upper Mincio. During the night of the 13th Thermidor (July 31), Serrurier burned his gun-carriages, spiked his cannon, buried his projectiles, and threw his powder into the water, before he started to join the active army.

Bonaparte, without losing a single moment, resolved to march first upon that corps of the enemy which was most forward, and the most exposed to danger from the position it had taken. This was the corps of Quasdanovich, who with twenty thousand men had debouched by Salò, Gavardo, and Brescia, on the rear of the lake of Garda, and threatened the communication with Milan. On that same day that Serrurier left Mantua, the 13th (July 31), Bonaparte made a retrograde movement for the purpose of falling upon Quasdanovich, and recrossed the Mincio at Peschiera with the greater part of his army. Angereau crossed at Borghetto, over the same bridge, the scene of a glorious action at the time of the first conquest. Rear-guards were left to watch the march of the enemy who had passed the Adige. Bonaparte ordered general Sauret to go and relieve general Guyeux, who had shut himself up in an old building with seventeen hundred men, without either bread or water, and who had been fighting most heroically for two days. He himself resolved to march upon Lonato, whither Quasdanovich had just pushed forward a division; and he ordered Angereau to get on to Brescia, to re-open the communication with Milan. Sauret succeeded in extricating general Guyeux, and drove back the Austrians into the mountains, and made some hundred of them prisoners. Bonaparte, with the German brigade, was not in time to attack the Austrians at Lonato: he was anticipated by them. After a very brisk action, he repulsed the Austrians, entered Lonato, and took six hundred prisoners. Augereau was, meanwhile, marching upon Brescia. He entered it on the 14th (August 1), without striking a blow, released some prisoners who had been taken from us, and forced the Austrians to make their way back to the mountains. Quasdanovich, who thought that he should come upon the rear of the French army and surprise it, was astonished to find imposing masses everywhere, making head against him so vigorously. He had lost only a few men either at Salo or at Lonato; but he thought it right to halt, and not proceed further, until he knew what had become of Wurmser, with the principal Austrian mass. He therefore halted.

Bonaparte likewise halted. Time was precious; on this point there was no motive for pushing an advantage further than necessary. It was enough to have made an impression on Quasdanovich; he had now to turn back to face Wurmser. He made a retrograde movement with Masséna's and Augereau's divisions. On the 15th (August 2), he placed Masséna's division at Pon-San-Marco, and Augereau's division at Monte-Chiaro. The rear-guards which he had left on the Mincio became his advanced guards. It was time that he came up, for Wurmser's forty thousand men had crossed not only the Adige but also the Mincio. The division of Bayalitsch having masked Peschiera by a detachment, and passed the Mincio, was advancing upon the road to Lonato. Liptai's division had crossed the Mincio at Borghetto, and driven general Vallette from Castiglione. Wurmser had proceeded with two divisions of infantry, and one of cavalry, to raise the blockade of Mantua. On seeing our gun-carriages in ashes, our cannon spiked, and all the signs of extreme precipitation, he did not perceive therein the foresight of genius, but the effect of fear; he was overjoyed, he entered the place in triumph which he came to relieve; this was the 15th (August 2nd).

Bonaparte, returned to Pon-San-Marco and Monte-Chiaro, did not halt for a moment. His troops had been constantly on the march, he had himself been all the time on horseback; he resolved to make them fight the very next morning. He had before him Bayalitsch at Lonato, and Liptai at Castiglione, presenting to both of them a front of twenty-five thousand men. He had to attack them before Wurmser should return from Mantua. Sauret had for the second time abandoned Salo; Bonaparte sent Gueux again thither to recover the position, and to keep back Quasdanovich. After these precautions on his left and on his rear, he resolved to march forward to Lonato with Masséna, and to throw Augereau upon the heights of Castiglione, which had been abandoned on the preceding day by general Vallette. He broke that general at the head of his army, in order to make his lieutenants do their duty without flinching. On the following day, the 16th (August 3rd), the whole army was in motion; Gueux re-entered Salo, and this rendered any communication between Quasdanovich and the Austrian army still more impracticable. Bonaparte advanced upon Lonato; but his advanced guard was beaten back, some pieces of cannon were taken, and general Pigeon was made prisoner. Bayalitsch, proud of this success, advanced with confidence, and extended his wings around the French division. He had two objects in performing this manoeuvre; in the first place, to surround Bonaparte, and in the second, to extend himself on his right for the purpose of entering into communication with Quasdanovich, whose cannon he heard at Salo. Bonaparte, not alarming himself about his rear, suffered himself to be surrounded with imperturbable coolness; he placed some sharpshooters on his exposed wings, he next took the 18th and 32nd demi-brigades of infantry, ranged them in close column, gave them a regiment of dragoons to support them, and rushed headlong upon the enemy's centre, which was weakened by its extension. With this brave body of infantry he overthrew all before him, and thus broke the line of the Austrians. The latter, divided into two bodies, immediately lost their courage; one part of the division of Bayalitsch fell back in all haste towards the Mincio; but the other, which had extended itself, in order to communicate with Quasdanovich, was driven towards Salo, where Gueux was at that moment. Bonaparte caused it to be pursued without intermission, that he might place it between two fires. He let loose Junot in pursuit of it, with a regiment of cavalry. Junot dashed off at a gallop, killed six horsemen with his own hand, and fell, having received several sabre wounds. The fugitive division, entrapped between the corps at Salo and that which was pursuing it from Lonato, was broken, routed, and lost at every step thousands of prisoners. During this successful pursuit, Bonaparte proceeded on his right to Castiglione, where Augereau was fighting ever since the morning with admirable bravery. The heights on which Liptai's division had placed itself had now to be carried. After an obstinate combat, several times renewed, he had at length accomplished his object, and Bonaparte on his arrival found the enemy retreating on all sides. Such was the battle called the battle of Lonato, fought on the 16th (August 3rd).

This battle produced considerable results. The French had taken twenty pieces of cannon and three thousand prisoners from the division cut off and driven back upon Salo, and they were still pursuing its scattered remnant in the mountains. They had made a thousand or fifteen hundred prisoners at Castiglione, and killed or wounded three thousand men; they had alarmed Quasdanovich, who finding the French army before him at Salo, and hearing it in the distance at Lonato, thought that it was everywhere. They had thus nearly disorganized the divisions of Bayalitsch and Liptai, which fell back upon Wurmser. That general at this moment came up with fifteen thousand men to rally the two beaten divisions, and began to draw out his lines in the plains of Castiglione. Bonaparte observed him on the morning of the following day, the 17th (August 4th), put himself in line to receive battle. He resolved to attack him again, and to fight one pitched battle with him, which should decide the fate of Italy. But for this purpose it was requisite that he should collect all his disposable troops at Castiglione. He therefore deferred this decisive battle till the 18th (August 5th). He set off at full gallop for Lonato, to personally expedite the movement of his troops. In a few days he had killed five horses with fatigue. He would not intrust any one with the execution of his orders; he would see every thing done himself, personally inquire into every thing, and infuse spirit into every body by his presence. It is thus that a great mind communicates itself to a great mass, and diffuses its own ardour. He arrived about mid-day at Lonato. His orders were already carried out; part of the troops were marching upon Castiglione, the rest were proceeding towards Salo and Gavardo. There remained at most no more than a thousand men at Lonato. Scarcely had Bonaparte entered the place, when an Austrian flag of truce presented itself; and the bearer summoned him to surrender. The general, surprised, could not comprehend at first how it was possible that he should be close to the Austrians. However, the fact soon explained itself. The division, separated on the preceding day in the battle of Lonato, and driven back upon Salo, had been partly taken; but a body of nearly four thousand men had been wandering all night in the mountains; and seeing Lonato almost abandoned, wanted to enter the place, in order to open for itself an outlet upon the Mincio. Bonaparte had but a thousand men to oppose to it, and, besides, he had no time to fight a battle. He immediately made all the officers about him mount their horses. He ordered the bearer of the flag of truce to be brought before him, and his eyes to be uncovered. The latter was astonished at witnessing this numerous staff. "Unhappy man!" said Bonaparte to him, "you know not then that you are in the presence of the commander-in-chief, and that he is here with his whole army. Go, tell those who have sent you, that I give them five minutes to surrender, or I will put them to the sword, to punish the insult which they have dared to offer me." He immediately ordered his artillery to be drawn up, and threatened to fire upon the advancing columns. The messengers went and carried back his answer, and the four thousand men laid down their arms before one thousand*. Bonaparte, saved by his presence of mind on this occasion, gave his orders for the conflict that was about to ensue. He added fresh troops to those which had already been despatched to Salo. The division of Despinois was united with that of Sauret, and both taking advantage of the ascendancy of victory, were to attack Quasdanovich, and throw him back definitively into the mountains. He led all the rest to Castiglione. He got back the same night, and without allowing himself a moment's repose, mounted a fresh horse, and hastened to the field of battle, to make his final arrangements. That day was to decide the fate of Italy.

It was in the plain of Castiglione that this battle was to take place. A series of heights, formed by the last range of the Alps, extends from Chiesa to the Mincio, by Lonato, Castiglione, and Solferino. At the foot of these heights lies the plain that was to serve for the field of battle. The two armies were close in front of each other, vertically from the line of the heights on which both supported one wing; Bonaparte had his left thereon, and Wurmser his right. Bonaparte had at most twenty-two thousand men, Wurmser thirty thousand. The latter had another advantage; his wing, which was in the plain, was protected by a redoubt placed on the elevation of Medolano. Thus it was supported on both sides. To counterbalance these advantages of number and position, Bonaparte relied upon the ascendancy of victory and his manœuvres. Wurmser would naturally strive to extend himself on his right, which supported himself by the line of the heights, in order to open a communication towards Lonato and Salo. This is what Bayalitsch had done two days before, and this was what Wurmser ought to have done, whose sole attention should have been directed to a junction with his great detachment. Bonaparte resolved to favour this movement, from which he hoped to derive important advantage. He had at his disposal Serrurier's division, which, pursued by Wurmser ever since it had left Mantua, had not yet been able to enter into line. It was coming by way of Guidizzolo. Bonaparte ordered it to debouch in the direction of Cauriana, on Wurmser's rear. He waited for his fire to begin the battle.

Ever since daybreak the two armies entered into action. Wurmser, impatient to attack, moved his right along the heights; Bonaparte, to favour this movement, drew back his left, formed by Masséna's division; he kept his centre immovable in the plain. He soon heard Serrurier's fire. Then, while he continued to draw back his left, and Wurmser to draw out his right, he ordered the redoubt of Medolano to be attacked. At first he directed twenty pieces of light artillery upon that redoubt, and after briskly cannonading it, he detached general Verdier, with three battalions, to storm it. That brave general advanced, supported by a regiment of cavalry, and took the redoubt. The left flank of the Austrians was thus exposed at the very moment when Serrurier, arriving at Cauriana, excited alarm upon their rear. Wurmser immediately moved part of his second line upon his right, now deprived of support, and placed it en potence to front the French, who were debouching from Medolano. He took the remainder of his second line to the rear, to protect Cauriana, and thus continued to make head against the enemy. But Bonaparte, seizing the opportunity with his accustomed promptness, immediately ceased to avoid engaging his left and his centre, and gave Masséna and Augereau the signal which they were impatiently awaiting. Masséna with the left, Augereau with the centre, rushed upon the weakened line of the Austrians, and charged it with impetuosity. Attacked so briskly on its entire front, and threatened on its left and its rear, it began to give ground. The ardour of the French increased. Wurmser seeing his army jeopardized then gave the signal for retreat. He was pursued, and some prisoners were taken. To put him completely to the rout, it would have been necessary to have made much more haste, and to push him while in disorder upon the Mincio. But for six days the troops had been constantly marching and fighting; they were unable to advance further, and slept on the field of battle. Wurmser had on that day lost no more than two thousand men, but he had nevertheless lost Italy.

* This fact has been called in question by one historian, M. Botta; but it is confirmed by others, and I have been assured of its authenticity by M. Aubernon, the paymaster-in-chief of the forces in service, who passed the four thousand prisoners before him in review.

On the following day, Augereau proceeded to the bridge of Borghetto, and Masséna before Peschiera. Augereau commenced a cannonade, which was followed by the retreat of the Austrians; and Masséna fought a rear-guard action with the division that had masked Peschiera. The Mincio was abandoned by Wurmser; he again took the road to Rivoli, between the Adige and the lake of Garda, in order to enter the Tyrol. Masséna followed him to Rivoli and to La Corona, and resumed his old position. Augereau appeared before Verona. The Venetian provviditori, in order to give the Austrians time to evacuate the city, and to save their baggage, demanded a ten hours' law before opening the gates; Bonaparte broke them open with cannon-balls. The Veronese, who were devoted to the cause of Austria, and who had loudly manifested their sentiments when the French retreated, dreaded the wrath of the conquerors; but his behaviour towards them was marked with great forbearance.

In the quarter of Salò and La Chiesa, Quasdanovich was effecting a difficult retreat behind the lake of Garda. He halted, and attempted to defend a defile called La Rocca d'Aufo; but he was beaten, and lost twelve hundred men. The French had soon recovered all their old positions.

This campaign had lasted six days; and in that short space of time some thirty thousand men had put sixty thousand hors de combat; Wurmser had lost twenty thousand men,—seven or eight thousand of whom were killed, and twelve or thirteen thousand prisoners. He was driven into the mountains, reduced to a state that rendered it utterly impracticable for him to keep the field. Thus had this formidable expedition vanished before a handful of brave men. These extraordinary results, unexampled in history, were owing to the promptness and vigour of resolution of the young commander. While two formidable armies covered both shores of the lake of Garda, and the courage of all was shaken, he in fact reduced the whole campaign to a single question—the junction of these two armies at the extremity of the lake of Garda. His judgment had guided him in rejecting one of two advantages,—the blockade of Mantua, in order to concentrate his forces at the decisive point; and by alternately inflicting tremendous attacks on each of the enemy's masses at Salò, at Lonato, and at Castiglione, he had successively disorganized them, and driven them back into the mountains from which they had issued.

The Austrians were struck with consternation, the French transported with admiration of their young commander. Their confidence in and devotion to him were at their height. One battalion could put three to flight. The old soldiers, who had made him corporal at Lodi, promoted him to serjeant at Castiglione. In Italy, the greatest sensation had been created. Milan, Bologna, Ferrara, the towns in the duchy of Modena, and all the friends of liberty, were transported with joy. The convents and all the old aristocracies looked very grave. Venice, Rome, and Naples, the governments that had acted so imprudently, were extremely alarmed.

Bonaparte, judging soundly of his position, did not consider the struggle as at an end, though he had deprived Wurmser of twenty thousand men. The old marshal was retiring into the Alps with forty thousand. He was going to refresh, to rally, to recruit them, and it was fairly to be presumed that he would make one more rush upon Italy. Bonaparte had lost a few thousand men, in prisoners, killed, and wounded; he had a great number in the hospitals: he thought it best to continue to temporize, to keep his eyes constantly upon the Tyrol, and his feet upon the Adige, and to content himself with overawing the Italian powers until he should have time to chastise them. He contented himself with apprising the Venetians that he was informed of their armaments, and continued to make them furnish him with supplies at their own cost, still postponing the negotiations for an alliance. He had learned the arrival at Ferrara of a papal legate, who had come to resume possession of the legations. He summoned him to his head-quarters. This legate, who was Cardinal Mattei, fell at his feet, crying, Peccavi. Bonaparte put him under constraint in a seminary. He wrote to M. d'Azara, who was his go-between with the courts of Rome and Naples, complained to him of the imbecility and of the bad faith of the papal government, and informed him of his intention to very shortly fall upon its rear, if it compelled him to do so. With regard to the court of Naples, he assumed the most threatening language. "The English," said he to M. d'Azara, "have persuaded the king of Naples that he was something; I will soon prove to him that he is nothing. If he persists, notwithstanding the terms of the armistice, to put himself in battle-array, I solemnly vow before the face of Europe, to march against his pretended seventy thousand men, with six thousand grenadiers, four thousand horse, and forty pieces of cannon."

He wrote a polite but firm letter to the duke of Tuscany, who had suffered the English to occupy Porto Ferrajo, and told him that France had certainly had it in her power to punish him for this negligence by occupying his dominions, but that she forbore to do so for old friendship's sake. He changed the garrison of Leghorn, in order to awe Tuscany by a movement of troops. To Genoa he was silent. He wrote a strong letter to the king of Sardinia, who tolerated the Barbets in his territories, and despatched a column of twelve hundred men, with a roving military commission to seize and shoot all Barbets found on the roads. The people of Milan had shown the most friendly inclinations towards the French. He addressed to them a delicate and noble letter, in order to thank them. His recent victories affording him well-grounded hopes of retaining Italy, he thought that he might favour the Lombards a little more; he granted them arms, and permitted them to raise a legion in their own pay, in which a great number of Italians, and the Poles dispersed over Europe since the last partition, enrolled themselves. Bonaparte testified his satisfaction to the people of Bologna and Ferrara. Those of Modena desired to be liberated from the regency established by their duke; Bonaparte had already some motives for breaking the armistice, for the regency had permitted the transit of supplies to the garrison of Mantua. He resolved, however, to wait a while. He solicited assistance from the directory to repair his losses, and remained at the entrance of the narrow passes of the Tyrol, ready to rush upon Wurmser, and to destroy the remains of his army the moment he should have learned that Moreau had crossed the Danube.

While these great events were taking place in Italy, others were about to take place on the Danube. Moreau had pushed the archduke foot by foot, and had arrived in the middle of Thermidor (the first day of August) on the Danube. Jourdan was on the Naab, which falls into that river. The chain of the Alb, which separates the Neckar from the Danube, is composed of mountains of middling height, terminating in an elevated plain crossed by defiles, quite as narrow as the fissures in rocks. It was by these defiles that Moreau had debouched upon the Danube, in an unequal country, intersected by ravines, and covered with wood.

The archduke, who entertained the design of collecting all his forces at one point on the Danube, and recovering strength on that powerful line, suddenly formed a resolution which had nearly marred his judicious plans. He received intelligence that Wartensleben, instead of falling back upon him as near as possible to Donaewerth, was falling back towards Bohemia, under the foolish idea of giving it some protection. He was apprehensive lest, profiting by this false movement, which left the Danube exposed, the army of the Sambre and Meuse should attempt to cross it. He resolved, therefore, to cross it himself, in order to file rapidly along the other shore, and to go and make head against Jourdan. But the river was obstructed by his stores and ammunition, and it would take him some time to clear them out; besides this, he did not wish to effect the passage under the eyes of Moreau and too much within reach of his attacks, and he conceived the idea of removing him by giving him battle with the Danube at his back,—a faulty conception, for which he has since severely censured himself, for it rendered him liable to be thrown into the river, or at least not to get thither without loss, things that were indispensable to insure the success of his ulterior designs.

On the 24th Thermidor (August 11th), he halted before Moreau's positions, to make a general attack upon him. Moreau was at Neresheim, occupying the positions of Dunstelkingen and Dischingen by his right and his centre, and the position of Nordlingen by his left. The archduke, wishing in the first place to throw him off from the Danube, in the next place to cut him off, if possible, from the mountains by which he had debouched, and lastly, to prevent him from communicating with Jourdan, attacked him, in order to attain all his objects on all these points at once. He succeeded in getting at the rear of Moreau's right, and in dispersing all his flankers; he advanced to Heidenheim, almost close to his rear, and excited such alarm, that all his artillery fell back. At the centre he attempted a vigorous attack, but it was not sufficiently decisive. On the left, towards Nordlingen, he made threatening demonstrations. Moreau was not intimidated either by the demonstrations made upon his left, or by the excursion behind his right; and judging very correctly that the essential point was at the centre, did the reverse of what is done by generals of ordinary capacity, who are always alarmed when the enemy's line threatens to extend beyond their own, he weakened his wings to strengthen his centre. This precaution was judicious, for the archduke increasing his efforts at the centre towards Dunstelkingen was repulsed with loss. Both armies passed the night on the field of battle.

Next day Moreau found himself greatly embarrassed by the retrograde movement of his artillery, which left him without ammunition. He nevertheless conceived that he ought to make amends by daring, and make show of an intended attack. But the archduke, in a hurry to recross the Danube, had no inclination to renew the combat; he effected his retreat with great firmness to the Danube, re-passed it unmolested by Moreau, and broke down the bridges as far as Donaewerth. There he learned what had passed between the two armies on the Maine. Wartensleben had not thrown himself into Bohemia, as he feared, but had remained on the Naab in front of Jourdan. The young Austrian prince then formed an admirable resolution, as being the consequence of his protracted retreat, and which was calculated to decide the campaign. His aim in falling back upon the Danube had been to bring all his forces to one point there, that he might have it in his power to act upon one or other of the two French armies with a superior mass of forces. The battle of Neresheim might have thwarted this plan, if, instead of being uncertain, it had been positively disastrous. But having retreated without loss to the Danube, he could now take advantage of the separation of the French armies, and fall upon one of the two. He consequently resolved to leave general Latour, with thirty-six thousand men, to keep Moreau in play, and to proceed in his own person with twenty-five thousand towards Wartensleben, in order to overwhelm Jourdan by this juncture of forces. Jourdan's army was the weaker of the two. At so great a distance from his supporting point it did not amount to much more than forty-five thousand men. It was evident that he could make no defence, and that he was even likely to be exposed to great disasters. Jourdan being beaten and driven back to the Rhine, Moreau, on his part, could not remain in Bavaria, and the archduke might even proceed to the Neckar, and anticipate him on his line of retreat. This very correct suggestion has been considered the most judicious of any that can reflect credit upon the Austrian generals during these long wars; like those which at the same moment distinguished the genius of Bonaparte in Italy, it emanated from a young man.

The archduke set out from Ingoldstadt on the 29th Thermidor (August 16), five days after the battle of Neresheim. Jourdan, placed on the Naab, between Naabburg and Schwandorf, was not aware of the storm that was brewing over his head. He had detached general Bernadotte to Neumark, on his right, with a view to put himself in communication with Moreau,—an object that it was impossible to effect, and for which a detached corps was uselessly endangered. It was this detachment that the archduke, on his way from the Danube, must necessarily attack. General Bernadotte, attacked by superior forces, made an honourable resistance, but was obliged rapidly to recross the mountains by which the army had debouched from the valley of the Maine into the valley of the Danube. He retired to Nuremberg. The archduke, having despatched a corps in pursuit of him, proceeded with the rest of his forces against Jourdan. The latter having received intelligence that a reinforcement was coming, and being apprised of the danger which Bernadotte had incurred, and of the retreat which he was obliged to make upon Nuremberg, resolved to recross the mountains himself. At the moment when he was commencing his march, he was attacked at once by the archduke at Wartensleben; he had a hazardous conflict to sustain at Amberg, and lost his direct route to Nuremberg. Thrown with his artillery, his infantry, and his cavalry into cross-roads, he incurred the greatest dangers, and was eight days in making a most difficult but a most creditable retreat both for the troops and for himself. He found himself once more on the Maine, at Schweinfurt, on the 12th Fructidor (August 29), purposing to proceed to Wurtzburg, to halt there, to rally his corps, and to once more try the fortune of war.

While the archduke was executing this admirable movement upon the army of the Sambre and Meuse, he afforded Moreau occasion to execute a similar one, equally masterly and equally decisive. An enemy never attempts a bold stroke without exposing himself, and without affording favourable chances to his adversary. Moreau having no more than thirty-eight thousand men opposed to him, might easily have overwhelmed them by acting with a little vigour. He could have done more (in the opinion of Napoleon and the archduke Charles), he might have attempted a movement which would have been attended with prodigious results. He should himself have followed the march of the enemy, have fallen upon the archduke, as that prince was himself falling upon Jourdan, and have got unawares upon his rear. The archduke, caught between Jourdan and Moreau, would have incurred incalculable risks. But for this purpose he must have executed a very extensive movement, suddenly changed his line of operation, and thrown himself from the Neckar upon the Maine; he must moreover have disobeyed the instructions of the directory, which ordered him to support himself upon the Tyrol, with a view to turn the enemy's flanks, and to communicate with the army of Italy. The young conqueror of Castiglione would not have hesitated to take this bold step, and to have committed such an act of disobedience, which would have decided the campaign in a victorious manner; but Moreau was incapable of such a determination. He remained several days on the banks of the Danube, ignorant of the departure of the archduke, and leisurely exploring a position that was then but little known. Being at length apprised of the movement which had taken place, he was alarmed for Jourdan; but not daring to take any vigorous determination, he resolved to cross the Danube and to advance into Bavaria, to try to draw the archduke back upon him, while adhering to the plan prescribed by the directory. It was however easy to judge that the archduke would not quit Jourdan till he had put him hors de combat, and that he would not suffer himself to be diverted from the execution of a vast plan by an incursion into Bavaria. Moreau nevertheless crossed the Danube after Latour, and approached the Lech. Latour showed an intention to dispute the passage of the Lech; but too much extended to support himself there, he was obliged to abandon it, after being worsted in an action at Friedberg. Moreau then approached Munich; on the 15th Fructidor (September 1) he was at Dachau, Pfaffenhofen, and Geisenfeld.

Thus fortune began to be less favourable to us in Germany, as the consequence of an ill-constructed design, which, separating our armies, rendered them liable to be beaten singly. Other results were about to take place in Italy also. We have seen that Bonaparte, after he had driven back the Austrians into the Tyrol, and resumed his old positions on the Adige, meditated fresh designs against Wurmser. Not content with having destroyed twenty thousand of his men, he wished to utterly ruin his army. This operation was indispensable for the execution of all his plans in Italy. Wurmser destroyed, he could make a push as far as Trieste, ruin that port, so important for Austria, then return to the Adige, give law to Venice, Rome, and Naples, whose ill-will was still as manifest as ever, and at length throw out the signal of liberty in Italy, by constituting Lombardy, the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, and perhaps even the duchy of Modena, an independent republic. He resolved then, in order to accomplish these plans, to ascend into the Tyrol, certain of being now supported by the presence of Moreau on the other slope of the Alps.

While the French troops were taking about a score days' rest, Wurmser had reorganized and reinforced his. New detachments from Austria and the Tyrolese militia enabled him to increase his army to nearly fifty thousand men. The autie council sent him a new head of the staff, general Latour, of the engineers, with fresh instructions respecting the plan to be pursued for taking the line of the Adige. Wurmser was to leave eighteen or twenty thousand men under Davidovich, to guard the Tyrol, and to descend with the rest by the valley of the Brenta, into the plains of the Vincentine and the Paduan. The Brenta rises not far from Trent, recedes from the Adige in the form of an arch, again becomes parallel to that river in the plain, and discharges itself into the Adriatic. A causeway, commencing at Trent, leads into the valley of the Brenta, and running through Bassano, terminates in the plains of the Vincentine and the Paduan. Wurmser would have to pass through this valley, in order to debouch in the plain and to attempt the passage of the Adige between Verona and Legnago. This plan was not better conceived than the preceding; for it was still attended with the inconvenience of dividing him into two bodies, and placing Bonaparte between them.

Wurmser entered into action at the same moment as Bonaparte. The latter, ignorant of Wurmser's designs, but foreseeing with rare sagacity that during his excursion to the extremity of the Tyrol the enemy might possibly be examining the line of the Adige from Verona to Legnago, left general Kilmaine at Verona, with a reserve of nearly three thousand men, and with all the means of resisting for two days at least. General Sahuguet remained, with a division of eight thousand men, before Mantua. Bonaparte set out with twenty-eight thousand, and ascended by all the three roads of the Tyrol,—that which runs behind the lake of Garda, and the two which border the Adige. On the 17th Fructidor (September 3), Sauret's division, now before Vaubois, after passing behind the lake of Garda, and fighting several actions, arrived at Torbole, near the upper extremity of the lake. On the same day, Masséna's and Angereau's divisions, which at first proceeded along both banks of the Adige, and afterwards formed a junction on one bank by means of the bridge of Golo, arrived before Scravalle. They fought an advanced-guard action, and took some prisoners from the enemy.

The French had now to make their way up a narrow and deep valley. On their left they had the Adige, on their right lofty mountains. In many places the river, running close to the foot of the mountains, left only the breadth of the causeway, and thus formed frightful defiles to pass. In penetrating into the Tyrol, there was more than one of this kind to encounter. But the French, daring and active, were as fit for this kind of warfare as for that which they had just been carrying on in the extensive plains of the Mantuan.

Davidovich had placed two divisions, one in the camp of Mori, on the right bank of the Adige, to make head against Vaubois' division, which was advancing along the causeway from Sano to Roveredo, behind the lake of Garda; the other at San Marco, on the left bank, to guard the defile against Masséna and Angereau. On the 18th Fructidor (September 4) the French and Austrians found themselves in presence of each other. It was Wukassowich's division that defended the defile of San Marco. Bonaparte's mind instantly grasping the nature of the tactics accordant with the locality, formed two corps of light infantry, and distributed them on the right and left on the surrounding heights. Then, after he had harnessed the Austrians for some time, he formed the 18th demi-brigade into close column by battalions, and ordered general Victor to force his way with them through the defile. A fierce conflict ensued; the Austrians at first made a stand, but Bonaparte decided the action by directing general Dubois to charge at the head of the hussars. That brave general rushed upon the Austrian infantry, broke it, and fell pierced with three balls. He was borne away, exclaiming, "Before I die," said he to Bonaparte, "let me know if we are conquerors." The Austrians fled on all sides, and retired to Roveredo, a league distant from Marco. They were pursued at a running pace. Roveredo is situated at some distance from the Adige; Bonaparte despatched Rampon, with the 32nd, towards the space between the river and the town; and Victor, with the 18th, upon the town itself. The latter entered the high street of Roveredo at the charge step, swept the Austrians before him, and reached the other extremity of the town at the very moment Rampon was finishing his external circuit of the town. While the principal army was thus carrying San Marco and Roveredo, Vaubois' division came up along the other bank of the Adige. The Austrian division of Reuss had disputed with it the camp of Mori, but Vaubois had just carried it, and all the divisions were now united about noon on both banks of the river, near Roveredo. But the most difficult task was yet to be performed.

Davidovich had rallied his two divisions upon his reserve, in the defile of Calliano, a perilous defile, and quite as dangerous as that of Marco. At this point the Adige, running close to the mountains, left but the width of the causeway between its bed and their foot. The entrance of the defile was closed by the castle of La Pietra, which connected the mountain with the river, and was surmounted with artillery.

Bonaparte, persisting in his tactics, distributed his light infantry on the right upon the declivities of the mountain; and on the left, upon the banks of the river. His soldiers, born on the banks of the Rhone, the Seine, or the Loire, equalled the hunters of the Alps in boldness and agility. Some, climbing from rock to rock, attained the summit of the mountain, and poured down a vertical fire upon the enemy; others, not less intrepid, glided along the river, venturing wherever they could find a footing, and turned the castle of La Pietra. General Domumartin placed a battery of light artillery in a situation where it produced the best effect: the castle was taken. The army then passed through it, and advanced in close column upon the Austrian army, crowded together in the defile. Artillery, cavalry, and infantry, were intermingled, and fled in frightful disorder. Young Lemarois, aid-de-camp of the general-in-chief, with a view to prevent the flight of the Austrians, dashed away in full gallop at the head of fifty huzzars, passed through the whole length of the Austrian mass, then, suddenly facing about, attempted to stop the van. He was struck from his horse, but he spread terror in the Austrian ranks, and gave the cavalry, which hastened after him, time to pick up several thousand prisoners. Thus ended that series of actions which made the French army masters of the defiles of the Tyrol, the town of Roveredo, the whole of the Austrian artillery, and four thousand prisoners, exclusively of killed and wounded. Bonaparte called this affair the battle of Roveredo.

On the following day, the 16th Fructidor (September 5th), the French entered Trent, the capital of the Italian Tyrol. The bishop had fled. Bonaparte, in order to appease the Tyrolese, who were strongly attached to the house of Austria, addressed to them a proclamation, in which he exhorted them to lay down their arms, and not to commit hostilities against his army; promising that on this condition their property and public establishments should be respected. Wurmser was no longer at Trent. Bonaparte had surprised him at the moment when he was marching to execute his plan. On seeing the French enter the Tyrol for the purpose of communicating perhaps with Germany, Wurmser was only the more disposed to descend by the Brenta, in order to possess himself of the Adige during their absence. He even hoped, by means of this rapid circuit, which would bring him to Verona, to inclose the French in the upper valley of the Adige, and at once to envelope them and to cut them off from Mantua. He had set out two days before, and must already have reached Bassano. Bonaparte immediately formed one of the boldest of resolutions. He determined to leave Vaubois to guard the Tyrol, and to hasten himself, through the narrow passes of the Brenta, after Wurmser. He could not take with him more than twenty thousand men, and Wurmser had thirty; he might be cooped up in those frightful gorges, if Wurmser should make head against him; he might also come too late to fall upon the rear of Wurmser, and the latter might have time to force the Adige. All this was possible, but his twenty thousand men were as good as thirty; if Wurmser attempted to oppose him and to shut him up in the gorges, he would cut his way through his army; if he had twenty leagues to go, he would perform that distance in two days, and reach the plain as soon as Wurmser. He would then drive him back, either upon Trieste, or upon the Adige. If he drove him upon Trieste, he would pursue him, and burn that port before his face; if he drove him upon the Adige, he would hem him in between his army and the river, and thus envelope the enemy, who thought to catch him in the narrow passes of the Tyrol.

This young man, whose conceptions and resolutions were quick as lightning itself, ordered Vau-bois, on the very day of his arrival at Trent, to proceed to the Lavis, and to take that position from the rear-guard of Davidovich. He made Vau-bois execute this order before his face, pointed out to him the position which he was to occupy with his ten thousand men, and then set out with twenty thousand to dash through the gorges of the Brenta.

He set out on the morning of the 20th (September 6th), and lay that night at Levico. Next morning, the 21st (September 7th), he resumed his march, and arrived before another defile, called the defile of Primolano, where Wurmser had placed a division. Bonaparte employed the same manœuvres as before, stationed riflemen upon the heights and upon the bank of the Brenta, and then ordered a column to charge upon the road. The defile was taken. There was a small fort beyond it; this was surrounded and carried. A few intrepid soldiers, running forward along the road, outstripped the fugitives, stopped them, and gave the army time to come up and secure them. Three thousand prisoners were taken. Bonaparte arrived in the evening at Cisona, after marching twenty leagues in two days. He would have advanced further, but the soldiers were unable to proceed; he was himself exhausted with fatigue. He had distanced his head-quarters, and had neither attendants or victuals. He partook of the ammunition-bread of one of the soldiers, and lay down to wait with impatience for the morrow.

This astounding and unexpected march greatly astonished Wurmser. He never imagined how his army could have got into those narrow passes, at the risk of being shut up there; he resolved to avail himself of the position of Bassano which shut them in, and to stop the passage with his entire army. Should he succeed in the attempt, Bonaparte would be taken in the bend of the Brenta. He had already sent the division of Mezaros to survey Verona; but he recalled it, that he might engage here with all his forces; however, it was not likely that the order would arrive in time. The town of Bassano is seated on the left bank of the Brenta. It communicates with the right by a bridge. Wurmser placed the two divisions of Seboltendorff and Quasdanovich on the two banks of the Brenta, in advance of the town. He posted six battalions as an advanced guard in the defiles which precede Bassano and close the valley.

On the morning of the 22nd (September 8th), Bonaparte left Cisona and advanced towards

Bassano. Masséna marched on the right bank, Augereau on the left. The defiles were carried, and the French debouched close in front of the enemy's army, drawn up on both banks of the Brenta. Wurmser's soldiers, disconcerted by the extreme boldness of the French, did not defend themselves with the courage which they had shown on so many other occasions; they gave way, were broken, and entered Bassano. Augereau presented himself at the entrance of the town. Masséna, who was on the opposite bank, wanted to force his way by the bridge; he carried it in close column, as he did the bridge of Lodi, and made his entry at the same time with Augereau. Wurmser, whose head-quarters were still there, had scarcely time to save himself, leaving us four thousand prisoners and an immense ordnance. Bonaparte's plan was thus carried into effect; he had debouched into the plain quite as soon as Wurmser, and it was now his business to surround him by driving him back upon the Adige.

Wurmser, in the disorder of so hurried an action, found himself cut off from the remains of Quasdanovich's division. This division had retreated towards the Friule, and he, seeing himself pressed by Masséna's and Augereau's divisions, which closed the road to the Friule against him, and drove him towards the Adige, formed the resolution of forcing a passage across that river and then throwing himself into Mantua. He had been rejoined by the division of Mezaros, which had been making vain efforts to take Verona. He now numbered no more than fourteen thousand men, eight of whom were infantry, and six excellent cavalry. He proceeded along the Adige, seeking a passage every where. Luckily for him, the post which guarded Legnago had been removed to Verona, and a detachment which ought to have come and kept the place had not yet come up. Wurmser, taking advantage of this accident, took possession of Legnago. Certain of being now able to regain Mantua, he gave some rest to his troops, who were spent with fatigue.

Bonaparte followed him closely: he was deeply mortified on learning the negligence that had saved Wurmser; however, he did not despair of still preventing him from reaching Mantua. He transferred Masséna's division to the other bank of the Adige by means of the ferry of Ronco, and despatched it to Sanguinetto, to stop the road to Mantua. He ordered Augereau towards Legnago itself. Masséna's advanced guard outstripping his division, entered Cérca on the 25th (September 11), at the moment when Wurmser was arriving there from Legnago with his entire army. This advanced guard of cavalry and light infantry, commanded by generals Murat and Pigeon, made the most heroic defence, but was completely overthrown: Wurmser forced his way through it, and continued his march. Bonaparte arrived alone at a gallop, at the moment of this action: he narrowly escaped being taken, and rode off in the utmost haste.

Wurmser passed through Sanguinetto; then learning that all the bridges over the Molinella were broken down excepting that of Villimpenta, he proceeded downwards to that bridge, crossed the Molinella, and marched to Mantua. General Charton attempting to oppose him with three hundred men formed in a square, those brave fellows were all either sabred or taken. Thus Wurmser arrived at Mantua on the 27th (September 13). These slight advantages afforded some alleviation to the disasters of the old and brave marshal. He distributed his army over the environs of Mantua, and for a moment kept the field, owing to his numerous and excellent cavalry.

Bonaparte came up out of breath, and enraged against the negligent officers who had caused him to lose so glorious a prey. Augereau had again got into Legnago, and had made the Austrian garrison, sixteen hundred strong, prisoners. Bonaparte ordered Augereau to proceed to Governolo on the Lower Mincio. He then fought some minor engagements with Wurmser, to draw him out of the place, and in the night between the 28th and 29th (September 14 and 15) he took up a position in the rear, in order to induce Wurmser to show himself in the plain. The old general, allured by his slight successes, actually deployed outside Mantua, between the citadel and the suburb of Saint-George. Bonaparte attacked him on the third complementary day, year iv. (September 19, 1796.) Augereau, coming from Governolo, formed the left; Masséna, starting from Due-Castelli, formed the centre; and Sahuguet, with the blockading corps, formed the right. Wurmser still had twenty-one thousand men in line. He was forced back every where, and driven into the fortifications with the loss of two thousand men. Some days afterwards he was completely enclosed in Mantua. The numerous cavalry which he had brought back were of no service to him whatever, and only increased the number of unprofitable mouths; he therefore ordered the horses to be killed and salted. He had twenty odd thousand men in garrison, several thousand of whom were in the hospitals.

Thus, although Bonaparte had partly lost the fruit of his daring march to the Brenta, and had not made the marshal lay down his arms, he had entirely ruined and dispersed his army. Some thousand men were driven back into the Tyrol under Davidovich; and some thousand were fleeing into the Friule under Quasdanovich. Wurmser, with twelve or fourteen thousand, had confined himself in Mantua. Thirteen or fourteen thousand were prisoners, six or seven thousand killed or wounded. Thus this army had been losing about twenty thousand men, besides ordnance stores to a large amount, in ten days. Bonaparte had lost seven or eight thousand, fifteen hundred of whom were prisoners, and the rest killed, wounded, or sick. Thus to the armies of Colli and Beaulieu, destroyed on entering Italy, was to be added that of Wurmser, destroyed on two occasions, first in the plains of Castiglione, and next on the banks of the Brenta. To the trophies of Montenotte, Lodi, Borghetto, Lonato, and Castiglione, were to be added those of Roveredo, Bassano, and Saint-George. At what period of history had ever such great results been seen, so many enemies slain, so many prisoners, colours, and cannon taken! The intelligence of these victories caused fresh rejoicings in Lombardy, and terror in the more remote parts of the peninsula. France was lost in admiration of the commander of the army of Italy.

Our arms were not so prosperous upon the other theatres of war. Moreau had advanced upon the Lech, as we have seen, in the hope that his progress in Bavaria would bring back the archduke and extricate Jourdan. This expectation was not well founded; for the archduke would have formed but a poor opinion of the importance of his movement, had he been diverted from its execution merely to return to Moreau. The whole campaign depended on what was about to take place on the Maine. Assuming that Jourdan were beaten and driven back upon the Rhine, the progress of Moreau would only involve him still further, and expose him to the risk of losing his line of retreat. The archduke therefore contented himself with despatching general Nauendorf, with ten regiments of cavalry and some battalions, to reinforce Latour, and continued his pursuit of the army of the Sambre and Meuse.

That brave army retired with the deepest regret, and without any abatement of its self-respect. It was this army that had performed the greatest and the most splendid exploits during the first years of the revolution; this was the army that had conquered at Watignies, at Fleurus, and on the banks of the Ourthe and the Roer. It had a warm esteem for its general, and a strong confidence in itself. This retreat had not discouraged it, and it was persuaded that it yielded solely to superior combinations and to the mass of the hostile forces. It desired and looked for an occasion for measuring its strength with the Austrians, and re-establishing the honour of its flag. Jourdan desired it also. The directory wrote to him that he must at any rate maintain his ground in Franconia on the Upper Maine, in order to take up his winter-quarters in Germany, and more particularly not to expose Moreau, who had advanced to the very gates of Munich. Moreau, on his part, had just then informed Jourdan, by a despatch dated the 8th Fructidor (August 25), of his march beyond the Lech, the advantages he had gained there, and the plan he designed of advancing still further, with a view to bring back the archduke. All these reasons induced Jourdan to try the fortune of arms, though he had before him a very superior force. He would have considered it dishonourable to himself had he quitted Franconia without fighting, and deserted his colleague in Bavaria. Besides, being misled by the movement of general Nauendorf, Jourdan imagined that the archduke had recently set out to regain the banks of the Danube. He halted, therefore, at Wurtzburg, a place he deemed it important to preserve, but of which the French had retained no more than the citadel. He there gave some rest to his troops, made some alterations in the arrangement and command of his divisions, and declared his intention to fight. The army displayed the greatest ardour in carrying all the positions that Jourdan deemed it necessary to occupy before he gave battle. He had his right supported by Wurtzburg, and the rest of his line by a series of positions extending along the Maine to Schweinfurth. The Maine separated him from the enemy. No more than one part of the Austrian army had crossed that river, and it was this that confirmed him in the idea that the archduke had gone back to the Danube. He left at the extremity of his line Lefebvre's division at Schweinfurth, to secure his retreat upon the Saale and the Fulda, in case the result of the battle should deprive him of the road to Frankfort. He thus denied himself the advantage of a second line, and of a corps de réserve; but he conceived that he ought to submit to this privation as a means of securing his retreat. He settled upon making the attack on the morning of the 17th Fructidor (September 3rd).

In the night between the 16th and 17th, the archduke, apprised of the plan of his adversary, rapidly conveyed the remainder of his army across the Main, and displayed before Jourdan's eyes a very superior force. The battle commenced at first very favourably on our side; but our cavalry being fiercely attacked in the plains extending along the Main by the powerful cavalry of the Austrians, was broken, rallied, was again broken, and were sheltered behind the lines and the steady fire of our infantry. Jourdan, if his reserve had not been at too great a distance from him, might have won the victory; he despatched to Lefebvre officers who could not make their way through the numerous squadrons of the enemy. He hoped, nevertheless, that Lefebvre, seeing that Schweinfurth was not exposed, would march to the place of danger; but he waited in vain, and made his army fall back, in order to withdraw it from the formidable cavalry of the enemy. The retreat was made in good order to Armstein. Jourdan, the victim of the faulty plan of the directory and of his attachment to his colleague, had now to retreat to the Lahn. He continued his march without intermission, ordered Moreau to retire from before Mentz, and arrived behind the Lahn on the 24th Fructidor (September 10th). His army in this arduous march to the very frontiers of Bohemia, had not lost more than five or six thousand men. It sustained a sensible loss in the death of young Moreau, who received a musket-shot from a Tyrolese rifleman, and who could not be carried off from the field of battle. The archduke Charles caused every attention to be paid to him, but he soon expired. The young hero, regretted by the two armies, was buried under a discharge of the artillery of both armies.

During these occurrences on the Main, Moreau, still beyond the Danube and the Lech, was waiting with impatience for news from Jourdan. None of the officers sent to bring him intelligence had arrived. He proceeded in great uncertainty without venturing to take any decisive step. In the interval his left, under the command of Desaix, had to sustain a most violent attack from the cavalry of Latour, which, united with Nauendorf's, debouched unawares by Langenbruck. Desaix made such judicious and such prompt arrangements, that he repulsed the numerous squadrons of the enemy, and dispersed them in the plains, after inflicting upon them a considerable loss. Moreau, still left in uncertainty, at length decided, after a delay of about three weeks, to attempt a movement in order to discover where the enemy lay. He resolved to approach the Danube, in order to extend his left wing to Nuremberg, and get some intelligence of Jourdan, or else to relieve him. On the 24th Fructidor, he directed his left and his centre to recross the Danube, and left his right by itself on the other side of the river near Zell. The left, under Desaix, advanced as far as Aichstett. In this singular situation, he extended his left towards Jourdan, who at the moment was sixty leagues distant from him; he had his centre on the Danube, and his right beyond that, exposing one of those three divisions to the risk of being destroyed, assuming that Latour had known how to take advantage of their separation. All military men have censured Moreau for this movement, as one of those half measures which have all the danger of great measures, without compensating by their advantages. Moreau, having in fact missed the opportunity of turning short round upon the archduke at the time the latter was turning round upon Jourdan, could not but jeopardize himself by thus placing himself à cheval upon the Danube.

At length, after four days' suspense in this singular situation, he became aware of the danger, moved back beyond the Danube, and thought of ascending its course in order to bring himself nearer to the point on which his operation was to be supported. He then received intelligence of the forced retreat of Jourdan on the Lahn; and he had no doubt that the archduke, after forcing back the army of the Sambre and Meuse, would fly to the Neckar, to cut off the retreat of the army of the Rhine. He was likewise informed of an attempt made by the garrison of Mannheim upon Kehl, with a view to destroy the bridge by which the French army had debouched into Germany. In this state of things, he no longer hesitated to put himself in marching order for the purpose of regaining France. His position was perilous. Engaged in the heart of Bavaria, having to cross the Black Mountains in his return to the Rhine, having in front Latour with forty thousand men, and exposed to falling in with the archduke Charles with thirty thousand on his rear, he could not help foreseeing inevitable dangers. But if he was deficient in that comprehensive and ardent genius which his rival displayed in Italy, his was a well-regulated mind, and not open to that confusion of ideas with which more animated dispositions are sometimes seized. He had the command of a superb army sixty old thousand strong, whose self-esteem had not been shaken by any defeat, and which placed extreme confidence in its leader. Appreciating such a resource, he did not alarm himself on account of his position, and resolved quietly to regain his route. Thinking that the archduke, after forcing Jourdan to fall back, would probably return to the Neckar, he was apprehensive lest he should find that river already occupied; he therefore went up along the valley of the Danube, to proceed direct to that of the Rhine by way of the forest towns. Those passes being the most remote from the point where the archduke then was, appeared to him to be the safest.

He remained therefore beyond the Danube, and ascended it quietly, supporting one of his wings upon the river. His artillery and his baggage marched before him without confusion; and every day his rear-guard bravely repulsed the enemy's advanced guards. Latour, instead of crossing the Danube, and striving to prevent Moreau from entering the defiles, was content to follow him step by step, but did not venture to make any attempt on his army. On reaching the lake of Fédersée, Moreau thought fit to halt. Latour had divided his forces into three divisions; he had given one to Nauendorf, and sent him to Tübingen on the Upper

Neckar, through which Moreau did not want to pass; he was himself with the second at Biberach; and the third was a long way off at Schusslenried. Moreau, who was approaching the Hollenthal (Val-d'Enfer), by which he intended to retreat, and who had no desire to be too closely pressed in passing through that defile, who saw Latour before him separated, and who was aware that a victory would certainly impart confidence to his troops during the rest of the retreat, halted on the 11th Vendémiaire, year V (October 2, 1796), in the environs of the lake of Fédersée, not far from Biberach. The country was mountainous, wooded, and intersected by valleys. Latour had drawn his troops on several heights, which could be detached and got by their rear; and had, moreover, a deep river behind their back, namely, the Riss. Moreau attacked him at all points, and, cleverly contriving to penetrate through his positions, attacked some in front, and, getting at the rear of others, drove him back to the Riss, threw him into it, and took from him four thousand prisoners. This important victory, taking its name from the town of Biberach, drove back Latour to a great distance, and remarkably increased the confidence of the French army. Moreau resumed his march and approached the defiles. He had already got beyond the roads which run through the valley of the Neckar and lead into the valley of the Rhine. There yet was left for him that road which, passing through Tuttingen and Rothweil towards the very sources of the Neckar, follows the valley of the Kintzig, and terminates at Kehl; but this Nauendorf had already occupied. The detachments which had come from Mannheim had already joined the latter, and the archduke was approaching him. Moreau preferred to ascend a little higher, and to pass through the Hollenthal, which, running through the Black Forest, formed a longer elbow, but led to Breisach, a still greater distance from the archduke. Accordingly, he placed Desaix and Ferino, with the left and the right, towards Tuttingen and Rothweil, to cover himself on the side next to the outlets where the principal Austrian forces were; and he despatched the centre, under Saint-Cyr, to force the Hollenthal. At the same time, he made his heavy artillery file off for Huningen by way of the forest towns. The Austrians had surrounded him with a multitude of petty divisions, as if they had hoped to surround him, and were not in any one place in a condition to make way against him. Saint-Cyr found scarcely a detachment in the Hollenthal, proceeded without difficulty to Neustadt, and arrived at Freiburg. The two wings immediately followed, and debouched through that frightful defile into the valley of the Rhine, rather exhibiting the appearance of a victorious army than a retreat. Moreau reached the valley of the Rhine on the 21st Vendémiaire (October 12). Instead of recrossing the Rhine at the bridge of Breisach, and ascending along the French bank to Strasburg, he resolved to ascend the right bank to Kehl in the face of the whole hostile army. Whether he was desirous of making a better appearance on his return, or whether it were that he hoped to maintain himself on the right bank, and to cover Kehl by proceeding directly thither, these reasons have been deemed insufficient for risking a battle. By crossing the Rhine at Breisach, on his return he could have gone up without opposition to Strasburg, and then debouched again by Kehl. That tête de pont could hold out long enough to give him time to come up. To determine, on the contrary, to march in face of the hostile army, the whole of which was again collected together under the archduke, and thus to expose himself to a general battle, with the Rhine at his back, was an inexcusable oversight, now that he had no longer a motive for either taking the offensive or of covering a retreat. On the 28th Vendémiaire (October 19), both armies were close in front of each other on the banks of the Elz, from Waldkirch to Emmendingen. After a sanguinary and variable conflict, Moreau perceived the impossibility of proceeding to Kehl along the right bank, and resolved to cross over the bridge of Breisach. Nevertheless, considering that he could not pass his whole army over the bridge without the risk of obstruction, and being anxious to send some forces as speedily as possible to Kehl, he ordered Desaix with the left wing to cross again at Breisach, and returned towards Huningen with the centre and the right. This determination has been deemed not less misadvised than that of fighting at Emmendingen; for Moreau, weakened by the separation of one-third of his army, was liable to be endangered. He reckoned, it is true, upon a capital position, that of Schlengen, which covers the debouch of Huningen, and upon which he could halt and fight, in order to render his passage more quiet and safe. Accordingly, he fell back thither, and halted there on the 3rd Brumaire (October 24), and fought an obstinate and drawn battle. Having by this day's fighting afforded time for his baggage to cross, he evacuated the position during the night, passed over to the left bank, and proceeded on his way towards Strasburg.

Thus ended that celebrated campaign, and that still more celebrated retreat. The result sufficiently indicates the imperfection of the plan. If, as Napoleon, the archduke Charles, and general Jomini have demonstrated, the directory, instead of forming two armies, advancing in detached columns, under different generals, with the paltry intention of attacking the enemy's flanks, had formed a single army of one hundred and sixty thousand men,—whereof a detachment fifty thousand strong was to have besieged Mentz, while the other one hundred and ten thousand, consolidated into a single division, should have invaded Germany by the valley of the Rhine, the Hollenthal, and Upper Bavaria,—the imperial armies would have been forced to keep retiring, without being able to bring their collected forces to bear advantageously against a too superior mass. The admirable plan of the young archduke would have been rendered impracticable, and the republican flag would have been carried to Vienna itself. With such a plan as this to go by, Jourdan was a compulsory victim. Thus his campaign, constantly unfortunate, became a matter of self-devotion, quite as much when he first crossed the Rhine to draw the forces of the archduke upon him, as when he advanced into Bohemia and fought at Wurtzburg. Moreau alone, with his fine army, was able to partially repair the imperfection of the plan, either by hastening to crush all that was before him at the moment when he debouched by Kehl, or by turning short upon the archduke when the latter was following Jourdan. He either dared not, or knew not how to do any thing of the kind; but although he displayed not a spark of genius, and although he preferred a retreat to a decisive and victorious manœuvre, he at least displayed in that retreat a great character and extraordinary resolution. It was certainly not so difficult as it has been represented, but nevertheless it was conducted in the most creditable manner.

The young archduke was indebted to the imperfection of the French plan for a fine conception, which he very ably executed; but, like Moreau, he lacked that ardour and that daring which might have rendered the fault of the French government fatal to its armies. Only conceive what would in all probability have been the case, had there been on either side that impetuous genius which had just destroyed three armies beyond the Alps; if Moreau's sixty thousand men, at the moment when they debouched from Kehl, or if the imperialists, at the moment when they quitted the Danube to turn round upon Jourdan, had been led with the impetuosity displayed in Italy, most assuredly the war would have been terminated at one blow in a disastrous manner for one of the two powers.

This campaign gave the young archduke a high reputation in Europe. In France every one was well satisfied with Moreau, for having brought back safe and sound the army jeopardized in Bavaria. Extreme anxiety had been felt on account of that army, especially from the time when Jourdan having fallen back, the bridge of Kehl being threatened, or a multitude of petty divisions having intercepted the communications through Swabia, nobody knew what had become or what was likely to become of it. But when, after these vivid apprehensions, it was seen debouching into the valley of the Rhine in such excellent condition, they were enraptured with the general who had so happily brought it home. His retreat was extolled as a masterpiece of military science, and immediately associated with the retreat of the ten thousand. No one certainly ventured to bring any thing into comparison with those brilliant triumphs of the army of Italy; but as there are always numbers of persons who take umbrage at superior genius and extraordinary fortune, and are better pleased with mediocre talent, these ranged themselves on Moreau's side, exulting on his prudence and his consummate ability, and determined themselves in favour of those qualities, rather than the ardent genius of the young Bonaparte. From that day Moreau had in his favour all who prefer second-rate merit to first-rate genius; and it must be confessed that in a republic we would almost forgive those enemies of genius, when we observe in how many respects genius is able to injure that liberty which has called it forth, cherished it, and elevated it to the highest degree of worldly splendour.

CHAPTER V.

THE INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL STATE OF FRANCE AFTER THE RETREAT OF THE ARMIES FROM GERMANY AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE YEAR V.—COMBINATIONS OF PITT; OPENING OF A NEGOTIATION WITH THE DIRECTORY; ARRIVAL OF LORD MALMESBURY AT PARIS.—PEACE WITH NAPLES AND WITH GENOA; FRUITLESS NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE POPE; THE DUKE OF MODENA DEPOSED; FOUNDATION OF THE CISADANE REPUBLIC.—THE MISSION OF CLARKE TO VIENNA.—RENEWED EFFORTS OF AUSTRIA IN ITALY; ARRIVAL OF ALVINZY; EXTREME DANGER OF THE FRENCH ARMY; BATTLE OF ARCOLO.

THE turn which the campaign in Germany had taken considerably embarrassed the republic. Her enemies, who persisted in denying her victories, or in predicting severe reverses of fortune, saw their prognostics realized, and openly triumphed in consequence. Those rapid conquests in Germany, said they, had then no solidity. The Danube and the genius of a young prince had soon put an end to them. No doubt, the rash army of Italy, which seemed so firmly established on the Adige, would be torn from it in its turn and flung back upon the Alps, as the armies of Germany had been upon the Rhine. The conquests of general Bonaparte, it is true, seemed to rest upon a somewhat more solid foundation. He had not confined himself to driving Colli and Beaulieu before him; he had destroyed them; he had not contented himself with repelling the new army of Wurmser; he had first thrown it into confusion at Castiglione, and subsequently annihilated it on the Brenta. There was somewhat more hope, therefore, of remaining in Italy than of remaining in Germany; but every one indulged himself in circulating alarming rumours. Numerous forces were on their road, it was said, from Poland and Turkey, to proceed towards the Alps; the imperial armies of the Rhine would now be able to make fresh detachments; and general Bonaparte, having continually new enemies to fight, would, with all his cleverness, have an end put to his successes, setting the exhaustion of his army out of the question. It was natural that in the present state of things such conjectures should be made; for imagination, after enlarging upon successes, will in its turn be unreasonably alarmed at reverses.

The armies of Germany had made good their retreat without any great losses, and occupied the line of the Rhine. There was no great misfortune in this, but the army of Italy was without support, and that was a serious inconvenience. Moreover, our two principal armies, having returned to the French territory, would now have to be maintained out of our finances, which were still in a deplorable state; and this was the worst of all. The mandats, no longer possessing a forced currency as money, had fallen to nothing; besides, they had been spent, and there were scarcely any remaining at the disposal of the government. At Paris they had got into the hands of a few speculators, who sold them to the purchasers of national domains. The arrear of the national debt due was still considerable, but it was not paid off; the arrears of taxes, and the forced loan, were slowly collected; the national domains contracted for were only partially paid for; the instalments still due were not demandable according to law; the contracts for sales that were still taking place were not sufficiently numerous to furnish the treasury. Besides all this, the government lived upon these sale contracts, as well as upon the articles of consumption proceeding from the land-tax, and the promises of payment made by the ministers. The budget of the year v. had just been made up, classed into ordinary and extraordinary expenses. The ordinary expenses amounted to four hundred and fifty millions, the others to five hundred and fifty. The land-tax, the customs, the stamp-duties, and the whole annual proceeds, were expected to answer the ordinary expenditure. The five hundred and fifty millions of the extraordinary would be amply covered by the arrears of the taxes of the year iv. and of the forced loan, and by the instalments yet to be paid for the national property previously sold. The government could also resort to the national property in the hands of the republic unsold; but all this had first to be turned into money, and in this the difficulty always consisted. The contractors, remaining unpaid, refused to continue their advances, and all the public services were suddenly left destitute. The public officials and the annuitants were not paid, and were dying of want.

Thus the insulated state of the army of Italy, and our finances, might afford considerable expectations to our enemies. The plan formed by the directory of a quadruple alliance between France, Spain, the Porte, and Venice, produced nothing but the alliance with Spain. The latter, induced by our offers, and our brilliant fortune in the middle of the summer, had decided, as we have observed, upon renewing the *Family Compact with the republic, and she had just published her declaration of war against Great Britain. Venice, in spite of the solicitations of Spain, and the invitations of the Porte, and in spite of Bonaparte's victories in Italy, had refused to ally herself with the republic. It had in vain been represented to her that Russia grudged her her colonies in Greece, and Austria her Illyrian provinces; that her alliance with France and the Porte, who coveted none of her possessions, would secure her against these two ambitious enemies; that the repeated victories of the French on the Adige must secure her from the return of the Austrian armies, as well as the vengeance of the emperor; that the concurrence of her forces, and of her navy, would render that return still more impossible; that neutrality, on the other hand, would not give her any friend, but leave her without protector, and perhaps even expose her to the danger of serving as a medium of accommodation between the belligerent powers. Venice, who deeply hated the French, was providing armaments evidently intended against them, since she consulted the Austrian ministry on the choice of a general, and refused a second time the alliance proposed to her. She clearly perceived the danger from Austrian ambition; but the danger of French principles was greater, more urgent, in her estimation, and she replied that she should persist in the unarmed neutrality, which was an act of dissimulation; for she was arming on all sides. The Porte, shocked by the refusal of Venice, and by the suggestions of Vienna and of England, had not yet acceded to the project of alliance. There therefore remained only France and Spain, whose alliance might certainly assist in wresting the Mediterranean from the English, but might also jeopardize the Spanish colonies. Pitt had, in fact, been considering how he could make them revolt against the mother country, and had already been intriguing in Mexico. The negotiations with Genoa were not concluded; for they were settling with her all at one time, the payment of a sum of money, the expulsion of certain families, and the recall of certain others; they were not more so with Naples, because the directory demanded a contribution; and the queen, who negotiated as a last resource, refused to comply. Peace was not made with Rome, on account of a condition required by the directory; it wanted the holy see to revoke all the pastoral letters (breves) issued against France since the commencement of the revolution, which severely hurt the pride of the aged pontiff. He summoned a council of cardinals, which decided that no such revocation could take place. The negotiations were broken off. They were renewed at Florence; and a congress was opened. The envoys of the Pope having repeated that the pastoral letters issued could not be revoked, and the French commissioners having replied on their part that the condition was a sine quâ non, they separated after a few minutes' interview. The Pope was the more positive in his refusal, inasmuch as he relied upon assistance from the king of Naples, and from England. He had just sent Cardinal Albani to Vienna, to implore the aid of Austria, and to confer with her on his defending himself against the French.

Such were the relations of France with Europe. Her enemies, on their part, were much exhausted. Austria felt more confidence, it is true, by the retreat of our armies which had advanced to the Danube; but she was very uneasy respecting Italy, and was making fresh preparations to recover it. England was reduced to a sad state: her situation in Corsica was precarious, and she saw herself exposed, in all probability, to the loss of that island. The French were for closing all the ports of Italy against her, and one more victory gained by general Bonaparte was all that was wanting to insure her entire expulsion from that country. War with Spain was about to close the Mediterranean against her, and to threaten Portugal. The whole coast, as far as the Texel, was closed against England. The expedition that Hoche was preparing in Brittany caused great anxiety in respect of Ireland; her finances were in disorder, the bank was shaken, and the people wanted peace; the opposition had been made stronger by the recent elections. These were quite sufficient reasons for thinking of peace, and for taking advantage of the late reverses of France to induce her to accept it. But the royal family and the aristocracy felt a great repugnance to treat with France, because according to their notions it was holding terms with the revolution. Pitt, much less attached to aristocratic principles, and intent solely on the interests of the English power, would certainly have been glad of peace, but on one condition, indispensable with him, but to which the republic could never assent—the restitution of the Netherlands to Austria. Pitt, as we have already remarked, was English all over in pride, ambition, and prejudices. The greatest crime of the revolution was, according to his notions, not so much the giving birth to a colossal republic, as the annexation of the Netherlands to France.

* This was the name of a treaty conceived by the duke de Choiseul, who was at the head of the French ministry in 1761, and was negotiated by him with the court of Madrid for the purpose of cementing an alliance and perpetual union among the different branches of the house of Bourbon, for the purpose of counterbalancing the maritime power of England, which has always given the French uneasiness. See Koch's Revolutions of Europe, in the series of the Popular Library, p. 147. Trans.

The Netherlands were, in fact, an important acquisition for France. That acquisition gave her, in the first place, the possession of the most fertile and wealthy provinces of the continent, and, above all, of manufacturing provinces; it gave her the mouths of the rivers most important to the commerce of the North, the Scheldt, the Meuse, and the Rhine; it gave her a considerable increase of coast, and consequently of shipping; it afforded her seaports of great importance, especially Antwerp; and lastly, an extension of our maritime frontier in a quarter the most dangerous to the English frontier, opposite to the defenceless coast of Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Yorkshiro. Besides this positive acquisition, the Netherlands conferred on us another advantage; Holland must fall under the immediate influence of France, when no longer separated from her by Austrian provinces. In this case, the French line would extend not only to Antwerp but to the Texel, and the English coast would be environed by a cincture of hostile shores. Add to this a family compact with Spain, then become powerful and well-organized, and we shall easily conceive that Pitt must have felt some uneasiness respecting the maritime power of England. It is, in fact, a principle with every Englishman well brought up in his national ideas, that England ought to bear sway at Naples, Lisbon, and Amsterdam, in order to have a footing on the continent, and to break the long line of coast that may be opposed to her. This principle was as deep-rooted in 1796, as that which caused any injury done to France to be considered as a benefit done to England. In consequence, Pitt, in order to recruit his finances for a moment, would gladly have consented to a temporary peace, but on the condition that the Netherlands should be restored to Austria. He thought, therefore, of opening a negotiation on this basis. He could hardly expect that France would admit such a condition; for the Netherlands were the principal acquisition of the revolution, and the constitution did not even allow the directory to treat for their alienation. But Pitt knew little about the continent. He sincerely believed that France was ruined, and he spoke as he believed the fact to be, when he came regularly every year and proclaimed the exhaustion and the fall of our republic. He thought that if France had ever been disposed to peace, it was at that very moment, whether it were on account of the fall of the mandates, or on account of the retreat of the armies from Germany. At any rate, whether he considered the condition admissible or not, he had a stronger reason for opening a negotiation. This was the necessity of complying with the public opinion, which loudly demanded peace. In fact, before he could obtain the levy of sixty thousand militia and fifteen thousand seamen, he had to show by some striking proof, that he had done his utmost to make a treaty. He had another object in view not less important. In taking the initiative, and opening a solemn negotiation in Paris, he had the advantage of drawing the discussion of all the European interests into one focus, and preventing the opening of any separate negotiation with Austria. This latter power cared less to recover the Netherlands than England did that they should be restored to her. The Netherlands were in the eyes of Austria a remote province, which was detached from the centre of her empire, exposed to continual invasion from France, and deeply imbued with revolutionary ideas; a province she had several times thought of exchanging for other possessions in Germany or Italy, and which she had kept solely because Prussia had always opposed her aggrandizement in Germany, and because opportunities had not offered allowing her increase of influence in Italy. Pitt thought that a solemn negotiation opened in Paris, on behalf of all the allies, would prevent individual combinations and preoccupy any private arrangement relative to the Netherlands. Lastly, he wanted to have an agent in France who could judge of her from close observation, and to obtain authentic information respecting the expedition preparing at Brest. Such were the reasons which, even without any hope of obtaining peace, decided Pitt to make an overture to the directory. He did not confine himself, as in the preceding year, to an insignificant communication from Wickham to Barthelemy. He demanded passports for an envoy invested with the powers of Great Britain. In this public mode of proceeding, adopted by our most implacable foe, there was something glorious for the republic. The English aristocrats were thus reduced to sue for peace at the hands of the regicide republic. The passports were immediately granted. Pitt selected lord Malmesbury, formerly Sir [James] Harris, and son of the author of "Hermes." This personage had not the character of being partial to republics; he had contributed to the oppression of Holland in 1787. He arrived in Paris, with a numerous suite, on the 2d Brumaire (October 23, 1796).

The directory caused itself to be represented by the minister Delacroix. The two plenipotentiaries met at the foreign office the 3d Brumaire, year v. (October 24, 1796.) The minister of France exhibited his powers. Lord Malmesbury declared himself to be sent by Great Britain and her allies, in order to treat for a general peace. He then exhibited his powers, which were signed by England alone. The French minister then asked if he was empowered by the allies of Great Britain to treat in their name. Lord Malmesbury replied, that as soon as the negotiation was opened, and the principle on which it could be based was admitted, the king of Great Britain was confident of obtaining the concurrence and the powers of his allies. His lordship then delivered to Delacroix a note from his court, stating the principle upon which the negotiation was to be based. This principle was that of mutual indemnity in respect of conquests between the powers. England, so said this note, had made conquests in the colonies; France had made conquests on the continent from the allies of England; there was therefore matter of restitution on both sides. But the principle of those compensations must first be defined, before entering into explanations concerning the subjects of mutual indemnity. We observe that the English cabinet forbore to explain itself positively concerning the restitution of the Netherlands, and enunciated a general principle, in order that the negotiation should not be broken off as soon as it was opened. The minister Delacroix replied, that he would go and confer with the directory.

The directory could not give up the Netherlands. In fact it had no authority conferred upon it so to do; if it had been authorized, it ought not to have complied. France had engagements of honour in regard to those provinces, and could not expose them to the vengeance of Austria by restoring them to her. Besides, she had a right to indemnities for the unjust war that had been made upon her; she had a right to compensation for the aggrandizements which Austria, Prussia, and Russia had gained in Poland by the consequences of an immoral act; lastly, her tendencies should be directed towards obtaining her natural extent of territory; and for all these reasons, she ought never to part with the Netherlands, but uphold the arrangements of the constitution. The directory, firmly resolved to perform its duty on this point, had it in its power to break off immediately a negotiation, the evident aim of which was to propose to us the cession of the Netherlands, and to prevent an arrangement with Austria; but thus it would have afforded a pretence for saying that it did not desire peace; it would have satisfied one of the principal intentions of Pitt, and have furnished him with excellent reasons for demanding fresh sacrifices of the English nation. The directory replied the very next day. France, it stated, had already treated separately with most of the powers of the coalition, without their having called for the concurrence of all the allies; to render the negotiation general, was to render it interminable; it was giving room to believe that the present negotiation was not more sincere than the overture made in the preceding year through the medium of Mr. Wickham. Besides, the English minister had not the powers of the allies, whose name he used. Lastly, the principle of mutual indemnity was enunciated in a manner too general and too vague for it to be possible either to admit or to reject it. The application of this principle always depended on the nature of the conquests, and on the strength left to the belligerent powers for retaining them. "Thus," added the directory, "the French government might well spare itself the trouble of replying; but to prove its desire of peace, it declares that it will be ready to listen to all the propositions so soon as lord Malmesbury shall be furnished with the powers of all the other potentates in whose name he alleges he is to treat."

The directory, who in this negotiation had nothing to conceal, and could therefore act with the greatest frankness, resolved to make the negotiation public, and to insert in the newspapers the notes of the English minister and the replies of the French minister. Accordingly it published immediately the memorial of lord Malmesbury, and the answer which he had returned. This mode of proceeding was of such a nature as somewhat to disconcert the tortuous policy of the English cabinet; but it did not depart from the ordinary course of politeness, although it deviated from established forms. Malmesbury replied, that he should refer the matter to his government. A singular plenipotentiary this, who had none other than such insufficient powers, and who at every difficulty was obliged to refer to his court! The directory might have looked upon this as a trick, and as showing an intention to unduly protract, by assuming the air of negotiating; it might even have expressed displeasure at the presence of a foreigner, whose intrigues might be dangerous, and who came to discover the secret of our armaments. However, the directory manifested no dissatisfaction; it permitted lord Malmesbury to wait for the answers of his court, and, while thus waiting, to make his observations upon Paris, the parties, their strength, and that of the government. The directory indeed would rather gain by so doing.

In the mean time our situation was becoming perilous in Italy, notwithstanding the recent triumphs of Roveredo, Bassano, and Saint-George. Austria redoubled her efforts to recover Lombardy. In consequence of the guarantees given by Catherine to the emperor for the security of Galicia, the troops which were in Poland had been marched towards the Alps. Owing also to the hope of maintaining peace with the Porte, the frontiers of Turkey had been stripped, and all the reserves of the Austrian monarchy directed towards Italy. A numerous and devoted population furnished, moreover, powerful means of recruiting the armies. The Austrian administration displayed extraordinary zeal and activity in enlisting fresh men, incorporating them with the old troops, and in arming and fitting them out. A fine army was thus preparing in the Friule, with the wrecks of Wurmser, the troops from Poland and Turkey, the detachments from the Rhine, and the recruits. Marshal Alvinzy was appointed to the command of it. It was hoped that this third army would be more fortunate than the two preceding, and that it would succeed in wresting Italy from the young conqueror.

In this interval, Bonaparte was perpetually demanding reinforcements, and advising negotiations with the Italian powers who were in his rear. He urged the directory to treat with Naples, to renew the negotiations with Rome, to conclude with Genoa, and to negotiate an alliance offensive and defensive with the king of Piedmont, in order to obtain assistance in Italy if none could be sent to him from France. He desired to be permitted to proclaim the independence of Lombardy, and that of the states of the duke of Modena, that he might gain himself partisans and auxiliaries strongly attached to his cause. His views were correct, and the distress of his army justified his urgent entreaties. The rupture of the negotiations with the Pope had stopped a second time the contributions levied by the armistice of Bologna. No more than one payment of it had been made. The contributions levied upon Parma, Modena, and Milan were exhausted either by the expenses of the army or by the remittances made to the government. Venice was regular in her supply of provisions, but the pay was in arrear. The amounts to be taken from foreign commerce at Leghorn were still in dispute. Amidst the richest countries in the world, the army began to experience privations. But the greatest misfortune was the void in its ranks, thinned by the Austrian cannon. It was not without sustaining great losses that it had destroyed so many enemies. It had been recruited by nine or ten thousand men since the opening of the campaign, which made the number of the French who had entered Italy amount to nearly about fifty thousand; but at this moment it had at most thirty and some odd thousand; fighting and disease had reduced it to this small number. A dozen battalions from La Vendée had just joined, but they were singularly diminished by desertions; the other promised detachments had not arrived. General Willot, who commanded in the south, and who was ordered to send several regiments to the Alps, detained them, to quell the disturbances which his mismanagement and his bad spirit excited in the provinces under his command. Kellermann could not take from his line of troops, for he was still obliged to hold himself in readiness to keep Lyons and its environs in order, where the companies of Jesus were committing murders. Bonaparte asked for the 83rd and the 40th brigades, forming nearly six thousand good troops, and undertook to answer for the result if they should arrive in time.

He complained that he had not been directed to negotiate with Rome, because he should have waited, before signifying his ultimatum, for payment of the contribution. "So long," said he, "as your general shall not be the centre of every thing in Italy, all will go wrong. It would be easy to accuse me of ambition, but the fact is, I am laden with too much honour. I am ill; I can scarcely sit my horse; nothing is left me but courage, and that is insufficient for the post I occupy. They can count us," added he; "the charm of our strength is fast disappearing. Send troops, or Italy is lost!"

The directory, feeling the necessity of depriving Rome of the support of Naples, and of strengthening Bonaparte's rear, at length concluded its treaty with the court of the two Sicilies. It forbore from making any particular demand; and for its own part, that court which our recent victories on the Brenta had intimidated, which saw Spain making common cause with France and was afraid of seeing the English driven from the Mediterranean, acceded to the treaty. Peace was signed on the 19th Vendémiaire (October 10). It was agreed that the king of Naples should withhold every kind of relief from the enemies of France, and that he should shut his ports against the armed vessels of the belligerent powers. The directory then concluded its treaty with Genoa. A particular circumstance led to its conclusion. Nelson had taken a French ship within sight of the Genoese batteries. This violation of the neutrality deeply compromised the republic of Genoa; the French party there became bolder, the party of the coalition more timid; and it was resolved to enter into an alliance with France. The ports of Genoa were closed against the English. Two millions were paid to us as an indemnity for the Modeste frigate, and two more were furnished by way of loan. The feudatory families were not exiled; but all the partisans of France formerly expelled from the territory and from the senate were recalled and reinstated. Piedmont was anew solicited to conclude an alliance, offensive and defensive. The king was just dead; his young successor, Charles Emanuel, manifested very favourable inclinations towards France, but he was not content with the advantages offered to him as the price of his alliance. The directory offered to guaranty his dominions, which in that general convulsion, and amidst all the republics that were ready to start up, no other power could guaranty to him. But the new king, like his predecessor, wanted to have Lombardy given to him; this the directory could not promise, having to settle the question of mutual indemnities in order to treat with Austria. The directory then allowed Bonaparte to renew the negotiations with Rome, and gave him full powers for that purpose.

Rome had sent Cardinal Albani to Vienna. She had reckoned upon Naples, and in her excessive eagerness had offended the Spanish legation. Naples failing her, and Spain manifesting her dissatisfaction, she became alarmed, and the moment was favourable for renewing the previous intercourse with her. Bonaparte, in the first place, wanted his money; in the next, though he was not afraid of her temporal power, he dreaded her moral influence over the people. The two Italian parties engendered by the French revolution, and developed by the presence of our armies, became daily more and more exasperated against one another. If Milan, Modena, Reggio, Bologna, Ferrara, were the seat of the patriotic party, Rome was the seat of the monastic and aristocratic party. She had it in her power to excite fanatic fury, and to do us great mischief, especially at a moment when the question with the Austrian armies was not yet resolved. Bonaparte deemed it right to temporize a little longer. As a man of a free and independent mind, he despised all the fanaticisms that clog the human understanding; but as a man of action, he dreaded those powers which are out of the reach of personal constraint, and he chose rather to elude than to combat with them. Besides, though educated in France, he was born amidst Italian superstition. He did not identify himself with that disgust of the Catholic religion, so strong and so common among us at the end of the eighteenth century; and he had not the same repugnance to treat with the holy see as was felt in Paris. He purposed therefore to gain time, to spare himself a retrograde march through the peninsula, to spare himself fanatical denunciations, and, if possible, to regain the sixteen millions carried back to Rome. He directed Cacciault the minister to disavow the demands made by the directory in regard to matters of faith, and not to insist on any other than purely material conditions. He selected cardinal Mattei, whom he had confined in a convent, for the purpose of sending him to Rome; he set him at liberty, and commissioned him to go and speak to the Pope. "The court of Rome," he wrote to him, "wants war, and war it shall have; but first I owe it to my nation and to humanity to make one last effort to bring back the Pope to reason. You are acquainted with the strength of the army which I command. To destroy the temporal power of the Pope, I need but to will it. Go to Rome, see his holiness, enlighten him as to his true interests; tear him away from the intriguers by whom he is surrounded, who wish for his ruin and for that of the court of Rome. The French government permits me still to listen to words of peace. Every thing may yet be settled. War, so cruel for nations, has terrible results for the vanquished. Divert these great calamities from the Pope. You know how anxious I am to finish by peace a struggle which war would terminate for me without glory as without danger."

While he was employing these means to entrap, as he said, the old fox, and to screen himself from the fury of fanaticism, he was thinking how to excite the spirit of liberty in Upper Italy, in order to oppose patriotism to superstition. All Upper Italy was in a state of the utmost enthusiastic excitement. The Milanese, which had been violently taken from Austria; and the provinces of Modena and Reggio, impatient of the yoke with which their old absentee duke oppressed them, the Legations of Bologna and Ferrara, withdrawn from the Pope, loudly demanded their independence and their organization into republics. Bonaparte could not proclaim the independence of Lombardy, for victory had not yet positively decided its fate; but he still held out to it hopes and encouragement. As for the provinces of Modena and Reggio, they lay close at the rear of his army, and bordered on Mantua. He had to complain of the regency, which had afforded a transit for provisions to the garrison; he had recommended to the directory not to give peace to the duke of Modena, but to confine itself to the armistice, that it might be able to punish him on a future occasion. Circumstances daily becoming more complicated, he decided upon a bold stroke, without giving previous notice of it to the directory. It was ascertained that the regency had again been in fault, and that it had violated the armistice by supplying Wurmser with provisions. He immediately declared the armistice broken, and by virtue of the right of conquest he expelled the regency, declared the duke of Modena deposed, and the provinces of Reggio and Modena free. The enthusiasm of the Reggians and the Modenese was extraordinary. Bonaparte ordered a municipal government to administer the country temporarily till it should be constituted. Bologna and Ferrara had already constituted themselves republics, and began to raise troops. Bonaparte resolved to unite those two Legations with the states of the duke of Modena, and to form with them a single republic, which, situated entirely on this side of the Po, should be called The Cispadane Republic. He thought that if it were necessary at the peace to restore the Modenese and the Legations to the duke of Modena and the Pope, that there might thus be erected a republic, the daughter and friend of the French republic, which would remain beyond the Alps the focus of French principles, and the asylum of the compromised patriots, whence liberty might some day be diffused over all Italy. He conceived that the enfranchisement of Italy was not to be accomplished by a single blow; he considered the French government as too much exhausted to effect it at that moment, and he thought that it was requisite to sow at least the seeds of liberty in this first campaign. To this end, it was advisable to unite Bologna and Ferrara with Modena and Reggio. Local interests were adverse to this plan; but he hoped to conquer that opposition by his all-powerful influence. He repaired to those cities, was received with enthusiasm, and decided them to send to Modena one hundred deputies from all parts of their territory, to form a national assembly, which should be charged to constitute the Cispadane republic. This assembly met on the 25th Vendémiaire (October 16th) at Modena. It was composed of lawyers, landholders, and merchants. Restrained by the presence of Bonaparte, and directed by his counsels, it displayed the greatest discretion. It voted the consolidation of the two Legations, and of the duchy of Modena into a single republic; it abolished the feudal system, and decreed civil equality; it appointed a commissioner to organize a legion of four thousand men, and ordained the formation of a second assembly, which was to meet on the 5th Nivôse (December 25), to deliberate upon a constitution. The Reggians displayed the greatest zeal. An Austrian detachment having quitted Mantua, they ran to arms, surrounded it, made it prisoner, and conducted it to Bonaparte. Two Reggians were killed in the action, and became the first martyrs of Italian independence.

Lombardy was jealous and alarmed at the favours conferred on the Cispadane republic, and regarded them as a sinister omen for herself. She conceived that, as the French were constituting the Legations and the duchy, without constituting her, they intended to restore her to Austria. Bonaparte again comforted the Lombards, represented to them the difficulties of his situation, and repeated that they must earn their independence by assisting him in this arduous struggle. They resolved to bring the two Italian and Polish legions up to twelve thousand men, the organization of which they had already commenced.

Bonaparte had thus gained over and got round him governments kindly disposed to his cause, and which were about to exert their utmost efforts to support him. Their troops certainly were no great things; but they would serve to act as a police to the conquered country, and in this manner they rendered the detachments which he employed there serviceable. They would be able, if supported by a few hundred French, to resist a first attempt of the Pope, if he were foolish enough to make one. Bonaparte strove at the same time to gain the confidence of the Duke of Parma, whose states bordered on the new republic, whose friendship might be useful, and whose relationship with Spain commanded attention. He held out to him the possibility of gaining a few towns amidst the dismemberment of territories. He thus availed himself of all the resources of politics to supply the deficiency of the forces with which his government could not furnish him; and in this he performed his duty to France and to Italy, and with the tact and address of a veteran diplomatist.

Through his exertions, Corsica had just been emancipated. He had collected the principal refugees at Leghorn, given them arms and officers, and daringly thrown them upon the island, to second the rebellion of the inhabitants against the English. The expedition had been successful, his native country was delivered from the English yoke, and the Mediterranean was soon likely to be the same. There was reason to expect that the Spanish squadrons, united with the squadrons of France, would in future close the Straits of Gibraltar against the English fleet, and have exclusive dominion throughout the whole of the Mediterranean.

He had, therefore, employed the time which had elapsed since the occurrences of the Brenta, in improving his position in Italy; but if he had rather less to fear from the princes of that country, the danger from Austria was getting greater, and his forces were still insufficient to ward off the blow. The 83rd and the 40th demi-brigades were still detained in the south. He had twelve thousand men in the Tyrol under Vaubois, drawn up in front of Trent, on the bank of the Lavis; about sixteen or seventeen thousand, under Masséna and Augereau, on the Brenta and Adige; lastly, eight or nine thousand before Mantua, which made his army amount to about thirty-six or thirty-eight thousand. Davidovich, who had remained in the Tyrol after Wurmser's disaster, with a few thousand men, had now eighteen thousand. Alvinzy was advancing from the Friule upon the Piave, with about forty thousand. Bonaparte was, therefore, in extreme jeopardy; for, to oppose sixty thousand men, he had only thirty-six thousand, worn out by a triple campaign, and daily thinned by the fevers which they contracted in the rice-grounds of Lombardy. He wrote to the directory, under the influence of extreme mortification, and told them that he was on the point of losing Italy.

The directory, seeing the danger Bonaparte was in, and unable to come soon enough to his assistance, thought of suspending hostilities immediately by means of a negotiation. Malmesbury was in Paris, as we have seen. He was waiting for the answer of his government to the communication of the directory, which insisted that he should have the powers of all the governments, and that he should express himself more clearly on the principle of compensation for conquests. The English ministry, after the lapse of nineteen days, at length answered on the 24th Brumaire (November 14th), that the demands of France were unusual; and that it was the usual practice for one ally to apply to treat in the name of her allies before receiving their formal authority for so doing; that England was confident of obtaining such authority, but it was first requisite that France should explain herself distinctly respecting the principle of the mutual indemnification, the only basis upon which the negotiation could be opened. The English cabinet added, that the reply of the directory was full of very indecorous insinuations respecting the intentions of his Britannic majesty, that it was beneath him to answer them, and he should take no notice of them, that he might not impede the negotiation. On the same day, the directory, wishing to be prompt and categorical, replied to lord Malmesbury, that it admitted the principle of mutual indemnification, but that it expected him to state immediately the objects to which that principle was to be applied.

The directory could give this answer without proceeding too far, since, while refusing to cede Belgium and Luxemburg, it could cede Lombardy and some other small territories. Besides all this, the negotiation was evidently illusory; the directory could not expect to derive any benefit from it, and it resolved to frustrate the subtleties of England by sending direct to Vienna a negotiator commissioned to effect a separate arrangement with the emperor. The first proposal which the negotiator had to make was, that of an armistice in Germany and Italy, which was to last at least six months. The Rhine and the Adige were to separate the armies of the two powers. The sieges of Kehl and Mantua were to be suspended. The provisions requisite for the daily consumption were to be sent every day into Mantua, so that at the conclusion of the armistice the two parties might be in the same situation they were formerly. France would thus gain the retention of Kehl, and Austria that of Mantua. A negotiation was to be opened immediately to treat for peace. The conditions offered by France were the following: Austria was to cede Belgium and Luxemburg to France; France was to restore Lombardy to Austria, and the Palatinate to the empire; she would thus on this latter point relinquish the line of the Rhine, she would consent moreover to indemnify Austria for the loss of the Netherlands by the secularization of several bishoprics of the empire. The emperor was not to interfere in any way in the affairs of France with the pope, and she was to employ her influence in Germany to procure indemnities for the Stadtholder. This was an indispensable condition, to insure the quiet of Holland, and to satisfy the king of Prussia, whose sister was the wife of the stadtholder. These conditions were extremely moderate, and proved the desire of the directory to put an end to the horrors of war, and to the alarm which it had felt for the army of Italy.

The directory appointed general Clarke, who was employed in the war-office under Carnot, to be the bearer of these proposals. His instructions were signed on the 26th Brumaire (November 16). But it took time before he could set out, arrive, be received, and heard; and during this interval events succeeded one another in Italy with extraordinary rapidity.

On the 11th Brumaire (November 1) marshal Alvinzy had thrown bridges over the Piave, and advanced upon the Brenta. The plan of the Austrians this time was to attack at once by the mountains of the Tyrol and by the plain. Davidovich was to drive Vaubois from his positions, and to descend along both banks of the Adige to Verona. Alvinzy, on his part, was to cross the Piave and the Brenta, to advance upon the Adige, to enter Verona with the main body of the army, and there form a junction with Davidovich. The two Austrian armies were to start from this point, and to march in concert to raise the blockade of Mantua, and to relieve Wurmser.

Alvinzy, after crossing the Piave, advanced upon the Brenta, where Masséna was posted with his division. The latter, having reconnoitred the enemy's force, fell back. Bonaparte marched to his support with Augereau's division. At the same time he directed Vaubois to coop up Davidovich in the valley of the Upper Adige, and to take from him, if possible, his position on the Lavis. He himself marched against Alvinzy, resolving, in spite of the disproportion of strength, to attack him impetuously, and to break him at the very outset of this new campaign. On the morning of the 16th Brumaire (November 6), he came in sight of the enemy. The Austrians had taken position in advance of the Brenta, from Carmignano to Bassano; their reserves had remained behind the other side of the Brenta. Bonaparte directed his whole force against them. Masséna attacked Liptai and Provera in front of Carmignano; Augereau attacked Quasdanovich before Bassano. The action was hot and bloody; the troops displayed great bravery; Liptai and Provera were driven beyond the Brenta by Masséna; Quasdanovich was thrown back upon Bassano by Augereau. Bonaparte intended to enter Bassano the same day, but was prevented by the arrival of the Austrian reserves. He was obliged to defer the attack till the following day. Unfortunately he received intelligence in the night that Vaubois had just experienced a reverse on the Upper Adige. That general had gallantly attacked the positions of Davidovich, and had at first obtained some advantages; but a panic had seized his troops, notwithstanding their tried bravery, and they had fled in disorder. He had rallied them in the famous defile of Calliano, where the army had deployed so daringly in the invasion of the Tyrol: he hoped to maintain his ground there, when Davidovich sending a corps to the other bank of the Adige, had fallen upon Calliano and turned the position. Vaubois declared that he was retiring, in order to avoid being divided, and he expressed his fear lest Davidovich should get before him to the important positions of La Corona and Rivoli, which cover the road to the Tyrol, between the Adige and the Lake of Garda.

Bonaparte then became aware of the danger of proceeding further against Alvinzy, while Vaubois, who was with his left in the Tyrol, was liable to lose La Corona, Rivoli, and even Verona, and even to be driven back into the plain. Bonaparte would then have been cut off from his principal wing, and placed with fifteen or sixteen thousand men between Davidovich and Alvinzy. He consequently resolved to fall back immediately. He ordered a trusty officer to fly to Verona, to collect there all the troops he could find, to hasten with them to Rivoli and La Corona, in order to anticipate Davidovich, and to give Vaubois time to retire thither.

The next day, the 17th Brumaire (November 7), he marched back, and passed through the city of Vicenza, which was astonished to see the French army retiring, after the success of the preceding day. He proceeded to Verona, where he left his whole army. He repaired alone to Rivoli and La Corona, where, very fortunately, he found Vaubois' troops rallied, and in some measure able to make head against a new attack of Davidovich. He resolved to give a lesson to the 39th and 85th demi-brigades, which had given way to a panic terror. He ordered the whole division to be assembled, and addressing those two demi-brigades, he reproached them for their want of discipline, and their flight. He then said to the head of the staff, "Let it be inscribed on the colours that the 39th and the 85th no longer form part of the army of Italy." These expressions produced the keenest mortification in the soldiers of those two demi-brigades. They surrounded Bonaparte, told him that they had been fighting one against three, and asked to be sent to his advanced guard, to show whether they had ceased to belong to the army of Italy. Bonaparte made them amends for his severity, by a few kind words, which transported them, and left them in a disposition to avenge their honour by desperate bravery.

Vaubois had only eight thousand men left out of the twelve thousand that he commanded before this rash enterprise. Bonaparte distributed them in the best manner that he could, in the positions of La Corona and Rivoli; and after he had made sure that Vaubois could maintain his ground for a few days, and cover our left and our rear, he returned to Verona, to operate against Alvinzy. The causeway leading from the Brenta to Verona, skirting the foot of the mountains, passes through Vicenza, Monte-Bello, Villa-Nova, and Caldiero. Alvinzy, surprised to see Bonaparte fall back the day after he had gained an advantage, had followed him at a distance, doubting whether the progress of Davidovich could alone have induced him to retire. He hoped that his plan of a junction at Verona was about to be realized. He halted about three leagues from Verona, on the heights of Caldiero, which command the road to that city. These heights presented an excellent position for making head against an army leaving Verona. Alvinzy posted himself there, placed batteries, and omitted nothing to render them impregnable. Bonaparte reconnoitred, and resolved to attack them immediately; for the situation of Vaubois at Rivoli was very precarious, and left him not much time to act against Alvinzy. He marched against him on the evening of the 21st (November 11th), repulsed his advanced guard, and bivouacked with Masséna's and Augereau's divisions at the foot of Caldiero. At day-break, he perceived that Alvinzy, deeply intrenched, was ready for battle. The position was assailable on one side, that which abutted upon the mountains, and which had not been defended with sufficient care by Alvinzy. Bonaparte sent Masséna thither, and directed Augereau to attack the rest of the line. The action was brisk. But the rain fell in torrents, which gave a great advantage to the enemy, whose artillery was placed beforehand in good positions, while ours, obliged to move along roads rendered impassable, could not be brought to suitable points, and wholly failed in effect. Masséna nevertheless succeeded in climbing the heights neglected by Alvinzy. But the rain suddenly changed to a cold sleet, which a violent wind blew in the faces of our soldiers. At the same instant Alvinzy ordered his reserve to march to the position which Masséna had taken from him, and recovered all his advantages. In vain did Bonaparte persist in renewing his efforts. They were attended with no better success. The two armies passed the night fronting each other. The rain never ceased falling, and our soldiers were in a miserable plight. On the next day, the 23rd Brumaire (November 15th), Bonaparte returned to Verona.

The situation of the army now became desperate.

After having to no purpose driven the enemy beyond the Brenta, and lost without benefit a great number of brave men; after having lost on the left the Tyrol and four thousand men, after having fought an unsuccessful battle at Caldiero to drive off Alvinzy from Verona, and again weakened him to no purpose, every resource seemed to fail. The left, now consisting of no more than eight thousand men, was liable every moment to be hurled from La Corona and Rivoli, and then Bonaparte would be surrounded at Verona. The two divisions of Masséna and Augereau, which formed the active army opposed to Alvinzy, were reduced by two battles to fourteen or fifteen thousand men. What were fourteen or fifteen thousand men against nearly forty thousand? The artillery, which had always served to counterbalance the superiority of the enemy, could no longer move along through the mud; there was therefore no hope of fighting with any chance of success. The army was in consternation. Those brave soldiers, tried by so many hardships and dangers, began to murmur. Like all intelligent soldiers, they were subject to fits of murmuring, because they were capable of forming a judgment. "After destroying," said they, "two armies which were opposed to us, we are expected, forsooth, to destroy those too which were opposed to the troops of the Rhine. After Baulieu came Wurmser, after Wurmser comes Alvinzy. The struggle is renewed every day. We cannot do the work of all. We have no business to fight Alvinzy any more than we had to fight Wurmser. If every one had done his duty as well as we have, the war would be at an end. Well and good," they added, "if they had but sent us assistance proportioned to our dangers! but they abandon us in the uttermost parts of Italy; they leave us by ourselves to contend with overwhelming armies. And when, after having shed our blood in thousands of fights, we shall be brought back to the Alps, we shall return without honour and without glory, like runaways who have not done their duty." Such was the language held by the soldiers in their bivouacs. Bonaparte, who shared their ill-temper and their mortification, wrote on the same day, the 24th Brumaire (November 14), to the directory. "All our superior officers, all our best generals, are hors de combat. The army of Italy, reduced to a handful of men, is exhausted. The heroes of Millesimo, of Lodi, of Castiglione, and of Bassano, have died for their country, or are in the hospital. All that is now left to the division is their reputation and their pride. Joubert, Lannes, Lamare, Victor, Murat, Charlot, Dupuis, Rampon, Pigeon, Menard, Chabrand, are wounded. We are deserted in the remotest parts of Italy; the few brave fellows who are still left me see death staring them in the face, amidst dangers so unceasing and with such inferior strength. Perhaps the hour of the brave Augereau, of the intrepid Masséna, is near at hand. Then, again, what will become of these brave fellows? This idea makes me melancholy; I no longer dare to face death, which would be a subject of discouragement to any one exposed to my anxieties. If I had received the 83rd, numbering three thousand five hundred men, known to the army, I would have answered for every thing going on well. Perhaps in a few days forty thousand may not be enough!

To-day," added Bonaparte, "rest for the troops; to-morrow, according to the movements of the enemy, we shall act."

While he was addressing these bitter complaints to the government, he affected the greatest self-reliance in the presence of his soldiers; he caused it to be repeated to them by his officers that one more effort must be made, and that this effort would be the last; that if Alvinzy were destroyed, the means of Austria would be exhausted for ever, Italy conquered, peace secured, and the glory of the army immortal. His presence and his address to them roused the courage of the men. The sick wasted by fever, on hearing that the army was in danger, left the hospitals in a body, and hastened to take their places in the ranks. The most heartfelt and the deepest emotion was in every heart. The Austrians had that very day got within sight of Verona, and were showing the ladders which they had prepared to scale the walls. The Veronese gave loose to their joy, at the idea of seeing in a few hours Alvinzy joining with Davidovich in their city, and the French destroyed. Some few among them who were compromised on account of their attachment to our cause, walked pensively up and down, counting the small number of our brave fellows.

The army anxiously awaited the orders of the general, and hoped every moment that he would set them in motion to some purpose. The day of the 24th had nevertheless elapsed, and against all usage the order of the day had not intimated any thing. But Bonaparte had not lost time; and after meditating on the field of battle, he made up his mind to adopt one of those resolutions which despair suggests to genius. Towards night, orders were issued for the whole army to get under arms, the strictest silence was recommended; the command to march was given, but instead of moving forward, the army fell back, recrossed the Adige by the bridges of Verona, and left the city by the gate leading to Milan. The army believed they were retreating, and that there was no further intention of keeping possession of Italy; and a general feeling of melancholy prevailed. However, at some distance from Verona, the army turned to the left; instead of continuing to recede from the Adige, it began to proceed along the river, and to follow its downward course. This line of march was followed for four leagues. At length, after a march of some hours, the army arrived at Ronco, where a bridge of boats had been thrown across by direction of the general; the army recrossed the river, and at day-break was on the other side of the Adige, which it had been believed had been quitted for ever. The plan of the general was extraordinary, he was about to surprise both armies. The Adige, on issuing from Verona, ceases for a short distance to run perpendicularly from the mountains to the sea, and bends obliquely towards the east; in this oblique direction it goes near the road from Verona to the Brenta, on which Alvinzy was encamped. Bonaparte, on reaching Ronco, consequently found himself brought back on the flanks, and nearly on the rear of the Austrians. By means of this bridge, he found himself amidst extensive marshes. These marshes were traversed by two causeways, one of which on the left, running along the upward course of the Adige, through Porcil and Gombione, was continued to Verona; the other on the right, crossed a small stream called the Alpon, at the village of Arcola, and went in the direction of the Verona road near Villa-Nova, in the rear of Caldiero.

Bonaparte therefore kept possession at Ronco of two causeways, both of them communicating with the high road occupied by the Austrians; the one between Caldiero and Verona, the other between Caldiero and Villa-Nova. Now remark the result of his calculations; amidst these marshes numerical advantage was neutralized; there was no deploying but upon the causeways, and on the causeways the courage of the advanced guards of the columns would decide the event. By the causeway on the left, which communicated with the road between Verona and Caldiero, he could fall upon the Austrians if they attempted to scale Verona. By the causeway on the right, which crossed the Alpon at the bridge of Arcola, and terminated at Villa Nova, he might debouch upon the rear of Alvinzy, take his artillery and baggage, and cut off his retreat. He was therefore impregnable at Ronco, and he stretched his two arms around the enemy. He had caused the gates at Verona to be shut, and had left Kilmaine there, with fifteen hundred men, to stand a first assault. This combination, so daring and so profound, struck the army, who immediately comprehended its object, and inspired them with confidence.

Bonaparte stationed Masséna on the dike at the left, so as to go up to Gombione and Porell, and take the enemy in the rear, if he should march to Verona. He despatched Augereau to the right, to debouch upon Villa-Nova. It was just day-break. Masséna placed himself in observation at the dike on the left; Augereau, before he could advance along the right-hand dike, had to cross the Alpon by the bridge of Arcola. Some battalions of Cronatians had been detached thither to watch the country. They were stationed along the river, and had their cannon pointed at the bridge. They received Augereau's advanced guard with a brisk fire of musketry, and made it fall back. Augereau ran up, and brought his troops once more in advance; but the fire from the bridge and the opposite bank again stopped them. He was obliged to give way to this obstacle, and to make a halt.

In the mean time, Alvinzy, who had his eyes fixed upon Verona, and who imagined that the French army was still there, was surprised to hear a very brisk fire amidst the marshes. He never supposed that general Bonaparte could choose such a field, and he imagined that it was a detached regiment of light troops. But his cavalry soon returned to inform him that the action was serious, and that reports of musketry proceeded from all quarters. Without yet being sensible of his situation, he sent off two divisions; one under Provera followed the line of the left-hand dike, the other, under Mitrowski, followed the right-hand dike, and advanced upon Arcola. Masséna, seeing the Austrians approaching, suffered them to advance upon this narrow dike, and when he considered they had advanced too far to retreat, he dashed upon them at a running pace, drove them back, threw them into the marsh, and killed and drowned a great number of them. Mitrowski's division arrived at Arcola, debouched by the bridge, and followed the line of the dike, as Provera's division had done. Augereau rushed upon it, broke it, and threw part of it into the marsh. He made pursuit, and attempted to cross the bridge after it, but the bridge was still better protected than in the morning. A numerous artillery defended its approaches, and the entire remnant of the Austrian line was deployed on the bank of the Alpon, firing on the dike, and firing on it from one side to the other. Augereau seized a flag, and carried it upon the bridge; his soldiers followed, but a tremendous fire drove them back. Generals Lannes, Verne, Bon, and Verdier, were severely wounded. The column fell back, and the soldiers descended to the side of the dike, to get themselves sheltered from the fire.

Bonaparte saw from Ronco the whole hostile army set itself in motion, which at length made sensible of its danger, lost no time in leaving Caldiero, that it might not be taken in the rear at Villa-Nova. He perceived with vexation that great results were eluding his grasp. He had, indeed, sent Guyeux with a brigade to endeavour to cross the Alpon above Arcola; but many hours would elapse before this attempt could be carried into execution; and in the mean time, it was of the utmost importance to cross the Arcola immediately, in order to get in due time at the rear of Alvinzy, and obtain a complete triumph; the fate of Italy depended upon it. He no longer hesitated; he set off at full gallop, came near the bridge, threw himself from his horse, went to the soldiers who were crouching down by the borders of the dike, asked them if they were still the conquerors of Lodi, revived their courage by his words, and seizing a flag cried, "Follow your general!" Hearing his voice, a number of soldiers went up to the causeway and followed him; unfortunately, the movement could not be communicated to the whole column, the rest of which remained behind the dike. Bonaparte advanced carrying the flag in his hand, amidst a shower of balls and grape-shot. All his generals surrounded him. Lannes, who had already received two wounds from musket-shots during the battle, was struck by a third. Young Muiron, the general's aid-de-camp, striving to cover him with his body, fell dead at his feet. The column was nevertheless on the point of clearing the bridge, when a last discharge stopped it, and threw it back. The roar abandoned the advance. The soldiers who still remained with the general then laid hold of him, carried him away amidst the fire and smoke, and insisted on his remounting his horse. An Austrian column debouching upon them, threw them in disorder into the marsh. Bonaparte fell in, and sunk up to the waist. As soon as the soldiers perceived his danger, "Forward," cried they, "to save the general." They ran after Bolland and Vignolles to get him out. They pulled him out of the mud, set him upon his horse again, and returned to Ronco.

At this moment, Guyeux had succeeded in making a passage above Arcola, and in taking the village by the other bank. But he was too late. Alvinzy had already made his artillery and his baggage file off; he had deployed in the plain, and in a manner so as to anticipate Bonaparte's designs. So much heroism and genius thus became inoperative. Bonaparte might, indeed, have avoided the obstacle of Arcola by throwing his bridge over the Adige, a little below Ronco, that is, at Albaredo, the point where the Alpon joins the Adige. But then he would have debouched in the plain, which it was of importance to avoid; and no facilities were afforded him for flying by the left-hand dike to the relief of Verona*. He therefore had good reasons for doing what he had done; and though the success was not perfect, important results had been obtained. Alvinzy had quitted the formidable position of Caldiero; he had descended again into the plain; he no longer threatened Verona; he had lost a great number of men in the marshes. The two dikes had become the only field of battle between the two armies, which gave the advantage to bravery and took it away from numerical strength. Lastly, the French soldiers, animated by the conflict, had recovered all their confidence.

Bonaparte, who had to provide against all dangers at once, had to attend to his left, left at La Corona and Rivoli. As it might every moment be overthrown, he was anxious to possess the means of flying to its assistance. He therefore considered that he ought to fall back from Gombione and Arcola, to recross the Adige at Ronco, and to bivouac on this side of the river, so as to be at hand to succour Vaubois, in case he should in the night receive intelligence of his defeat. Such was this first battle, on the 25th Brumaire (November 15).

The night passed without any bad news. It was known that Vaubois still held out at Rivoli. The exploits of Castiglione protected Bonaparte on that quarter. Davidovich, who commanded a division at the battle of Castiglione, had retained such an impression of that event, that he did not venture to advance without receiving certain intelligence of Alvinzy. Thus the influence of Bonaparte's genius was where he was not personally present. The battle of the 26th (November 16) commenced; the scene of the contest was the two dikes. The French charged with the bayonet, broke through the Austrians, threw a great number of them into the marsh, and made many prisoners. They took colours and cannon. Bonaparte still kept up a fire of musketry on the bank of the Alpon, but he made no decisive attempt to effect a passage. When night came on, he again drew back his columns, took them below the dikes, and collected them on the other bank of the Adige, satisfied with having harassed the enemy the whole day, while waiting for more certain intelligence of Vaubois. The second night was passed in the same manner: the intelligence from Vaubois was encouraging. There was then a third day to be devoted to a decisive conflict with Alvinzy. At length the sun rose for the third time on this frightful theatre of carnage. It was the 27th (November 17). Bonaparte calculated that the enemy could not have lost much less than a third of his army in killed, wounded, drowned, and prisoners. He considered him to be harassed and disheartened, and he saw his own soldiers full of enthusiasm. He then resolved to quit those dikes, and to transfer the field of battle to the plain the other side the Alpon. As on the preceding days, the French, debouching from Ronco, encountered the Austrians on the dikes. Masséna still occupied the left dike; on the dike at the right hand it was general Robert who was directed to attack, while Augereau proceeded to cross the Alpon near its falling into the Adige. Masséna at first experienced an animated defence, but he put his hat on the point of his sword, and marched in that manner at the head of his soldiers. As on the former days, a great number of the enemy were killed, drowned, or taken. On the right-hand dike, general Robert advanced at first with success; but he was killed, and his column repulsed nearly up to the bridge of Ronco.

Bonaparte, who was sensible of the danger, placed the 32nd in a wood of willows which bordered the dike. While the enemy's column, victorious over Robert was advancing, the 32nd suddenly sallied from its ambuscade, took it in flank, and throw it into frightful disorder. These were the three thousand Croats; the greater part of them were slain or made prisoners. The dikes thus cleared, Bonaparte determined to cross the Alpon. Augereau had passed it on the extremity at the right. Bonaparte brought back Masséna from the left-hand dike to the right-hand dike, despatched him to Arcola, which was evacuated, and thus brought his whole army into the plain in front of Alvinzy's army. Bonaparte, before he gave the word to charge, wanted to cause a panic by means of a stratagem. A marsh, overgrown with reeds, covered the left wing of the Austrians; he ordered Hercule, a chef de bataillon, to take with him twenty-five of his guards, to march in single line through the reeds, and to charge unawares with a great blast of trumpets. These twenty-five brave fellows made themselves ready to execute this order. Bonaparte then gave the signal to Masséna and Augereau. These latter vigorously charged the Austrian line, which made a stand; but all at once a great blast of trumpets was heard. The Austrians, conceiving that they were going to be charged by a whole division of cavalry, gave up the field. At that moment the garrison of Legnago, which Bonaparte had ordered to move round upon their rear, showed itself at a distance, and increased their alarm. They then retreated; and after this seventy-two hours' tremendous battle, disheartened and worn out with fatigue, that victory was no longer withheld, so justly due to the heroism of a few thousand brave men, and to the genius of a great commander.

Both armies, exhausted by their exertions, passed the night in the plain. Next morning Bonaparte renewed the pursuit to Vicenza. Arrived at the upper end of the causeway leading from the Brenta to Verona, through Villa-Nova, he left his cavalry alone to pursue the enemy, and thought of returning to Verona, by way of Villa Nova and Caldiero, in order to come up to the relief of Vaubois. Bonaparte received intelligence on the road that Vaubois had been obliged to abandon La Corona and Rivoli, and to fall back to Castel-Novo. He redoubled his speed, and arrived the same evening at Verona, passing over the field of battle which Alvinzy had occupied. He entered the city at the gate opposite to that by which he had left it. When the Veronese saw this handful of men, who had gone forth as fugitives by the Milan gate, re-entering as conquerors by the Venice gate, they were exceedingly surprised. Neither friends or foes could repress their admiration of the general and the soldiers who had so gloriously changed the fortune of the war. From that moment neither party feared or hoped that the French could ever be driven out of Italy. Bonaparte immediately ordered Masséna to march to Castelnovo, and Augereau upon Dolce, along the left bank of the Adige. Davidovich, attacked on all sides, was quickly driven back into the Tyrol, with the loss of a great number of prisoners. Bonaparte contented himself by causing the positions of La Corona and Rivoli to be again occupied, without caring to go up as far as Trent, or resume possession of the Tyrol. The French army was exceedingly reduced by this last conflict. The Austrian army had lost five thousand prisoners, and eight or ten thousand in killed and wounded; but it still found itself upwards of forty thousand strong, inclusive of Davidovich's division. The Austrian army retreated into the Tyrol and to the Brenta, to there rest itself: it was far from having suffered so severely as the armies of Wurmser and Beaulieu. The French, completely worn out, could only repulse but not destroy it. All idea of a pursuit was necessarily abandoned until the promised reinforcements should arrive. Bonaparte satisfied himself by occupying the Adige from Dolce to the sea.

* I here report an observation frequently made to Bonaparte with respect to this famous battle, and the answer he has made thereto in his Memoirs.

This new victory was the occasion of extreme rejoicings both in Italy and in France. That persevering genius, which, with fourteen or fifteen thousand men against forty thousand, had never thought of retreating; that inventive and profound genius, which had the sagacity to discover in the dikes of Ronco a field of battle entirely new, and neutralized numerical strength, and transferred the attack to the flanks of the enemy, became the theme of universal admiration. Every one enlarged upon the heroism displayed at the bridge of Arcola, and the young general was every where depicted with the colours in his hand, amidst fire and smoke. The two councils, in declaring, according to usage, that the army of Italy had deserved well of the country, resolved moreover that the flags which the two generals, Bonaparte and Augereau, had borne upon the bridge of Arcola, should be presented to them, to be preserved in their families: an appropriate and a noble reward, worthy of an heroic age, and far more glorious than the diadem decreed at a later period by weakness to all-powerful genius.

CHAPTER VI.

GENERAL CLARKE AT THE HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF ITALY.—THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE ENGLISH CABINET ABRUPTLY TERMINATED, LORD MALMESBURY TAKES HIS DEPARTURE.—THE IRISH EXPEDITION.—ADMINISTRATIVE OCCUPATIONS OF THE DIRECTORY DURING THE WINTER OF THE YEAR V. FINANCIAL STATE OF THINGS. RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE.—CAPITULATION OF KEHL—THE EXPIRING EFFORTS OF AUSTRIA IN REGARD TO ITALY. VICTORIES OF RIVOLI AND LA FAVORITA. CAPTURE OF MANTUA.—CONCLUSION OF THE MEMORABLE CAMPAIGN OF 1796.

GENERAL CLARKE arrived at the head-quarters of the army of Italy, whence he was to set out for Vienna. His mission was deprived of its essential object, for the battle of Arcola had rendered an armistice of no purpose. Bonaparte, whom general Clarke had orders to consult, totally disapproved of the armistice and its articles. The reasons he gave were excellent. The armistice could have but one object, that of saving the fortress of Kehl on the Rhine, which the archduke Charles was most vigorously besieging; and for this very subordinate object it sacrificed Mantua. All that Kehl presented was a tête de pont, which was by no means indispensable for debouching into Germany. The taking of Mantua, on the contrary, would inevitably lead to the absolute conquest of Italy, and would allow us to demand in return, Mentz and the entire line of the Rhine. The armistice evidently jeopardised this conquest; for Mantua, incumbered with sick, and reduced to half rations, could not delay opening its gates longer than a month. The provisions that would be brought thither would restore health and strength to the garrison. Their quantity could not be exactly ascertained, and Wurmser, by economical arrangements, might husband his stores so as to renew his defence, in case of the resumption of hostilities. The effects of the battles fought to protect the blockade of Mantua would thus become inoperative, and it would have to be recommenced by a new outlay. Nor was this all. The Pope could not fail to be included in the armistice by Austria, and then the French would be deprived of the means of punishing him and wringing from him twenty or thirty millions, of which the army had great need, and which could be made available for a new campaign. Lastly, Bonaparte, looking forward into futurity, advised that, so far from suspending hostilities, to prosecute them with vigour, but to transfer the war to its most appropriate theatre, and to send into Italy a reinforcement of thirty thousand men. He undertook, if this was acceded to, to march to Vienna, and in two months to secure peace, the line of the Rhine, and a republic in Italy. Most assuredly this combination would place in his hands all the military and political operations of the war; but putting out of the question the disinterestedness of the request, it was equitable and profound, and the event proved its wisdom.

Nevertheless, in obedience to the directory, letters were addressed to the Austrian generals on the Rhine and the Adige, to propose an armistice and to obtain passports for Clarke. The archduke Charles answered Moreau that he could not hearken to any proposal for an armistice, that his powers did not permit him so to do, and that he must refer the matter to the Aulic council. Alvinzy made the same answer, and sent off a courier to Vienna. The Austrian minister, secretly devoted to England, had little inclination to listen to the proposals of France. The cabinet of London had acquainted him with the embassy of lord Malmesbury; the English cabinet had done its best to persuade the Austrian minister that the emperor would gain far greater advantages by concurring in the negotiation opened in Paris than by making separate conquests, since the English conquests in the two Indies would be sacrificed to procure for him the restitution of the Netherlands. Besides the insinuations of England, the cabinet of Vienna had other reasons for rejecting the proposals of the directory. It flattered itself that the fortress of Kehl would in a very short time be recaptured; the French, hemmed in along the Rhine, would then no longer be able to cross that river; fresh detachments might then without danger be withdrawn, and sent to the Adige. These detachments, joined to the new levies that were being raised throughout all Austria with wonderful activity, would afford one more attempt upon Italy; and then perhaps that terrible army, which had annihilated so many Austrian battalions, might at last conclude by yielding in its turn to reiterated attacks.

In this instance, therefore, German perseverance was consistent enough, and in spite of so many reverses did not yet abandon its pretensions to fair Italy. It was in consequence resolved not to allow Clarke to come to Vienna. Besides, there was a feeling of apprehension against having a spy in the capital itself, and a direct negotiation was by no means desirable. As for the armistice, the Austrians would have consented to allow it on the Adige, but not on the Rhine. Clarke received for answer, that if he would repair to Vicenza, he would there find the baron de Vincent, with whom he might confer at that place. The conference accordingly took place at Vicenza. The Austrian minister alleged that the emperor could not receive an envoy of the republic, because that would be equivalent to acknowledging it; and as for the armistice, he declared that it was not admissible save in Italy. This proposal was ridiculous, and one cannot conceive how the Austrian minister could make it, for it would save Mantua without saving Kehl, and the French must have been supposed fools indeed to accept it. Nevertheless the Austrian ministry, who wished in case of need to reserve to itself the means of a separate negotiation, caused it to be declared by their envoy, if the French commissioner had proposals to make relative to peace, he had only to go to Turin, and to communicate them to the Austrian ambassador at Piedmont. Thus, owing to the suggestions of England and to the silly hopes of the cabinet of Vienna, the dangerous project of an armistice went off. Clarke went to Turin, in order to avail himself, in case of need, of the means of communication offered to him at the court of Sardinia. But he had another mission, and that was to watch general Bonaparte. The genius of that young man had appeared so extraordinary, his character so peremptory and so energetic, that, without any precise motive, he was supposed to be guilty of ambitious projects. He had wanted to conduct the war just as he pleased, and had tendered his resignation when a plan had been laid down for him that was not his own; he had acted like a sovereign in Italy, granting to princes peace or war under the name of armistices; he had loudly complained because the negotiations with the pope had not been conducted by him alone, and he had insisted that they should be entirely transferred to his control; he had treated the commissioners Garrau and Salicetti with great severity when they had taken upon themselves to carry out measures which he disapproved, and had compelled them to leave the head-quarters; he had taken upon himself to transmit funds to the different armies, without being first authorized by the government, and without availing himself of the indispensable medium of the treasury. All these acts indicated a man who liked to do himself that which he thought he alone could properly perform. This at present was nothing more than the impatience of genius, which cannot bear to be thwarted in its operations; but it is by this impatience of control that a despotic will begins to manifest itself. On seeing him excite Upper Italy against its old masters, and create or destroy states, the saying was that he wanted to make himself duke of Milan. They had a glimmering of his ambition, and he himself had a confused idea of his being open to the accusation. He complained of being accused, and then justified himself, before a single word of the directory had given him occasion so to do.

Clarke then had, besides the office of negotiating, that of watching Bonaparte, who, aware of his errand, and acting in this instance with that haughtiness and tact which were peculiar to him, and letting him perceive that he was acquainted with the object of his mission, in a short time won him over by his ascendancy and his winning behaviour, quite as powerful, it is said, as his genius, and made him a convert to his own opinions. Clarke possessed talent, but he had too much vanity to be a clever and supple spy. He remained in Italy, sometimes at Turin, sometimes at head-quarters, and soon belonged more to Bonaparte than the directory.

At Paris the English cabinet did its utmost to protract the negotiation; but the French cabinet, by returning prompt and explicit answers, had at last obliged lord Malmesbury to make himself clearly understood. That minister had, as we have seen, at first assumed the principle of a general negotiation, and that of a mutual indemnity in respect of conquests; the directory, on its own part, had demanded the powers of all the allies, and a clearer explanation upon the principle of mutual indemnities. The English minister had taken nineteen days to reply; he had at length answered that application had been made for the powers; but before they were produced, it was requisite that the French government should positively admit the principle of mutual indemnities. The directory had then required an immediate declaration of the objects to which the principle of mutual indemnities should extend. It was at this point that the negotiation had stopped. Lord Malmesbury again wrote to London, and after a lapse of twelve days, replied, on the 6th Frimaire (November 26), that his court had nothing to add to what it had already said, and that it could not further explain itself so long as the French government would not formally admit the proposed principle. This was a mere trick; for in demanding a statement of the objects which were to form the subject of indemnity, France had evidently admitted the principle of mutual indemnities. To write to London, and to occupy twelve days more upon this idle distinction, was nothing else than trifling with the directory. The directory replied, as it always did, on the following day, and in a note of four lines stated that its former note necessarily implied the admission of the principle of mutual indemnities, but at any rate it formally admitted that principle, and demanded immediately a specification of the objects to which it was to be applied. The directory further desired to be informed whether, upon every question, lord Malmesbury would be obliged to write to London. Lord Malmesbury vaguely replied, that he should be obliged to write on every occasion that the question required fresh instructions. He again wrote, and remained twenty days before he replied. It was evident this time that he must divest himself of that vagueness in which he had shrouded himself, and at last enter upon the formidable question of the Netherlands. To come to an explanation on that point was to break off the negotiation, and it is generally believed that the English cabinet delayed the rupture as long as possible. At last, on the 28th Frimaire (December 18), lord Malmesbury had an interview with the minister Delacroix, and delivered to him a note in which the claims of the English cabinet were broadly stated. The English cabinet desired that France should restore to the powers of the continent all her conquests, and that she should restore to Austria, Belgium and Luxemburg, and to the empire the German states on the left bank of the Rhine; that she should entirely evacuate Italy, and place it in the statu quo ante bellum; that she should restore to Holland certain portions of territory, such as maritime Flanders, for example, in order to render her independent; and lastly, that changes should be made in her present constitution. The English cabinet would not undertake to restore the Dutch colonies, unless the stadtholder were restored; and still it would not give up all: the English meant to keep some as an indemnity for the war; among these was the Cape. For all these sacrifices it proposed to restore two or three islands which we had lost during the war in the West Indies, Martinique, Saint-Lucia, and Tobago, and again upon condition that we should not retain the whole of Saint-Domingo. Thus France, after an iniquitous war, in which she had all the justice on her side, in which she had expended enormous sums, and from which she had come off victorious, France was not to gain a single province, while the northern powers had just divided a kingdom among them*, and England had been recently making immense acquisitions in India! France, who still occupied the line of the Rhine, and who was mistress of Italy, was to evacuate the Rhine and Italy, at the mere summons of England! Such conditions were absurd, and inadmissible: the simple proposition of them was offensive, and they could not be hearkened to. Delacroix, nevertheless, did listen to them with a politeness which struck the English minister, and which even made him hope that the negotiation might be continued.

Delacroix gave a reason, which was insufficient, namely, that the Netherlands were declared national territory by the constitution; and the English minister replied by a reason which was not a whit better, that the treaty of Utrecht * adjudged them to Austria. The constitution might be obligatory upon the French nation, but it neither concerned or was binding upon foreign nations. The treaty of Utrecht was, like all other treaties in the world, an arrangement of constraint, which forced the power of altering. The only reason which the French minister ought to have given was, that the annexation of the Netherlands to France was just, that it was founded on every principle of natural and political expediency, and justified by conquest. After a long discussion on all the subordinate points of the negotiation, the two ministers separated. Delacroix went to refer the matter to the directory, who justly incensed, resolved to reply to the English minister as he deserved. The note of the English minister was not signed; it was merely enclosed in a signed letter. The directory that same day required that it should be invested with the necessary forms, and demanded his ultimatum within twenty-four hours. Lord Malmesbury, in embarrassment, replied that the note was sufficiently authentic, since it was enclosed in a signed letter, and so far as concerned the ultimatum, it was against all usage to demand an ultimatum in such an off-hand offensive manner. The next day, the 29th Frimaire (December 19th), the directory caused it to be notified to him that it never would hearken to any proposal contrary to the laws and treaties which bound the republic; the directory also added that lord Malmesbury having constantly to refer to his government, and performing a purely passive part in the negotiation, his presence in Paris was of no service; that in consequence he had orders to withdraw himself and his suite within forty-eight hours; moreover, that couriers would suffice for the purposes of negotiation, if the English government adopted the fundamental principles assumed by the French republic.

Thus ended this negotiation, in which the directory, so far from disregarding forms, as hath been represented, set a real example of frankness in its relations with hostile powers. In the present, not a single point of usage was violated. The communications of powers are impressed, like every other relation between individuals, with the character of the time, of the situation, and of the persons who govern. A strong and victorious government speaks in a different tone from that of a weak and vanquished government; and it was more appropriate for a republic, supported by justice and victory, to render its language prompt, distinct, and perfectly open.

During this interval, Hoche's grand design upon Ireland was carried into execution. This was what

* Alluding to the final partition of Poland between Russia, Austria, and Prussia. Trans.

* The articles and objects of this treaty, which bore date in April, 1713, are fully explained in "Koch's Revolutions of Europe," forming a part of the series of "The Popular Library of Modern Authors," p. 113. Trans.

England dreaded, and which would in fact place her in great jeopardy. Notwithstanding the reports industriously spread of an expedition to Portugal or America, England had correctly understood the object of the preparations making at Brest. Pitt had caused the militia to be called out, and the coasts to be armed, and had given orders to retreat from every place in the interior, if the French should land.

Ireland, whither the expedition was directed, was in such a state as to cause serious anxieties. The partisans of parliamentary reform and the Catholics in that island afforded a mass sufficient to produce an insurrection. They would gladly have adopted a republican form of government under the protection of France, and they had sent secret agents to Paris to have a good understanding with the directory. Thus every thing indicated that an expedition might be the occasion of placing England in serious difficulties, and be the means of compelling her to accept a very different sort of peace from that which she had just been offering. Hoche, who had spent the two best years of his life in La Vendée, and who saw the great theatres of war occupied by Bonaparte, Moreau, and Jourdan, burned with impatience to open one for himself in Ireland. England was quite as noble an adversary as Austria, and the honour of fighting against and overcoming her was quite as great. A new republic had sprung up in Italy, and was about to become the focus of liberty in that quarter. Hoche imagined that it would be a glorious as well as a practicable scheme to erect such another in Ireland, by the side of the English aristocracy. He was closely connected with admiral Truguet, secretary of the admiralty, and a minister of comprehensive views. They both pledged each other to raise the navy into importance, and to do great things; for at that time every body's head was in labour, every body was thinking how he could effect prodigies for the glory and happiness of their country. The offensive and defensive alliance concluded with Spain, at Saint Ildefonso, presented extensive resources, and admitted of vast projects. By joining the Toulon squadron with the Spanish fleet, and bringing their united force in the channel to bear in conjunction with that which France had in the [Atlantic] ocean, a very formidable force might be collected, and an attempt be made to open the seas by a decisive engagement: Ireland at least might be set in flames, and the successes of England in India might suffer interruption. Admiral Truguet, sensible of the importance of sending speedy relief to India, desired that the Brest squadron, without waiting for the junction of the French and Spanish fleets in the channel, should immediately set sail, put Hoche's army ashore in Ireland, keep a few thousand men on board, then sail for the Isle of France, take on board the battalions of negroes in training there, and take this reinforcement to India to assist Tippoo Saib. This grand expedition was so far defective in its arrangement in transferring to Ireland no more than a portion of the army belonging to this expedition, and leaving it exposed to great risks, while till the very precarious junction of admiral Villeneuve's squadron which was to sail from Toulon, of the Spanish squadron which was dispersed in the ports of Spain, and of Richerry's squadron, which was returning from America. This expedition was not carried into effect. It waited for admiral Richerry's arrival from America, and notwithstanding the state of the finances, extraordinary exertions were made to complete the fitting out of the Brest squadron. In Frimaire (December) this squadron was ready to sail. It consisted of fifteen sail of the line, twenty frigates, six luggers, and fifty transports, and could carry twenty-two thousand men. Hoche could not agree with admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, and the latter was succeeded by Morard de Galles. The expedition was to land in Bantry Bay. Each of the captains of the ships of the line was furnished with sealed orders, specifying the direction which he was to follow, and the anchorage he was to resort to in case of accident.

The expedition sailed on the 26th Frimaire (December 16), Hoche and Morard de Galles were both on board one frigate. Owing to a thick fog, the French squadron escaped the English cruisers, and crossed the sea unnoticed. But in the night between the 26th and 27th the squadron was dispersed by a violent storm. One ship foundered. However, rear-admiral Bouvet manœuvred for the purpose of rallying the squadron, and succeeded in two days in getting it together with the exception of one man of war and three frigates. Unfortunately, the frigate which bore Hoche and Morard de Galles was one of the latter. The squadron doubled Cape Clear, and manœuvred there several days, waiting for the two commanders. At length, on the 4th Nivôse (December 25th), the squadron entered Bantry Bay. A council of war decided on landing; but this became impracticable on account of the bad weather; the squadron was again borne away from the coasts of Ireland. Rear-admiral Bouvet, daunted by so many obstacles, apprehensive lest he should run short of provisions, and separated from the two commanders-in-chief, felt it his duty to regain the coast of France. Hoche and Morard de Galles at length arrived in Bantry Bay, and there received information of the return of the French squadron. They got back home amidst unparalleled dangers. Tossed by the sea, and chased by the English, it was little short of a miracle that they reached the French shores. The man-of-war Les Droits de l'Homme, captain La Crosse, got separated from the squadron, and performed prodigies: attacked by two English vessels, she destroyed one, and sheered off from the other; but being much damaged, and having lost masts and sails, she could not withstand the violence of the sea. Part of the crew was swallowed up by the waves, the remainder were with difficulty saved.

Thus ended that expedition, which caused great alarm in England, and exposed her weakest point. The directory did not give up all idea of prosecuting this design at a future period, but for the moment turned its whole attention towards the continent, in order to compel, and that without loss of time, Austria to lay down her arms. The troops of the expedition had not suffered much; they were brought on land. A sufficient force was left on the coast to perform the police duty of the country, and the greater part of the army, which had been called the army of the ocean, proceeded towards the Rhine. The two Vendées and Brittany were, at any rate, perfectly tranquilized through the 1797.

Jan.
(Nivôse.)

Licentiousness of the daily press.

THE DIRECTORY.

The state of France in consequence of the financial depression.

681

vigilance and the constant presence of Hoche. An important command was provided for that general, to reward him for his thankless and arduous exertions. The resignation of Jourdan, whom the unsuccessful issue of the campaign had disgusted, and who had been temporarily succeeded by Beurnouville, afforded an opportunity for offering Hoche a compensation which had long been due to his patriotism and his talents.

The winter, already far advanced (it was now Nivôse, January, 1797), had not interrupted this memorable campaign. On the Rhine, the archduke Charles was besieging Kehl and the tête de pont of Huningen; on the Adige, Alvinzy was preparing for one concluding effort against Bonaparte. The interior of the republic was tolerably quiet; the parties had their eyes fixed on the different theatres of the war. The credit and the strength of the government increased or diminished according to the chances of the campaign. The late victory of Arcole had shed a great lustre, and had compensated for the bad effect produced by the retreat of the armies of the Rhine. But after all, this effort of desperate bravery had not completely restored general confidence respecting the possession of Italy. It was well known that Alvinzy was reinforcing himself, and that the pope was fitting out troops; the malignants said that the army of Italy was exhausted; that its general, overwhelmed with the labours of a campaign without precedent, and wasted by an extraordinary disease, could no longer sit his horse. Mantua was not yet taken, and there was room for uneasiness as to what the month of Nivôse (January) would bring forth.

The journals of the two parties, taking unbounded advantage of the liberty of the press, continued to launch forth. Those of the counter-revolution, looking forward to spring, the period for the elections, did their best to agitate opinion, and to incline it in their favour. Ever since the disasters of the royalists in La Vendée, it was clear that their last expedient was to destroy liberty by abusing it, and to usurp the republic by controlling the elections. The directory, witnessing their inactivity, was seized with those movements of impatience, which even the most enlightened government cannot always repress. Although long accustomed to liberty, it was alarmed at the language it uttered in certain journals; it did not yet thoroughly comprehend, that every thing should be spoken out, that falsehood is never to be feared whatever publicity it may gain; that it expends itself by its violence; and that a government perishes by truth alone, and especially by truth repressed. It applied to the two councils for laws respecting the licentiousness of the press. An outcry was raised; it was alleged that, as the elections were at hand, the directory wanted to cramp the freedom of election; the laws which it called for were refused; two articles only were adopted; one relative to the repression of private slander, the other to the hawkers of newspapers in the streets, who, instead of crying them by their titles, announced them by unconnected and frequently very improper expressions. The hawkers of a particular pamphlet for instance, cried about the streets, "Give us back our myriagrammes, and — the camp if you cannot make the people happy." It was settled that, to obviate this scandal, the journals and other publications should not be cried in future but by their simple title. The directory recommended the establishment of an official journal of the government. The five hundred assented to this; the ancients opposed it. The law of the 3rd Brumaire brought a second time under discussion in Vendémiaire, and made the pretext for the ridiculous attack of the patriots on the camp of Grenelle, had been maintained after a solemn debate. It was, in a certain degree, the post around which the two parties were incessantly running against one another. It was that article in particular, which excluded the relatives of emigrants from public offices, the right side wished to annul, and that which the republicans desired to retain. After a third attack, it was decided that this article should be retained. There was but one alteration made in this law. It excluded from the general oblivion accorded to revolutionary misdemeanors, those offences connected with the 13th Vendémiaire; that event was already too remote a date not to indemnify the individuals who might have taken part in it, and who, moreover, enjoyed absolute impunity for the act; the act of oblivion therefore was declared to have reference to the offences of Vendémiaire as well as to all the other purely revolutionary acts.

Thus the directory, and all those who were for the directorial republic, retained a majority in the councils, in spite of the outcries of certain foolish hotheaded patriots, and of some intriguers in the pay of the counter-revolution.

The state of the finances produced the usual effect of inflicting privations in social life, and disturbed the domestic union of the directory with the legislative body. The directory complained that its measures were not always favourably received by the councils; the directory addressed to them a message of alarming import, and published it, as if to make the public misfortunes recoil upon them, if they did not readily adopt its conclusions. The message of the 25th Frimaire was couched in these terms. "Every department of the service is distressed. The pay of the troops is in arrear; the defenders of the country are exposed to the horrors of nakedness; their courage is enervated by the painful feeling of their necessities, the disgust which is the consequence of it, leads to desertion. The hospitals are destitute of furniture, fire, and medicines. The charitable institutions experience the same destitution, and repel the poor and the infirm, whose sole resource they were. The creditors of the state, the contractors, who every day contribute to supply the wants of the armies, are scarcely able to wring but small portions of the sums that are due to them; their distress deters men who could perform the same offices with more punctuality or for less salaries from offering their services. The roads are cut up, the communications interrupted. The public functionaries are without salary; from one end of the republic to the other, judges and administrators may be seen reduced to the horrible alternative either of dragging on with their families a miserable existence, or of degrading themselves by receiving pay from the intriguers. Malignancy is every where in active operation; in many places murder is systematically perpetrated, and the police, without activity, without energy, because it is denuded of pecuniary resources, cannot put a stop to this disorder."

The councils were irritated at the publication of this message, which seemed to throw the blame of the disastrous condition of the state upon them, and sharply censured the indiscretion of the directory. Notwithstanding this, they immediately set about examining its allegations. Money was every where plentiful except in the coffers of the state. The assessed taxes at this time receivable in money or in paper at the current value, came in but slowly. The national property contracted for was paid in part, the payments yet remaining to be made were not yet fallen due. The government lived by expédients. Those who contracted for the treasury warrants received tallies (bordereaux de liquidation), a sort of securities, bearing interest, which were taken only for a very inferior value, and which caused a considerable rise in the price of the markots. Here was again the same situation that we have already so frequently illustrated.

Great improvements were introduced into the finances for the year V. The budget was divided, as we have already seen, into two parts; the ordinary expenses of four hundred and fifty millions, and the extraordinary expenses of five hundred and fifty. The land tax, amounting to two hundred and fifty millions, the sumptuary and personal tax at fifty, the customs, the stamp and registration duties, at one hundred and fifty, were to furnish the four hundred and fifty millions for the ordinary expenditure. The extraordinary expenditure was to be covered by the arrears of the assessed taxes and by the produce of the national property. The taxes were now to be levied entirely in specie. There were still left some mandates and some assignats, which were immediately cancelled, and taken at the current value for the payment of arrears. In this manner the paper money confusion was put an end to. The forced loan was finally closed. It had produced scarcely four hundred millions, effective value. The taxes in arrear were to be paid up before the 15th Frimaire (December 5) of the present year. Distraining brokers were appointed in order to accelerate the collection, lists were ordered to be prepared for the purpose of levying immediately one-fourth of the taxes for the year V. It yet remained to be settled how the value of the national property was to be made available, as there was no longer any paper money for putting it beforehand into circulation. The last sixth of the national estates contracted for was still outstanding. It was settled that in order to anticipate this last payment, there should be required of the purchasers bonds payable in money, falling due at the very period the law required for their discharge, and involving in case of protest the forfeiture of the estate sold. This measure was likely to bring in some eighty millions in bonds, with which the contractors declared they would willingly pay themselves. There was no longer any confidence in the state, but there was with regard to private individuals; and the eighty millions of this personal paper had a value which a paper issued and guaranteed by the republic would never have had. It was settled that the property sold in future should be paid for as follows: One-tenth in ready money, five-tenths down in treasury warrants, or in tallies delivered to contractors; and lastly, the other four-tenths in bonds payable at one per year.

Thus having no longer any public credit, the government availed itself of private credit; being no longer able to issue paper money upon security of the national property, it required of the purchasers of those estates a kind of paper which, bearing their signature, possessed an individual value; and lastly, it allowed the contractors to pay themselves for their services out of the estates themselves.

These arrangements gave hopes of a little order and some returns. To supply the urgent wants of the ministry of war, there was immediately assigned for that service for the months of Nivôse, Pluviose, Ventôse, and Germinal, months devoted to preparations for the new campaign, the sum of one hundred and twenty millions, thirty-three of which were to be taken from the ordinary, and eighty-seven from the extraordinary revenue. The registration, the posts, the customs, the licences, the land tax, were to furnish these thirty-three millions; the eighty-seven of the extraordinary [revenue] were to be composed of the produce of the woods, the arrears of the military levies, and the bonds of the purchasers of national property. These securities were of known value, and they were going to be paid up forthwith. All the public officials were paid in money. It was decided that the life annuitants should be paid in the same manner; but not having money to give them, they were paid by notes to bearer, receivable in payment for national property, much in the same manner as the treasury warrants and the tallies delivered to the contractors.

Such were the administrative operations of the directory during the winter of the year V. (1796, 1797), and the means which it prepared, in order to provide for the ensuing campaign. The present campaign had not yet terminated, and every thing indicated that notwithstanding ten months' hard fighting, and in spite of ice and snow, there would still be fresh battles. The archduke Charles was bent on carrying the têtes de pont of Kehl and Huningen, as if, in possessing himself of them, he should for ever prevent the French from returning on the right bank. The directory had an excellent reason for keeping him there, namely, to prevent him from proceeding to Italy. He spent nearly three months before the fortress of Kehl. On both sides the troops distinguished themselves by heroic courage, and the generals of division displayed extraordinary practical talent. Desaix, in particular, immortalized himself by his intrepidity, his coolness, and his skillful arrangements around that miserably intrenched fort. The conduct of the two commanders-in-chief was far from being so highly approved of as that of their lieutenants. Moreau was accused of not having done the best with his army, and for not having debouched on the right bank to fall upon the besieging army. The archduke was censured for having expended such exertions on a tête de pont. Moreau surrendered Kehl on the 20th Nivôse, year V. (January 9, 1797); it was no great loss. Our long defence proved the solidity of the line of the Rhine. The troops had not suffered much, Moreau had employed the time in perfecting their complete discipline; his army appeared in the finest order. The army of the 1797.

Jan.
(Nivôse)

Marshal Wurmser besieged in Mantua.

THE DIRECTORY.

Bonaparte preparing for the final struggle with Italy.

683

Sambre and Meuse, transferred to the command of Beurnonville, had not been usefully employed during these latter months; but it had been taking rest, and was reinforced with fresh detachments from La Vendée. This army had now for its leader a celebrated commander, Hoche, who had been at last called to a war worthy of his talents. Thus the directory, although it no longer was master of Mentz and had lost Kehl, might still consider itself as powerful upon the Rhine. The Austrians, for their part, were proud of having taken Kehl, and they now directed all their efforts against the tête de pont of Huningen. But the thoughts of the emperor and of his ministers were solely occupied with regard to Italy. The administration had made extraordinary exertions to reinforce Alvinzy's army, and in preparing for a final struggle. The troops had been sent off post-haste. The whole garrison of Vienna had been despatched to the Tyrol. The inhabitants of the capital, in their extreme attachment to the imperial house, had furnished four thousand volunteers, who were formed into regiments under the style of the Vienna volunteers. The empress had presented them with colours, embroidered with her own hands. A new levy had been made in Hungary, and some thousand of the best troops of the empire had been drawn from the Rhine. Owing to this most meritorious activity, Alvinzy's army had been reinforced by about twenty thousand men, and now amounted to upwards of sixty thousand. This army had taken its rest, and been reorganized; and though it contained some recruits, it was chiefly composed of veteran troops. The battalion of Vienna volunteers was formed of young men, to whom, it is true, war was new; but as members of good families, they were animated with noble sentiments, thoroughly devoted to the imperial house, and were ready to display the greatest bravery.

The Austrian ministers were on good terms with the pope, and had prevailed upon him to resist the threats of Bonaparte. They had sent him Colli and some other officers to command his army, and had recommended to him to make it advance as near as possible to Bologna and Mantua. They had apprised Wurmser that he would be speedily relieved, but that he was not to surrender; and should he be reduced to extremity, he was to leave Mantua with all the troops, and especially all the officers, to throw himself across the Bolognese and the Ferrarese into the Roman states, to join the papal army, and to organize and bring it to bear upon the rear of Bonaparte. This plan, so well conceived, might very possibly have succeeded with so brave a general as Wurmser. This old marshal still held out in Mantua with great firmness, though his garrison had nothing to eat but salted horseflesh and polenta.

Bonaparte was awaiting this last struggle, which was to decide for ever the fate of Italy, and made good preparations to meet it. In fact, as reported in Paris by the malignants, who desired the degradation of our armies, he was afflicted with a cutaneous disorder, which had been improperly treated, and contracted at Toulon by charging a cannon with his own hands. This disease, not well understood, joined to the unheard-of fatigues of this campaign, had extremely weakened him. He could scarcely sit his horse; his cheeks were hollow and livid. His personal appearance was attenuated; his eyes alone, still bright and piercing as ever, indicated that the fire of his soul was not extinguished. His physical proportions even exhibited, when put in comparison with his genius and celebrity, a singular and striking contrast, amusing to soldiers, who are at the same time jovial and enthusiastic. Notwithstanding the decline of his strength, his extraordinary energy supported him, and imparted an activity which was applied to all objects at once. He had begun what he called the war against the thieves. Intriguers of all kinds had hastened to Italy, for the purpose of introducing themselves into the administration of the armies, and getting what they could out of the superabundance of that fine country. While simplicity and indigence prevailed in the armies of the Rhine, luxury had introduced itself into the army of Italy; the luxury indeed of that army equalled its glorious achievements. The soldiers, well clothed and well fed, were every where cordially received by the handsome Italian women, and lived in pleasures and abundance. The officers and the generals partook of the general profusion, and laid the foundation of their fortunes. As for the contractors, they displayed a scandalous licentiousness, and purchased with the produce of their extortions the favours of the most beautiful actresses of Italy. Bonaparte, who possessed within himself every passion, but who at that moment was entirely absorbed by one passion, that of glory, lived in a simple and austere manner, seeking no pleasure save in the society of his wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, and who had come, at his desire, to his head-quarters. Indignant at the disorders of the administration, he carefully looked into petty details, personally audited the accounts of the companies, detected dishonest administrators, and caused them to be rigidly prosecuted. He reproached them, in particular, with want of courage, and with leaving the army in the hour of danger. He recommended to the directory to select men of tried energy; he proposed the institution of a syndicate, which, trying like a jury, should have power, on its simple [moral] conviction, to punish those offences of which legal proof could not be obtained. He willingly allowed his soldiers and generals enjoyments which were not in their case the indulgences of Capua; but he bore an implacable hatred to all those who enriched themselves at the expense of the army, without administering to its wants by their acts or their diligence. He had applied the same attention and activity with respect to his relations with the Italian powers. Still dissembling with Venice, whose armaments he saw preparing in the lagoons and in the mountains of the Bergamasco, he deferred all explanation till after the surrender of Mantua. He caused his troops to temporarily take possession of the castle of Bergamo, which had a Venetian garrison, and assigned as a reason that he did not think it sufficiently guarded to resist a sudden attack of the Austrians. He thus secured himself against treachery, and overawed the numerous enemies whom he had in Bergamo. In Lombardy and the Cispadane republic he continued to favour the spirit of liberty, repressing the Austrian and papal party, and keeping within bounds the democratic party, which in every country needs constraint. He maintained friendly relations with the king of Sardinia and the duke of Parma. He went in person to Bologna, to terminate a negotiation with the duke of Tuscany, and to overawe the court of Rome. The duke of Tuscany was annoyed at the presence of the French in Leghorn; questions and warm debates had arisen between the merchants of Leghorn with respect to the merchandise belonging to traders enemies of France. These discussions produced violent animosity; besides, the merchandise, rescued with great difficulty, had been carelessly sold, and that by a company who had recently plundered the army of five or six millions. Bonaparte preferred to make his arrangements with the grand duke. It was agreed that in consideration of two millions, he should evacuate Leghorn. By this means he had the garrison of that city more completely at his own disposal. His intention was to take the two legions formed by the Cispadane republic, to unite them with the garrison of Leghorn, to add to them three thousand of his troops, and to despatch this little army towards the Romagna and the March of Ancona. He meant to take possession of two more provinces of the Roman states, and there lay his hand upon the demesnes of the pope, put a stop upon the taxes there, and thus pay himself for the levy which had not been discharged, take hostages selected from the party inimical to France, and thus establish a natural defence between the states of the church and Mantua. By this he would render the plan of a junction between Wurmser and the papal army impracticable; he could overawe the pope, and oblige him at last to submit to the conditions of the republic. Giving vent to his ill temper against the holy see, he even had thoughts of never being reconciled with her, and wished to make an entirely new division of Italy. He would have restored Lombardy to Austria; he would have formed a powerful republic, by adding Romagna, the March of Ancona, and the Duchy of Parma to the Modenese, the Bolognese, and the Ferrarese: Rome would have been in this case assigned to the duke of Parma, which would have given great pleasure to Spain, and have compromised the most catholic of all the powers. He had already begun to carry his design into execution; and had betaken himself to Bologna with three thousand men, and from thence threatened the holy see, which had already formed the nucleus of an army. But the pope, now certain of a new Austrian expedition, hoping to communicate by the Lower Po with Wurmser, defied the threats of the French general, and even manifested a wish to see him advance still further into his dominions. The holy father, it was said at the Vatican, would, if necessary, quit Rome in order to seek protection at the extremity of his territories. The further Bonaparte should advance, and remove himself from the Adige, the more dangerous would his situation be, and so much the more favourable would be the chances for the holy cause. Bonaparte, who was quite as cautious as the Vatican, took good care not to march to Rome; all he cared to do was to threaten, and he always had his eye upon the Adige, expecting every moment a new attack. On the 19th Nivôse (January 8, 1797) he actually received intelligence that an action had taken place on all his advanced posts; he immediately recrossed the Po with two thousand men, and hastened in person to Verona.

Since the affair of Arcola, his army had received the reinforcements which it ought to have received before that battle. As the winter was over, his sick had left the hospitals; he had about forty-five thousand effective men under arms. Their distribution were still the same. About ten thousand men were blockading Mantua, under Serrurier; thirty thousand were in observation on the Adige. Augereau occupied Legnago; Masséna, Verona; Joubert, who had succeeded Vauchois, kept Rivoli and La Corona. Rey, with a division of reserve, was at Dezenzano, on the border of the lake of Garda. The other four or five thousand men were either in the citadels of Bergamo and Milan, or in the Cispadane republic. The Austrians were advancing with sixty and some odd thousand men, and had twenty thousand in Mantua, at least twelve thousand of whom were under arms. Thus, in this conflict as in the preceding, the proportion of the enemy was as two to one. The Austrians on the present occasion ventured on a new system. They had tried all the routes for attacking the double line of the Mincio and the Adige. At the time of the battle of Castiglione they had descended along both shores of the lake of Garda, by the two valleys of the Chiese and of the Adige. Subsequently, they had debouched by the valley of the Adige and by that of the Brenta, making their attack by Rivoli and Verona. They had now modified their plan in conformity with their arrangements with the pope. The principal attack was to be made by the Upper Adige, with forty-five thousand men under the command of Alvinzy. A subordinate attack, and independent of the former, was to be made with nearly twenty thousand men, under the command of Provera, by the Lower Adige, with a view to communicate with Mantua, Romagna, and the army of the pope.

Alvinzy's attack was to be the principal one; it was strong enough to hope for success on this point, and it would have to be pushed without any consideration of what might befall Provera. We have already described the three routes which issue from the mountains of the Tyrol. That which turned behind the lake of Garda had been disused ever since the affair at Castiglione; the others were to be followed. The one, running between the Adige and the lake of Garda, passed through the mountains which separate the lake from the river, and there came upon the position of Rivoli; the other, running outside the river, debouched on the plain of Verona outside the French line. Alvinzy selected that which passed between the river and the lake, and which went as far as the French line. It was therefore upon Rivoli that his attack was to be pointed. Now let us survey this ever memorable position. The chain of Monte Baldo divides the lake of Garda from the Adige. The high road winds between the Adige and the foot of the mountains, to the extent of some leagues. At Incanale the river washes the very base of the mountains, and leaves no room whatever for proceeding along its bank. The road then leaves the banks of the river, rises by a kind of zig zag direction round the sides of the mountain, and debouches upon an extensive elevated plain (plateau), which is that of Rivoli. It overlooks the Adige on one side, and is encompassed on the other by the amphitheatre of Monte Baldo. An army in position on this plateau commands the winding road by which the ascent to it is made, and sweeps by its fire both banks of the Adige to a great distance. It is very difficult to storm this plateau in front, since you must clamber up the narrow zigzag road before you can reach it. Therefore no one would attempt to attack it by that single way. Before arriving at Incanale, other roads lead to Monte Baldo, and ascending its long and sloping acclivities terminate at the plateau of Rivoli. They are not passable either for cavalry or for artillery, but they afford easy access to foot soldiers, and may be made available for conveying a considerable force in infantry upon the flanks and rear of the body defending the plateau. Alvinzy's plan was to attack the position by all the outlets at once.

On the 23rd Nivôse (January 12), Alvinzy attacked Joubert, who kept all the advanced positions, and forced him back upon Rivoli. The same day, Provera pushed two advanced guards, the one upon Verona, the other upon Legnago, by Caldiero and Bevilacqua. Masséna, who was at Verona, sallied forth, overthrew the advanced guard, coming right before him, and made nine hundred prisoners. At that very moment, Bonaparte arrived upon the spot from Bologna. He drew back the entire division to Verona, to keep it in readiness for marching. In the night, he received intelligence that Joubert was attacked and forced at Rivoli, and that Augereau, before Legnago, had observed considerable forces. He could not yet judge upon what point the enemy would direct his principal mass. He still kept Masséna's division ready to march, and ordered Rey's division, which was at Dezenzano, and which had not observed any enemy debouching from behind the lake of Garda, to proceed to Castel-Novo, the most central point between the Upper and the Lower Adige. Next day, the 24th (January 13), couriers came in one after another. Bonaparte was informed that Joubert, attacked by immense forces, was likely to be surrounded, and that it was owing only to the obstinacy and the success of his resistance that he was yet able to preserve the plateau of Rivoli: Augereau sent him a message from the Lower Adige that a fire of musketry was kept up along both banks, but that no event of importance had taken place. Bonaparte had not more than about two thousand Austrians before him at Verona. From that moment he guessed what the enemy was at, and he saw clearly that the principal attack was directed against Rivoli. He thought that Augereau would be sufficient to defend the Lower Adige; he reinforced him with a corps of cavalry, detached from Masséna's division. He ordered Serrurier, who was blockading Mantua, to send his reserve to Villa-Franca, that it might be stationed at intervals with reference to each point. He left a regiment of infantry, and one of cavalry, at Verona; and set out in the night between the 24th and 25th (January 13 and 14), with the 18th, 32nd, and 75th demi-brigades of Masséna's division, and two squadrons of cavalry. He sent a message to Rey not to stop at Castel-Novo, but to get with all possible speed up to Rivoli. He got forwards before his divisions, and arrived at Rivoli at two in the morning. The weather, which had been rainy for some days, had now cleared up. The sky was clear, the moon shone brightly, and it was bitter cold. On his arrival, Bonaparte beheld the whole horizon in a blaze with the enemy's fires. He reckoned him to have forty-five thousand men; Joubert had ten thousand at most: it was high time that some assistance should come up. The enemy had divided himself into three bodies. The principal, composed of a strong column of grenadiers, the whole of the cavalry, the whole of the artillery, and the baggage, proceeded under Quasdanovich, along the high road between the river and Monte Baldo, and was to debouch by the zigzag road of Incanale. Three other divisions, under the command of Oeskey, Koblos, and Liptai, solely composed of infantry, had climbed the steep and long slopes of the mountains, and were to get to the field of battle by descending the steps of the amphitheatre formed by Monte Baldo round the plateau of Rivoli. A fourth division, under the command of Lusignan, winding round the side of the plateau, was to station itself on the rear of the French army, to cut it off from the road to Verona. Lastly, Alvinzy had detached a sixth division, which, from its position, had no connexion with the operation. It marched on the other side of the Adige, and followed the road running outside along the river through Roveredo, Dolce, and Verona. This division, commanded by Wukassovich, could at most send a few balls upon the field of battle by firing from one bank across to the other.

Bonaparte instantly perceived that he must keep the plateau at any rate. He had in front the Austrian infantry descending the amphitheatre, without a single piece of cannon; on his right he had the grenadiers, the artillery, the cavalry, advancing along the road by the river, and ready to debouch by the zigzag road of Incanale on his right flank. On his left, Lusignan was getting to the rear of Rivoli. The balls of Wukassovich, launched from the other side of the river, reached his advanced guard. Posted on the plateau, he prevented the junction of the different divisions. He played with his artillery upon the infantry, deprived of its cannon, and drove back the cavalry and artillery, crowded together in a narrow winding road. He did not concern himself as to the exertions Lusignan made to get at his rear, or that Wukassovich was firing some few cannon balls in the direction. Having resolved upon his plan with his accustomed promptness, he commenced his operations before daylight. Joubert had been obliged to keep his men close together, so that he should not occupy a greater space than would suffice for his strength; and it was apprehended that the infantry, descending the steps of Monte Baldo, would not effect its junction with the advanced guard of the column climbing up by Incanale. Bonaparte, long before daylight, ordered Joubert's troops, which, after forty-eight hours' fighting, were taking a little rest, to be roused. He made them attack the advanced posts of the Austrian infantry, drove them back, and extended himself more widely upon the plateau.

The action became extremely brisk. The Austrian infantry, having no cannon, retreated before our infantry provided with its formidable artillery, and fell back in a semicircle upon the amphitheatre of Monte Baldo. But, at this moment, an unfortunate event happened on our left. Liptai's division, which kept the extremity of the enemy's semicircle, fell upon Joubert's left, composed of the 89th and 25th demi-brigades, surprised them, broke them, and compelled them to retire in disorder. The 14th, coming immediately after these two demi-brigades, formed en croquet to cover the rest of the line, and made a most admirable stand; the Austrians put forth all their strength against it, and were nearly overwhelming it. In particular, they tried hard to take its cannon, the horses attached to which had been killed. They had already reached the pieces, when an officer exclaimed, "Grenadiers of the 14th, will you let them take your guns?" Fifty men immediately rushed forward after the brave officer, repulsed the Austrians, harnessed themselves to the pieces, and drew them back.

Bonaparte perceiving the danger, left Berthier on the threatened point, and set out at a gallop for Rivoli to procure relief. Masséna's first troops had scarcely come up, after marching all night. Bonaparte took the 32nd, already distinguished by its exploits during the campaign, and brought it to bear upon the left, so as to rally the two demi-brigades which had given way. The intrepid Masséna advanced at its head, rallied behind him the broken troops, and overthrew all before him. He repulsed the Austrians, and placed himself by the side of the 14th, which had not ceased to perform prodigies of valour. The fight was thus kept up on this point, and the army occupied the semicircle of the plateau. But the momentary check of the left wing had obliged Joubert to fall back with the right; he gave ground, and already the Austrian infantry was a second time nearing that point which Bonaparte had such an object in compelling him to abandon; in fact, the Austrian infantry was about getting up to the outlet by which the winding road of Lucanalle led to the plateau. At this moment, the column composed of artillery and cavalry, and preceded by several battalions of grenadiers, ascending the winding road, and with incredible efforts of bravery, repulsed the 29th. Wukassovich, from the other bank of the Adige, sent a shower of cannon balls to protect this kind of escalade. Already had the grenadiers climbed the summit of the defile, and the cavalry was debouching in their train upon the plateau. This was not all. Lusignan's column, whose fires had been seen at a distance, and who had been perceived on the left, getting to the rear of the position of the French, were now coming up to their rear, in order to cut them off from the road to Verona, and to stop Rey, who was coming from Castel-Novo with the division of reserve. Lusignan's soldiers finding themselves on the rear of the French army, already clapped their hands, and considered it as taken. Thus, on this plateau, closely pressed in front by a semicircle of infantry, pressed on the rear on the left by a strong column, sealed on the right by the main body of the Austrian army, and galled by the cannon balls which came from the opposite bank of the Adige in the direction of this plateau, Bonaparte was alone with Joubert's and Masséna's divisions in the midst of a cloud of enemies. In fact, he was with sixteen thousand men, surrounded by forty thousand at least.

At this anxious moment, Bonaparte was not shaken; he retained all the fire and all the vivacity of inspiration. On seeing Lusignan's Austrians, he said, "Those are ours," and he allowed them to engage without giving himself any concern about their movement. The soldiers, conjecturing what their general meant, experienced the same confidence, and also repeated to one another, "They are ours!"

At this moment Bonaparte did not concern himself with more than what was passing before him. His left was protected by the heroism of the 14th and the 32nd. His right was threatened at once by the infantry which had resumed the offensive, and by the column that was scaling the plateau. He immediately directed decisive movements to be effected. A battery of light artillery and two squadrons, under two brave officers, Leclerc and Laselle, were ordered to the outlet of which the enemy had taken possession. Joubert, who, with the extreme right, had this outlet at his back, suddenly faced about with a corps of light infantry. All charged at once. The artillery first poured a discharge upon all that had debouched; the cavalry and the light infantry then charged with vigour. Joubert's horse was killed under him; he got up nowise daunted, and rushed upon the enemy with a musket in his hand. All that had debouched, grenadiers, cavalry, artillery, all were hurled pêle mêle headlong down the winding road of Lucanalle. The confusion was awful; some pieces of cannon firing down into the defile, augmented the terror and the confusion. At every step, the French killed and made prisoners. Having cleared the plateau of the assailants who had scaled it, Bonaparte again returned to his attacks against the infantry which was ranged in semicircle before him, and set Joubert upon it with the light infantry, and Laselle with two hundred hussars. On this new attack, consternation seized that infantry, now deprived of all hope of effecting a junction with the main body; it fled in confusion. Our whole semicircular line then moved from right to left, drove back the Austrians against the amphitheatre of Monte Baldo, and pursued them as far as possible into the mountains. Bonaparte then returned, and proceeded to realize his prediction upon Lusignan's division. That body, on witnessing the disasters of the Austrian army, soon perceived what would be its own fate. Bonaparte, after firing upon it with grape-shot, ordered the 18th and the 75th demi-brigades to charge. These brave demi-brigades moved onwards, singing the chant du départ, and drove Lusignan along the Verona road, by which Rey was coming up with the reserve division. The Austrian corps at first made a stand, then retreated, and came full butt upon the advanced guard of Rey's division. Terrified at this sight, it sought the clemency of the conqueror, and laid down its arms, to the number of four thousand men. Two thousand had been taken in the defile of the Adige.

It was now five o'clock, and it may be said that the Austrian army was annihilated. Lusignan was taken; the infantry that had advanced from the mountains was taking flight over rugged declivities; the principal column was pent up on the bank of the river, while the subordinate division of Wukassovich was an idle spectator of the disaster, separated by the Adige from the field of battle. This great victory did not confuse Bonaparte's ideas; he now turned his attention to the Lower Adige, which he had left exposed; he judged that Joubert, with his brave division, and Rey with the reserve division, would be well able to give the finishing blow to the enemy, and to take from him thousands of prisoners. He rallied Masséna's division, which had fought the preceding day at Verona, which had then marched all night, and again fought the whole of the 26th (14th), and he set out with it, to march the whole of the following night, and to hurry away to new battles. These brave soldiers, with joyful faces, and reckoning upon fresh victories, seemed to be incapable of fatigue. They flew, rather than marched, to protect Mantua, from which city they were fourteen leagues distant.

Bonaparte received intelligence by the way of what was passing on the Lower Adige. Provera getting away from Augereau, had thrown a bridge at Anguillari, a little above Legnago; he had left Hohenzollern beyond the Adige, and marched to Mantua with nine or ten thousand men. Augereau, apprised too late, had nevertheless followed close upon him, taken him in rear, and made two thousand prisoners. But Provera himself, with seven or eight thousand men, was continuing his march towards Mantua, in order to join the garrison. Bonaparte learned these particulars at Castel-Novo. He was fearful lest the garrison, on hearing of them, should sally forth, and co-operate with the division that was coming up, and place the blockade division between two fires. He had marched the whole night between the 25th and 26th (14th and 15th), with Masséna's division; he made it continue its march the entire of the day of the 26th (15th), so that it might arrive in the evening before Mantua. Moreover he directed thither the reserves, which he had left on his road to Villa-Franca, and hastened thither himself to make his arrangements.

That same day, the 26th (15th), Provera had come up before Mantua. He presented himself before the suburb of Saint George, in which Miollis with at most fifteen hundred men had been stationed. Provera summoned him to surrender. The brave Miollis replied by a discharge of his artillery. Provera, repulsed, betook himself to the side nearest the citadel, in the expectation of a sally from Wurmser; but he found Serrurier before him. He halted at the palace of La Favorita, between Saint George and the citadel, and hastily despatched a boat across the lake, to tell Wurmser to debouch from the place on the following morning. Bonaparte arrived in the evening, posted Augereau on the rear of Provera, and Victor and Masséna on his flanks, so as to cut him off from the citadel, by which Wurmser would have to debouch. He posted Serrurier facing Wurmser. Next morning, the 27th Nivôse (January 16th), at daybreak, the battle commenced. Wurmser debouched from the place and attacked Serrurier with fury; the latter made a gallant defence, and kept him back along the lines of circumvallation. Victor, at the head of the 57th, which, on that day, received the name of the Terrible, rushed upon Provera, and carried all before him. After an obstinate conflict, Wurmser was driven back into Mantua. Provera, hunted like a deer, surrounded by Victor, Masséna, and Augereau, annoyed by a sally of Miollis, laid down his arms, with six thousand men. The young Vienna volunteers followed their example. After an honourable defence, they surrendered their arms, together with the colours embroidered by the hands of the empress herself.

Such was the last act of that memorable operation, which is considered by military men as one of the best conducted ever recorded in history. It was found that Joubert, in his pursuit of Alvinzy, had also taken from him seven thousand prisoners. Six thousand had been taken on the day of the battle of Rivoli, which made thirteen thousand; Augereau had taken two thousand; Provera had surrendered six thousand; one thousand had been picked up before Verona, and some hundreds elsewhere, which made the total number in three days amount to twenty-two or twenty-three thousand men. Masséna's division had marched and fought without intermission for four days, marching all night and fighting all day. Thus Bonaparte wrote with justifiable pride that his soldiers had surpassed the so much vaunted rapidity of Cæsar's legions. It can be easily understood at a later period why he attached to the name of Masséna that of Rivoli. The action of the 25th (January 14) was called the battle of Rivoli; that of the 27th (16th), before Mantua, the battle of La Favorita.

Thus in three days again, Bonaparte had taken or destroyed half of the enemy's army, and had, as it were, stricken it with a thunderbolt. Austria had made her expiring effort, and now Italy was ours. Wurmser, driven back into Mantua, was without hope; he had eaten all his horses, and the garrison was perishing from the joint effects of disease and famine. To have stood out any longer would have been not only useless, but trifling with human life. The veteran marshal had exhibited a noble courage and an uncommon resolution; he could now think of surrendering himself. He sent one of his officers to Serrurier to treat; this was Klenau. Serrurier referred to the commander-in-chief, who repaired to the conference. Bonaparte, wrapped in his cloak, without making himself known, listened to the conversation between Klenau and Serrurier. The Austrian officer expatiated largely on the resources which his general still had left, and declared that he had yet provisions for three months. Bonaparte, muffled up as before, approached the table at which the conference was held, snatched the paper on which Wurmser's propositions were written, and commenced making certain notes on the margin, without uttering a single word, and to the great astonishment of Klenau, who could not conceive what this unknown person was about. Afterwards rising and throwing off his cloak, Bonaparte stepped up to Klenau. "There," said he, "are the conditions which I grant to your marshal. If he had but a fortnight's provisions and could talk of surrender, he would not deserve an honourable capitulation. As he sends you, it must be that he is reduced to extremity. I respect his age, his intrepidity, and his misfortunes. Take him the conditions which I grant. Whether he leaves the place to-morrow, in a month, or in six months, he shall have neither better nor worse conditions. He can stay as long as may be consistent with his honour."

By this language and this tone Kléau recognized the illustrious commander, and hastened to take Wurmser the terms that had been offered him. The old marshal was very grateful for the generosity which his young adversary exhibited towards him. Bonaparte had given him permission to march freely out of the place with all his staff; he even allowed him two hundred horse, five hundred men, chosen by himself, and six pieces of cannon, to render his departure the less humiliating. The garrison was to be conducted to Trieste, and there exchanged against French prisoners. Wurmser readily accepted these conditions; and to testify his gratitude to the French general, he informed him of a plot hatched in the papal states to poison him. He was to quit Mantua on the 14th Pluviôse (February 2). His consolation was, that on leaving Mantua, he should deliver up his sword to the conqueror himself; but he found only the brave Soururier, before whom he was obliged to file off with his whole staff. Bonaparte had already set out for Romagna, to chastise the pope and punish the Vatican. His vanity, as gigantic as his genius, did not evince itself in him as it would in ordinary minds; he far preferred being absent than present at the place of triumph.

Mantua having surrendered, Italy was absolutely conquered, and this campaign was terminated.

In generally reviewing the events of this campaign, the imagination is struck by the multitude of the battles, the fertility of ideas, and the immensity of the results. Bonaparte entering Italy with some thirty thousand men, first cuts off the Piedmontese from the Austrians at Montenotte and Millesimo, completes the destruction of the former at Mondovi, then hastens after the latter, crosses the Po at Piacenza before their face and the Adda at Lodi, makes himself master of Lombardy, halts there an instant, again marches onward, finds the Austrians reinforced on the Mincio, and puts the finishing stroke to their destruction at the battle of Borghetto. There he seizes at a glance the plan of his future operations. It is on the Adige that he must establish himself to make head against the Austrians. As for the princes on his rear, he would content himself by quieting them with negotiations and threats. A second army is sent against him under Wurmser; he cannot beat it unless by rapidly concentrating his forces, and alternately attacking each of his separate masses; as a resolute man, he sacrifices the blockade of Mantua, crushes Wurmser at Lonato and at Castiglione, and drives him into the Tyrol. Wurmser is again reinforced, as Beaulieu had been. Bonaparte anticipated him in the Tyrol; ascends the Adige, overturns all before him at Roveredo, throws himself across the valley of the Brenta; cuts off Wurmser, who expected to perform the same manœuvre against him, fairly throws him at Bassano, and coops him up at Mantua. This is the second Austrian army destroyed after being reinforced.

Bonaparte, still negotiating and threatening the banks of the Adige, awaits the third army. It is formidable; it arrives before he has received reinforcements; he is obliged to give way before it; he is reduced to despair; he is about to succumb, when he discovers in the midst of an impassable morass, two lines debouching upon the enemy's flanks, and casts himself upon them with incredible audacity. He is again victor at Arcola. But the enemy is only checked—not destroyed; he returns, for the last time, and stronger than at first. On the one hand he descends from the mountains; on the other he advances along the Lower Adige. Bonaparte discovers the only point where the Austrian columns, winding through a mountainous country, can form a junction, dashes upon the celebrated plateau of Rivoli, and from that plateau confounds the main army of Alvinzy; then resuming his flight towards the Lower Adige, surrounds the whole column that had crossed it. His last operation is the most brilliant, for here good fortune was associated with talent. Thus, in ten months, besides the Piedmontese army, three formidable armies, thrice reinforced, had been destroyed by one, which, only thirty and a few odd thousand strong on taking the field, had received only about twenty thousand to repair its losses. Thus fifty-five thousand French had beaten more than two hundred thousand Austrians, taken more than eighty thousand, killed and wounded more than twenty thousand. They had fought twelve pitched battles, and more than sixty actions, and crossed several rivers, in defiance of the waves and the enemy's fire. When war is a purely mechanical routine, consisting only in driving and slaughtering the enemy you have before you, it is scarcely worth recording as history; but when one of those conflicts occur, where a mass of men are observed to be impelled by one absorbing and vast conception, which displays itself amidst the roar of cannon with as much distinctness as any idea of Newton or Descartes in the solitude of the closet, this is a matter worth the attention of the philosopher, as well as of the statesman and the soldier; and if this identification of the multitude with a single individual, who originates force at its highest impulse, is available for the defence and protection of a noble cause, that of liberty, then the scene becomes as much a subject for reflection as it is elevated.

Bonaparte now hurried on to new designs. He bent his steps towards Rome, to put an end to the shuffling at that court of priests, and to return, not to the Adige, but to Vienna. He had by his successes brought back the war to its appropriate theatre, Italy, from whence he could drop down upon the emperor's hereditary dominions. The government, who understood the motive and object of his achievements, sent him reinforcements to enable him to proceed to Vienna, and to dictate a glorious peace in the name of the French republic. The conclusion of the campaign had realized all the hopes to which its opening had given rise.

The triumphs of Rivoli had raised the joy of the patriots to the highest pitch. These twenty-two thousand prisoners were in every body's mouth, and the certificate of the authorities of Milan, who had reviewed them and certified their number, in order to silence all the doubts of malevolence, were cited in corroboration. The surrender of Mantua next came to fill the measure of public satisfaction. From that moment the conquest of Italy was considered as absolute. The courier who brought these tidings arrived in the evening in Paris. The garrison was immediately assembled, and the intelligence published by torchlight, to the sound of trumpets and shouts of joy, from every Frenchman attached to his country. Ah! days long to be remembered and ever to be regretted by us! At what period was our country greater and more glorious! The storms of the revolution seemed to be succeeded by a calm; the discontented murmurs of the parties sounded like the expiring gusts of the tempest. These remains of agitation were considered as the very life of a free state. Trade and finance were emerging from a tremendous crisis; the entire soil, restored to industrious hands, was now to be rendered productive. A government composed of citizens, our equals, ruled the republic with moderation; the best were selected to succeed them. The great roads were open. France, at the height of power, was mistress of the soil extending from the Rhine to the Pyrenees, and from the sea to the Alps. Holland and Spain were about to unite their fleets with hers, and unite their efforts against maritime despotism. France was resplendent with immortal glory. Well disciplined armies caused her tricoloured banners to wave in the presence of those kings who intended to annihilate her. Twenty heroes, differing in character and talent, alike only in age and courage, led her soldiers to victory. Hoche, Kléber, Desaix, Moreau, Joubert, Masséna, Bonaparte, and a great number of others were following in their steps. People weighed their different merits; but no eye, piercing soever as it might be, could distinguish amongst this generation of heroes the unfortunate or the guilty; no eye could mark him who was soon to expire in the flower of his age from the attack of an unknown disease, him who was to fall by the Mussulman dagger, or the fire of the enemy, him who should cramp liberty, or him who should betray his country: all appeared pure, happy, and affording augury of their future fame. This was but for a moment; but there are tides in the affairs of nations, as in the life of individuals. We were about to regain wealth with tranquillity; as for liberty and glory, we already possessed them! "The country," said one of the ancients, "ought to be not only prosperous, but sufficiently glorious." This aspiration was accomplished. Frenchmen, ye who have since seen our liberty extinguished, our country invaded, our heroes shot, or forgetful of their glory—let us never forget those ever memorable days of liberty, greatness, and expectation!

CHAPTER VII.

SITUATION OF THE GOVERNMENT DURING THE WINTER OF THE YEAR V. (1797).—CHARACTER OF AND DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE FIVE DIRECTORS, BARRAS, CARNOT, REWBELL, LETOURNEUR, AND LARÉVELLIÈRE-LÉPEAUX.—STATE OF PUBLIC OPINION. THE CLICHÉ CLUB.—INTRIGUES OF THE ROYALIST FACTION. DISCOVERY OF A PLOT BY BROTTIER, LAVILLE-MORNOIS, AND DUVERNE DE PRERRE.—ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR V.—REVIEW OF THE SITUATION OF THE FOREIGN POWERS AT THE OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1797.

THE late victories of Rivoli and La Favorita, and the capture of Mantua, had restored all her superiority to France. The directory, as grossly abused as ever, struck the greatest terror into the foreign powers. "Half Europe," wrote Mallet Dupan¹, "is on its knees before this divan, bargaining for the honour of becoming its tributary." These fifteen months' firm and brilliant reign had not only firmly seated the five directors in the government, but had also developed their passions and their characters. Men cannot live long together without exhibiting either preference or distaste to one another, and without making their associations in conformity with their inclinations. Carnot, Barras, Rewbell, Larévellière-Lépeaux, and Letourneur, had already begun to exclusively associate with each other. Carnot was systematic, headstrong, and proud. He was totally deficient in that habitude which imparts enlarged views and precision to the mind, and aptitude to the character. He was shrewd, and carefully investigated every subject he had to examine; but when once involved in an error, he never extricated himself from it. He was upright, persevering, very attentive to business, but never forgave either a wrong or an affront offered to his self-love; he was witty and original, which is not uncommon with men of great mental resources. He had formerly quarrelled with the members of the committee of public welfare, for it was impossible that his pride should sympathize with that of Robespierre and Saint Just, and that his great courage should quail before their despotism. At this time, the same thing could hardly fail to happen to him with regard to the directory. Independent of the circumstances which made him run against his colleagues while engaged in common with them in a task so difficult as that of government, and which so naturally provokes a diversity of opinions, he nursed up bygone resentments, particularly against Barras. The whole tenor of his conduct, as a strict, upright, laborious man, estranged him from this prodigal, debauched, and indolent colleague; but he was particularly disgusted with him as being the chief of those Thermidorians, friends and avengers of Danton, and persecutors of the old Mountain. Carnot, who was one of the principal authors of Danton's death, and who would shortly have fallen a victim to the persecutions directed against the Mountain, could not forgive the Thermidorians; he therefore cherished a settled dislike against Barras.

Barras had formerly served in India; and had there displayed the courage of a soldier. He was a fit man to put himself on horseback in times of disturbances; and as we have already seen, it was by so doing that he had gained his place in the directory. So, on all troublous occasions did he still talk of getting on horseback, and of cutting down the enemies of the republic. In person he was tall and handsome; but in his countenance there was something dark and sinister, that harmonized little with his character, which was rather choleric than wicked. Although he was brought up in a superior station in life, there was nothing in his address that indicated the well-bred man. His address in fact was coarse, bold, and vulgar. He possessed a shrewdness and sharpness of wit that with study and application might have been turned to good account; but indolent and ignorant, he knew at the most no more than what is acquired in an agitated state of existence, and in those matters upon which he was daily called to give his opinion, he suffered sufficient good sense to peep out, to make one regret that his education had not been more attended to. In other respects, profligate and cynical, violent and faithless, as southerners generally are who care to conceal their duplicity under an affected bluntness, republican by sentiment and by position, but an inconsistent man, admitting to his house the most violent revolutionists of the faubourgs, and all the emigrants returned to France, pleasing the one by his trivial vehemence, and making himself agreeable to the other by his spirit of intrigue, he was in reality a warm patriot, and in secret he held out hopes to all parties. He was the representative of the Danton party in every thing save Danton's talent, which had not been transmitted to his successors.

* Secret correspondence with the Venetian government.

Rewbell, formerly an advocate at Colmar, had acquired at the bar and in our different assemblies great experience in the conduct of affairs. With the most extraordinary shrewdness and discernment, he combined extensive information, a prodigious memory, and a remarkable attention to business. These qualities made him an indispensable personage at the head of the state. He thoroughly sifted matters, though somewhat argumentatively, from an adherence to former professional habits. To a personable appearance he joined easy manners; but he was coarse and affronting by the warmth and keenness of his language. Notwithstanding the false insinuations of the counter-revolutionists and the malignants, he was thoroughly honest. Unfortunately he was not without some tincture of avarice; he was desirous of investing his private fortune in a profitable manner, and it was this that caused him to be resorted to by men of business, and gave some weight to vexatious imputations. He was particularly diligent in attending to foreign affairs, and his attachment to the interests of France was so strong, that he would willingly have acted unjustly towards foreign nations. A warm, steady, and staunch republican, he belonged originally to the moderate part of the convention, and was quite as much estranged from Carnot as he was from Barras, the one as a Mountaineer, the other as a Dantonist. Thus Carnot, Barras, and Rewbell, all three of them coming from adverse parties, hated one another; thus the animosities kindled during a long and terrible struggle were not extinguished under the constitutional system; thus hearts had not reciprocated feelings, as rivers which unite without mingling their streams. Notwithstanding, while these three men cordially hated one another, they repressed their resentments, and laboured heartily in the common cause.

There remained Laréveillière-Lépeux and Letourneur, who bore no animosity to any one. Letourneur, a vain easy creature, but whose conceit was not overbearing and annoyed no one, who was satisfied with the outward insignia of power and the salutes of sentinels, Letourneur possessed a respectful esteem for Carnot. He was ready to offer his opinion, but equally ready to abandon it the moment he found that his notions were erroneous, or when Carnot had spoken. His vote on all occasions was with Carnot.

Laréveillière, the most honest and best of men, united with great and varied information a well-regulated and observant mind. He was very attentive in business, and was capable of giving sound advice on all subjects; and in fact, he did give good advice upon important occasions. But he was frequently hurried away by illusory notions, or checked by the scruples of a single-hearted mind. He sometimes desired what was impracticable, and did not venture to call for what was necessary; for it requires a great mind to calculate how much is to be conceded to circumstances without compounding principles. As a good orator and endued with extraordinary firmness, he was highly useful when good suggestions were to be supported, and his personal consideration rendered the directory no small assistance.

His part among colleagues who detested each other was extremely serviceable. Among the four directors, he entertained a decided preference in favour of the most honest and the most talented, namely, Rewbell. Yet he had cautiously avoided any close connexion, which would have been more to his taste, if it would not have alienated him from his other colleagues. He was not without some preference for Barras, and would have been on closer terms with him had he found him less corrupt and less insincere. He possessed a certain ascendancy over his colleague, by reason of his high standing, his shrewdness, and his firmness. Profligates are never behindhand in scoffing at virtue, but they fear her when she combines with that sagacity which exposes them, the moral courage that defies them. Laréveillière exerted his influence over Rewbell and Barras, to keep them in harmony with one another and with Carnot. Owing to this mediator, and owing also to their zeal for the interests of the republic, these directors lived on terms of ordinary politeness together, and prosecuted their task, delivering their opinions on the questions they had to decide much rather in accordance with their real feelings than with reference to their animosities.

With the exception of Barras, the directors resided with their families, each occupying a suite of rooms in the Luxembourg. They lived in an inexpensive style. However, Laréveillière, who was fond of company, and of the arts and sciences, and who deemed it his duty to spend his salary in a manner useful to the state, admitted to his house scientific and literary characters, but he treated them with simplicity and cordiality. He had unfortunately exposed himself to some ridicule, without having in the least deserved it. He adhered in every respect to the philosophy of the eighteenth century, as expressed in the profession of faith of the Savoyard vicar. He wished for the fall of the Catholic religion, and he flattered himself that it would soon be extinguished, if governments had the prudence to employ against it nothing else than neglect and disregard. He was against all superstitions, ceremonies, and all substantive representations of the Deity; but he conceived that public meetings were requisite for men, that there they might discourse together on morality and the greatness of the Deity, as manifested in the creation. These subjects, in fact, ought to be treated of in public assemblies, because men there are more readily moved, and are more accessible to elevated and generous sentiments. He had promulgated these ideas in a written work, wherein he had said that it would be well some day to supersede the ceremonies of the Catholic worship by meetings like those of the Protestants, but more simple and more free from formality. This idea, adopted by some well-meaning minds, was immediately carried into execution. A brother of Hanly, the celebrated geologist, formed a society which he called the Theophilanthropists, whose meetings were instituted for the purpose of moral exhortations, philosophical lectures, and pious hymns. More than one society of this kind was formed. They assembled in halls hired at their own expense, and under the superintendence of the police. Although Larévillière considered this institution meritorious, and likely to draw from the Catholic churches many of those tender consciences who yearn for the outpouring of their religious sentiments in common, he took care that neither himself or his family should ever figure there, lest he should be supposed to assume the character of the leader of a sect, and recall the associations evoked by the pontificate of Robespierre. In spite of Larévillière's caution, malignity seized that pretext to throw some ridicule on a magistrate universally honoured, and who gave no occasion for calumny. Besides, if Theophilanthropism were the subject of some pointless jokes in Barras's parties, or in the royalist journals, it attracted but little notice, and did not in the least diminish the respect which Larévillière-Lépeaux enjoyed.

That director who really injured the respect due to the government, was Barras. His mode of life was not so simple and retired as his colleagues; he displayed a luxury and a prodigality for which his participation in the profits of men of business could alone account. The finances were managed with strict probity by the directorial majority and by the excellent minister Ramel; but they could not prevent Barras from receiving from the contractors, or the bankers whom he supported with his influence, a very considerable share of their bonuses. He had a thousand other ways of supplying his extravagance. France had become the arbitress of so many states, great and small, that many princes were glad to seek her favour, and to pay large sums for the promise of a voice in the directory. We shall soon see what was attempted in this way. The exhibition that Barras displayed might not in itself have been useless, for the leaders of a state ought to mix much with company, in order to study men, to learn their characters, and to select proper objects for their purposes; but he surrounded himself not only with men of business, but with intriguers of all sorts, dissolute women, and persons of bad character. His withdrawing rooms were the scene of the most scandalous licen-tiousness. Those clandestine connexions which in well-regulated society every body strives to conceal, were publicly avowed. Gros-Bois was the place where these orgies were celebrated, which furnished the enemies of the republic with powerful arguments against the government. Besides, Barras himself did not care to conceal any part of his conduct, and like most debauchees, he boasted of his irregularities. He himself related to his colleagues, who sometimes severely condemned him, his excesses at Gros-Bois and the Luxembourg; he would tell them how he had forced a celebrated contractor of that day to take off his hands a mistress of whom he began to be tired, and whose extravagance he could no longer supply; how he had revenged himself upon the abbé Poncelin, a newspaper writer, for some personal invectives against him; and how, after getting him to come to the Luxembourg, he had made his servants give him a flogging. This aping of an ill-regulated prince, was in a republic extremely prejudicial to the directory, and would have completely lowered it in public estimation, had not the high reputation and the virtues of Carnot and Larévillière compensated for the ill effect of the excesses of Barras.

The directory, instituted on the morrow of the 15th Vendémiaire*, formed in the spirit of hatred to counter-revolution, composed of regicides, and furiously attacked by the royalists, could not but be warmly republican. But each of its members participated more or less in the opinions that divided France. Larévillière and Rewbell possessed that moderate but rigid republicanism, which was as much opposed to the excesses of 1793 as to the royalist frenzies of 1795. To gain them over to the counter-revolution was impossible. The unerring instinct of the parties taught them that from such men nothing was to be obtained either by corruption or by eulogiums in the newspapers. Accordingly, the parties had nothing but the most bitter accusations against those two directors. As for Barras and Carnot, it was otherwise with them. Barras, though he entertained everybody, was in reality an ardent revolutionist. The faubourgs made much of him, and had not forgotten that he had been the general of Vendémiaire, and the conspirators of the camp of Grenelle had considered that they could reckon upon him. Accordingly, the patriots loaded him with praise, and the royalists overwhelmed him with invectives. Some secret agents of royalism, brought in contact with him by a common spirit of intrigue, might indeed, calculating upon his depravity, conceive some hopes; but this was an opinion which they kept to themselves. The great bulk of the party abhorred him, and pursued him with the utmost animosity.

Carnot, ex-mountaineer, formerly member of the committee of public welfare, and in danger after the 9th Thermidor of becoming a victim to the royalist reaction, ought certainly to have been a decided republican, and he really was so. At the first moment of his entrance into the directory, he had strongly supported all the appointments taken from the mountaineer party; but by degrees, in proportion as the terrors of Vendémiaire subsided, his inclinations had changed. Carnot, even in the committee of public welfare, had never liked the herd of the turbulent revolutionists, and had powerfully contributed to destroy the Hebertists. On seeing Barras, who wanted to continue king of the mob (roi de la canaille), surround himself with the relics of the Jacobin party, he had become hostile to that party; he had displayed great energy in the affair of the camp of Grenelle, and the more so as Barras was somewhat compromised in that rash attempt. Nor is this all; thoughts were Carnot's tormentors. The charge that had been made against him of having signed the most sanguinary acts of the committee of public welfare extremely harassed him. It was not enough for him that he had given very reasonable explanations; he would have wished to prove by every possible means that he was no monster; and he would have made great sacrifices to prove this. Parties know every thing, guess at every thing; they are not nice with respect to persons when they are victorious; but when they are vanquished they draw others into their association in every possible manner, and above all, are careful to pay their court to the commanders of armies. The royalists were soon aware of Carnot's inclinations in regard to Barras and the patriot party. They had discovered his anxiety to reinstate himself in the good opinion of the public; they were aware of his military importance, and they took care to treat him differently from his colleagues, and to speak of him in the manner which they knew to be most likely to affect him. Thus, while the whole tribe of their journals never stopped their current of gross abuse against Barras, Larévellière and Rewbell, they did nothing else than pass eulogiums on the ex-mountaineer and regicide Carnot. Moreover, in gaining over Carnot, they would also have Letourneur, and thus two voices were gained by a common but powerful artifice, like all those which are addressed to vanity. Carnot had the weakness to yield to this kind of seduction; and without ceasing to be governed by his internal convictions, he formed with his friend Letourneur in the body of the directory a kind of opposition, not dissimilar to that which the new third formed in the two councils. On all questions, in fact, on which the directory had to deliberate, he pronounced in favour of the opinion adopted by the opposition. Thus, on all questions relative to peace and war, he voted for peace, after the example of the opposition, which affected continually to demand it. He had strongly recommended that the greatest sacrifices should be made to the emperor, and that peace should be signed with Naples and Rome, without insisting on too rigorous conditions.

* Year IV. 4 October, 1795.

No sooner do such differences of opinion break out than they make rapid progress. The party desirous of making the most by them bestows the most extravagant praise on those whom it wishes to gain over, and turns the blame upon the others. This mode of proceeding had met with its usual success. Barras and Rewbell, already inimical to Carnot, had a still greater grudge against him ever since the praise that had been lavished upon him, and laid to his charge the inveterate attacks of which they were the object. Larévellière did all he could, but in vain, to appease these animosities; but dissension nevertheless made baneful progress. The public, apprised of what was going on, distinguished the directory into majority and minority, classing Larévellière, Rewbell, and Barras in the former, and Carnot and Letourneur in the latter.

The ministers were also classified. As the utmost desire was manifested of finding fault with the management of the finances, a clamour was raised against the minister Ramel, an excellent public manager, whom the impoverished state of the exchequer compelled to resort to expedients censurable at any other time, but which could not be avoided in the present state of things. The taxes came in but slowly, owing to the terrible irregularities in the collection. It had been found necessary to reduce the land-tax, and the customs, excise, stamps, and registry duties (contributions indirectes) yielded much less than had been expected. There were frequently no funds whatever in the treasury; and in these emergencies, the funds appropriated for the ordinary expenses were applied in discharge of the extraordinary, or perhaps the receipts themselves were anticipated, or else those improvident and usurious contracts were made which always take place on such occasions. A great outcry was being kept up against abuses and peculations, at a time when every assistance should have been rendered to the government. Ramel, who performed the duties of his office with equal integrity and intelligence, was the butt of every attack, and received no quarter from the newspapers. It was the same with Truguet, the minister of the marine, well known as an open-hearted republican, as the friend of Hucho, and as a supporter of all the patriot officers; so it was with Delacroix, the minister for foreign affairs, capable of forming a good manager for the public, but in other respects a bad diplomatist, too pedantic, and too gross in his intercourse with the ministers of foreign powers; the same with Merlin, who in his administration of justice displayed all the fervour of a mountaineer republican. As for Benezech, Petiet, and Cochin, the ministers of the interior, of war, and of the police, they were classed entirely by themselves. Benezech had sustained so many attacks from the Jacobins for having proposed to return to the free-trade system in articles of consumption, and for ceasing to feed Paris at the public expense, that he had gone over to the counter-revolutionary party. An able public manager, but schooled under the old system, which he regretted, he partly deserved the favour of those who praised him. Petiet, minister at war, acquitted himself ably of his functions; but being a creature of Carnot's, he shared precisely the same fate as the latter with the parties. As for Cochin, he was also recommended by his connexion with Carnot; and the discovery he had made of the plots of the Jacobins, and the zeal which he had shown in prosecuting them, had won the favour of the opposite party, who landed him up to the skies.

Notwithstanding these contrarieties of opinion, the government was still sufficiently united to rule with vigour, and to prosecute with glory its operations against the powers of Europe. The opposition was constantly kept down by the conventional majority remaining in the legislative body. The elections, however, were approaching, and the moment was at hand when a new third, chosen under the influence of the moment, would succeed another conventional third. The opposition flattered itself that it would then acquire the majority, and emerge from the state of submission in which it had existed. Accordingly, its language in the two councils became more loud, and suffered its expectations to manifest themselves. The members of this minority met at Tivoli, there to talk over their plans, and to concert their measures. This meeting of deputies had become a most violent club, known by the name of the Clichy Club. The journals participated in this movement. A great number of young men, who under the old system would have composed morsels of poetry, now declaimed through fifty or sixty pages, against the excesses of the revolution and against the convention, to whom they imputed those excesses. They bore no hostility, they said, to the republic, but with those who had stained its cradle with blood. The assemblies of electors were forming beforehand, and every exertion was made to influence their choice. This was in every respect the language, the spirit, and the passions of Vendémiaire; the same simplicity and the same credulity in the mass, the same ambition in certain individuals, the same perfidy in some few conspirators secretly engaged for the purpose of royalty.

The royalist faction, always beaten, but still credulous and intriguing, was interminably kept on foot. Wherever there is a claim supported by some pecuniary assistance, there will always be found intriguers ready to serve it by petty designs. Although Lemaitre had been condemned to death, La Vendée quelled, Pichegru deprived of the command of the army of the Rhine, the plots of the counter-revolution were by no means extinguished; far otherwise, they were prosecuted with extreme activity. The relative positions of the individuals were singularly changed. The pretender, who alternately bore the title of count de Lille and Louis XVIII., had left Venice, as we have seen, to proceed to the army of the Rhine. He had stopped for a moment in the camp of the prince of Condé, where an accident placed his life in jeopardy. Standing at a window, he was fired at and slightly grazed by the ball. This attempt, the author of which remained unknown, could not fail to be attributed to the directory, which was not so short-sighted to pay for a crime that would have done no service to any body but the count d'Artois. The pretender did not stay long with the prince of Condé. His presence in the Austrian army was not agreeable to the cabinet of Vienna, who had shown no desire to recognize him, and was aware that his presence would only serve to inflame the quarrel with France, a quarrel already too sanguinary and too expensive. He was quietly told to go away, and on his refusal, a detachment was sent to compel him. He then retired to Blankenburg, where he continued to be the centre of communication. Condé remained with his regiment upon the Rhine. The count d'Artois, after his vain schemes respecting La Vendée, had retired to Scotland, whence he still corresponded with some intriguers, passing to and fro between La Vendée and England.

Lemaitre being dead, his associates had taken his place, and succeeded him in the confidence of the pretender. These were, as we have already seen, the abbé Brottier, formerly a tutor; Laville Hournois, formerly the master of requests; a certain chevalier Despomelles, and a naval officer named Duverne de Presle. The old system of these agents, stationed in Paris, was to do every thing through the medium of the intriguers in the capital, while the Vendéans pretended to do every thing by armed insurrection, and the prince of Condé to do every thing by means of Pichegru. La Vendée being subdued, Pichegru doomed to retirement, and an alarming reaction breaking out against the revolution, the Paris agents were the more fully persuaded that every thing was to be expected from a spontaneous movement of the interior. To control the elections, then by the elections to control the councils, by the councils the directory and the public offices, seemed to them a sure way to re-establish royalty with the very means rendered available to them by the constitution of the republic. But to effect this, that contrariety of opinions that had always prevailed in counter-revolutionary designs must first cease. Puisaye, who remained concealed in Brittany, was dreaming there, as formerly, of an insurrection in that province. In Normandy, M. de Froté was striving to excite a rising similar to that which had taken place in La Vendée, but neither of them would put themselves in communication with the Paris agents. The prince of Condé, duped in his intrigue with Pichegru upon the Rhine, was always desirous of acting individually in this matter, without mixing the Austrians or the pretender up with it, and he was heartily sorry that he had let them into the secret. To impart some consistency to these incoherent projects, and more especially to obtain money, the Paris agents sent one of their number into the western provinces, and into England, Scotland, Germany, and Switzerland. Duverne de Presle was the person thus selected. Being unable to deprive Puisaye of his command, they strove, by the influence of the count d'Artois, to force him to join the system of the Paris agents, and to come to an understanding with them. They obtained from the English the most important thing, some assistance in money. They procured powers from the pretender, which made all the intrigues depend upon the Paris agency. An interview was had with the prince of Condé, who was not to be rendered either intelligent or tractable. An interview was also had with M. de Précy, who was still the secret promoter of the disturbances at Lyons and in the south. At last a general plan was concerted, but it had neither consistency or unity, except upon paper, and it did not prevent every one from doing just as he chose, and in conformity with his personal interests and pretensions.

It was settled that France should be divided into two agencies, one comprising the east and the south, the other the north and the west. M. de Précy was to be at the head of the former, the Paris agents were to direct the latter. These two agencies were to mutually arrange all their operations, and to correspond directly with the pretender, who was to give them his orders. Secret associations were devised on the model of those formed by Babeuf. They were to be entirely unconnected with one another, and were not to know the names of the leaders, so that the apprehension of one of the parties should not lead to the seizure of all the conspirators. These associations were to be adapted to the state of France. As it had been observed that the greater part of the population, without desiring the return of the Bourbons, wished for peace and quiet, and imputed to the directory the continuance of the revolutionary system, a sort of masonic society was formed, called the Philanthropists, who engaged to use their electoral rights, and to exercise them in favour of men opposed to the directory. The Philanthropists were unacquainted with the secret object of these underplots, and all that was held out to them was the mere intention of strengthening the opposition. Another association, more secret, more concentrated, less numerous, and intitled the Faithful, was to be composed of those more resolute and devoted men, to whom the secret of the faction might be communicated. The Faithful were to be secretly armed, and ready for all sudden attacks. They were to enrol themselves in the national guard, which was not yet organized, and under cover of that uniform to execute the more securely the orders that should be given them. Their special mission was, independent of every plan of insurrection, to watch the elections; and if the parties should come to blows, as had been the case in Vendémiaire, to fly to the assistance of the opposition party. The Faithful, moreover, were to aid in concealing emigrants and priests, in forging passports, in persecuting the revolutionists and the purchasers of the national estates. These associations were to be under the direction of military leaders, who were to correspond with the two principal agencies, and to receive orders from them. Such was the new plan of the faction; a chimerical design, which history would disdain to record, did it not make us acquainted with the bitter fancies on which defeated parties chew the cud. Notwithstanding this assumed consistency, the association of the south did nothing else than produce some anonymous companies, acting without direction and without object, and solely governed by the ideas of revenge and plunder. Puisaye, Frotte, and Rochecot, in Brittany and Normandy, laboured apart to get up another Vendée, and disavowed the mixed counter-revolution of the Paris agents. Puisaye even published a manifesto, declaring that Brittany would never second any plans which did not tend to restore by open force an absolute and unrestricted royalty to the family of Bourbon.

The prince of Condé continued on his part to correspond directly with Pichegru, whose singular and strange conduct can only be accounted for by his embarrassing situation. This general, the only commander recorded in history to have voluntarily suffered himself to be beaten, had himself required his dismissal. This conduct must appear surprising, for it was depriving himself of every possible influence, and consequently rendering himself incapable of accomplishing his pretended designs. However, we shall be able to account for it in attentively considering Pichegru's situation: he could not continue general, without at last putting in execution the plans he had engaged to accomplish, and for which he had received considerable sums. Pichegru had before his eyes three examples, all of them different cases, Bouillé, Fayette, and Dumouriez, which proved to him that it was impossible to seduce a whole army. He wished, therefore, to put it out of his power to attempt any such thing; and this explains his requiring his dismissal, which the directory, wholly ignorant of his treason, did not accept without concern. The prince of Condé and his agents were extremely surprised at the conduct of Pichegru, and conceived that he had cheated them out of their money, and that in reality he had never intended to serve them. But he had hardly been discharged before he returned to the banks of the Rhine, upon pretext of selling his carriages, and then proceeded into the Jura, which was his native country. From that place he continued to correspond with the agents of the prince, to whom he represented his resignation as a deep-laid scheme. He should be considered, he said, as a victim of the directory; he was going to connect himself with all the royalists of the interior, and to form an immense party; his army, in the command of which he was to be succeeded by Moreau, would deeply regret him, and on the first reverse that it should sustain, it would not fail to call for its old general, and to revolt in order to obtain his reinstatement. He should take advantage of this moment to throw off the mask, hasten to his army, assume the dictatorship, and proclaim royalty. This ridiculous plan, had it been sincere, would have been balked by the successes of Moreau, who, even during his famous retreat, always came off victorious. The prince of Condé, the Austrian generals, whom he had been obliged to trust in this matter, and Wickham, the English minister in Switzerland, began to believe that Pichegru had cheated them. They had no desire to continue the correspondence; but at the pressing requests of the intermediate agents, who never liked to be unsuccessfully employed, the correspondence was continued, to see whether any good could come of it. The correspondence came by way of Strasburg, through the medium of some spies, who crossed the Rhine, and met at Klinglin's, the Austrian general; and so on by Bâle, with the English minister, Wickham. Pichegru stayed in the Jura, without refusing or accepting the embassy to Sweden, which had been offered him, but striving to get himself nominated deputy, paying the agents of the prince with the most wretched promises, and continually receiving considerable sums. He held out hopes of the most important results from his nomination to the five hundred; he boasted of an influence which he did not possess; he pretended to be giving the directory perfidious advice, and inducing it to adopt dangerous resolutions; he took honour to himself for the long defence of Kohl, which, he said, he had recommended for the purpose of compromising the army. Very little faith was placed in these pretended services. The count de Bellegarde wrote, "We are in the situation of the gambler who wishes to regain his money, and who is exposing himself to further loss in the hope of recovering what he has lost." The Austrian generals continued, nevertheless, to keep up the correspondence, because, although nothing very great could be done, yet at all events they obtained valuable particulars concerning the state and the movements of the French army. The infamous agents of this correspondence sent to general Klinglin such statements and plans as they could procure. During the siege of Kehl they had been continually marking the points upon which the enemy's fire might be directed with the greatest effect.

Such was then the miserable part performed by Pichegru. With an understanding not above mediocrity, he was cunning and wary, and had sufficient tact and experience to believe any plan of counter-revolution impracticable at the moment. His everlasting delays, and his fables to amuse the credulity of the prince's agents, prove his conviction on this point; and his conduct in important circumstances will go much further. He received, nevertheless, the reward agreed on for designs he would not execute, and had the art to cause it to be offered to him without his asking for it.

After all, this was the way in which all the agents of royalism behaved. They had most impudently boasted of an influence they did not possess, and pretended to have influence over the personages of the greatest importance, to whom they had never spoken a word. Brottier, Duverne de Presle, and Laville-Heurnois, boasted that they could command a great number of the deputies in the two councils, and felt assured they should have many more after the new elections. There was nothing of the kind; they had no communication except with the deputy Lemerer, and one Morsan, who had been excluded from the legislative body by virtue of the law of the 3rd Brumaire against the relatives of emigrants. By means of Lemerer, they pretended to have got all the deputies belonging to the Clichy club. They judged from the speeches and the votes of those deputies that they would probably applaud the restoration of the monarchy, and for that reason they deemed themselves authorized beforehand to make a demonstration of their attachment and even of their repugnance to the king of Blankenburg. These wretches imposed on this king, and calumniated the members of the Clichy club. There were among them ambitious men, who were enemies of the conventionalists, because the conventionalists had the entire government in their hands, men exasperated against the revolution, dupes who suffered themselves to be led, but very few men bold enough to turn their thoughts towards royalty, and of sufficient capacity to effectually advance its re-establishment. Yet it was upon such foundations that the agents of royalism built their designs and their assurances.

It was England that furnished all the funds for the presumed counter-revolution. She sent from London to Brittany the assistance required by Puisaye. Wickham, the English minister in Switzerland, was directed to supply the two agencies of Lyons and Paris with money, and to send some direct to Pichegru, who in the terms of the correspondence was "treasured up for great occasions."

The agents of the counter-revolution had intended to take the money of England, and then laugh at her. They had agreed with the pretender to receive her funds, without ever following any of her views, and without ever complying with any of her suggestions, which they alleged it was right to distrust. England was not their dupe, and felt for them all the contempt they deserved. Wickham, Pitt, indeed no one of the English ministers, placed the least reliance on the operations of these gentry, and had no hope whatever of a counter-revolution by their means. They wanted turbulent spirits, who should disturb France, who should give general uneasiness by their designs, and who, without putting the government in any real peril, should cause exaggerated apprehensions. They cheerfully devoted one or perhaps two millions a year to this purpose. Thus the agents of the counter-revolution deceived themselves in supposing that they were deceiving the English. With every desire to act the cheat, they were unable to do so; for England never reckoned upon greater results than those which they were capable of producing.

Such were then the designs and the means of the royalist faction. Cochoy, minister of the police, was partly acquainted with them; he knew that there were in Paris correspondents of the court of Blankenburg; for throughout our long revolution, during which one plot was constantly succeeded by another, there is not a single instance of a conspiracy having remained unknown. He attentively watched their proceedings, surrounded them with spies, and waited for an overt act on their part, that he might take them with the means of conviction. They soon gave him the opportunity. In conformity with their notable design of gaining over the authorities, they first thought of securing the military authorities of Paris. The principal forces of the capital consisted of the grenadiers of the legislative body, and those in the camp of Sablons. The grenadiers of the legislative body were a picked corps of twelve hundred men, whom the constitution had placed about the two councils as a guard of safety and honour. Their commandant, adjutant-general Ramel, was known for his moderate sentiments, and in the estimation of the silly agents of Louis XVIII. this was a sufficient reason to set him down for a royalist. The armed force assembled at Sablons amounted to nearly twelve thousand men. The commander of this armed force was general Hatry, a brave man, whom they had no hope of gaining over. They turned their eyes to the colonel of the 21st dragoons, named Malo, who had so briskly charged the Jacobins at the time of their ridiculous attempt on the camp of Sablons. They argued respecting him as they did about Ramel, and because he had repulsed the Jacobins it was concluded that he would welcome the royalists. Brottier, Laville-Heurnois, and Duverne de Presle, sounded both of them, and made proposals, which were listened to and immediately denounced to the minister of the police. The latter enjoined Ramel and Malo to continue to lend an ear to the conspirators, in order to get at their whole scheme. Accordingly, they were encouraged to enter into a long explanation of their designs, their means, and their hopes, and another interview was appointed, at which they were to exhibit the powers that they had received from Louis XVIII. Advantage was to be taken of this opportunity for securing them. The interviews took place in the apartments occupied by Malo in the military school. Gendarmes and witnesses were concealed in such a manner as to hear every thing, and to be able to show themselves at a given signal. Accordingly, on the 11th Pluviôse, these wretched dupes attended, bringing with them the powers of Louis XVIII., and again detailed their plans. The interview over, they were going to part, when they were seized by the agents employed for the purpose, and taken before the minister of the police. Messengers were immediately sent to their residences, and all their papers were secured in their presence. Among them were found letters which furnished sufficient proofs of the conspiracy, and in part discovered the details. It was seen, for example, that those gentry composed an entire government at their pleasure. They meant, for the moment, and till the return of the king from Blankenburg, to suffer part of the existing authorities to remain. Among others, they proposed to retain Benezech in the department of the interior, and Cochon in that of the police; and if the royalists should feel shy of the latter as a regicide, they designed to put M. Siméon or M. Portalis in his place. They meant, moreover, to give the superintendence of the finances to M. Barbe-Marbois, "who," they said, "possesses talents and information, and has the credit of being an honest man." They had, to be sure, not consulted MM. Portalis, Siméon, Benezech, Barbe-Marbois, and Cochon, to whom they were totally unknown; but they had disposed of them, as they were accustomed to do, without their knowledge, and on their presumed opinions.

The discovery of this plot produced a very great sensation, and proved that it behoved the republic to be continually upon its guard against its old enemies. It excited a positive astonishment in the members of the opposition, whose acts tended to royalism without their being aware of it, and who were not at all in the secret. This astonishment proved how those wretches boasted when they sent assurances to Blankenburg that they had at their disposal a great number of the members of both councils. The directory proposed to give them up immediately to a military commission. They denied the competency of its authority, asserting that they had not been taken in arms, or making any attempt by violence. Several deputies, united in sentiment to their cause, supported them in the councils; the directory nevertheless persisted in sending them to a military commission for trial, because they had attempted to seduce military officers.

Their system of defence was plausible enough. They admitted their title of agents of Louis XVIII., but declared that they had no other commission than to prepare the public opinion, and to expect from that alone, and not from force, a return to monarchical ideas. They were condemned to death, but their punishment was commuted to that of imprisonment, in consequence of the confessions of Duverne de Presle*. The latter made a long statement to the directory, which was inserted in the secret register, and in which he disclosed all the intrigues of the royalists. The directory abstained from publishing these details, lest it should apprise the conspirators that it was acquainted with their whole plan. Duverne de Presle gave no information concerning Pichegru, whose intrigues, being carried on directly with the prince of Condé, were unknown to the Paris agents; but he declared vaguely from hearsay that attempts had been made to gain partisans in one of the principal armies.

This apprehension of their chief agents might have thwarted the intrigues of the royalists, had they laid a well-combined plan, but as each of them proceeded in his own way, the arrest of Brottier, Laville-Hournois, and Duverne de Presle, did not prevent M. de Puisaye and M. de Frotté from intriguing in Normandy and in Brittany, M. de Précy at Lyons, and the prince of Condé in the army of the Rhine.

About the same time, Babœuf and his accomplices were brought to trial; they were all acquitted, excepting Babœuf and Darthé, who underwent the punishment of death*.

The most important affair was that of the elections. Out of opposition to the directory, or from a bias in favour of royalism, a great number of persons were taking every measure to influence them. In the Jura, great efforts were made to obtain the nomination of Pichegru; at Lyons, that of M. Imbert-Colomès, one of the agents of Louis XVIII. in the south; and at Versailles, that of M. de Vauvilliers, who was seriously compromised in the recently-discovered plot. In short, exertions were making in every quarter on behalf of persons opposed to the directory. In Paris, the electors of the Seine had met to concert their nominations. They proposed to ask the candidates the following questions: Has thou purchased national estates? Has thou been a newspaper writer? Has thou written, made thyself conspicuous, or done any thing during the revolution? Those were not to be nominated who answered these questions in the affirmative. Such preparations showed how violent was the reaction against all those who had taken part in the revolution. A hundred journals declaimed with vehemence, and produced an actual dizziness in the public mind. The directory had no other means to repress them than the law which inflicted capital punishment on writers calling for the restoration of royalty. No judges would ever have consented to give judgment on so cruel a law. The directory, for the third time, applied to the two councils for new legislative enactments, which were again refused. It proposed also to make the electors take an oath of hatred to royalty. A warm discussion took place concerning the efficacy of the oath, and the motion was modified by changing the oath into a mere declaration. Every elector was to declare that he was an enemy to anarchy as well as to royalty. The directory, without descending to any of the disgraceful means so frequently employed by representative governments for influencing elections, contented itself with choosing as commissioners to the assemblies men known for their republican sentiments, and setting Cochon, the minister, to write circulars, in which he recommended to the electors the candidates of its choice. A great outcry was raised against those circulars, which were only an insignificant exhortation, and by no means an injunction; for the number and independence of the electors, especially in a government in which almost all places were elective, placed them above the reach of the influence of the directory.

While every body was busying themselves about the elections, the choice of a new director occupied considerable attention. The question was, which of the five should be fixed upon by lot to go out of the directory : whether it should be Barraas, Rowbell, or Larévellière-Lépeaux, the opposition made sure, with the assistance of the new third, of having the nomination of a director of its own choice. The opposition hoped that it should then have a majority in the government, on which point it deceived itself, for its follies would not have failed very soon, to alienate Carnot and Letourneur from its cause.

* 19th Germinal (April 18).

* 6th Prairial (May 25).

The Clichy club noisily discussed the choice of the new elector. Cochon and Barthélemy were then proposed. Cochon had lost somewhat in the opinion of the counter-revolutionists since the apprehension of Brottier and his accomplices, and especially since his circulars to the electors. They preferred Barthélemy, our ambassador in Sweden, whom they believed to be secretly connected with the emigrants and the prince of Condé.

Amidst this agitation, the most absurd reports were propagated. It was said that the directory intended to commit the newly-elected deputies to prison, and to prevent their assembling ; it was even maintained that its intention was to cause them to be assassinated. Its friends, on their part, declared that an act of accusation was preparing against them at Clichy, and that the framers were only waiting for the new third in order to present it to the five hundred.

But while the parties were thus in a state of ferment, in expectation of an event which was to alter the majorities, and to change the direction of the republican government, a new campaign was in preparation, and every thing indicated that it would be the last. The relative situation of the powers stood much the same as in the preceding year. France, allied with Spain and Holland, had to struggle against England and Austria. The sentiments of the court of Spain were not, and could not be, favourable to the French republicans ; but its policy, directed by the prince of the peace, was entirely favourable to them. She considered their alliance as the surest means of being protected against their principles, and justly flattered herself that they would not desire to revolutionize her, so long as they should find in her a powerful naval auxiliary. Besides, she had an ancient enmity against Austria, and hoped that the union of all the navies of the continent would furnish her with the means of avenging her injuries. The prince of the peace seeing that his existence depended on this policy, and aware that he must perish along with it, employed all his influence with the queen to secure it the ascendancy over the sentiments of the royal family ; and therein he was perfectly successful. It was the constant result of this state of things that the French were individually ill-treated in Spain, while their government got every thing it wanted. Unfortunately, the French legations there did not behave with the respect due to a friendly power, or with the firmness requisite for protecting French subjects. Spain, by allying herself with France, had lost the important colony of Trinidad. She flattered herself that if France should this year free herself from Austria, and bring back all her forces against England, the latter would have to surrender all her acquisitions. The queen, in particular, flattered herself with an advancement in Italy for her son-in-law, the duke of Parma. There was an idea also of an expedition against Portugal, and amidst that vast convulsion of states, the court of Madrid was not without some hope of uniting the whole of the Peninsula under one sovereignty.

As for Holland, her situation was melancholy enough. She was agitated by all the passions that a change of constitution calls forth. The reasonable persons who wished for a government, in which the old federative system should be made consistent with the unity necessary for giving strength to the Batavian republic, had to contend with three parties, all of them equally dangerous ; in the first place, the orangists, comprising all the creatures of the stadtholder, the placemen, and the populace ; secondly, the federalists, including all the wealthy and powerful families, who were desirous of maintaining the former state of things, with the exception of the stadtholdership, which wounded their pride ; lastly, the decided democrats, a turbulent, daring, and implacable party, composed of hot-headed persons and adventurers. These three parties were inveterately hostile to one another, and impeded the establishment of the constitution of the country. Besides these embarrassments, Holland was still in dread of an invasion by Prussia, who was not checked by the successes of France. She found her commerce restricted in the north by the English and the Russians ; lastly, she was losing all her colonies, through the treachery of most of her governors. The Cape of Good Hope, Trincomalee, and the Moluccas, were in the hands of the English. The French troops encamped in Holland to protect her against Prussia, observed the strictest and most praise-worthy discipline ; but the public departments and the military commanders did not conduct themselves with either propriety or common honesty. The country was, therefore, horribly burdened. Some persons might therefore assume that Holland had done wrong by connecting herself with France, but this would be a hasty conclusion. Holland, placed between the two belligerent masses, could not escape the influence of the conquerors. Under the stadtholder, she was the subject of England, and sacrificed to her interests ; she was moreover subject to bondage at home. By allying herself with France, she ran the risks attached to the nature of that continental rather than maritime power, and compromised her colonies ; but she might some day, by the union of the three navies of the continent, recover what she had lost ; she might hope for a reasonable constitution under French protection. Such is the situation of states : if they are strong, they make their revolutions themselves, but they have to undergo all the calamities attending them, and welter in their own blood ; if they are weak, they see their neighbours come to revolutionize them with a strong hand, and undergo all the inconveniences arising from the presence of foreign armies. They do not indeed slay one another, but they pay the soldiers who come to keep them in order. Such was the fate of Holland and her relative situation with us. In this state, she had not been of any great service to the French government. Her army and navy were very slowly putting themselves to rights ; the Batavian money orders (rescriptions), with which the war indemnity of one hundred millions had been paid, were passing for next to nothing, and the advantages of the alliance were of no effectual service so far as France was concerned; an estrangement between the two countries was the consequence. The directory blamed the Dutch government for not keeping its engagements, and the Dutch government reproached the directory with putting it out of its power to fulfil them. In spite of these misunderstandings, both states had the same object in view. A squadron and marines attached thereto were getting ready in Holland to assist in the designs of the directory.

So far as concerned Prussia, a great part of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland, France had always continued in the same relations of strict neutrality. Misunderstandings had arisen between France and America. The United States conducted themselves towards us with as much injustice as ingratitude. Old Washington had suffered himself to be drawn into the party of John Adams and the English, which was desirous of bringing America back to the aristocratic and monarchical state. The injuries suffered from certain privateers, and the conduct of the agents of the committee of public welfare, afforded them a pretext; a very slight pretext indeed, for the wrongs done by the English to the American navy were of a far more serious nature; and the conduct of our agents was noticed at the time, and ought to have been excused. These favourers of the English party alleged that France meant to obtain from Spain the cession of the Floridas and of Louisiana; that, by means of those provinces and of Canada, she would encompass the United States, sow there the seeds of democratic principles, successively disunite all the states from the union, thus dissolve the American federation, and form a vast democracy between the Gulf of Mexico and the five lakes. Nothing of the kind was ever intended; but these falsehoods served to create a ferment, and make enemies to France. A treaty of commerce had just been concluded with England; this treaty contained stipulations which transferred to that power advantages formerly reserved for France alone, and due to the services she had rendered to the American cause. The notion of a violent separation from the United States had its advocates in the French government. Monroe, who was ambassador to Paris, gave the directory the most prudent advice with regard to this matter. "War with France," said he, "will force the American government to throw herself into the arms of England, and abandon herself to English influence; aristocracy will gain supreme control in the United States, and liberty will be compromised. On the contrary, by patiently enduring the wrongs of the present president, you will leave him without excuse, you will explain yourselves to the Americans, and cause a contrary nomination at the next election. Reparation will then be made for all the wrongs of which France may have to complain. This wise and provident recommendation prevailed with the directory. Rowbell, Barras, and Larevellière, had triumphantly opposed the opinion of the systematic Carnot, who, though in general favourably inclined to peace, wanted them to give us Louisiana, and that the experiment of a republic should be tried there.

Such were the relations of France with those powers who were either her allies or simply her friends. England and Austria had concluded in the preceding year a treaty of triple alliance with Russia; but the great and meanly-perfidious Catherine had recently died. Her successor, Paul I., whose mind by no means sound, possessed but a few lucid intervals, as is frequently the case in his family, had paid many marks of respect to the French emigrants, and yet at the same time cared very little as to executing the conditions of the treaty of triple alliance. This prince seemed to be struck by the colossal power of the French republic; and one would have said that he saw the danger of increasing its formidable character by opposition; at least the language he used to a Frenchman, celebrated for his acquirements and his abilities, would induce us to think so. Without violating the treaty, he had turned the state of his army and his treasury to the best account, and advised England and Austria what course the negotiation would take. England had endeavoured to induce the king of Prussia to take a part in this league, but had not succeeded. That prince felt that he could have no interest in affording assistance to his most formidable enemy, the emperor. France promised him an indemnity in Germany for the stadtholder who had married his sister; he had, therefore, nothing to desire for himself. All he cared about was to prevent Austria, beaten and despoiled by France, from indemnifying herself for her losses in Germany; he would even have desired to oppose her receiving indemnities in Italy. So he had in like manner declared that he never would consent that Austria should take Bavaria in exchange for the Netherlands; and at the same time he had made an offer of allying himself with the republic of Venice, offering to indemnify her, in case France and Austria should attempt to accommodate their differences at her expense. This object, therefore, was to prevent the emperor from obtaining equivalents for the losses which he had sustained in the contest with France.

Russia not yet taking a part in the conflict, and Prussia persisting in her neutrality, England and Austria alone remained in the field. England was in a very sad state; she no longer dreaded, at least for the moment, an expedition to Ireland, but her bank was threatened more seriously than ever; she placed no dependence whatever on Austria, whom she saw out of breath, and expected to see France, after conquering the continent, fall upon her with her united forces. Austria, notwithstanding the occupation of the têtes de pont of Kehl and Huningen, was fully sensible that she had ruined herself by her obstinacy in persevering to attack two bridges, and in not marching all her forces into Italy. The disasters of Rivoli and La Favorita, and the capture of Mantua, placed her in imminent danger. She was obliged to leave the Rhine exposed, and to reduce herself to an absolute inferiority on that frontier, in order to transfer her forces and her prince Charles to Italy. But during the interval that the troops would take to perform the march from the Upper Rhine to the Piave and the Isonzo, she would be left defenceless to an adversary, who was admirably qualified for seizing advantages the moment they occurred.

All these fears were not without foundation, and France was making preparation for a serious attack, which the opening campaign was not long in rendering effectual.

1797, Jan.
(Nivôse.
Pluviose.)

The state of the French armies at the opening of the campaign of 1797.

THE DIRECTORY.

Bonaparte marches against the Papal states.

699

CHAPTER VIII.

THE STATE OF OUR ARMIES AT THE OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1797.—BONAPARTE MARCHES AGAINST THE ROMAN STATES.—TREATY OF TOLENTINO WITH THE POPE.—NEW CAMPAIGN AGAINST THE AUSTRIANS.—PASSAGE OF THE TAGLIAMENTO. BATTLE OF TARVIS.—REVOLUTION IN THE CITIES OF BERGAMO, BRESCIA, AND OTHER CITIES IN THE VENETIAN STATES.—PASSAGE OF THE JULIAN ALPS BY BONAPARTE. MARCH TO VIENNA. PRELIMINARIES OF PEACE WITH AUSTRIA SIGNED AT LÖBEN.—PASSAGE OF THE RHINE AT NEUWIED AND DIRSHEIM.—VENETIAN PERFDY. MASSACRE OF VERONA. THE REPUBLIC OF VENICE EXTINGUISHED.

THE army of the Sambre and Meuse, reinforced by great part of the army of the Ocean, had been increased to eighty thousand men. Hoche, who had become its commander-in-chief, had stopped a very short time in Paris, on his return from the expedition to Ireland, and had hastened to proceed to his head-quarters. He had employed the winter in organizing his troops and providing them with necessaries. Drawing ample resources from Holland and the provinces between the Meuse and the Rhine, which were treated as conquered countries, he had preserved his army from those privations to which the army of the Rhine was exposed. By adopting a different mode of distributing his troops, he had altogether improved his army, and had brought it into the finest order. He was burning with impatience to march at the head of his eighty thousand men, and saw nothing to prevent him from advancing into the very heart of Germany. Anxious to illustrate his political views, he wished to imitate the examples of the general in Italy, and in his turn to create a republic. The provinces between the Meuse and the Rhine, which had not boon, like Belgium, declared constitutional territory, were temporarily under military law. If, at the conclusion of peace with the empire, France were refused them in order that she should be deprived of the line of the Rhine, she might at least consent that they should be constituted into an independent republic, an ally and friend of our own. This republic, by the name of Cisrhene republic, might have been indissolubly attached to France, and as useful to her as any one of her provinces. Hoche availed himself of the moment to give it a temporary formation, and to prepare it for the republican state. He had formed at Bonn a commission, which was charged with the double task of organizing it and making it available for the purposes of the French troops.

The army of the Upper Rhine, under Moreau, was far from being in so satisfactory a state. In regard to the valour and the discipline of the troops every thing was as it should be, but it was in great want of necessaries; and the want of money, not even allowing the cost of materials for a bridge, delayed its taking the field. Moreau urgently solicited a few hundred thousand francs, with which it was impossible for the treasury to furnish him. In order to obtain them, he had applied to general Bonaparte, but was obliged to wait till the latter had finished his excursion into the Roman states. This circumstance could not but delay the operations on the Rhine.

The most violent and the most sudden attacks were about to be carried into effect in Italy. Bonaparte, who had nearly destroyed at Rivoli the last Austrian army, had given notice that he should afterwards make an incursion of a few days into the states of the pope, to subject him to the republic, and to wring from him the money of which the army stood in need. He added, that if a reinforcement of thirty thousand men were sent him, he would cross the Julian Alps, and march at once to Vienna. This plan, so vast, would have been in the preceding year deemed chimerical; but as things now were, it had become practicable. The policy alone of the directory might have stood in the way; it might have objected to again transferring the entire operations of the war to this young commander, so peremptory in his determinations. However, the benevolent Larévellière strongly insisted on his being furnished with the means of executing so grand a design, and which would put so speedily an end to the war. It was settled that thirty thousand men should be sent to him from the Rhine. Bernadotte's division was taken from the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and Delmas' division from that of the Upper Rhine, to be marched across the Alps in the depth of winter. Moreau made the utmost efforts to place the division of Delmas on such a footing as to be a worthy representative of the army of the Rhine in Italy; he selected his best troops, and emptied his magazines in fitting them out. It was impossible to be actuated by a more honourable and a more delicate sentiment. Those two divisions, forming twenty and some odd thousand men, passed the Alps in January, before any one was aware of their march. When just ready to cross, a tempest overtook them. The guides advised a halt; a charge was sounded, and they defied the tempest, with drums beating and colours flying. These two divisions were already descending into Piedmont before any one knew of their having left the Rhine.

Bonaparte had hardly signed the capitulation of Mantua when he set out, without waiting for marshal Wurmser to file off before him, and proceeded to Bologna, to give law to the pope. The directory was desirous that he should at length destroy the temporal power of the holy see, but had not made it peremptorily incumbent upon him so to do, and had left him at liberty to act according to circumstances and his own discretion. Bonaparte had no intention of undertaking such an enterprise. While preparations were making in Upper Italy for a march across the Julian Alps, he meant to wrest one or two provinces from the pope, and to impose on him a levy sufficient to defray the expenses of the new campaign. To desire to do more would interfere with his designs against Austria. It was even requisite that Bonaparte should make great haste, that he might be able to return speedily to Upper Italy; above all, it be- loved him to conduct himself in such a manner as to avoid a war of religion, and that he should overawe the court of Naples, which had signed a peace, but did not consider itself at all bound by its treaty. That power felt strongly inclined to interpose in the quarrel, either in the hope of coming in for a share of the spoils of the pope, or as desiring to prevent the establishment of a republic at Rome, and that the revolution should not be brought to its own doors. Bonaparte joined, at Bologna, Victor's division as well as the new Italian troops raised in Lombardy and in the Cispadane, and marched at their head, to execute in person an enterprise which, in order to lead to success, required all his tact and efficiency.

The pope was in the most painful anxiety; the emperor had promised him his alliance, but only on the hardest conditions, that is, at the price of Ferrara and Comacchio; but even this alliance could no longer be of service, since Alvinzy's army was no more. The holy see had therefore compromised itself to no purpose. The correspondence of cardinal Busca, secretary of state, and a sworn enemy of France, had been intercepted. The designs against the French army, which it was proposed to attack in the rear, were disclosed; there was no longer any excuse for appealing to the clemency of the conqueror, to whose proposals the Papal government had for a year past refused to listen. When Cacault, the French minister, published the general's manifesto, and applied for leave to retire, there was not the slightest sign made of his being desired to remain; but this arose from a feeling of pride; but the pope was nevertheless suffering the most dreadful anxiety. Soon, nothing was listened to but the counsels of despair. The Austrian general, Colli, who arrived at Rome with some officers, was put at the head of the Papal troops; fanatical sermons were preached throughout the Roman states; heaven was promised to all who should devote themselves for the holy see, and efforts were made to stir up a Vendée around Bonaparte. Urgent entreaties were addressed to the court of Naples for the purpose of awakening all its ambition and religious zeal.

Bonaparte advanced rapidly, that he might not allow the conflagration time to spread. On the 16th Pluviôse, year V. (February 4, 1797), he marched to the Senio. The Papal army was intrenched there. It consisted of seven or eight thousand regular troops, and a great number of peasants armed in haste, and headed by their monks. This army exhibited a most burlesque appearance. A person who came to treat declared, that if the army of Napoleon persisted in advancing, it would be fired upon. It advanced nevertheless towards the bridge over the Senio, which was rather strongly intrenched. Lannes went up the river with a few hundred men, forded it, and drew up in order of battle in the rear of the Papal army. General Lahoz, with the Lombard troops, then marched to the bridge, and soon carried it. The new Italian troops steadily bore the fire, which was for a short time very brisk. Four or five hundred prisoners were taken, and some of the peasants cut down. The Papal army retreated in disorder.

It was pursued to Faenza; the gates of the town were broken open, and the French entered to the sound of the tocsin, and amidst the shouts of an infuriated people. The soldiers asked leave to plunder the place; Bonaparte refused it. He assembled the prisoners taken in the battle on the banks of the Senio, and spoke to them in Italian. These unfortunates imagined that they were about to be put to the sword. Bonaparte put their minds at ease, and informed them, to their great astonishment, that he set them at liberty on the condition of their going and setting their fellow countrymen right respecting the intentions of the French, who were not come to destroy either religion or the holy see, but who merely wished to remove the evil counsellors by whom the pope was surrounded. He then ordered them to be fed, and discharged them. Bonaparte advanced rapidly from Faenza to Forlì, Cesena, Rimini, Pesaro, and Sinigaglia. Colli, who had but about three thousand regular troops left, intrenched them in good position before Ancona. Bonaparte surrounded and took great part of them. He gave them their liberty on the same conditions as before. Colli retired with his officers to Rome. Bonaparte had now only to march to that capital. He proceeded first to Loreto, the treasury of which had been emptied; scarcely a million was found in it. The old wooden image of the virgin was sent to Paris as a curiosity. Leaving the coast, he marched from Loreto by Macerata for the Apennines, intending to cross them, and to debouch upon Rome, if that should be necessary. He arrived at Tolentino on the 26th Pluviôse (February 13), and there halted, to see what effect his rapid march and the liberation of his prisoners would produce. He had sent for the general of the Camaldulenses, an ecclesiastic in whom Pius VI. placed great confidence, and directed him to repair to Rome with offers of peace. Bonaparte was anxious for the pope to submit, and to accept the conditions which he resolved to impose upon him. He did not intend to lose time in exciting a revolution in Rome, which might detain him longer than suited his purposes, which would perhaps have provoked the court of Naples to take up arms, and which, in overthrowing the established government, would for the moment ruin the Roman finances, and prevent him from drawing from the country the twenty or thirty millions for which he had need. He conceived that the holy see, deprived of its finest provinces in favour of the Cispadane republic, and exposed to the vicinity of the new republic, would soon be infected with the revolutionary contagion, and in a very short time be subjugated. This was good policy, and the event proved its correctness. He awaited therefore at Tolentino the effects of his clemency, and the pope's apprehensions.

The prisoners whom he had discharged had, in fact, gone to all parts of the Roman states, and especially to Rome, spreading the most favourable reports of the French army, and appeasing the resentments excited against it. The general of the Camaldulenses arrived at the Vatican at the moment when the pope was about to enter his carriage and to leave Rome. That potentate, comforted by the message brought by that ecclesiastic, relinquished his intention of quitting the capital, dismissed Busca the secretary of state, and despatched cardinal Mattei, the prelate Galeppi, marquis Massimi, and his nephew, the duke of Brascchi, to Tolentino, to treat with the French general. They had full powers to treat, provided the general left religious faith untouched. The treaty was thereby rendered perfectly smooth, for with respect to articles of faith the French general was by no means particular. The treaty was concluded in a few days, and signed at Tolentino on the 1st Ventôse (February 19). Its principal conditions were these. The pope revoked all treaties of alliance against France, acknowledged the republic, and declared himself in peace and good understanding with her. He ceded to her all his claims on the Comtat Venaissin*, and gave up definitively to the Cispadane republic the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, and likewise the fine province of Romagna. The town and the important citadel of Ancona were to remain in the hands of France until the general peace. The two provinces of the duchy of Urbino and Macerata, which the French army had occupied, were to be restored to the pope on payment of the sum of fifteen millions. A like sum was to be paid, agreeably to the armistice of Bologna, not yet executed. These thirty millions were payable, two-thirds in money, and one-third in diamonds or precious stones. The pope was moreover to furnish eight hundred cavalry horses, and eight hundred draught horses, buffaloes, and other productions of the states of the church. He was to disavow the murder of Bassville, and to pay three hundred thousand francs for the benefit of his heirs and of others who had suffered by the same event. All the works of art and manuscripts ceded to France by the armistice of Bologna, were to be sent off immediately to Paris.

Such was the treaty of Tolentino, which gained for the Cispadane republic not only the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, but also the beautiful province of Romagna, and procured for the army a subsidy of thirty millions, more than enough for the campaign that was about to commence. A fortnight had sufficed for this expedition. While this treaty was negotiating, Bonaparte had contrived to intimidate the court of Naples, and to disengage himself from it. Before quitting Tolentino, he performed a remarkable act, and one which even then showed his personal policy. Italy, and the Papal states in particular, were full of exiled French priests. These unfortunate men, retired in convents, were not always received there with much charity. The ordinances of the directory forbade their stay in countries occupied by our armies; and the Italian monks were not sorry to get rid of them by the approach of our troops. These unfortunates were reduced to despair. Long separated from their country, exposed to every contumely from foreigners, they wept when they saw our soldiers; they even recognized some of them, whose pastors they had been in the villages of France. Bonaparte was easily moved; besides, he was anxious to appear divested of every kind of revolutionary and religious prejudice: he commanded, by an order from head-quarters, that all the convents of the holy see were to receive the French priests, to maintain them, and to give them pay. Thus, so far from driving them away, he improved their condition. He wrote to the directory, explaining the motives which had induced him to commit this breach of its ordinances. "By continually hunting down these unfortunate men," said he, "you force them to return home. It is far better that they should be in Italy than in France; they will be useful to us there. They are less fanatical than the Italian priests; they will set the mind of the people, who are highly excited against us, to rights." Besides," added he, "they weep on seeing us; how is it possible not to have compassion on their misfortunes?" The directory approved of his conduct. This act and this letter were published, and produced a very strong sensation.

He returned immediately to the Adige, to execute the boldest military march known in history. After once crossing the Alps to enter Italy, he was now going to cross them a second time, to throw himself beyond the Drave and the Mur into the valley of the Danube, and to advance upon Vienna. Never had a French army yet appeared in sight of that capital. To execute this vast design, many dangers had to be encountered. He left all Italy upon his rear;—Italy, struck with terror and admiration, but still impressed with the notion that the French could not long retain their acquisition.

The late campaign of Rivoli and the capture of Mantua had appeared to put an end to those doubts; but a march into Germany was about to revive them all. The governments of Genoa, Tuscany, Naples, Rome, Turin, and Venice, indignant at seeing a focus of revolution placed beside them in the Cispadane republic and Lombardy, might seize the opportunity of the first reverse to revolt. In uncertainty as to the result, the Italian patriots watched one another, that they might not compromise themselves. Bonaparte's army was far inferior to what it ought to have been to neutralize all the perils attendant on his design. The divisions of Bernadotte and Delmas, arrived from the Rhine, amounted to no more than twenty thousand men; the old army of Italy did not exceed forty thousand; and these, with the Lombard troops, might make about seventy thousand. But it was necessary to leave at least twenty thousand in Italy, and to guard the Tyrol with fifteen or eighteen thousand, so that there remained but thirty and some odd thousand to march upon Vienna, a most unheard-of rashness. Bonaparte, in order to obviate these difficulties, strove to negotiate an offensive and defensive alliance with Piedmont, which he had long been most anxious to effect. This alliance would procure him ten thousand good troops. The king, [of Sardinia,] who at first was not satisfied with the protection of his dominions as a compensation for the services he was going to afford, was content with it now that he saw the revolution was gaining head in public opinion. He signed the treaty, which was sent to Paris. But this treaty opposed the views of the French government. The directory, approving of Bonaparte's policy in Italy, which consisted in awaiting the very speedy downfall of the governments, and in not causing it, so as to have neither the trouble or the odium of revolutions—the directory did not care to attack or afford protection to any potentate. The ratification of the treaty was therefore extremely uncertain, and besides it would take fifteen or twenty days. It would then be required that the Sardinian contingent should set itself in motion, and by that time Bonaparte ought to be beyond the Alps. Bonaparte would, above all, have concluded a similar treaty of alliance with Venice. The government of that republic was fitting out considerable armaments, the object of which could not be misunderstood. The lagoons were full of Slavonian regiments. Ottolini, podesta of Bergamo, the blind instrument of the state inquisitors, had distributed money and arms among the mountaineers of the Bergamasco, and kept them ready for the first favourable opportunity. That government, equally weak and perfidious, was nevertheless unwilling to compromise itself, and persisted in its pretended neutrality. It had refused the alliance of Austria and of Prussia, but yet it was armed; and if the French, after entering Austria, should sustain reverses, then it had made up its mind to declare itself by slaughtering them in their retreat. Bonaparte, who was as crafty as the Venetian aristocracy, was aware of this danger, and pursued his alliance more for the purpose of protecting himself from its hostile designs than of deriving assistance. On crossing the Adige, he wished to see the proreditore, Pezaro, the same he had so terrified the year before at Peschiera; to him he made the most frank and friendly overtures. The entire continent, said he, is impregnated with revolutionary notions; a single word from the French would be sufficient to excite all the provinces to insurrection against Venice; but the French, if Venice were to ally herself with them, would take care not to excite a revolt; they would do their utmost to pacify public opinion; they would guarantee the republic against the ambition of Austria; and without demanding at her hands the sacrifice of her constitution, they would content themselves by advising her, for her own good, to adopt some indispensable reforms. Nothing could be more prudent or more sincere than this advice. It is not true that, at the moment it was given, the directory and Bonaparte were considering how to betray Venice to Austria. The directory had not considered with respect to this; if any thing had entered her mind, it was rather to emancipate Italy than to give up any part of it to Austria. As for Bonaparte, he sincerely wished to make an ally of Venice; and if Venice had listened to him, if she had joined him, and would have reformed her constitution, she might have saved her territory and her ancient laws. Pezaro answered in an evasive manner. Bonaparte finding that he had nothing to hope, then looked to his precautions, and how to compensate for all his deficiencies in his usual manner, that is, by the rapidity and the vehemence of his attacks.

* The name of a district of Provence, on the borders of the Dauphiné. Joanna of Naples sold the Comtat Venaissin to pope Clement VI., in 1348. The pope kept possession of this territory, although the parliament of Provence, repudiating this sale, caused it to be re-annexed to France in 1663. However, this territory was never actually in the possession of the French till 1791.—Trans.

He had sixty and odd thousand men, such as Europe had never yet seen. He resolved to leave ten thousand in Italy; these, joined to the Lombard and Cispadane battalions, would form fifteen or eighteen thousand men, capable of awing the Venetians. He then had left him fifty and some odd thousand, which he was going to dispose of in the following manner. Three roads lead across the Rhaetian, Noric, and Julian Alps to Vienna: the first, on the left, crossing the Tyrol by the pass of the Brenner; the second, in the centre, traversing Carinthia by the pass of the Tarwis; the third, on the right, crossing the Tagliamento and the Isonzo, and leading into Carniola. The archduke Charles had the bulk of his forces on the Isonzo, guarding Carniola and protecting Trieste. Two divisions, one at Feltre and Belluno, the other in the Tyrol, occupied the other two causeways. Owing to the blunder Austria had committed in not transferring her forces to Italy till very late, six fine divisions coming from the Rhine had not yet come up. This blunder might have been partly repaired, had the archduke Charles, fixing his head-quarters in the Tyrol, intended to operate upon our left. He would have got the six divisions from the Rhine fifteen days earlier; and then indeed Bonaparte, instead of fling off on the right by Carinthia or Carniola, would have been compelled to fight him, and to finish with him before he ventured himself the other side of the Alps. He would then have found him with his best troops, and would not have got off so easily. But the archduke had orders to protect Trieste, the only sea-port of the monarchy. He therefore posted himself at the outlet from Carniola, and placed only subordinate divisions on the causeway from Carinthia and the Tyrol. Two of the divisions leaving the Rhine were to reinforce general Kerpen in the Tyrol; the four others were to file off behind the Alps, through Carinthia and Carniola, and to proceed to the head-quarters in the Friule. It was now Ventôse (March). The Alps were covered with snow and ice; how could it be imagined that Bonaparte intended to climb at that moment the summit of the Alps?

Bonaparte conceived that by throwing himself upon the archduke before the arrival of the principal forces from the Rhine, he should more easily carry the passes of the Alps, next make his way through them, beat one after the other, as he had always done, the separate bodies of the Austrians, and if he were supported by a movement of the armies from the Rhine, advance to Vienna.

Consequently he reinforced Joubert, who had at Rivoli proved himself worthy of his entire confidence, with the divisions of Baraguet d'Hilliers and Delmas, and thus gave him a division eighteen thousand strong. He directed him to get up into the Tyrol, to fight generals Laudohn and Kerpen, and to utterly destroy their army, to drive them beyond the Brenner to the other side of the Alps, and then to file off to the right across the Pusterthal, so as to effect a junction with the grand army in Carinthia. Laudohn and Kerpen might doubtless return into the Tyrol, after Joubert should have rejoin'd the principal army; but they would want time to put themselves in order after a defeat, to obtain reinforcements, and to regain the Tyrol, and in the mean time Bonaparte would be at the gates of Vienna. To quiet the Tyrolese, he recommended to Joubert to show much regard for the priests, to speak well of the emperor and ill of his ministers, to touch none but the imperial wealth, and to make no change in the administration of the country. He directed the intrepid Masséna, with his fine division, ten thousand strong, to march upon the division which was in the centre towards Feltre and Belluno, to hasten to the narrow passes of the Ponteba, which come before the great pass of the Tarvis, to make himself master of the narrow defiles and the pass of that mountain, and thus to secure the outlet of Carinthia. His intention was himself to march with three divisions, twenty-five thousand strong, upon the Piave and the Tagliamento, to push the archduke before him into Carniola, then to fall down towards the road of Carinthia, to join Masséna at the pass of the Tarvis, to cross the Alps by that pass, to descend into the valley of the Drave and the Muër, take up Joubert, and march for Vienna. He reckoned upon the impetuosity and the audacity of his onset, and upon the impression which his prompt and terrible attacks ordinarily created.

Before he commenced his march, he gave to general Kilmaine the command of Upper Italy. Victor's division, posted en échelon in the Papal states, waiting till the thirty millions should be paid, was to return in a few days to the Adige, and there form with the Lombards the corps of observation. An extraordinary ferment prevailed in the Venetian provinces. The peasants and the mountaineers devoted to the priests and the aristocracy, and the cities agitated by the revolutionary spirit, were ready to come to blows. Bonaparte commanded general Kilmaine to observe the strictest neutrality, and set out to execute his vast projects. He issued as usual an energetic proclamation, calculated to increase the enthusiasm of his soldiers, supposing that had been possible. On the 20th Ventôse, year V. (March 10, 1797), the cold being intense, and the snow several feet deep on the mountains, he set his whole line in motion. Masséna commenced his operation upon the centre division, pushed it forwards on Feltre, Belluno, and Cadore, made a thousand prisoners, among whom was again general Lusignan, then descending upon Spilimbergo, he got far into the narrow defiles of the Ponteba, which precede the pass of the Tarvis. Bonaparte advanced with three divisions upon the Piave; Serrurier's division, which had so distinguished itself before Mantua; Augereau's division, now under the command of general Guyeux in the absence of Augereau, who had gone to take the column to Paris, and Bernadotte's division, which had come from the Rhine. This last formed a strong contrast, by its simplicity and its rugged appearance, with the old army of Italy, enriched in the beautiful plains which it had conquered, and composed of brave, fiery, and ill-regulated southerners. The soldiers of Italy, proud of their victories, derided the soldiers of the Rhine, and called them the contingent, alluding to the contingents of the circles of Germany, who in the emperor's armies were lazy in their duty. The soldiers of the Rhine, veterans in arms, were impatient to exhibit their courage before their rivals in glory. Some sabre cuts had already been exchanged on account of these raileries, and they were impatient to make a demonstration of their valour in the face of the enemy.

On the 23rd, (March 13,) the three divisions crossed the Piave, and were on the point of losing one man, who was in danger of being drowned, when a female sutler swam after him and saved him. Bonaparte gave the woman a gold necklace.

The enemy's advanced guards fell back to protect themselves behind the Tagliamento. All the troops of prince Charles in the Friule were there assembled to dispute the passage. The two young adversaries were about to meet. The one, in saving Germany by a felicitous idea, had in the preceding year acquired high reputation. He was brave, not at all wedded to the German routine, but very uncertain of success, and in great anxiety for his military reputation. The other had astonished Europe by the fertility and the boldness of his combinations; he feared nothing whatever. Although diffident till the battle of Lodi, he now deemed no genius equal to his own, and no soldier equal to the French soldier. On the morning of the 26th Ventôse (March 16), Bonaparte directed his three divisions by Valvasone to the bank of the Tagliamento. That river, the bed of which is badly mapped, descends from the Alps over gravel, and divides into a great number of branches, all fordable. The Austrian army was drawn up on the other bank, covering the level shingle of the river with its cannon balls, and holding its fine cavalry in readiness, deployed on its wings, so as to make it serviceable on these plains so favourable for military evolutions.

Bonaparte left Serrurier's division in reserve at Valvasone, and despatched the two divisions of Guyeux and Bernadotte; the former to the left, facing the village of Gradisca, where the enemy had made a lodgment; the latter to the right, facing Godroppo. The cannonade opened, and some skirmishes took place with the cavalry on the shingle. Bonaparte, finding the enemy too well prepared, feigned to give some rest to his troops, ordered the firing to cease, and directed them to begin their soup. The enemy thus led into error, imagined that these divisions having marched all night were about to halt and to take some rest. But at noon, Bonaparte all at once ordered them again under arms. Guyeux's division deployed on the left, Bernadotte's on the right. Battalions of grenadiers were formed. At the head of each division was placed the light infantry, ready to disperse as sharpshooters, then the grenadiers, who were to charge, and the dragoons who were to support them. The two divisions were deployed in rear of these two advanced guards. Each demi-brigade had its first battalion deployed in line, and the two others arranged in close column on the wings of the first. The cavalry was appointed to hover about on the wings. The army advanced in this manner towards the banks of the river, in the same order, and with the same self-possession, as if on parade.

General Dammartin on the left, and general Lespinasse on the right, made their artillery draw up. The light infantry dispersed and covered the banks of the Tagliamento with a cloud of riflemen. Bonaparte then gave the signal. The grenadiers of the two divisions entered the water, supported by the squadrons of cavalry, and advanced towards the other bank. "Soldiers of the Rhine!" exclaimed Bernadotte, "the army of Italy has its eyes upon you!" On both sides they dashed on with equal bravery. They rushed upon the enemy's army, and drove it back on every quarter. However, prince Charles had placed some heavy infantry at Gradisca, towards our left, and kept his cavalry towards our right wing, in order to extend his line beyond ours, and charge us by taking advantage of the plain. General Guyeux, at the head of his division, made a furious attack on Gradisca, and carried it. Bonaparte disposed his reserve cavalry towards our threatened wing, and ordered it to charge, under the command of general Dugua and adjutant-general Kellermann, upon the Austrian cavalry. Our squadrons charged with skill and impetuosity, took prisoner the general of the enemy's cavalry, and put it to the rout. Along the whole line the Tagliamento was cleared, and the enemy put to flight. We made four or five hundred prisoners; the ground, being open, did not give us the chance of making more.

Such was the battle of the 26th Ventôse (March 16), called the battle of Tagliamento. While it was taking place, Masséna, on the centre causeway, attacked Osopo, made himself master of the narrow defiles of the Ponteba, and drove the remains of Lusignan's and Orksey's division upon Tarwis.

The archduke Charles was fully sensible that, in order to guard the Carniola causeway and to cover Trieste, he must lose the Carinthia causeway, which was the most direct and the shortest, and that which Bonaparte meant to follow in his march to Vienna. The Carniola causeway communicates with that of Carinthia, and with the pass of Tarwis by a cross road, which runs through the valley of the Isonzo. The archduke Charles despatched the division of Bayalitsch by this route towards mount Tarwis, to get before Masséna, if possible. He afterwards retired with the rest of his forces upon the Friule, in order to dispute the passage of the Lower Isonzo.

Bonaparte followed him, and took possession of Palma-Nova, a Venetian fortress, which the archduke had occupied, and which contained immense stores. He then marched to Gradisca, a town situated in advance of the Isonzo. He arrived there on the 29th Ventôse (March 19). Bernadotte's division advanced towards Gradisca, which was badly intrenched, but guarded by three thousand men. In the mean time Bonaparte ordered Serrurier's division, a little below Gradisca, to cross the Isonzo at that place, and to cut off the retreat of the garrison. Bernadotte, without waiting for the result of the manœuvre, summoned the place to surrender. The commandant refused. The soldiers of the Rhine demanded permission to take the place by assault, that they might enter the town before the soldiers of Italy. They rushed upon the intrenchments, but a shower of balls and grape-shot struck down more than five hundred of them. Fortunately, Serrurier's manœuvre put an end to the battle. The three thousand men in Gradisca laid down their arms, and gave up their colours and cannon.

During this time Masséna had at length reached the pass of Tarwis, and after a very brisk action, made himself master of that passage of the Alps. The division of Bayalitsch, proceeding across the sources of the Isonzo to anticipate Masséna at Tarwis, would therefore find the outlet closed. The archduke Charles, foreseeing this result, left the rest of his army on the Friule and Carniola road, with orders to come and rejoin him behind the Alps at Klagenfurt; he then himself made the utmost haste to Villach, where numerous detachments were coming up from the Rhine, to make a fresh attack on Tarwis, to drive Masséna from it, and to re-open the road for Bayalitsch's division. Bonaparte, on his side, left Bernadotte's division to pursue the divisions that were retreating into Carniola, and with Guyeux's and Serrurier's divisions, proceeded to harass the Bayalitsch division in its rear, in its passage through the valley of the Isonzo.

Prince Charles, after rallying behind the Alps the wrecks of Lusignan and Orksey, who had lost the pass of Tarwis, reinforced them with six thousand grenadiers, the finest and bravest soldiers in the imperial service, and again attacked the pass of Tarwis, where Masséna had left scarcely a detachment. He succeeded in recovering it, and posted himself there with the regiments of Lusignan and Orksey, and the six thousand grenadiers. Masséna collected his whole division, in order to carry it again. Both generals were sensible of the importance of this point. Tarwis retaken, the French army would be masters of the Alps, and would make prisoners of the whole of Bayalitsch's division. Masséna rushed on headlong with his brave infantry, and suffered as usual in person. Prince Charles was not less clary of himself than the republican general, and several times ran the risk of being taken by the French riflemen. The pass of Tarwis is the loftiest of the Noric Alps. It overlooks Germany and Dalmatia. The battle took place above the clouds, amidst snow, and upon plains of ice. Whole lines of cavalry were thrown down and broken on this frightful field of battle. At length, after having brought forward his last battalion, the archduke Charles abandoned Tarwis to his pertinacious adversary, and found himself compelled to sacrifice Bayalitsch's division. Masséna, left master of Tarwis, fell down upon that division which now came up, attacked it in front, while it was pressed in the rear by the divisions of Guyeux and Serrurier, both under command of Bonaparte. That division had no other resource than to be made prisoners. A great number of soldiers, natives of Carniola and Croatia, escaped across the mountains, after throwing away their arms; but five thousand were left in the hands of the French, together with all the baggage, ammunition, and the artillery of the Austrian army, which had followed this route. Thus Bonaparte had reached in a fortnight the summit of the Alps, and in the place where he assumed the command, had completely realized his object.

In the Tyrol, Joubert justified his confidence by fighting the battles of the giants. The two generals Laudohn and Kerpen, occupied the two banks of the Adige. Joubert had attacked and beaten them at Saint Michael, killed two thousand of their men, and taken three thousand. Pursuing them without intermission to Newark and Tramin, and taking from them two thousand more men, he had thrown Laudohn to the left of the Adige into the valley of the Meran, and Kerpen to the right, to the foot of the Brenner. Kerpen, reinforced at Clausen by one of the two divisions coming from the Rhine, had been again beaten. He recruited himself anew at Mittenwald, with the second division of the Rhine, had been finally beaten, and ultimately retired beyond the Brenner. Joubert having thus cleared the Tyrol, had turned right about, and was marching through the Pusterthal to rejoin his commander-in-chief. It was now the 12th Germinal (April 1), and Bonaparte was already master of the heights of the Alps, had taken nearly twenty thousand prisoners; he was going to consolidate Joubert and Masséna with his principal army, and to march with fifty thousand men for Vienna. His adversary, broken, was using his utmost exertions to collect around him the wrecks of his army, and to join them to the troops which were coming up from the Rhine. Such was the result of this rapid and daring march.

But while Bonaparte was obtaining such speedy results, all that he had foreseen and apprehended on his rear was now actually taking place. The Venetian provinces, agitated by the revolutionary spirit, had risen. They had thus furnished the Venetian government with a pretext for calling out considerable forces, and placing itself in a condition to crush the French army in case it suffered a reverse. The provinces on the right bank of the Mincio were most infected with this revolutionary spirit, owing to the vicinity of Lombardy. In the towns of Bergamo, Brescia, Salò, and Crema, were numbers of great families to whom the yoke of the nobility of the golden book was intolerable, and who, supported by a numerous trading population, formed powerful parties. By following the advice of Bonaparte, by opening the pages of the golden book, by introducing some reforms into the ancient constitution, the government of Venice might have disarmed the formidable party which had sprung up in all the continental provinces; but the usual unreflecting spirit of all aristocracies had prevented this settlement, and rendered a revolution inevitable. The part the French took in this revolution can easily be perceived, notwithstanding all the absurdities invented by malice and repeated by stupidity. The army of Italy was composed of southern, in other words, ardent revolutionists. In all their intercourse with the subjects of Venice it could not but happen but the army should bring over the Venetians to their mode of thinking, and excite a revolt against the most odious of European aristocracies; but this was not to be avoided, and neither the government or the French generals could prevent it. As for the intentions of the directory and Bonaparte, they were clear enough. The directory wished for the downfall of all the Italian governments in the common course of things; but it had determined not to take any active part in accelerating the event; and besides, it relied entirely on Bonaparte to conduct the political and military operations in Italy. As for Bonaparte himself, he had too much need of union, tranquillity, and friendly powers in his rear, to think of revolutionizing Venice. An arrangement between the two parties would have suited him much better. This arrangement and our alliance being refused, he purposed to demand on his return what he had not been able to obtain by fair means. But for the moment he meant to do nothing. His intentions on this point were positively expressed to his government, and he had given general Kilmaine the most strict orders not to take any part in political events, and to maintain tranquillity to the utmost of his power.

The towns of Bergamo and Brescia, the most agitated of the terra firma [or continent], were frequently in communication with Milan. Secret revolutionary committees were every where formed, for the purpose of corresponding with the Milanese patriots, and their aid was solicited to shake off the yoke of Venice. The victories of the French left no further doubt of the conclusive expulsion of the Austrians. The protectors of the aristocracy were therefore conquered; and although the French might have affected neutrality, it was clear that they would never have used their arms to bring those people whom they had relieved once more under the yoke. All those, therefore, who rose in insurrection would in all probability continue free. Such was the mode in which the Italians reasoned. The inhabitants of Bergamo, who were more closely connected with Milan, wrote to that city, and secretly inquired of the Milanese leaders whether they could rely upon their support, and upon the assistance of the Lombard legion, commanded by Lahoz. Ottolini, the podesta of Bergamo, the same who, like a trusty agent of the state inquisitors, gave money and arms to the peasants and mountaineers, had spies among the Milanese patriots; he knew what was going on, and obtained the names of the principal inhabitants of Bergamo, agents of the revolt. He lost no time in despatching a courier to Venice, to carry their names to the state inquisitors, and to call for their apprehension. The inhabitants of Bergamo, apprized of the danger, sent messengers after the bearer of the despatch, who overtook and stopped him, and published the names of those amongst them who were compromised. This event determined the outbreak. On the 11th March, at the very time Bonaparte was marching to the Piave, the disturbance began in Bergamo. Ottolini, the podesta, made great threats, to which no one hearkened. The French commandant, whom Bonaparte had placed in the citadel with a garrison to watch the motions of the mountaineers of the Bergamasque, increased his vigilance, and doubled all his posts. His influence and support were appealed to by both parties; his answer was that he could not interfere in the contests of Venetian subjects with their government, and said that the doubling of the posts was only a precaution for the safety of the place committed to his charge. In executing his orders and remaining neutral, he did quite enough for the Bergamasques. The latter assembled on the following day, March 12, formed a provisional municipality, declared the town of Bergamo free, and drove away Ottolini, the podesta, who retired with the Venetian troops. They immediately sent an address to Milan, to obtain the support of the Lombards. The conflagration could not fail to spread rapidly to Brescia and to all the neighbouring cities. The inhabitants of Bergamo, as the first act of their newly-acquired freedom, sent a deputation to Brescia. The presence of these Bergamasques made the Brescians rise. It was Battaglia, the same Venetian who had given such prudent counsel in the deliberations of the senate, who was podesta of Brescia. He did not believe that he could stem the torrent, and therefore he gave way. The revolution of that city was brought about on the 15th March. The flame continued to spread, proceeding along the foot of the mountains. From Bergamo and Brescia it communicated to Salò, where the revolution was accomplished in like manner by the arrival of Bergamasques and Brosicians, by the flight of the Venetian authorities, and in the face of the French garrisons, who remained neuter, but whose aspect, silent though they were, filled the revolted with hope. This rising of the patriotic party in the towns could not, but as a matter of course, induce the rising of the opposite party in the mountains and in the country. The mountaineers and the peasants, armed long before by Ottolini, received the signal from the capuchins and the monks, who came to preach in the hamlets; they got ready to go and sack the insurgent towns, and, if they could, murder the French. From that moment the French generals could no longer remain inactive, much as they wished to continue neuter. They were too well acquainted with the intentions of the mountaineers and of the peasants to suffer them to take up arms; and without wishing to give support to either party, they found themselves compelled to interpose, and to repress that party which entertained and declared hostile intentions against themselves. Kilmaine immediately ordered general Lahoz, commander of the Lombard legion, to march towards the mountains to oppose their arming. He had no wish, nor was it his duty, to impede the operations of the Venetian regular troops, if they came to act against the insurgent towns; but he would not suffer a rising, the result of which was incalculable in case of a defeat in Austria. He immediately despatched couriers to Bonaparte, and sent to hasten the march of Victor's division, which was returning from the Papal states.

The government of Venice, as it always happens in every unenlightened government, which will not prevent danger by granting what is indispensable, was alarmed at these events, just as if they had been unforeseen. The Venetian government immediately put in motion the troops it had long been getting together, and sent them to the towns on the right bank of the Mincio. At the same time, persuaded that the French were the secret influence to whom they should apply, they addressed themselves to Lallemand, the minister of France, inquiring whether, in this extremity of danger, the republic of Venice could rely on the friendship of the directory. Lallemand's reply was simple, and dictated by his position. He declared that he had no instructions from his government to meet this case, which was true; but he added that if the Venetian government would introduce into its constitution such reforms as the time required, he considered that France would cheerfully lend her assistance. Lallemand could not have given any other answer; for if France had proffered her alliance to Venice against the other powers, she had never offered it to her against her own subjects; and she could not offer it to her against them, but on condition that the government should adopt wise and rational principles. The great council of Venice deliberated on Lallemand's answer. It was several centuries since the proposal of a change of constitution had been publicly made. Out of two hundred votes it obtained but five. Some fifty voices were for adopting some energetic determination; but one hundred and eighty declared in favour of a slow and gradual reform, to be referred to less troublous times, in other words, in favour of an evasive determination. It was resolved two deputies should be immediately sent to Bonaparte, to sound his intentions, and to call for his assistance. They made selection of one of the sages of the continent (sages de terre ferme), J. B. Cornaro, and the well-known procurator, Pezaro, whom we have already seen so often in the presence of the general.

The couriers from Kilmaine and the Venetian envoys reached Bonaparte at the moment when his bold manœuvres had ensured to him the line of the Alps, and had enabled him to make his way into the hereditary states. He was at Gorice, occupied settling the capitulation of Trieste. He received with unaffected concern intelligence of the events that were taking place on his rear, and one may very well imagine this, when the audacity and the danger of his march upon Vienna is taken into consideration. Besides, his despatches to the directory plainly exhibit the concern he felt; and those who have said that he did not express his real sentiments in those despatches, have not shown great judgment, since he made no scruple of avowing his least creditable artifices against the Italian governments. But what could he do under such circumstances? It would not be generous in him to forcibly repress the party that proclaimed our own principles, the very party that welcomed and received our armies, and ensured the triumph to a party which was ready, in case of a reverse, to annihilate our principles and our armies altogether. He resolved to make the most of this circumstance, so as to obtain from the envoys of Venice the concessions and the relief which he had not yet been able to wring from them. He received the two envoys with politeness, and gave them an audience on the 5th Germinal (March 25). "For me to arm against my friends," said he, "against those who welcome us and are ready to defend us, in favour of my enemies, in favour of those who detest and would slaughter us, is quite out of the question. This base policy is as far from my heart as from my interest. Never will I lend my aid against those principles for which France has achieved her revolution, and to which I owe in part the success of my arms. But I offer you once more my friendship and my advice. Ally yourselves heart and hand with France; embrace her principles; make those reforms that are indispensably necessary to your constitution; then I will answer for every thing, and without using violent measures, to which I never can assent, I will obtain by my influence over the people of Italy, and by the promise of a more rational system, the restoration of order and peace. This result would be quite as much for your advantage as for mine." This language, which was sincere, and the wisdom of which needs no demonstration, was by no means agreeable to the Venetian envoys, and especially to Pezaro. This was not what they wanted: they were desirous that Bonaparte should restore the fortresses he had occupied by way of precaution in Bergamo, Brescia, and Verona; that he should support the armament of the fanatic party against the patriotic party, and that he should thus allow another war like that of Vendée to be raised up against him in his rear. This was not the way to come to a mutual understanding. Bonaparte, whose disposition was peremptory, behaved with rudeness to the two deputies, and reminding them of the proceedings of the Venetians towards the French army, declared that he well knew their secret inclinations and designs; but that he was a match for them, and that he had an army in Lombardy to look after them. The conference grew warm. They passed from these questions to that of supplies. Hitherto Venice had furnished provisions for the French army, and she had given Bonaparte a good reason for demanding them at her hands by supplying the Austrian army. The Venetians were desirous that Bonaparte, having entered the hereditary states, should no longer have his army kept at their expense. This was by no means his intention, for he did not mean to require any thing of the inhabitants of Austria, so that he might conciliate them. The contractors whom Venice had secretly employed to supply the French army had ceased to send provisions, and the general had been obliged to levy requisitions in the Venetian states. "This is a vicious expedient," said Bonaparte; "it distresses the inhabitant, and affords occasion for abominable peculations; this campaign will cost me a million a month so long as this campaign lasts; it will not be a long one. The French republic will afterwards settle with you, and will be better satisfied with this million than for all the vexation you suffer from the requisitions. Besides, you have been supplying all my enemies, you have afforded them an asylum; you should do the same for me." The two envoys replied that the treasury was impoverished. "If it be so," answered Bonaparte, "take money out of the treasury of the duke of Modena, whom you have harboured to the detriment of my allies, the Modenese; get it from the property of the English, of the Russians, of the Austrians, of any of my enemies you have now in safe keeping." The parties separated in an ill humour. A fresh interview took place on the following day. Bonaparte, who was then in a better temper, renewed all his proposals; but Pezaro did nothing to satisfy him, and merely promised to inform the senate of all his demands. Bonaparte, whose irritation could no longer be concealed, then grasped the arm of Pezaro, and said, "Now I tell you plainly I know what you are about; I know what you are preparing for me; but mark me! If while I shall be engaged in a distant expedition, you murder my sick, if you attack my depôts, if you threaten my retreat, you will have done for yourselves. What I might forgive while in Italy, would be an unpardonable crime while I am engaged in Austria. If you take up arms, you decide either my ruin or your own. Consider this, and do not hazard the infirm lion of Saint Mark against the fortune of an army which would find in its depôts and its hospitals wherewithal to cross your lagoons and to destroy you." This energetic language frightened, without convincing, the Venetian envoys, who wrote off at once the result of this conference. Bonaparte also wrote immediately to Kilmaine, ordering him to increase his vigilance, to punish the French commandants if they overstepped the bounds of neutrality, and to disarm all the mountaineers and peasants.

Things had gone too far to stop. The insurrection of Bergamo had taken place on the 22nd Ventôse (March 12), that of Brescia on the 27th (March 17), that of Salò on the 4th Germinal (March 24). On the 8th Germinal (March 28)

the town of Crema effected its revolution, and the French troops were compelled to engage therein. A detachment which preceded Victor's division, returning to Lombardy, presented itself at the gates of Crema. It was in a moment of agitation. The sight of the French troops could not fail to increase the hopes and the boldness of the patriots. The Venetian podesta, who was frightened, at first refused admission to the French; he then introduced forty of them, who made themselves masters of the gates of the town, and opened them to the rest of the French troops that followed. The inhabitants seized the opportunity, rose, and sent off the Venetian podesta. The French had done this merely to open themselves a passage; the patriots took advantage of it to rise. When such inclinations exist every thing helps, and the most involuntary circumstances have results which induce a suspicion of concert where none really exists. Such was the situation of the French, who, there is no doubt, personally desired the revolution, but who officially observed neutrality.

The mountaineers and the peasants, excited by the agents of Venice and by the sermons of the capuchins, overran the country. The Slavonian regiments, landed from the lagoons upon the continent, advanced towards the insurgent towns. Kilmaine had issued orders, and set in motion the Lombard legion to disarm the peasants. Several skirmishes had already taken place; villages had been burned, and some peasants seized and disarmed. But the latter, on their part, began to sack the towns, and to slaughter the French, whom they distinguished by the name of Jacobins. They had even already murdered, in a horrible manner, all those whom they met with singly. They first effected a counter-revolution at Salò; and thereupon a body of the inhabitants of Bergamo and Brescia, supported by a detachment of the Poles of the Lombard legion, immediately marched upon Salò to drive away the mountaineers. Some persons sent to parley were induced to enter the town, and were slaughtered; the detachment was surrounded and beaten. Two hundred Poles were taken prisoners and sent to Venice. The known partisans of the French were seized at Salò, at Verona, and in all the Venetian towns; they were confined under the leads, and the state inquisitors, emboldened by this petty success, showed themselves inclined to take cruel vengeance. It is asserted that it was forbidden to cleanse the canal of Orfano, which was appropriated, as it is well known, to the horrible purpose of drowning prisoners of state. However, the government of Venice, while it was inclined to exhibit the greatest severities, strove to deceive general Bonaparte by acts of apparent compliance, and granted the million a month which he had demanded. The murder of the French, whenever they could be found, still continued. Their situation became extremely critical, and Kilmaine despatched fresh couriers to Bonaparte. The latter, when apprised of the battle fought by the mountaineers, the events of Salò, where two hundred Poles had been made prisoners, the confinement of all those in the interest of France, and the murders committed upon the French, was exceedingly enraged. He immediately sent an astounding letter to the senate, in which he recapitulated his complaints, and de-such interests to real advantages; that, on the present occasion, they would treat on a footing of equality; and that France and the emperor should alternately take the initiative.

They then proceeded to the consideration of the essential questions. The first and most important article was the cession of the Belgic provinces to France. Austria could no longer think of withholding them. It was first agreed that the emperor should cede to France all the Belgic provinces; that moreover he should consent, as a member of the Germanic empire, that France should extend her frontiers to the Rhine. There was a question as to indemnities, and the emperor had demanded that sufficient indemnities should be given him either in Germany or in Italy. There were two modes of procuring them for him in Germany, either by giving him Bavaria, or by secularizing several ecclesiastical states of the empire. The first idea had more than once engaged the attention of European diplomacy. The second is attributable to Rawbell, who had devised this expedient, as being most accordant and consistent with the spirit of the revolution. In fact, it was no longer a time for bishops to be temporal sovereigns, and Rawbell indeed was astute in making the ecclesiastical power contribute to the augmentation the French republic was about to receive. But the acquisitions of the emperor in Germany would hardly have met with the concurrence of Prussia. Besides, if Bavaria were given to him, indemnities would have to be provided for the prince to whom it belonged. Lastly, the states of Germany being under the immediate influence of the emperor, he would not gain much by acquiring them, and he far preferred aggrandizements in Italy, which really did add new territories to his power. It became therefore necessary to think of seeking indemnities in Italy.

Had the immediate restoration of Lombardy to the emperor been assented to; if an engagement had been entered into for maintaining the republic of Venice in its present state, and not permitting democracy to advance to the frontiers of the Alps; he would instantly have consented to the peace, and acknowledged the Cispadane republic, composed of the duchy of Modena, the two Legations, and Romagna. But to subject Lombardy again to the Austrian yoke, Lombardy who showed so strong an attachment for us, who had made such exertions and such sacrifices for us, and whose principal inhabitants were so deeply compromised, would have been an odious and weak act; for our situation allowed us to demand more. We were therefore bound to ensure the independence of Lombardy, and to look in Italy for such indemnities as would compensate Austria for the twofold loss of Belgium and of Lombardy. There was a very simple arrangement, which had more than once occurred to European diplomatists, and had more than once been a subject of hope to Austria, and of fear to Venice; this was to indemnify Austria with the Venetian states. The Illyrian provinces, Istria, and the whole of Upper Italy, from the Isonzo to the Oglio, formed rich dominions, and could supply ample indemnities to Austria. The manner in which the Venetian aristocracy had conducted itself towards France, its constant refusals to make alliance with her, its secret armaments, the evident object of which was to fall upon the French in case of a reverse, the recent rising of the mountaineers and peasants, and the murder of French subjects, had filled Bonaparte with indignation. Besides, if the emperor, for whom Venice had secretly armed, accepted her spoils, Bonaparte, against whom she had prepared those armaments, could not have any scruple to cede them. After all, there would yet be indemnities left to offer to Venice. There was Lombardy, the duchy of Modena, the Legations of Bologna, and Ferrara, and Romagna, rich and important provinces, part of which formed the Cispadane republic. Venice might be indemnified with some of these provinces. This arrangement appeared the most suitable; and here for the first time was laid down the principle of indemnifying Austria with the continental provinces of Venice without prejudice to compensating Venice with other Italian provinces.

Recourse was had to Vienna, which was scarcely twenty-five leagues distant. This kind of indemnity was agreed upon; the preliminaries of peace were immediately settled and reduced into articles, which were to serve as the basis of a definitive negotiation. The emperor ceded to France all his possessions in the Netherlands, and consented, as a member of the empire, that the republic should acquire the boundary of the Rhine. He further renounced Lombardy. As an indemnification for all these cessions, he was to receive the Venetian continental territories, Illyria, Istria, and Upper Italy as far as the Oglio. Venice remained independent, retaining the Ionian islands, and was to receive compensations taken from the provinces at the disposal of France. The emperor acknowledged the republics which were about to be founded in Italy. The French army was to retire from the Austrian states, and be distributed in cantonments on the frontiers of those states; that is to say, to evacuate Carinthia and Carniola, and to be posted on the Isonzo, and at the outlets of the Tyrol. All the arrangements relative to the Venetian provinces and government were to be made to the mutual satisfaction of Austria and France. Two congresses were to be opened, one at Berne for the separate peace with the emperor, the other in a city of Germany for the peace with the empire. The peace with the emperor was to be concluded in three months, otherwise the preliminaries were to be annulled. Austria had another powerful reason for hastening the conclusion of the definitive treaty, and that was to enter into possession as soon as possible of the Venetian provinces, so that the French might not have time to propagate revolutionary ideas in that quarter.

Bonaparte's design was to dismember the Cispadane republic, composed of the duchy of Modena, the two legations, and Romagna; to unite the duchy of Modena with Lombardy, and to create with them a single republic, having Milan for its capital, under the style of the Cisalpine republic, from its situation with reference to the Alps. He then purposed giving the two Legations and Romagna to Venice, taking care to humble its aristocracy and to reform its constitution. After this fashion there would be in Italy two republics allied with France, owing their existence to her, and inclined to concur in her plans. The Cisalpine would have the Oglio for its frontier, which it 1797.

April.
(Germinal.)

Justification of the policy of partitioning Italy.

THE DIRECTORY.

Hoche's successes on the Rhine.—Passage of the Rhine by Desaix.

711

would be easy to fortify. It would not possess Mantua, which, with the Mantuan, would continue to belong to the emperor; but Pizzighitone on the Adda might be made a first-rate fortress; and the walls of Berginamo and Orena might be rebuilt. The republic of Venice with her islands, with the Dogado and the Polesino, which Bonaparte would do his utmost to preserve for her, with the two Legations and Romagna, which were to be given to her with the province of Massa-Carrara, and the Gulf of Spezzia, which was to be added thereto in the Mediterranean, would be a maritime power, opening on two seas.

It may be asked why Bonaparte did not avail himself of his position to drive the Austrians at once from Italy; and why, in particular, he indemnified them at the expense of a neutral power, and by an act similar to the partition of Poland. In the first place, was it possible entirely to emancipate Italy? Should we not have had to turn Europe upside down once more before we could bring it to consent to the overthrow of the pope, of the king of Sardinia, of the grand-duke of Tuscany, of the Bourbons of Naples, and of the duke of Parma? Was the French republic in a state to make those renewed exertions which such an enterprise would have demanded? Was it not a great thing to have sown in this campaign the seeds of liberty, by constituting two republics, whence she could not fail soon to extend herself to the remotest parts of the Peninsula? The partition of the Venetian states did not in any one thing resemble that notorious outrage with which Europe has been so frequently reproached. Poland was partitioned by the very powers which had made her to rise, and had promised her their assistance. Venice, to whom the French had in all sincerity offered their friendship, had refused it, and prepared to betray them, and to surprise them in a moment of danger. If she had cause of complaint, it was against the Austrians, for whose benefit she wished to betray the French. Poland was a state whose limits were distinctly marked on the map of Europe, whose independence, if we may so express ourselves, was dictated by its natural position, and was of consequence, so far as the tranquillity of the west was concerned; whose constitution, though vicious, was liberal; whose citizens, unworthily betrayed, had exhibited a noble courage, and deserved the sympathy of civilized nations. Venice, on the contrary, had no natural territory but her lagoons, for her power had never resided in her continental possessions; she was not destroyed, because some of her provinces were exchanged for others; her constitution was the most corrupt in Europe; her government was abhorred by her subjects; her perfidy and her cowardice gave her no claim to sympathy or to existence. There was nothing then in the partition of the Venetian states that could be compared with the partition of Poland, unless it were the manner in which Austria had acted.

Besides, before we could be exempted from giving such indemnities to the Austrians, we must have expelled them from Italy, and this could only be done by treating in Vienna itself. But to effect this we must have had the concurrence of the armies of the Rhine, and Bonaparte had been written to, that they could not take the field in less than a month. All that he could have done in this situation would have been to fall back, to wait for their taking the field, which would have exposed him to numerous inconveniences; for it would have given time to the archduke to prepare a formidable army against him, and to Hungary to rise en masse and fall upon his flanks. Moreover, he would have been obliged to fall back, and almost to acknowledge the imprudent hardihood of his march. In accepting the preliminaries, he had the honour of individually extorting peace; he reaped the fruit of his very daring march; he obtained conditions which, in the situation of Europe, were very splendid, and were, above all, far more advantageous than those which had formed the instructions for Clarke, since they stipulated for the line of the Rhine and the Alps, and for a republic in Italy. Thus, partly for political and military reasons, partly from personal considerations, he made up his mind to sign the preliminaries. Clarke had not yet arrived at head-quarters. With his accustomed boldness, and the confidence suggested by his reputation, his name, and the general desire for peace, Bonaparte overstepped his powers, and signed the preliminaries, just as if it were a question of a mere armistice. The signature was given at Leoben, on the 29th Germinal, year V. (April 18, 1797.)

If at this moment he could have known what was taking place on the Rhine, he would not have been in such a hurry to sign the preliminaries of Leoben; but he knew no more than what had been written to him, and he had been informed that the inactivity of the army would be protracted. He immediately sent off Masséna to carry the preliminaries to Paris. This brave general was the only one who had not been sent to carry the colours to Paris, and receive the honours of the triumph. Bonaparte deemed this a fine opportunity for sending him, and one that was worthy of the important services which he had rendered. He also despatched couriers to the armies of the Rhine and of the Sambre and Meuse, who travelled through Germany, in order to get thither as quickly as possible, and to put an end to all hostilities if they had commenced.

They had in fact commenced at the very time while the signature of the preliminaries was taking place. Hoche, long impatient to enter into action, was incessantly demanding permission to commence hostilities. Moreau had hastened to Paris, to solicit the funds necessary for the purchase of materials for a bridge. It was at last ordered. Hoche, at the head of his fine army, debouched by Neuwied, while Championnet, with the right wing, debouched by Düsseldorf, and marched to Uckerath and Altenkirchen. Hoche attacked the Austrians at Heddersdorf, where they had thrown up considerable intrenchments, killed a great number of them, and took five thousand prisoners. After this brilliant action, he advanced rapidly upon Frankfurt, always beating Kray, and striving to cut off his retreat. He was on the point of surrounding him by a skillful manoeuvre, and perhaps of taking him, when there came Bonaparte's courier, who announced the signature of the preliminaries. This circumstance stopped Hoche in the midst of his victorious career, and caused him deep mortification, for he once more saw himself stopped short in his career. If the couriers had but been sent first to Paris, he would have had time to take Kray and all his army, which would have added a glorious exploit to his life, and have had the greatest influence on the subsequent negotiations. While Hoche was advancing thus rapidly upon the Nidda, Desaix, who had been authorized by Moreau to cross the Rhine, attempted one of the boldest actions recorded in the history of the war. He had chosen for crossing the Rhine a point much lower down than Strasburg. After grounding with his troops upon an island of gravel, he had at length got to the opposite shore. There he had remained for twenty-four hours, liable to be thrown into the Rhine, and obliged to contend against the whole Austrian army in order to keep his ground in copses and marshes, till the bridge was thrown across the river. At length the passage was effected; the Austrians had been pursued into the Black mountains, and some part of their baggage seized. Here also the army was stopped amidst its successes by the courier sent from Léoben; and it was much to be regretted that the false statements sent to Bonaparte should have determined him to sign so soon.

The couriers next arrived at Paris, where they gave great joy to those who wished for peace, but not to the directory, who, deeming our situation commanding, was sorry to see that it had not been turned to better account. Larévellière and Rewbell, as philosophers, desired the entire emancipation of Italy; Barras, like a fiery revolutionist, wished that the republic should humble the powers; Carnot, who for some time past affected moderation, and who generally supported the views of the opposition, approved of the peace, and argued that, in order to make it durable, the emperor should not be too much humiliated. Warm discussions on the subject of the preliminaries took place in the directory; nevertheless, in order not to alienate public opinion, and not to appear to be desirous of everlasting war, it was decided that the basis established at Léoben should be approved of.

During these occurrences on the Rhine and in France, important events were bursting forth in Italy. We have already observed that Bonaparte, who had received intelligence of the disturbances which agitated the Venetian states, of the rising of the mountaineers against the towns, of the check of the Brescians before Salò, of the capture of the two hundred Poles, of the murder of a great number of Frenchmen, and of the imprisonment of all their partisans, had written at Léoben a letter expressing the utmost indignation to the Venetian senate. He had ordered Junot, his aid-de-camp, to read it himself to the senate, and then to demand the liberation of all the prisoners, as well as that search should be made for the murderers who were to be delivered over to the French; and he further ordered him to quit Venice immediately, at the same time posting up a declaration of war if complete satisfaction were not granted. Junot was introduced to the senate on the 26th Germinal (April 15). He read the threatening letter of his general, and he conducted himself with all the rudeness of a soldier so peculiar to a soldier of fortune. He was answered, that the armaments that had been prepared had for their object nothing else than the maintenance of subordination in the territories of the republic; that if murders had been committed, it was an accident they could not have prevented, but for which amends should be made. Junot would not be put off with empty words. He threatened to post up the declaration of war unless they instantly released the state-prisoners and the Poles, and unless orders were given for disarming the mountaineers, and for following up all those who had committed the murders. At last they contrived to pacify Junot, and it was settled with him and the French minister, Lallemand, that the senate should write to general Bonaparte, and send two deputies to arrange with him as to the amends he would require to be made. The two deputies appointed were Francis Donat and Leopold Justiniani.

But in the mean time the agitation in the Venetian states continued. The towns were still in hostility with the country and mountaineer population. The agents of the aristocratic and monkish party spread the grossest misrepresentations relative to the fate of the French army in Austria. They asserted that it had been surrounded and destroyed, and they relied upon two facts as supporting their false intelligence. Bonaparte, in drawing closer to him the two corps of Joubert and Bernadotte, which he had ordered to march, the one through the Tyrol, the other through Carniola, had exposed his wings. Joubert had beaten and driven Kerpen beyond the Alps; but he had left Laudohn in a part of the Tyrol, from whence the latter had soon reappeared, raising the whole loyal population of those mountains, and descending the Adige, to proceed to Verona. General Servier left with twelve hundred men to guard the Tyrol, retired foot by foot upon Verona, to seek refuge with the French troops remaining in Upper Italy. At the same time, a division of the same strength, left in Carniola, retired before the Croats, who had risen like the Tyrolese, and fell back upon Palma Nova. These were matters of no great importance, and Lallemand, the French minister, strove to demonstrate their unimportance to the Venetian government, that it might desist from further acts of imprudence; but all these arguments were of no force; and at the very time that Bonaparte was compelling the Austrian plenipotentiaries to come to his head-quarters to treat, it was reported in the Venetian states that he was beaten, surrounded, and must inevitably perish in his hare-brained expedition. The party hostile to the French and to the revolution, at the head of which were several members of the Venetian government, without the government appearing to be identified with it, was in higher spirits than ever. At Verona, the agitation was particularly violent. This, the most important city of the Venetian states, was the first exposed to the revolutionary contagion, for it stood next to Salò upon the line of the insurgent towns. The Venetians were extremely desirous to save it, and to drive the French from it. Every thing seemed to concur favorably for them in this respect, not so much the inclinations of the inhabitants, as the great concourse of the mountaineers, and the approach of general Laudohn. There were already in the city Italian and Slavonian troops in the service of Venice. More were advancing towards the place, and very soon all the communications with the neighbouring towns were occupied. General Bal-lard, who commanded the French garrison at Verona, found himself cut off from the other commandants posted in the environs. More than twenty thousand mountaineers overran the country. The French detachments were attacked on the roads; Capuchins preached to the populace in the streets, and a false manifesto of the podesta of Verona was circulated, for the purpose of exciting the people to slaughter the French. This manifesto was a forgery, and the name of Bataglin, subscribed thereto, is enough to prove its falsity; but it did not the less fail to add to the general excitement. At length, a communication emanating from the leaders of the party in Verona informed general Laudohn that he might approach, and that they were going to deliver the citadel to him. It was on the 26th and 27th Germinal (April 15 and 16) that all this took place. There were no news from Léoben, and the moment in fact appeared most suitably chosen for an outbreak.

General Balland kept upon his guard. He had given his troops orders to retire into the fortifications on the first signal. He complained to the Venetian authorities of the treatment experienced by the French, and particularly of the preparations which he saw making; but he obtained only evasive replies, and no real satisfaction. He wrote to Mantua and to Milan asking for assistance, and held himself ready to retire into the fortifications. On the 28th Germinal (April 17), which was Easter Monday, an extraordinary agitation was exhibited in Verona; bands of peasants entered, shouting, "Death to the Jacobins!" Balland withdrew his troops into the fortifications, left mere detachments at the gates, and gave notice that on the first act of violence he would fire upon the city. But about noon whistlings were heard in the streets: the people fell upon the French; armed bands attacked the detachments left to guard the gates, and butchered those who had not time to regain the forts. A set of ferocious wretches flew upon those Frenchmen whose duties kept them in Verona, stabbed them with daggers, and threw them into the Adige. Even the hospitals were not spared, and they were stained with the blood of some of the patients. In the mean time those who could get away, but had not time to run to the fortifications, fled to the government-house, where the Venetian authorities afforded them an asylum, in order that the massacre might not appear to be their doing. Already more than four hundred unfortunate persons had perished, and the French garrison could not contain itself for rage at seeing the French slaughtered, and their bodies floating at a distance upon the Adige. General Balland immediately gave the order to fire, and showered cannon-balls upon the city. He could have reduced it to ashes. But although the mountaineers who had entered concerned themselves but little about this, the inhabitants and the Venetian magistrates resolved to come to some terms in order to save their city. They sent a flag of truce to general Balland, in order to come to some understanding with him, and to stop further damage. General Balland consented to hear what they had to say, with a view to save the unhappy individuals who had taken refuge in the government-palace, and who were threatened with revenge for all the damage done to the city. Among the number were women and children belonging to the officers of the civil administrations, and patients escaped from the hospitals; and it was of importance to put them out of the reach of danger. Balland insisted that they should be delivered up to him immediately, that they should turn the mountaineers and the Sclavonian regiments out of the town, that they should disarm the populace, and that some of the Venetian magistrates should be given him as hostages and guarantees for the submission of the city. The bearers of the flag of truce desired that an officer should go to the government-palace to treat. The brave brigadier-general (chef de brigade) Beaupoil, had the courage to undertake this. Having made his way through the furious populace, who would have torn him in pieces, he came before the Venetian authorities. The whole night was passed in vain discussions with the providitors and the podesta, without being able to come to any understanding. They would not disarm, they would not give hostages, they wanted guarantees against the vengeance that general Bonaparte would not fail to take on the rebellious city. But during this parley, the agreement not to fire during these conferences was violated by the ferocious hordes that had taken possession of Verona; they exchanged a fire of musketry with the forts, and our troops made occasional sallies. Next morning, the 29th Germinal (April 18), Beaupoil returned to the forts, exposed to the greatest possible dangers, without having gained any thing. It was now learned that the Venetian magistrates, unable to keep the furious multitude within bounds, had disappeared. The firing of musketry against the fort was renewed. General Balland then ordered the firing to be renewed, and kept up a most heavy cannonade-fire upon the city. It was on fire in several places. Some of the principal inhabitants were collected at the government-palace in order to take the government of the city in the absence of the authorities. A fresh parley took place; it was agreed that the firing should cease; but this agreement was not better adhered to by the insurgents than the previous, for the insurgents kept up an incessant fire upon the fortifications. The savage peasants who covered the country fell upon the garrison of the fort of La Chiusa, situated on the Adige, and killed every body there. They treated the French scattered in the villages around Verona in the same manner.

But the moment of vengeance was not long deferred. Couriers had been despatched from all quarters to put general Kilmaine on his guard. Troops were coming in from all quarters. Kilmaine gave orders to general Chabran to march immediately with twelve hundred men; to Lahoz, commander of the Lombard legion, to advance with eight hundred; and to generals Victor and Baraguay d'Hilliers, to march with their divisions. While the troops were executing these movements, general Laudohn, receiving intelligence of the signature of the preliminaries, halted upon the Adige. After a sanguinary battle, which general Chabran had to fight with the Venetian troops, the city of Verona was surrounded on all sides, and then the furious wretches who had massacred the French after the most atrocious violence, now exhibited the most abject feeling. They had never ceased to alternately parley and fire from the 1st to the 5th Floreal (April 20—25). The Venetian magistrates had again made their appearance; they still wanted guarantees against the vengeance which threatened them; twenty-four hours were given them to decide; they again disappeared. A provisional municipality supplied their place, and on seeing the French troops masters of the city and ready to reduce it to ashes, it surrendered unconditionally. General Kilmaine did what he could to prevent pillage, but he could not save the Mont de Piété, which was partly plundered. He ordered some of the known leaders of the insurrection, taken in arms, to be shot; he imposed upon the city a levy of eleven hundred thousand francs, for the pay of the army, and sent out his cavalry upon all the roads to disarm the peasants, and to cut down those who resisted. He then exerted himself to restore order, and immediately despatched a report to the general-in-chief, awaiting his orders with regard to the rebel city. Such were the massacres known by the name of the Veronese Easter (Pâques Véronaises).

While this incident was taking place at Verona, an act still more odious, if possible, was committed in Venice itself. There was a regulation which prohibited armed vessels of the belligerent powers to enter the port of Lido. A lugger, commanded by captain Laugier, belonging to the French flotilla in the Adriatic, chased by Austrian frigates, had taken shelter under the batteries of Lido, and had saluted them with nine guns. He was ordered to sheer off, notwithstanding the weather, and the enemy's ships that were in pursuit of him. He was going to obey, when, without giving him time to get off, the batteries fired upon the unfortunate vessel, and riddled her without mercy. Captain Laugier, with a generous self-devotion, made his crew go down into the hold, and went himself upon deck with a speaking-trumpet to make himself heard and repeat that he was getting away, but he fell dead upon the deck with two of his crew. At the same moment the lugger was boarded by some Venetian boats, manned by Slavonians, who rushed upon deck and murdered the crew, with the exception of two or three unfortunate men, who were carried to Venice. This deplorable event happened on the 4th Floréal (April 23).

At this moment news arrived not only of the massacres at Verona, but of the capture of that city, and of the signature of the preliminaries. The government found itself completely compromised, and could no longer reckon upon the ruin of general Bonaparte, who, so far from being surrounded and beaten, was on the contrary victorious, and had just been dictating a peace to Austria. It was now going to face that all-powerful general, whose alliance it had refused, and whose soldiers it had been murdering. The government, in fact, was completely terrified. That it had officially ordered either the massacres at Verona or the cruelties perpetrated at the port of Lido, was by no means probable; and no one who is acquainted with the usual course pursued by governments under the influence of factions can suppose this to have been the case. Governments so circumstanced have no occasion to give orders for the execution of what they wish; all they have to do is to remove all restraint from that faction in whose sentiments they participate. They surrender their appliances to the faction, and thus make it the instrument of doing what they dare not do themselves. The insurgents of Verona had cannon; they were supported by Venetian regular regiments. Ottolui, podesta of Bergamo, had been supplied wholesale with all that was necessary for arming the peasants; thus, after furnishing the means, the government had only to suffer them to be employed; and this is the way in which it behaved. In the first moment, however, it acted without consideration, by rewarding the commandant of the Lido, for having, as it said, made the laws of Venice to be respected. It could not, therefore, flatter itself with the hope that available excuses could be tendered to general Bonaparte. It sent fresh instructions to the two deputies, Donat and Justiniani, who were at first directed only to reply to the demands made by Junot on the 26th Germinal (April 13). As yet the occurrences at Verona and the Lido were not known; but now the two deputies had a very different task to perform, and very different events to explain. They advanced amidst shouts of joy excited by the news of the peace, and they soon comprehended that they alone had cause to be sad amidst these important events. They learned on the road that Bonaparte, to punish them for the refusal of his alliance, for their severity to his partisans, and for some individual murders committed upon the French, had ceded part of their territories to Austria. What would be done when he should be acquainted with the atrocious circumstances which had since occurred!

Bonaparte was already on his return from Léoben, and, according to the tenour of the preliminaries, retreated with his army towards the Alps and the Isonzo. They found him at Gratz, and were introduced to him on the 6th Floréal (April 25). At this moment he had heard only of the massacres at Verona, which had begun on the 28th Germinal (April 17), and not of the affair of the Lido, which took place on the 4th Floréal (April 23). They had fortified themselves with a letter from a brother of the general's, in order that they might be the more graciously received. They came trembling into the presence of that man "truly extraordinary," as they said, "for the vivacity of his imagination, the promptness of his understanding, and the invincible force of his comprehension." He received them politely, and, repressing his indignation, permitted them to explain themselves at great length. Then breaking silence, he thus addressed them, "Are my prisoners released? Are the murderers punished? Are the peasants disarmed? I want no empty professions; my soldiers have been massacred; signal vengeance must be taken for this." The two envoys would have reverted to the circumstances which had obliged them to provide against the insurrection, to the disorders inseparable from such events, to the difficulty of discovering the real murderers. "A government so well served by spies as yours," replied Bonaparte sharply, "ought to know the real instigators of those murders. At any rate, I well know that it is as contemptible as it is despicable, and that it cannot now disarm those whom it has set in motion. I will myself disarm them. I have made peace. I have eighty thousand men; I will break up your leads. Venice shall find a second Attila in me. I will have no inquisition, no golden book; those are institutions of the barbarous ages. Your government is too aged by far; it can no longer stand. When I was at Gorice, I offered M. Pezaro my alliance and good counsel. He rejected them. You were waiting for my return to cut off my retreat; well, here I am. I will no longer parley; I am determined to lay down the law. If you have nothing else to tell me, I can only say that you may retire."

• Veramente originale, ma forse non più che per vivacità d'immaginazione, robustezza invincibile di sentimento, ed agilità vel ravvisarlo esternamente.

These words, uttered with great indignation, prostrated the Venetian envoys. They solicited a second interview, but they could not draw any other expressions from the general, who persisted in his intentions, and whose evident determination it was to give law to Venice, and to destroy by force an aristocracy whom he could not bring to reform itself in pursuance of his advice. But they had soon additional cause for apprehension, when they became acquainted with the particulars of the massacres at Verona, and especially with the detestable cruelty committed in the port of Lido. Not daring to make their appearance before Bonaparte, they ventured to write him a most submissive letter, offering him every explanation he could desire. "I cannot receive you," he replied, "covered all over as you are with French blood; I will hearken to you when you have delivered to me the three state-inquisitors, the commandant of the Lido, and the officer who has the conduct of the Venetian police." However, as they had received a recent courier relative to the event at the Lido, he consented to see them, but refused to listen to any proposal, till they had delivered up to him the persons whom he demanded. The two Venetians, then seeking to avail themselves of a faculty the republic had frequently employed with effect, endeavoured to propose to him a reparation of another kind. "No, no," replied the irritated general; "if you were to cover your bench with gold, all your treasures, all the treasures of Peru, could not pay for the blood of one of my soldiers."

Bonaparte dismissed them. It was the 13th Floreal (May 2). He immediately issued a proclamation of war against Venice. The French constitution did not permit either the directory or the generals to declare war, but it authorized them to repel hostilities already commenced. Bonaparte, supporting himself upon this authority and upon the events at Verona and at the Lido, declared that hostilities had commenced; gave notice to Lallemand, the minister, to quit Venice; took down the lion of Saint Mark in all the continental provinces; caused the towns to be municipalized; proclaimed every where the overthrow of the Venetian government; and in the interval of the march of his troops on their return from Austria, he ordered general Kilmaine to proceed with the divisions of Baraguay-d'Hilliers and Victor to the border of the lagoons. His determinations, as prompt as his anger, were instantly executed. In the twinkling of an eye, the ancient lion of Saint Mark disappeared every where between the banks of the Isonzo and those of the Mincio, and was replaced by the tree of liberty. Military were on their road from all quarters, and the French cannon roared on those shores which for a long time had never heard the cannon of an hostile force.

The ancient city of Venice, seated amidst her lagoons, could still present almost insuperable difficulties even to the general who had just humbled Austria. All her lagoons were protected. She had thirty-seven gulleys, and one hundred and sixty-eight gun-boats, carrying seven hundred and fifty guns and eight thousand five hundred seamen or gunners. She had a garrison of three thousand five hundred Italians and eleven thousand Sclavonians, provisions for eight months, fresh water for two, and the means of renewing these supplies. We were not masters of the sea; we had no gun-boats for crossing the lagoons; we should be obliged to proceed sounding as we went along those unknown canals and under the fire of innumerable batteries. Brave and daring as the conquerors of Italy were, they might yet be frustrated by such obstacles, and condemned to a siege of several months. And how many events might not a delay of several months bring about! Austria, at present repulsed, might reject the preliminaries, enter the lists again, and give rise to fresh chances.

But if the military situation of Venice presented resources, her internal state did not allow an energetic use to be made of them. Like all worn-out bodies, this aristocracy was divided. It had neither the same interests or even the same sentiments. The upper nobility, possessing the public offices and honours, and having great wealth at its disposal, had less ignorance and fewer prejudices and passions than the lower nobility; it had, above all, the ambition of power. The mass of the nobility, excluded from public employments, living as state-pensioners, ignorant and violent, possessed genuine aristocratic prejudices. In conjunction with the priests, it excited the people to whom they belonged, as happens in every state where the middle class is not yet sufficiently powerful to get the nobility to identify itself with that class. The Venetian populace, composed of seamen and artisans, coarse, superstitious, and half-savage, were ready to indulge in every possible excess. The middle class, composed of merchants, tradesmen, lawyers, physicians, &c., wished, as in every other place it does, for the establishment of civil equality, rejoiced at the approach of the French, but durst not give vent to its joy, on seeing before its face a populace capable of being stimulated to the greatest excesses before a revolution were effected. Lastly, to all these discordant elements was added another not less dangerous. The Venetian government was served by Sclavonians. This barbarous soldiery, alien to the people of Venice, and frequently in hostility with them, were on the look-out for an opportunity to satisfy their love of pillage, without caring to serve one party or the other.

Such was the internal state of things at Venice. That superannuated body was ready to fall to pieces. The great, in possession of the government, were alarmed at the very idea of contending with such a warrior as Bonaparte; and although Venice could have stood out without any great difficulty, they could not face without consternation the horrors of a siege; the violences to which both parties, highly exasperated, would not fail to abandon themselves; the excesses in which the Sclavonian soldiery might indulge; the dangers to which Venice, with her maritime and commercial estabilements would be exposed: they were, above all, apprehensive lest their possessions, all situated on the continent (terra firma), should be sequestrated by Bonaparte, and threatened with confiscation. They even had fears on account of the pensions upon which the reduced nobility subsisted, and which would be lost, if, pushing the contest to extremity, they exposed themselves to a revolution. They conceived that by negotiating, they might save the ancient institutions of Venice by reforms; retain the power which is always confirmed to those who are accustomed to wield it; save their estates, and the pensions of the reduced nobility; and spare the city of Venice the horrors of sack and pillage. These men, consequently, who neither possessed the energy of their ancestors or the passions of the mass of the nobility, were for treating with the enemy. The principal members of the government assembled at the doge's. These were the six councillors of the doge, the three presidents of the criminal tribunal of forty, the six grand sages, the five grand sages of the terra firma, the five sages of the orders, the eleven sages taken from the council, the three chiefs of the council of ten, and the three avogadors. The object of this meeting, which was of an extraordinary nature, and even against all usage, was to provide for the safety of Venice. Every member of the assembly was in the utmost consternation. The doge, broken by age, his eyes dimmed with tears, said that they were not sure of sleeping the next night quietly in their beds. Each had different measures to suggest. One member was for employing Haller the banker to corrupt Bonaparte. This was judged ridiculous and useless. Besides, the ambassador Quirin had orders to do whatever could be done in Paris, and even to buy votes in the directory, were it practicable. Others proposed that they should defend themselves. This proposal was deemed inapplicable, and as emanating from young and inexperienced minds. At length it was decided to propose to the great council a reform of the constitution, in order by this means to appease Bonaparte. The great council, composed in general of all the nobility, and representing the Venetian nation, was convoked. Six hundred and nineteen members, that is, rather more than half, were present. The proposition was made amidst a mournful silence. This question had already been discussed in consequence of a communication from Lallemant, the minister, to the senate, and it had been voted to refer the reforms to some other time. But on this occasion every one was sensible that it was no longer practicable to have recourse to dilatory measures. The doge's proposition was adopted by five hundred and ninety-eight votes. It purported that two commissaries, to be sent by the senate, should be authorized to negotiate with general Bonaparte, and even to treat of objects within the competence of the great council, that is, of constitutional objects, subject to ratification.

The two commissaries set out immediately, and found Bonaparte on the border of the lagoons, at the bridge of Marghera. He was arranging his troops, and the French artillerymen were already exchanging balls with the Venetian gun-boats. The two commissioners delivered to him the resolution of the great council. For a moment he appeared struck with their determination; then, resuming a rough tone, he said to them, "And are the three state-inquisitors and the commandant of the Lido in confinement? I must have their heads. No treaty till French blood has been avenged. I fear not your lagoons. I find them just what I expected. In fifteen days I shall be at Venice. Your nobles shall not escape death except by going like the French emigrants, and dragging their misery all over the world." The two commissioners did their utmost to gain a few days' respite, in order to obtain the consent of the council to the reparation he desired. He would not grant more than twenty-four hours. He nevertheless consented to grant a suspension of arms for six days, to give the Venetian commissaries time to rejoin him at Mantua, with the adherence of the great council to all the conditions which he imposed.

Bonaparte, satisfied with having struck terror into the Venetians, had no intention of coming to real hostilities, because he was aware of the difficulty of carrying the lagoons, and he foresaw the interference of Austria. One article of the preliminaries purported that every thing which concerned Venice should be the subject of an amicable arrangement between France and Austria. If he entered by main force, complaints of the violation of the preliminaries would be made at Vienna; and in any case it would suit him better to induce them to submit. Satisfied with having terrified them, he set out for Mantua and Milan, not doubting that they would soon follow, to make their full and entire submission.

The assembly of all the members of the government, already formed at the doge's, met afresh to receive the report of the commissaries. There were no longer any means of resisting the demands of the general; they were obliged to consent to them all, for the danger daily became more imminent. It was said that the citizens were conspiring, and intended to murder the nobility; and that the Selavonians would avail themselves of the occasion to pillage the city. It was agreed to submit a new proposition to the great council, tending to accede to all that general Bonaparte demanded. On the 15th Floreal (May 4) the grand council was again convened. By a majority of seven hundred and four voices to ten, it decided that the commissaries should be authorized to negotiate on the subject of every one of the conditions with general Bonaparte, and that proceedings should be immediately commenced against the three state-inquisitors and the commandant of the Lido.

The commissaries, furnished with new powers, followed Bonaparte to Milan, to lay the proud constitution of Venice at his feet. But six days were not sufficient, and the truce had nearly expired before they could come to an arrangement with the general. During this interval the consternation kept increasing in Venice. At one moment the terror was so great, that the commandant of the lagoons was authorized to capitulate to the French generals, invested with the command in the absence of Bonaparte. The government merely recommended to him the independence of the republic, religion, the protection of persons and of the foreign ambassadors, public and private property, the mint, the bank, the arsenal, and the archives. An extension of the truce was, however, obtained from the French generals, in order to allow the Venetian envoys time to negotiate with Bonaparte.

The arrest of the three state-inquisitors had disorganized the police of Venice. The most influential persons among the citizens put themselves in motion, and openly manifested an intention of bestirring themselves for the purpose of hastening the fall of the aristocracy. They were constantly with Villetard, the French chargé d'affaires, who had remained at Venice after the departure of the minister Lallemand, and who was an ardent patriot. They sought and hoped to find in him one who would forward their designs. At the same time, the Slavonians were in a state of insubordination, which afforded reason to apprehend the most horrible excesses. They had come to blows with the Venetian populace, and the citizens seemed even to excite these disturbances, which produced division among the forces of the aristocratic party. The 20th Floréal (May 9) the general alarm reached its highest pitch. Two very influential members of the revolutionary party, by name Spada and Zorzi, entered into communication with some of the members of the extraordinary meeting convened at the doge's. They insinuated that they ought to address themselves to the French chargé d'affaires, and to have some understanding with him as to the means of preserving Venice from the calamities which threatened her. Dount and Bataglia, two patricians, whom we have already observed as appearing before the public, addressed themselves to Villetard on the 9th of May. They asked him what would be, in the present perilous state of things, the most proper course to be taken for saving Venice. The latter replied, that he had no authority whatever from the commander-in-chief to treat, but that, if they asked for his private opinion, he should advise the following measures: the putting on board and sending away the Slavonians; the institution of a municipal guard; the introduction of four thousand French into Venice, and the occupation by them of all the fortified points; the abolition of the ancient government, and the formation, in its stead, of a municipality of thirty-six members, chosen from among all classes, with the present doge for mayor; and the liberation of all prisoners confined on account of their opinions. Villetard added, that on these terms Bonaparte would, no doubt, pardon the three state-inquisitors and the commandant of the Lido.

These propositions were submitted to the council assembled at the doge's. They were extremely severe, inasmuch as they involved a complete revolution in Venice. But the heads of the government dreaded a revolution stained with blood, through the designs of the reforming party, the popular violence, and the cupidity of the Slavonians. Two of the council most firmly stood out. Pezaro said that they ought to retire to Switzerland, rather than themselves complete the ruin of the ancient Venetian government. The opposition, however, was diverted, and it was resolved that the proposition should be presented to the great council. The convocation was summoned for the 23d Floréal (May 12). In the mean time they paid off the Slavonians who were sent on ship-board to be sent back to Dalmatia. A contrary wind, however, prevented them from leaving the harbour, and their presence in the waters of Venice did nothing else than keep up the prevailing agitation and terror.

On the 23rd Floréal (May 12) the great council was solemnly assembled for the purpose of voting the abolition of this ancient aristocracy. An immense concourse of people was collected. On the one hand was perceived the citizen class in high glee at witnessing at length the extinction of the power of their masters; and on the other, the populace, excited by the nobility, were ready to rush upon those whom it considered as the instigators of this revolution. The doge in tears addressed the assembly, and proposed that he should abdicate the sovereignty. They were about to deliberate, when reports of musketry were heard. The nobility conceived themselves threatened with a massacre. "To the vote! To the vote!" was shouted on all sides. Five hundred and twelve voices voted the abolition of the old government. According to the statutes, there should have been six hundred. There were twelve negative votes, and five altogether void. The great council surrendered the sovereignty of the entire Venetian nation; it voted the institution of a municipality, and the establishment of a provisional government, composed of deputies of all the Venetian states; it consolidated the public debt and the pensions granted to the poor nobles, and decreed the admission of French troops into Venice. No sooner were these resolutions adopted, than a flag was hoisted from a window of the palace. On seeing this, the citizens were delighted; but the enraged populace, bearing the image of St. Mark, dispersed themselves over the streets of Venice, and attacked the houses of those inhabitants accused of having wrung this determination from the Venetian nobility. The houses of Spada and Zorzi were pillaged and sacked: the uproar was at its height, and a terrible convulsion was apprehended. Meanwhile, a certain number of the inhabitants, desirous of preserving the public tranquillity, assembled, placed at their head an old Maltese general, named Salembeni, who had been long persecuted by the state-inquisition, and fell upon the rioters. After a conflict on the bridge of the Rialto, they dispersed them, and restored order and tranquillity.

The Slavonians were at length put on board and sent home, after committing great excesses in the villages of Lido and Malamocco. The new municipality was instituted; and on the 27th Floréal (May 16) the flotilla went to fetch a division of four thousand French, which quietly established itself in Venice.

During these occurrences in Venice, Bonaparte signed at Milan, and on the same day, with the Venetian plenipotentiaries, a treaty conformable in every respect with the revolution which had just taken place. It stipulated the abdication of the aristocracy, the institution of a provisional government, the introduction of a French division by way of protection, and the punishment of the three state-inquisitors, and of the commandant of the Lido. Secret articles stipulated, moreover, exchanges of territory, a levy of three millions in money, and three millions in naval stores, and the delivery to France of three men-of-war ships and two frigates. This treaty was to have been ratified by the government of Venice; but this ratification could not take place, since the abdication had already taken place; and moreover it would have been to no purpose, as all the articles of the treaty were already executed. The provisional municipality, nevertheless, thought it right to ratify the treaty.

Thus Bonaparte, without compromising himself with Austria, without encumbering his operations with the delay and confusion of a siege, had gained his ends. He had overthrown the absurd aristocracy which had betrayed him; he had placed Venice in the same situation as Lombardy, the Modenese, the Bolognese, and the Ferrarese; he would now, without any confusion, make such arrangements of territory as he should think fit. In ceding to the emperor the whole of the continental possessions (terre firme), extending from the Isonzo to the Oglio, he had the means of indemnifying Venice, by allotting it Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, which at this time formed part of the Cispadane republic. This was not again subjecting these provinces to the yoke, but rather bestowing them upon revolutionized Venice. There would then be left the duchy of Modena and Lombardy, with which it would be easy to compose a second republic, allied with the first. Still better might be done, that is, if it were possible to put an end to provincial rivalries, namely, to unite all the provinces emancipated by the French arms, and to create with Lombardy, the Modenese, the Bolognese, the Ferrarese, the Romagna, the Polesina, Venice, and the Greek islands, a powerful republic, which should bear sway both on the continent and in the seas of Italy.

The secret articles relative to the three millions in naval stores, and to the three men-of-war and two frigates, were a means of controlling the entire Venetian navy. The comprehensive mind of Bonaparte, whose foresight extended to all within its reach, was desirous that it should not be with us in respect of the Venetians as had before happened to us with regard to the Dutch, namely, that the naval officers or the governors of the islands, dissatisfied with the revolution, should deliver up to the English the ships and islands under their command. He laid particular stress upon the important Greek islands belonging to Venice, Corfu, Zante, Cephalonia, Santa-Maura, and Cerigo. He immediately ordered them to be occupied. He wrote to Toulon, desiring that a certain number of seamen might be sent to him by land, promising to pay their expenses and to fit them out on their arrival in Venice. He asked the directory for orders that admiral Bruëys should immediately put to sea with six ships, in order to collect the whole of the Venetian navy, and to go and take possession of the Greek islands. He sent of his own accord two millions to Toulon, that the commissioner of the navy there might not be stopped for want of funds. In this respect he transgressed the regulations of the treasury, in order that no delay should occur. However, fearing lest Bruëys should arrive too late, he joined the little flotilla which he had in the Adriatic with the ships found at Venice, distributed the Venetian crews among the French, put on board two thousand troops, and despatched them immediately to take possession of the islands. He was thus securing the most important posts in the Levant and the Adriatic, and was taking a position which, becoming daily more striking, could not fail to have a powerful influence on the definitive negotiations with Austria.

The revolution was every day making greater progress, since the signature of the preliminaries of Leoben had settled the fate of Italy, and had there confirmed the influence of France. It was now certain that the greater part of Upper Italy would be constituted into a democratic republic. It was a seductive precedent, and one which agitated Piedmont, the duchy of Parma, Tuscany, and the states of the Pope. The French general controlled no one's choice, but seemed ready to welcome those who should throw themselves into his arms. At Genoa, the public mind was violently incensed against the aristocracy, a class by no means so unreasonable and so weak as that of Venice, but, if possible, more obstinate. France, as we have seen, had parleyed with her for the purpose of securing her rear, and had limited her demands to two millions for indemnities, two millions in advance, and the recall of the families exiled for their attachment to France. But the patriot party threw off all restraint so soon as Bonaparte had imposed peace upon Austria. This party held its meetings at one Morandi's, and had there formed an extremely violent club. A petition was drawn up and presented to the doge, demanding reforms in the constitution. The doge obtained the appointment of a commission to report how far this were practicable. In the interval, however, the agitation was not quelled. The citizens of Genoa and the hot-headed young men combined together, and held themselves ready to have recourse to arms. On their part the nobility, aided by the priests, excited the common people, and armed the charcoal-dealers and the linkmen. The French minister, a mild and temperate man, rather restrained than excited the patriot party. But, on the 22nd of May, when the occurrences at Venice became known, the Morandists, as they were called, appeared in arms, and tried to make themselves masters of the principal posts of the city. A most violent conflict ensued. The patriots, who had to deal with the entire population, were beaten, and were most dreadfully used. The victorious rabble committed the grossest excesses, and did not spare the French families, many of whom were exposed to extreme violence. The only reason why the French minister was spared, was only because the doge had taken care to send him a guard. When Bonaparte heard of these events, he saw that he could no longer defer his interference. He despatched Lavalette, his aid-de-camp, to claim the French who were made prisoners, to demand reparations on their behalf, and, above all, to insist on the apprehension of the three state-inquisitors accused of having put arms into the hands of the populace. The patriot party, supported by this powerful influence, rallied itself, regained the ascendancy, and obliged the Genoese aristocracy to abdicate, as that of Venice had done. A provisional government was installed, and a commission sent to Bonaparte, to settle with him as to the constitution it was expedient the republic of Genoa should receive.

Thus, after having in two months brought the pope into subjection, crossed the Julian Alps, dictated the terms of a peace to Austria, once more crossed the Alps, and punished Venice, Bonaparte was at Milan, exercising supreme authority over all Italy, awaiting, without unnecessarily urging, the course of the revolution, taking in hand the constitution of the emancipated provinces, building himself a navy in the Adriatic, and rendering his situation more and more capable of overawing Austria. The preliminaries of Léoben had been approved in Paris and in Vienna: the exchange of the ratifications had taken place between Bonaparte and M. de Gallo, and the opening of the conferences for a definitive peace was anxiously looked for; Bonaparte in Milan, a mere general of the republic, possessed greater influence than all the potentates in Europe. The continued arrival and departure of couriers declared in very plain terms that it was there that the fate of the world was soon to be centered. The enthusiastic Italians waited for hours at a time to see the general come forth from the Serbelloni palace. Young and beautiful women paid their court to Madame Bonaparte, and formed her brilliant court. Then commenced that extraordinary state of existence which has since dazzled and influenced civilized nations.

CHAPTER IX.

THE EMBARRASSING POSITION OF ENGLAND AFTER THE PRELIMINARIES OF PEACE WITH AUSTRIA; FRESH PROPOSALS FOR PEACE; THE CONFERENCES AT LILLE.—THE ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR V.—THE PROGRESS OF THE COUNTER-REVOLUTIONARY REACTION.—CONTEST OF THE COUNCILS WITH THE DIRECTORY.—BARTHELEMY ELECTED TO THE DIRECTORY IN THE ROOM OF LETOURNEUR, THE DIRECTOR GOING OUT OF OFFICE.—FRESH FINANCIAL PARTICULARS FOR THE YEAR V.—PROPOSED REFORMS IN RESPECT OF THEIR ADMINISTRATION MADE BY THE OPPOSITION.—RETURN OF THE PRIESTS AND EMIGRANTS.—INTRIGUES AND PLOT OF THE ROYALIST FACTION.—HOW PARTIES WERE DIVIDED, AND THEIR RELATIVE STRENGTH.—POLITICAL BIAS DEMONSTRATED BY THE ARMIES.

THE conduct of Bonaparte in regard to Venice was bold, but nevertheless it had not exceeded the limit of the laws. He had founded the manifesto of Palma Nova upon the necessity of repelling hostilities already commenced; and, before hostilities had terminated in a declared war, he had concluded a treaty, which rendered it unnecessary for the directory to submit the declaration of war to the two councils. In this manner the republic of Venice had been attacked, destroyed, and raised from [the map of] Europe, without the general having scarcely consulted the directory, or the directory the councils. Nothing was left to be done but to publish the treaty. Geneva had been revolutionized in the same way, without the government appearing to have been consulted: and all these facts, which were attributed to general Bonaparte in a far greater degree than they really belonged to him, imparted an extraordinary idea of the authority which he assumed in Italy, and of the power which he arrogated to himself. The directory, in fact, considered that general Bonaparte had summarily disposed of a great number of questions; yet it could not reproach him with having materially exceeded his powers. The directory was obliged to acknowledge the utility and the propriety of all his operations; and it durst not condemn the conduct of a victorious general, and one invested with such public influence. M. Quirini, the Venetian ambassador in Paris, had employed all possible means with the directory to gain votes in favour of his country. He made use of a Dalmatian, a cunning intriguer, who was acquainted with Barras, to gain over that director. It appears that the sum of six hundred thousand francs in bills was given, on condition of defending Venice in the directory. But Bonaparte, informed of the intrigue, denounced it. Venice was not saved, and payment of the bills was refused. These facts, laid before the directory, occasioned explanations, and even went so far as the commencement of a prosecution, but it ended by its being silently quashed. The conduct of Bonaparte in Italy was approved of, and the days next ensuing the intelligence of the preliminaries of Léoben were devoted to the most animated public rejoicings. The enemies of the revolution and of the directory, who had so loudly called for peace, so as to obtain a pretext for accusing the government, were in their own hearts very mortified at seeing the preliminaries signed. The republicans were at the height of their exultation. They could have wished, it is true, the entire emancipation of Italy; but they were delighted to see the republic recognized, and in some measure sanctioned, by the emperor. The great mass of the population was glad to see an end put to the horrors of war, and looked for a reduction of the public burdens. The sitting at which the councils received the notification of the preliminaries was a scene of enthusiasm. It was declared that the armies of Italy, of the Rhine, and of the Sambre and Meuse, had deserved well of the country and of mankind in general, in subjecting peace to their victories. All the parties lavished expressions of the warmest enthusiasm on Bonaparte, and it was proposed to give him the surname of Italianus (Italienus), as in Rome that of Africanus had been conferred on Scipio.

Together with Austria the continent was in subjection. There was only England now to contend with; and she, reduced to her own resources, was in fact in a critical situation. Hoche, stopped short at Frankfort in the midst of the most glorious triumphs, was impatient to open for himself a new career. Ireland was the continual object of his thoughts, and he had by no means abandoned his designs of the preceding year. He had nearly eighty thousand men between the Rhine and the Nidda; he had left about forty thousand in the environs of Brest; the squadron fitted out in that port was quite ready to sail. A Spanish fleet collected at Cadiz was only waiting for a gale that should compel the English admiral Jervis to sheer off, in order to sail from the road, and get to the Channel, to combine its efforts with that of the French navy. The Dutch had at length succeeded in getting a squadron together, and re-organizing part of their army. Hoche could therefore have at his disposal powerful appliances to effect a rising in Ireland. He purposed to detach twenty thousand men from the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and to march them off for Brest, to be there again put on board. He had selected his best troops for this important operation, to which his entire attention was bent. He himself repaired to Holland, preserving the strictest incognito, having reported that he was going to pass a few days with his family. There he superintended with his own eyes all the preparations. Seventeen thousand excellent Dutch troops were put on board a squadron, and were only waiting for a signal to sail, and join the expedition fitted out at Brest. If to these appliances those that Spain could furnish were to be joined, England would be exposed, as is plainly perceivable, to dangers of which no one could foresee the event.

Pitt was in the greatest consternation. The defection of Austria, the preparations making in the Texel, the squadron collected in Cadiz, from which the blockading fleet might be blown away by a gale—all these circumstances were alarming. Spain and France were labouring with Portugal to compel her to make peace, and the defection of this ancient ally, too, was to be apprehended. Those events had sensibly affected public credit, and produced a crisis long foreseen and frequently predicted. The English government had always had recourse to the bank, and had drawn from it enormous advances, either by making it purchase stock or discount exchequer bills. These advances the bank could never have made save by an extended issue of notes. The prevalence of the general alarm, and a report being circulated that the bank had lent considerable sums to the government, every one hastened to turn his notes into money. Thus, in the month of March, at the moment when Bonaparte was advancing towards Vienna, the bank was obliged to ask for the privilege of suspending its cash payments. This was complied with, and the bank was discharged from an obligation it could never have performed; but this did not protect the existence or the credit of the bank. A statement of its securities and liabilities was immediately published. The former amounted to £17,597,280 sterling; the latter to £18,770,390 sterling; so that its securities exceeded its liabilities by £3,826,890 sterling. But it was not stated how much of the former consisted in government securities. All that consisted in bullion or bills of exchange was considered very sure; but stocks and exchequer bills, which constituted the greater part of the securities, had lost credit as well as the policy of the government. Bank notes fell immediately more than 15 per cent. The bankers, in their turn, solicited the privilege of paying in notes, otherwise they should be obliged to suspend their payments. It was natural that the same favour should be granted to them as to the bank; nay, it was no more than just that it should, for it was the bank's refusal to fulfil its engagements in cash, that put them in the situation of incapacity to discharge theirs in the same way. But from that time a forced money currency, in regard to notes, was the consequence. To obviate this inconvenience, the principal merchants and traders in London met, and exhibited a remarkable proof of public spirit and intelligence. Being sensible that the refusal to bank notes in payment would produce an inevitable catastrophe, in which everybody would have to bear their share of the calamity, they resolved to prevent it, and unanimously agreed to receive notes in payment. From that very period fell into England the way of a paper currency. It is true that this paper money, instead of being forced, was voluntary; but it had only the solidity of paper, and was eminently dependent on the political conduct of the cabinet. To make it more serviceable for pecuniary purposes, it was divided into small sums. The bank, whose smallest notes had been for £4 sterling, (ninety-eight or one hundred francs,) was empowered to issue notes for twenty and forty shillings. This was one way of making them available for the payment of the labouring classes.

Though the accommodating spirit of English commerce had rendered this catastrophe less mischievous than it might have been, yet the situation was not less perilous; and that it might not become completely fatal, France must be conciliated, and something done to prevent the Spanish, French, and Dutch squadrons from exciting a conflagration in Ireland. The royal family were as little reconciled as ever to the revolution and peace; but Pitt, who had no other view than the interest of England, considered a respite as indispensably necessary at the moment. Whether the peace were or were not definitive, a temporary cessation of hostilities must be obtained. Perfectly agreeing on this point with Lord Grenville, he got the cabinet to set on foot a bond fide negotiation, which should afford two or three years' relaxation to the overstrained springs of the British power. There could be no longer any question as to the Netherlands, now ceded by Austria; all that had to be settled was as to the colonies, and consequently there were the means as well as the expectation of coming to some mutual understanding. Not only did the state of things suggest the idea of a treaty, but the selection of the negotiator also proved it. Lord Malmesbury was again nominated for the present occasion; and at his age he would not have been employed twice successively upon a useless piece of state ceremonial. Lord Malmesbury, celebrated for his long diplomatic career, and the address he had displayed in his negotiations, was weary of business, and wished to retire from it, but not till he had concluded some memorable and successful negotiation. None could be more capable of effecting an impression than a pacification with France after so obstinate a contest; and if he had not been certain that his cabinet was desirous of peace, he would not have consented to play a mere walking part, which would become ridiculous by the repetition. He had, in fact, received secret instructions, which left him no doubt. The English cabinet applied for passports for its negotiator; and by common consent the place for the conferences was fixed not in Paris but at Lille. The directory preferred receiving the English minister in a provincial town; for there there was less to be apprehended from the English minister, on his part, had no desire to be brought face to face with a government whose forms had some rudeness, and rather preferred treating through the medium of its negotiators. Lille was therefore selected, and a formal legation was prepared on both sides. Hoche had nevertheless to continue his preparations with vigour, in order to give greater weight to the French negotiators.

Thus France, victorious on all sides, was in negotiation with the two great European powers, and was verging upon a general peace. Events so auspicious and so brilliant should not have left room for any thing but joy in all hearts; but the elections for the year V. had just given a dangerous strength to the opposition. We have seen how the adversaries of the directory bestirred themselves at the approach of the elections. The royalist faction had considerably influenced their result. This faction had lost three of its principal agents by the apprehension of Brothier, Laville-Heurnois, and Duverne de Presle; but there was no great harm in that, for so confused was its state, that the loss of its leaders could hardly add to the confusion. There constantly existed two associations, one of men devoted to and capable of taking up arms; the other of doubtful men, fit only to vote at elections. The Lyons agency was yet intact. Pichegru, conspiring apart, was still corresponding with Wickham, the English minister, and the prince of Condé. The elections, influenced by these intrigues of every description, and especially by the spirit of reaction, had the result which had been foreseen. Almost the whole of the second third was composed, like the first, of men who were enemies to the directory, either from attachment to royalty or hatred of terror. The advocates of royalty were, it is true, very few in number; but they meant to avail themselves, as usual, of the passions of others. Pichegru was elected deputy in the Jura. At Colmar one Chemblé was chosen, a person employed in the correspondence with Wickham; at Lyons, Imbert-Colomès, one of the members of the royalist agency in the south, and Camille-Jordan, a young man of good feelings and a lively imagination, but who displayed a ridiculous enmity against the directory; at Marseilles, general Willot, who had been removed from the army of the Ocean to command in the department of the Bouches-du-Rhône, and who, so far from keeping the parties within bounds, had suffered himself to be gained over, perhaps unconsciously, by the royalist faction; at Versailles, one Vauvilliers, implicated in Brothier's conspiracy, and intended by the agency to be a commissioner for articles of consumption (administrateur des subsistances); and at Brest, admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, who had quarrelled with Hoche, and, consequently, with the government, on occasion of the expedition to Ireland. A great many other elections were made, equally significant with the former. General Jourdan, who had resigned the command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse after the unsuccessful termination of the preceding campaign, was elected deputy by his department. He was worthy of representing the army in the legislative body, and of avenging the dishonour which the treason of Pichegru was about to cast upon it. It was a singular circumstance that Barrère was elected by the department of the Hautes-Pyrénées.

The new members hastened to Paris. While waiting for the 1st Prairial, when they were to be installed, they were drawn in to become members of the Clichy club, which daily became more and more violent. The councils themselves no longer manifested their former moderation. The members of the first third, seeing that the moment when they were to be reinforced was approaching, began to throw off the reserve in which for fifteen months past they had wrapped themselves. They had hitherto followed in the wake of the constitutionalists, that is, of those deputies who pretended to be neither friends or enemies of the directory, but affected an attachment to the constitution alone, and to oppose the government only when it deviated from that. This line of conduct had particularly prevailed in the council of the ancients. But as the day of the junction approached, the opposition in the five hundred began to employ a more threatening language. It was said that the ancients had too long led the five hundred, and that it was time for the latter to throw off their dependence. Thus, in the Clichy club, as well as in the legislative body, the party that was about to acquire the majority manifested its joy and its audacity.

The constitutionalists, deceived, like all those who from the commencement of the revolution had suffered themselves to be drawn into the opposition, thought that they were about to become the controllers of the movement, and that the new comers would only be a reinforcement for them. Carnot was at their head. More and more involved in the false course which he had taken, he had never ceased supporting in the directory the opinion of the legislative minority. In the discussion of the preliminaries of Leoben, in particular, he had given vent to an animosity hitherto kept within the bounds of decorum, and supported the concessions made to Austria with a zeal which could not have been expected from his past life. Carnot, blinded by his self-love, conceived that he could lead at pleasure the constitutional party either in the five hundred or in the ancients, and saw in the newly elected only additional partisans. In his zeal to bring together the elements of a party of which he hoped to be the chief, he sought to connect himself with the most distinguished of the new deputies. He had even gone beyond Pichegru, who was far from showing politeness to any of the members of the directory, and called to see him. Pichegru, making a very ill return for his courtesy, had only manifested aversion, and almost disdain. Carnot was connected with many other deputies of the first and second third. His apartments at the Luxembourg had become the rendezvous of all the members of the new opposition; and his colleagues daily saw their most irreconcilable enemies coming to visit him.

The great question was that of the choice of a new director. The lot was to decide who should go out. If the lot fell upon Laréveillère-Lépeaux, Rewbell, or Barras, the course of the government would be changed; for the director nominated by the new majority could not fail to vote with Carnot and Letourneur.

It was said that the five directors had agreed among themselves which of them should retire; elections, and, as it might naturally be expected, they declared all that were doubtful, void, whenever the question concerned a republican deputy, and confirmed them when an opponent of the revolution was concerned. They caused all the commissions to be renewed; and pretending that every thing ought to date from the day of their taking their seat in the legislative body, they demanded accounts of the finances up to the 1st Prairial. They then appointed special commissions for examining the laws relative to emigrants, priests, religion, public education, the colonies, &c. The intention of laying hands on every thing was plain enough.

Two exceptions had been made in the laws which banished emigrants for ever: the one in favour of the labourers and husbandmen, whom St. Just and Lebas had driven from the Upper Rhine during their mission in 1793; the other in favour of the persons implicated and obliged to take to flight in consequence of the events of the 31st of May. The refugees from Toulon, who had delivered up that place, and escaped in the English squadron, were alone deprived of the benefit of this second exception. Under colour of these two clauses, a multitude of emigrants had already returned. Some passed themselves off for artisans or farmers of the Upper Rhine, others as having been proscribed on the 31st of May. The Clichyans moved and carried a prorogation of the time allowed to the fugitives of the Upper Rhine, and caused the time to be extended to six months. They even caused it to be declared that the Toulonese fugitives might avail themselves of the exception granted to the persons proscribed on the 31st of May. Although this indulgence was merited by many of the Southerners, who had not fled to Toulon, and from Toulon on board the English squadron, but for the purpose of shielding themselves from the prescription incurred by the federalists, it nevertheless had relation to, and seemed to grant an act of oblivion for the most criminal act of the revolutionary faction, and must have excited the indignation of the patriots. The discussion on the subject of the colonies, and on the conduct of the agents of the directory in Saint Domingo led to a violent scene. The commission to whom this subject was referred, consisting of Tarbe, Villaret-Joyeuse, Vaublanc, and Bourdon (of the Oise), presented a report, in which the convention was treated with the greatest acrimony. The conventionalist Marec was accused therein of not having opposed tyranny with the energy of virtue. At these words, which indicated the intention frequently manifested of insulting the members of the convention, all those who had still seats in the five hundred rushed to the tribune, and demanded a report drawn up in a manner more worthy of the legislative body. The scene was one of the most violent that could be imagined. The conventionalists, supported by the moderate deputies, got the report sent back to be reviewed by the commission. Carnot influenced the commission by means of Bourdon (of the Oise), and the clauses of the projected decree were reformed. At first it had been proposed to deprive the directory of the faculty of sending agents to the colonies; that power was left it, but the number of agents was limited to three, and the duration of their mission to eighteen months. Santhonax was recalled. The constitutionalists, seeing that by joining the conventionalists, they had been able to check the impetuosity of the Clichyans, conceived that they were about to become the moderators of the legislative body. But the succeeding sittings were soon to undeceive them.

Among the most important subjects to which the new members purposed to direct their attention, were religion and the laws concerning the priests. The commission to whom this important subject was confided appointed for its reporter young Camille-Jordan, whose imagination had been heated amidst the horrors of the siege of Lyons, and whose sensibility, though sincere, was not without some self-conceit. The reporter made a long and turgid dissertation on the freedom of worship. "It was not sufficient," he said, "to allow to any one the exercise of his religion, but in order that the liberty should be real, nothing should be required of him that was inconsistent with his creed. Thus, for instance, the oath required of the priests, though it were not repugnant to their creed, yet having been unfavourably interpreted by them, and considered as contrary to the doctrines of the Catholic church, ought not to be imposed upon them. It was a tyranny, the result of which was to create a class of proscripts, and of dangerous proscripts, because they greatly influenced opinion; and, being assiduously concealed from the researches of the authorities by the pious zeal of the people, they laboured in secret to excite rebellion. As for the ceremonies of religion, it was not enough to permit them in closed temples. It was right, while forbidding all external shows that could occasion disturbance, to permit certain indispensable usages. Thus, bells were absolutely necessary for calling the Catholics together at certain hours; they were a necessary part of their worship; to prohibit their use was to restrict toleration in this respect. Besides, the people were accustomed to those sounds, they were fond of them, they had not yet consented to do without them, and in the country the law against bells had never been carried into execution. To allow them, therefore, was to satisfy an innocent want, and to put an end to the scandal of a law that had never been put in force. The case was the same in regard to cemeteries. While prohibiting the use of public processions in all religions, it was nevertheless necessary to allow each to have its own enclosed places devoted to burial, and in which liberty should be granted for the placing the symbols peculiar to each form of worship. As a consequence of these principles, Camille-Jordan proposed the abolition of the oaths, the repeal of the oppressive laws which it had introduced, the use of bells, and the appropriation of cemeteries, in which each religion could place such religious symbols as it pleased over the graves. The principles of this report, though deduced with dangerous emphasis, were just. It is true that there is but one way of destroying old superstitions, namely, indifference and famine. By tolerating all religions, and granting salaries to none, governments would amazingly accelerate their extinction. The convention had already restored to the Catholics the buildings which served them for churches. The directory would have done well to allow them bells and crosses in the cemeteries, and to abolish the oath, and the laws against the priests who refused to take it. But were the right forms employed, was the proper moment chosen for bringing forward such claims? If, instead of making them one of the grievances in the grand indictment preferred against the directory, they had waited for a more seasonable moment, and allowed passions time to subside, and the government time to settle itself, they would infallibly have obtained the desired concessions. But because the counter-revolutionists made them a condition, for that very reason the patriots opposed them; for men will always oppose the opinions of their enemies. On hearing the sound of the bells, they would have fancied that they heard the tocsin of counter-revolution. Each party desires that its own feelings should be appreciated and conceded to, but it will neither comprehend or admit those of the contrary party. The party feeling of the patriots was composed of errors, apprehensions, and animosities, which it was likewise necessary to comprehend and put up with. This report produced an extraordinary sensation, for it appealed to the keenest and the deepest resentments. It was the most striking and perhaps the most dangerous act of the Clichyans, though at bottom the most reasonable. The patriots made a bad reply to it, by saying that their adversaries proposed to reward the violation of the laws by the repeal of the violated laws. In point of fact those laws that could not be carried into execution, ought to be repealed.

To all these requisitions the Clichyans added annoyances of all kinds against the directory on the subject of the finances. This was the chief object by means of which they hoped to harass and paralyse the government. We have already shown, in giving a sketch of the financial resources of the year V. (1797), what were the presumed receipts and expenses for that year. There were to meet four hundred and fifty millions [francs] of ordinary expenses, two hundred and fifty millions from the land-tax, fifty millions from the poll-tax, and one hundred and fifty millions from the stamp duty, registration, licenses, posts, and customs. Five hundred and fifty millions were to be provided for by the last fourth of the instalment of the national estates put up to sale in the preceding year, amounting to one hundred millions, and demandable in bills from the purchasers; by the produce of the woods and the rents of national property, by the arrears of the assessed taxes, by the Batavian money orders, by the sale of the national moveable property, by various accessary revenues, and lastly, by the continuing resource of the domains yet remaining to be sold. But all these means were insufficient, and very much below their presumed value. The receipts and expenditure of the year being but temporarily provided for, orders had been issued for the levy on the provisional assessments, of three-fifths of the land-tax and poll-taxes. But the assessments made by the local administrations being imperfect, as we have already stated, on account of the continual variation of the fiscal laws, and crammed with marginal abstracts, gave rise to continual difficulties. The unwillingness of the payers added to these difficulties, and the receipt was very slow. Besides the inconvenience of its coming in but slowly, it was much below what had been expected. No more than two hundred millions could be anticipated from the land-tax instead of two hundred and fifty. The different revenues, such as stamp-duty, registration, licenses, customs, and posts, gave hopes of no more than one hundred millions instead of one hundred and fifty. Such was the deficit in the ordinary revenues appointed to provide for the ordinary expenses. It was not the less so in the extraordinary. The bills given by the purchasers of the national property for the last fourth of the purchase money, had been negotiated under great disadvantages. To avoid suffering the same losses on the Batavian money orders, they had been pledged for a sum very inferior to their value. The estates sold very slowly indeed, consequently extreme distress prevailed. The army of Italy had been supported upon the levies it had enforced; but the armies of the Rhine, of the Sambre and Meuse, of the interior, and the naval forces had suffered most severely. The troops had more than once given demonstrations of a mutinous spirit. The public establishments and the hospitals were in extreme destitution, and the public officials did not receive their salaries.

It had been found necessary to recur to expedients of every description. Thus, as we have already noticed, recourse was had to postponement in the payment of certain obligations. The annuities were paid no more than one-fourth in cash, and three-fourths in bills, payable in national estates, called three-quarter bills (bons des trois quarts). The amount of the consolidated debt, the life debt, and pensions, was two hundred and forty-eight millions; consequently there were only sixty-two millions to pay, and the ordinary expense was thus reduced to one hundred and eighty-six millions. But notwithstanding this reduction, the expenditure exceeded the income. Notwithstanding the distinction made between the ordinary and extraordinary expense, this distinction was not kept in the payments of the treasury. The extraordinary expense was provided for by resources appropriated for the ordinary expense; that is, in default of money to pay the troops, or the contractors who supplied them, it was taken from the sums set apart for the salaries of the public functionaries, the judges, and the administrators of all classes. Not only were the two kinds of funds confusedly mixed, but the receipts were anticipated, and orders given upon this or that receiver, payable out of the first funds that should come to his hands. The contractors had orders given them upon the treasury, the minister of which fixed the order of payment according to the urgency of the wants. This method gave rise sometimes to abuses, but it afforded the means of providing for what was most pressing, and of frequently preventing contractors from being disheartened and relinquishing the service. Lastly, in default of every other resource, bills were given upon the national property—a paper negotiable to purchasers. This was how the sales were anticipated since the destruction of the paper money. From this state of the revenue it turned out that none but the worst kind of contractors, that is, speculative contractors, would have to do with government, and made it to submit to the most disadvantageous bargains. They would not take the paper that was given them but at a very low rate, and they raised the price of articles of consumption in proportion to the chances or the delay of payment. The government was frequently obliged to make the most singular arrangements, in order to supply particular wants. Thus the minister of the marine bought flour for the fleet, on condition that the contractor, on delivering the flour at Brest, should give part in money, in order to pay the seamen, who were ready to mutiny. The premium for this advance of cash was of course to be obtained from the high price of the flour. All these losses were inevitable, and resulted from the existing state of affairs. It would be an injustice to impute them to the government. Unfortunately, the conduct of one of the directors, who secretly shared in the profits of the contractors, and who took no pains to conceal either his prodigality or the growth of his fortune, furnished a pretext for all sorts of calumnies. It was certainly not the disgraceful profits made by one individual which involved the state in distress, but people took occasion from them to accuse the directory of ruining the finances.

Indeed, this subject alone furnished matter wherein a violent and factious opposition might find ample scope for declamation and for mischievous designs. In fact, an extremely dangerous opposition had been formed. This opposition had secured the nomination of men of its own choice to the finance commission, men who were most unfavourably disposed towards the government. The first thing which this commission did was to present to the five hundred, through the reporter, Gilbert Desmolières, an incorrect statement of the income and expenditure. It exaggerated the one, and greatly diminished the other. Obligated to acknowledge the inadequacy of the ordinary resources, such as the land-tax, the registration, the stamp duty, the patents, the posts, and the customs, it nevertheless refused all the taxes devised for supplying the deficiency. Ever since the commencement of the revolution, it had been found impossible to re-establish the indirect taxes. A tax on salt and tobacco was proposed; the commission alleged that it would frighten the people. A lottery was proposed; that it rejected as immoral. A toll upon the high roads was proposed; this it considered as liable to great difficulties. All this was more or less just; but it was absolutely necessary to seek and to find resources. As the sole resource, the commission intimated that it was about to take into consideration a duty on the registry of judicial acts. As for the deficit of the extraordinary receipts, so far from providing for that, it sought to increase it, by forbidding the directory the use of those expedients, by means of which it had contrived to live from day to day. The course which it pursued was this.

The constitution had separated the treasury from the directory, and made it a distinct establishment, under the control of independent commissioners, appointed by the councils, who had no other duty than to receive the revenue and to make the disbursements. Thus the directory had not the management of the funds of the state: it gave orders upon the treasury, which the latter paid till the credits opened by the councils were exhausted. Nothing could be more vicious than this system, for the management of the funds is a branch of the executive which ought to belong to the government, like the direction of the military operations, and in which the deliberating bodies can no more interfere than in the plan of a campaign. In many cases even it occurs, that by a clever and skilful management a minister contrives to create temporary resources on a pressing emergency. Thus the two councils had, in the preceding year, empowered the treasury to carry out all the negotiations commanded by the directory. The new commission resolved to cut short the expedients which enabled the directory to exist, by depriving it of all power over the treasury. In the first place, it desired that the directory should cease to possess the faculty of ordering the negotiation of securities. When non-circulating securities were to be realized, the commissioners of the treasury were to negotiate them themselves upon their personal responsibility. The new commission then considered how to deprive the directory of the right of regulating the order in which the warrants for payment were to be discharged. It proposed also to prohibit any anticipation of the funds that were to be received by the chests of the departments. It even went so far as to desire that all orders already delivered upon the credit of funds not yet received, should be carried back to the treasury, verified, and paid in their turn, which would interrupt and annul all the operations that had already taken place. It proposed, moreover, to render obligatory the distinction made between the two natures of expenses and receipts, and to require that the ordinary expenses should be paid out of the ordinary receipts, and the extraordinary expenses out of the extraordinary receipts, a mischievous measure at a moment when it was absolutely necessary to supply every urgent want out of the first disposable funds. To all these propositions it added a last, more pernicious than the preceding. We have already stated, that as the national estates sold slowly, the government anticipated their sale, by giving bills receivable in part payment of their value. The contractors were satisfied with these bills, which they afterwards negotiated to purchasers. This paper, it is true, was put in competition with the three quarters bills delivered to the stock annuitants, and were deteriorated in value by the competition. Upon pretext of protecting the unfortunate annuitants against the rapacity of the contractors, the commission proposed no longer to allow the national estates to be paid for by the bills given to the contractors.

All these propositions were adopted by the five hundred, the majority of whom, hurried on without reflection, no longer kept within due limits. These propositions were extremely prejudicial, and threatened the interruption of all the public services. The directory, in fact, being no longer allowed to negotiate at pleasure the securities which it had in its hands, having no longer the power to regulate the order of the payments according to the urgency of the services, to anticipate on an emergency funds not yet received, to take from the ordinary for the extraordinary, and lastly, to issue a voluntary paper, payable in national domains, was deprived of all the means which had hitherto enabled it to exist, and was permitted, in the impossibility to provide for all wants, to give the preference to the most urgent. The measures adopted, though well suited to restore order in a time of greater tranquillity, were alarming

1797.
June.
(Messidor.)

State of finances in the year V. and their proposed regulation
by the opposition.

THE DIRECTORY.

Dumolard's, the royalist, motion in respect of the events in Italy.

727

in the existing state of the country. The constitutionalists made vain efforts to oppose them in the five hundred. They passed, and the only hope left was in the council of ancients.

The constitutionalists, who were temperately opposed to the directory, saw with the utmost concern the line of conduct pursued by the council of the five hundred. They had hoped that the addition of a new third would have rather done them service than otherwise, that it would have no other effect than that of changing the majority, and that they should become masters of the legislative body. Carnot, their leader, had conceived the same delusive ideas; but they both found they had overshot the mark, and they could perceive, on this as on all other occasions, that behind opposition lurks counter-revolution, with its mischievous designs. They possessed much more influence with the ancients than with the five hundred, and they strove to cause the rejection of the resolutions relative to the finances. Carnot had a devoted friend there in the deputy Lacuée; he was also connected with Dumas, formerly a member of the legislative assembly. He could reckon upon the influence of Portalis, Troncon-Découdray, Lebrun, and Barbé-Marbois, all rational opponents of the directory, and censuring the extravagance of the Clichyan party. Owing to the united efforts of these deputies, and to the inclinations of the council of ancients, the first proposition of Gilbert Desmolières, which forbade the directory to manage the negotiations of the treasury, to regulate the order of the payments, and to confuse the ordinary with the extraordinary, were rejected. This rejection gave great satisfaction to the constitutionalists, and to all moderate men in general, who dreaded a conflict. Carnot was extremely rejoiced at it. He again hoped that the Clichyans might be kept within bounds, by means of the council of ancients, and that the direction of affairs would remain in his hands and those of his friends.

But this was but a poor palliative. The Clichy club resounded with the most violent declamations against the ancients, and with fresh schemes of accusation against the directory. Gilbert Desmolières resumed his first propositions rejected by the ancients, in order to present them in another form, and thus obtain their adoption upon a second deliberation. Resolutions of all kinds against the government succeeded one another in the five hundred. Deputies were forbidden to accept places for a year before their leaving the legislative body. Imbert-Colomès, who corresponded with the court of Blankenburg, proposed to take from the directory the faculty, which it derived from a special law, of examining letters coming from abroad. Aubry, the same who had brought about a reaction in the army of the 9th Thermidor, and who had displaced Bonaparte in 1795, proposed to deprive the directory of the right of removing officers, which would strip it of one of its most important constitutional prerogatives. He proposed also to add to the twelve hundred grenadiers composing the guard of the legislative body a company of artillery and a squadron of dragoons, and to give the command of the whole of this guard to the inspectors of the hall of the legislative body—a ridiculous proposition, and which seemed to denote preparations for war. Condemnatory remarks were made as to the remittance of a million to the commissioner of the navy at Toulon, sent off by Bonaparte, without availing himself of the medium of the treasury, for the purpose of expediting the departure of the squadron which he wanted in the Adriatic. That million was seized by the treasury and conveyed to Paris. Similar remarks were also made as to remittances made in the same way from the army of Italy to the armies of the Alps, the Rhine, and the Sambre and Meuse. A lengthy report upon our relations with the United States was presented; and although the directory had some reason on its side in the differences which had arisen between it and that power, it was censured with acrimony. At length the rage for impeaching and censuring all the operations of the government, harried the Clichyans into one final course, which was on their part a fatal indiscretion.

The events at Venice had made a great noise in Europe. Since the manifesto of Palma Nova, that republic had been annihilated, and that of Genoa revolutionized, without the directory communicating a single word on the subject to the councils. This silence is accounted for, as we have seen, by the rapidity of the operations, a rapidity so great that Venice had ceased to exist, before the war could be submitted for deliberation to the legislative body. The treaty since concluded had not yet been laid before it, but was to be discussed in a few days. It was not so much the silence of the directory that excited dissatisfaction, as the fall of the aristocratic governments, and the progress of the revolution in Italy. Dumolard, that irrelevant speaker, who for nearly two years had unceasingly attacked the directory in the council of five hundred, resolved to make a motion relative to the events of Venice and Genoa. The attempt was a bold one, for it was impossible to attack the directory without attacking general Bonaparte. To do this, he had to testify open contempt for an admiration now universal, and an influence which had become colossal since the general had compelled Austria to make peace, and in particular since as negotiator and warrior, he seemed at Milan to be the arbiter of the destinies of Europe. All those Clichyans who still retained a particle of common sense strove to dissuade Dumolard from his intention; but he persisted, and in the sitting of the 5th Messidor (June 23), he made a motion of order with regard to the events of Venice. "Rumour," said he, "whose flight it is impossible to restrain, has every where diffused the report of our conquests over the Venetians, and of the astonishing revolution which has crowned them. Our troops are in their capital; their navy is delivered up to us; the most ancient government in Europe is annihilated; in the twinkling of an eye it again appears under democratic forms; and our soldiers, braving the billows of the Adriatic, are on their way to Corfu to complete the new revolution. Admit these events as certain, and it follows that the directory has in disguised terms made war and peace, and in certain respects a treaty of alliance with Venice, and all without your concurrence. Are we then no longer that nation which has proclaimed in principle, and maintained by force of arms, that no foreign power has a right, upon any pretext, to interfere in the form of government of another state? Insulted by the Venetians, was it on their political institutions that we had a right to declare war? Victors and conquerors, was it for us to take an active part in their revolution, in appearance unlooked for? I shall not here inquire what is the fate reserved for Venice, and particularly for her continental provinces. I shall not examine whether their invasion, contemplated, perhaps, before the outrages which served to justify it, is not destined to figure in history as a fit parallel to the partition of Poland. I shall waive these reflections, and with the constitutional act in my hand, I ask how the directory can justify the absolute ignorance in which it seeks to leave the legislative body concerning this multitude of extraordinary events." Passing from the affairs of Venice, Dumolard then adverted to the transactions at Genoa, which, he said, exhibited the same character, and justified the supposition of the interference of the French army and its leaders. He spoke also of Switzerland, with which he said they were at variance relative to a right of navigation; and he asked if the government proposed to render democratic all the states in alliance with France. Taking frequent occasion to praise the heroes of Italy, he made mention only once of the commander-in-chief, whose name no lips then omitted an opportunity of pronouncing and eulogizing. Dumolard concluded by proposing a message to the directory, applying for explanations concerning the events of Venice and Genoa, and the relations of France with Switzerland.

This motion caused general astonishment, and showed the boldness of the Clichyans. It was soon to cost them dearly. Until they had to experience its melancholy consequences, their arrogance was excessive. They loudly proclaimed their great expectations, and seemed likely to become in a short time masters of the government. It was in every respect the same self-confidence and indiscretion which distinguished them in Vendémiaire. The emigrants returned in crowds. Great quantities of false passports and false certificates of residence were sent from Paris to all parts of Europe. A traffic was carried on with them at Hamburg. The emigrants introduced themselves into the French territory by way of Holland, Alsatin, Switzerland, and Piedmont. Induced to return by that attachment the French possess towards their fine country, and by the hardships and contumelies endured abroad, and having, besides, nothing to hope from war, since the commencement of negotiations with Austria, having even to apprehend the disbanding of the corps of Condé, they came back to attempt, by means of peace and intrigues at home, that counter-revolution which they had not been able to effect by the united assistance of the European powers. Besides, whatever might be the success of counter-revolution, they wished to see their country once more, and to recover part of their property. Owing in fact to the interest which they every where excited, they had a thousand facilities for redeeming it. The jobbing in the different papers taken in payment for national domains, the facility for obtaining these papers at a low price, the favour of the local administrations towards the old proscribed families, and the complaisance of the bidders, who drew back whenever a former proprietor wished to purchase his estates under a fictitious name, enabled the emigrants to recover possession of their patrimony with very small sums. The priests, in particular, had returned in crowds. They were cordially received by all the devout in France, who lodged them, fed them, fitted up chapels for them in their houses, and supplied them with money which they collected. The old ecclesiastical hierarchy was clandestinely re-established. None of the new limitations of the civil constitution of the clergy was acknowledged. The old dioceses still existed. Bishops and archbishops secretly officiated therein, and corresponded with Rome. Through them and their ministry all the ceremonies of the Catholic church were practised; they confessed, baptized, and married the persons who had remained faithful to the old religion. All the thriftless Chouans hastened to Paris, and joined the emigrants, whose number there was said to exceed five thousand. Seeing the conduct of the five hundred and the perils of the directory, they conceived that it would take but a few days to bring about the long-wished-for catastrophe. These expectations formed the sum of their correspondence with foreign countries. At the prince of Condé's, whose division was retiring to Poland, at the pretender's at Blankenburg, and at count d'Artois's in Scotland, there was the greatest demonstrations of satisfaction. In the midst of this general exhilaration, which had manifested itself at Coblenz, by the emigrants expecting to come back in a fortnight in the train of the king of Prussia, they formed plans for their return. They talked of it, and enjoyed the thoughts of it, as an event that would immediately take place. The towns bordering on the frontiers were full of people waiting with impatience for the moment when they could revisit France. Lastly, to all this must be added the violent language of part of the royalist journals, whose fury increased with the temerity and the hopes of the party.

The directory was informed by its police of all these movements. The conduct of the emigrants, the proceedings of the five hundred, sufficiently corresponded with the declaration of Duverne de Presle to demonstrate the existence of a real plot. Duverne de Presle had denounced, without naming parties, one hundred and eighty deputies as implicated therein. He had accused by name none other than Lemeray and Mersan, and had said that all the others were members of the Clichy club. In this he was mistaken, as we have seen. The greater part of the Clichyans, excepting perhaps five or six, were hurried away by the mere force of opinion, and did not act upon any concerted plan. But the directory, misled by appearances and by the declaration of Duverne de Presle, believed them to be knowingly engaged in the plot, and regarded them as conspirators. A discovery made in Italy by Bonaparte had just disclosed to him an important secret, and increased the alarm of the directory. The count d'Entraigues, an agent of the pretender's, through whom he communicated with the intriguers of France, and the confidant of all the secrets of the emigration, had sought refuge in Venice. When the French entered that city, he was seized and delivered up to Bonaparte. The latter might have sent him to France to be shot as an emigrant and a conspirator; but he suffered him-

1797.
June.
(Messidor.)

Renewed intrigues and counter-revolutionary plans of the royalist faction.

THE DIRECTORY.

Renewed intrigues and counter-
revolutionary plans of the
royalist faction.

729

self to be moved, and chose rather to make use of him and his indiscretions than to doom him to death. He assigned him the city of Milan for his prison, gave him some assistance in money, and made him relate all the secrets of the pretender. He thus learned the whole history of Pichegru's treason, which had remained unknown to the government, and of which Rewbell alone had entertained some suspicions, to which his colleagues refused to listen. D'Entraigues related to Bonaparte all that he knew, and made him acquainted with all the intrigues of the emigrants. Besides these verbal disclosures, some very curious particulars were obtained by the seizure of the papers found at Venice in the portfolio of d'Entraigues. Among other papers there was one of great importance, containing a long conversation between d'Entraigues and the count de Montgaillard, in which the latter gave an account of the first negotiation opened with Pichegru, and which proved fruitless through the obstinacy of the prince of Condé. D'Entraigues had committed this conversation to writing, which was found among his papers*. Berthier, Clarke, and Bonaparte immediately signed it, for the purpose of attesting its authenticity, and sent it to Paris.

The directory kept it secret, like the declaration of Duverne du Presle, waiting for an occasion to employ it to good purpose. But it had no longer any doubt concerning the part acted by Pichegru in the council of five hundred, which explained his defeats, his absurd conduct, his ill behaviour, his refusal to go to Stockholm, and his influence over the Clichyens. The directory supposed that at the head of one hundred and eighty deputies, his accomplices, he was preparing a counter-revolution.

The five directors were divided since the new direction which Carnot had taken, and which had been followed by Barthélemy. Barras, Rewbell, and Larévellière-Lépeaux, alone continued devoted to the system of the government. These three directors themselves were not very closely united; for Rewbell, a moderate conventionalist, hated Barras as a partisan of Danton, and had, moreover, a great aversion for his manners and character. Larévellière had some acquaintance with Rewbell, but very little intercourse with Barras. The three directors harmonized only in the habitual conformity of their votes. All three were highly irritated, and decidedly hostile to the Clichy faction. Barras, although he received emigrants, in consequence of an habitual complaisance, never ceased

* M. de Montgaillard in his work, which is filled with slanderous imputations and mistakes, has asserted that this document contained some facts in themselves true, but that it was a forgery, and had been prepared by Bonaparte, Berthier, and Clarke. The contrary is self-evident, and it may easily be conceived how anxious M. de Montgaillard must be to justify his brother in respect of the conversation attributed to him in this document. But one can hardly come at once to the conclusion that three persons of such consideration would dare to utter a forgery. These acts are quite as uncommon in our days as cases of poisoning. Clarke had been dismissed after Fructidor, and he was one of Carnot's party. It is not very probable that he would lend himself to forge documents in support of the events of Fructidor. In the next place, the document does not bear out the statement it was framed to support; and if a forgery had been committed, it would have been made sufficient for its purpose. Every thing therefore tends to show how little reliance can be placed on M. de Montgaillard.

to declare that he would mount his horse, and proceed sword in hand, at the head of the faubourgs, to cut in pieces all the counter-revolutionists of the five hundred. Rewbell did not express himself in that manner; he imagined that all was lost; and though resolved to do his duty, he conceived that no other resource would soon be left for him and his two colleagues but flight. Larévellière-Lépeaux, endowed with as much courage as integrity, thought that they ought to make head against the storm, and to strain every nerve to save the republic. With a heart free from hatred, he might serve as the connecting link between Barras and Rewbell, and such he resolved to make himself. He first addressed himself to Rewbell, whose probity and intelligence he highly appreciated, and explaining his intentions, asked him if he would consent to save the revolution. Rewbell received his overtures with warmth, and promised to be entirely devoted to him. The question now was to make sure of Barras, whose energetic language was not sufficient to satisfy his colleagues. Giving him no credit for either integrity or principle, seeing him surrounded by men of all parties, they deemed him just as capable of selling himself to the emigrants, as of putting himself some day at the head of the faubourgs, and attempting some horrible off-hand attack. They were as apprehensive of one of these things as of the other. They wished to save the republic by an act of energy, but not to compromise it by fresh murders. Scared by the manners of Barras, they distrusted him too much. Larévellière undertook to speak to him. Barras, delighted to coalesce with his two colleagues, and to ensure their support, flattered above all by their alliance, acquiesced entirely in their plans, and appeared to fall in with all their views. From that moment they were sure of forming a compact majority, and of completely annulling by their three united votes the influence of Carnot and Barthélemy. It now became a question what means were to be employed to counteract the conspiracy, which was supposed by them to have such extensive ramifications in the two councils. To have recourse to judicial proceedings, to denounce Pichegru and his accomplices, to demand of the five hundred an act of accusation against them, and then to bring them to trial, was altogether impossible. In the first place, they had no names but those of Pichegru, Lemerer, and Mersan; it was believed that the others might be easily recognized by their connexions, their intrigues, their violent propositions in the Clichy club and in the five hundred, but they were no where named. To procure the condemnation of Pichegru and two or three deputies would not be destroying the conspiracy. Besides, they had not the means of ensuring the condemnation of Pichegru, Lemerer, and Mersan; for the proofs obtained against them, though carrying moral conviction, were not sufficient to enable the judges to pronounce a condemnation. The declaration of Duverne du Presle and that of d'Entraigues were insufficient without the aid of oral depositions. But this was not the greatest difficulty. If they had obtained against Pichegru and his accomplices all the evidence which was wanting, it would be requisite to wring the act of accusation from the five hundred; and though the proofs had been as clear as day, still the existing majority would never have confirmed it, for it was nothing else than sending a culprit to be tried by his own accomplices. These reasons were so evident, that Larévellière and Rowbell, notwithstanding their preference of a legal course, were obliged to relinquish all idea of a regular trial, and to make up their minds to a decisive act of violence,—a sad and deplorable resource, but which, in their situation and with their cause for alarm, was the only practicable one. Having determined upon extreme measures, they purposed, nevertheless, not to have recourse to sanguinary measures, and strove to curb the revolutionary propensities of Barras. Without having yet decided upon the mode and the moment of execution, they adopted the idea of apprehending Pichegru and his one hundred and eighty supposed accomplices, impeaching them before the purified legislative body, and demanding from it an extraordinary law, which should decree their banishment without trial. In their extreme distrust, they made a great mistake respecting Carnot. They forgot his past life, his rigid principles, his obstinacy, and looked upon him as almost a traitor. They feared that, united with Barthélemy, he was implicated in Pichegru's plot. The pains which he took to collect the opposition around him, and to make himself its chief, appeared to their prejudiced eyes so many proofs of criminal connivance. Still they were not yet convinced; but having determined upon a bold stroke, they would not do the thing by halves; and they were ready to strike the guilty, even at their sides, and in the very bosom of the directory.

They agreed to prepare every thing for the execution of their plan, and to watch their enemies closely, in order to seize the moment when the blow should be no longer delayed. Disposed to so bold an act, they had need of support. The patriot party, which could alone furnish it, was divided as formerly into two classes: some still furious ever since the 9th Thermidor, had not cooled in the space of three years; they comprehended nothing whatever of the forced march of the revolution, considered the legal system as a concession made to counter-revolutionists, and wanted nothing else than vengeance and proscriptions. Though the directory had struck them in the person of Babouf, they were ready, with their usual self-devotion, to fly to its aid. But they were too dangerous to be employed, and the utmost that could be done was, in the day of extreme danger, to form them into regiments, as on the 13th Vendémiaire, and to reckon upon the sacrifice of their lives. They had sufficiently proved by the side of Bonaparte and on the steps of the church of Saint-Roch, of what they were capable in the hour of danger. Besides these ardent patriots, almost all compromised by their zeal or their active participation in the revolution, there were moderate patriots of a superior class, who, approving more or less the conduct of the directory, desired nevertheless that the republic should derive its support from the laws, and saw the imminent peril to which it was exposed by the reaction. These perfectly answered the intentions of Rowbell and Larévellière, and could lend the aid, if not of force, at least of opinion to the directory. They were to be seen alternately in the withdrawing-rooms of Barras, who kept up a kind of state for his colleagues, or in those of Madame de Stael, who had not quitted Paris, and who, by the charms of her superior mind, collected around her all the most shining characters in France. M. Benjamin Constant occupied the first rank among them, for his talents, and for the works which he had already published in favour of the directory. There too was seen M. de Talleyrand, who, erased from the list of emigrants during the latter times of the convention, had come to Paris, with the desire of again entering upon the career of high diplomatic employments. This assemblage of distinguished men, composing the government society, had resolved to form an association to counterbalance the influence of Clichy, and to discuss political questions in a contrary spirit. It was called the constitutional circle. It soon comprised all the persons whom we have just designated, and the members of the councils who voted with the directory, that is, nearly the whole of the last conventional third. The members of the legislative body, who called themselves constitutionalists, would naturally have been expected to join the new circle, for their opinion was the same; but embroiled from self-love with the directory, and by their discussions in the legislative body, they persisted in keeping distinct between the constitutional circle and Clichy, after the example of Carnot and Barthélemy, the directors, and the deputies Troncon-Ducoudray, Portalis, Lacuée, Dumas, Doucet-Pontécoulant, Siméon, and Thibaudeau. M. Benjamin Constant spoke several times in the constitutional circle. M. de Talleyrand also delivered his sentiments there. This example was imitated; and circles of the same kind, composed, it is true, of men of an inferior class, and of less temperate patriots, were formed in all quarters. The constitutional circle was opened on the 1st Messidor, a month after the 1st Prairial. In a few days there were similar associations all over France; the warmest patriots joined them, and from a perfectly natural reaction, the Jacobin party almost seemed to be forming itself anew.

But this was a worn-out implement, and of little use. The clubs had lost their reputation in France, and were deprived by the constitution of the means of again becoming efficacious. The directory had fortunately another support, namely, the armies, in which republican principles seemed to have taken refuge ever since the sufferings of the revolution had produced so violent and so great a reaction in the interior. Every army is attached to the government that organizes, maintains, and keeps it in pay; but the republican soldiers viewed the directory not merely as the heads of the government, but as the heads of a cause for which they had risen en masse in 1793, and for which they had fought and conquered for six years. No where was the attachment to the revolution so strong as in the army of Italy. It was composed of the revolutionists of the south, as impetuous in their opinions as in their bravery. Generals, officers, and soldiers were loaded with honours, rolling in wealth, and revelling in pleasure. They had conceived an extraordinary pride on account of their victories. They were informed of what was going on in the interior from the newspapers, which were given to them to read, and they talked of nothing but recrossing the Alps, to cut down the aristocrats of Paris. The ease they enjoyed ever since the signature of the preliminaries, contributed by idleness to augment their excitement. Masséna, Joubert, and Augereau, in particular, set them the example of the most ardent republicanism. The troops which had come from the Rhine, without being less republican, were more settled, more moderate, and had contracted under Moreau greater sobriety and discipline. Bernadotte was their commander. He affected a polished education, and strove to distinguish himself from his colleagues by more elegant manners. In his division, the title of Monsieur was employed, whereas throughout the entire of the old army of Italy, no other title than that of citizen was tolerated. The old soldiers of Italy, licentious, insolent, and quarrelsome as southerners and as spoilt children of victory, were already rivalled in bravery by the soldiers of the Rhine; and now they began to compete with the latter, not in opinion but in manners and habits. They would not be called Monsieur, and on this account they had frequent duels with their comrades of the Rhine. Augereau's division, in particular, which was distinguished, like its general, for its revolutionary exaltation, was the most restless. It required an energetic proclamation from its chief to repress it, and to put a stop to duels. The style of citizen was the only one allowed.

General Bonaparte viewed with pleasure the spirit of his army, and encouraged its flights. His first successes had all been gained against the royalist faction, whether before Toulon, or on the 13th Vendémiaire. He was opposed to that faction from the beginning. That faction had since made a point of depreciating his triumphs, because their lustre was reflected upon the revolution.

Its last attack, especially, had filled the general with indignation. He could not contain himself when he read Dumolard's motion, and learnt that the treasury had seized the million sent to Toulon. But besides his particular reason for detesting the royalist faction, he had another more general and more profound; it lay in the glory and the greatness of the part which he was acting. What effect might a king have on his future prospects? To whatever height he might exalt him, that king would still be above him. Under the republic, on the contrary, no head was exalted above his own. Whether he had any presentiment of his wonderful destiny or not, he foresaw, at least, in the republic an audacity and an immensity of enterprise which tallied with the audacity and the immensity of his own genius; with a king, on the contrary, France would have been brought back to an obscure and limited existence. However he might act towards the republic, whether he served or oppressed it, Bonaparte could not be great unless through it and by it, and he could not but cherish that in which his own destiny was involved. That a Pichegru should suffer himself to be allured by a mansion, a title, and a few millions, is not surprising; the ardent imagination of the conqueror of Italy required a different prospect. It required the prospect of a new world, revolutionized by his hands.

He wrote, therefore, to the directory, to say that he and his army were ready to fly to its aid, in order to make the counter-revolutionists return into their former nothingness. He was not afraid to give advice, and he earnestly exhorted the directory to sacrifice a few traitors, and to break up a few newspaper presses.

In the army of the Rhine, every thing was in far less a perturbed state. The army contained some bad officers placed in the ranks by Pichegru. Nevertheless the bulk of the army was republican, but quiet, disciplined, poor, and less intoxicated than that of Italy. An army is always created after the image of the general. His disposition is reflected in his officers, and from his officers it is imparted to his soldiers. The army of the Rhine was modelled after Moreau. Moreau, flattered by the royalist faction, who were for putting his well-conducted retreat above the wonderful exploits in Italy, felt less hatred towards them than Bonaparte. He was, moreover, of an easy, temperate disposition, and phlegmatic, and his taste for politics was no greater than his capacity; therefore he hung back, never caring to declare his opinions. Yet for all this he was a republican and no traitor, as it had been asserted. He possessed at this moment evidence of Pichegru's treason, and could have rendered an immense service to his government. We have already stated that he had taken a baggage waggon belonging to general Klinglin containing a great quantity of papers. Those papers included Pichegru's entire correspondence in cypher with Wickham, the prince of Condé, &c. Moreau, therefore, could have furnished proofs of the treason, and rendered judicial proceedings more effectual. But Pichegru had been his commander-in-chief and his friend; he would not betray him; and he worked hard to discover the cypher of this correspondence without giving information to the government. Moreover, it contained the very proof of Moreau's fidelity to the republic. Pichegru, after resigning the command, had only one mode of retaining importance; namely, to say that he could do what he chose with Moreau, and that leaving the conduct of the army to him he was himself going to manage the intrigues of the interior. Now Pichegru was continually repeating to his correspondents that they must not address themselves to Moreau, because he would not admit any overture*. Moreau then was cold, but faithful. His army was one of the finest and bravest that the republic ever possessed.

Every thing was different in the army of the Sambre and Meuse. This was, as we have elsewhere observed, the army of Fleurus, of the Ourthe, and of the Roër, a brave and republican army, like its old general. Its ardour was increased when young Hoche, appointed to command it, had come to diffuse among his soldiers all the energy of his character. This young man, who from sergeant in the French guards had risen in one campaign to be commander-in-chief, regarded the republic as his mother and his benefactress. Even in the dungeons of the committee of public welfare his attachment to her had not become lukewarm; in La Vendée it had been strengthened while contending with the royalists; in Vendémiaire he had been always ready to fly to the aid of the convention, and he had already set twenty thousand men in motion, when the vigour of Bonaparte in the battle of the 13th rendered it unnecessary for them to advance further. Having in his political capacity a reason for meddling in affairs which Moreau had not, and not being envious of Bonaparte, although impatient to overtake him in the career of glory, he was heartily devoted to the republic, and ready to serve her in every way, on the field of battle, or amidst the storm of politics. We have already had occasion to observe, that with consummate prudence he combined a most extraordinary ardour and restlessness of character. Ready to throw himself into the arena of public events, he offered his arm and his life to the directory. Thus there was no failure of physical force in the government, but it had to be used with discretion, and above all, with due reference to the occasion.

* If M. de Montgillard had perused the correspondence of Klinglin, he would not have advanced upon the faith of an assertion of the king, Louis XVIII., that Moreau had been a traitor to France ever since the year 1797.

Of all the generals, Hoche was the man whom it best suited the directory to employ. If the glory and the character of Bonaparte could excite umbrage with some, it was not so with Hoche. His victories at Weissenburg in 1793, his admirable pacification of La Vendée, his recent victory at Neuwied, reflected upon him a splendid and a varied glory, in which esteem for the statesman was blended with esteem for the warrior; but there was nothing in his reputation that could militate against liberty. If a general must be made a party to the troubles of the state, it were far better to apply to him than to the giant who was bearing sway in Italy. He was the favourite general of the republicans, and the one upon whom their thoughts reposed without any fear. Besides, his army was nearer to Paris. Twenty thousand men could, were it necessary, in a few marches reach the capital, and second by their presence the vigorous stroke which the directory had resolved to strike.

It was on Hoche, then, that the attention of the three directors, Barras, Rewbell, and Larévellière was fixed. However, Barras, who was extremely busy and very clever at intrigue, and who was desirous in this new crisis to take upon himself the honour of the execution, Barras, without communicating with his colleagues, wrote to Hoche, with whom he had some acquaintance, and called for his intervention in the events that were preparing. Hoche never hesitated. A most convenient opportunity offered for sending troops to Paris. He was labouring with the greatest assiduity in fitting out his new expedition against Ireland. He had gone to Holland to superintend the preparations making in the Texel. He had resolved to detach twenty thousand men from the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and to send them off for Brest. On their way through the interior, it would be easy to stop them when in the neighbourhood of Paris, and to employ them in the service of the directory. He offered still more; money would be wanted, either for the column on march, or for any sudden occasion; he provided himself very cleverly with this. We have observed that the provinces between the Meuse and the Rhine had but an uncertain existence until peace should be made with the empire. They had not been, like Belgium, divided into departments and incorporated with France; they were governed according to martial law and with great discretion by Hoche, who wished to turn them into republics, and if he could not obtain their express union with France, to form them into a Cisrhene republic, attached to the French as a daughter to her mother. He had established a commission at Bonn, to whom the government of the country was entrusted, together with the collection of the levies made on this as well as on the other side of the Rhine. Two millions and some hundred thousand francs were in the coffers of this commission. Hoche prohibited their transfer to the chest of the army paymaster, because they would then be under the authority of the treasury, and would perhaps even be withdrawn for purposes foreign to the army. He directed the column which he was about to set in motion to be paid up, and nearly two millions to be kept in reserve, either to be offered to the directory or to be employed for the expedition to Ireland. It was out of political zeal that he committed this breach of the rules of keeping the public accounts, for this young general, who had greater opportunities for enriching himself than any other, was very poor. In doing all this, Hoche conceived that he was executing the orders not of Barras only, but also of Larévellière-Lépeaux and Rewbell.

Two months had elapsed since the 1st Prairial, that is, since the opening of the new session: it was now the end of Messidor (the middle of July). The propositions settled at Clichy, and carried to the five hundred, had followed one another without intermission. A fresh proposal was in preparation, to which the royalist faction attached great interest. The organization of the national guards was not yet decreed; the principle was merely introduced into the constitution. The Clichyans were desirous of contriving some force to act in opposition to the armies, and to get again under arms that youth which had risen in Vendémiaire against the convention. They had just been nominating a commission in the five hundred, who were to report upon a plan of organization; Pichegru was its president and reporter. Besides this important measure, the commission of finance had again, in an underhand manner, taken up the propositions rejected by the ancients, and sought to present them in a different manner, so as to get them adopted in a new form. These propositions of the five hundred, formidable as they were, alarmed the three directors less than the conspiracy, at the head of which they saw a celebrated general, and which they supposed to have very extensive ramifications in the councils. Determined to act, they meant first to make certain changes in the ministry, which they deemed necessary for giving more consistency to the administration of the state, and more steadiness and decision to the conduct of the government.

The minister of the police, Cochon, though somewhat in disgrace with the royalists, since the prosecution of the three agents of the pretender and the circulars relative to the elections, was not the less entirely devoted to Carnot. The directory with the plans it entertained, could not leave the police in the hands of Cochon. The minister at war, Petiet, stood high in the estimation of the royalists; he was the devoted creature of Carnot. He would have to be excluded also, that there might not be a hostile channel of communication between the armies and the directorial majority. Benezec, minister of the interior, an excellent public functionary, and a complaisant courtier, was not to be feared by either party; but he was suspected on account of his known partialities and the indulgence shown him by the royalist journals. It was proposed to remove him too, were it but to have in his stead one on whom more reliance could be placed. Entire confidence was reposed in Truguet, commissioner of the navy, and Charles Delacroix, minister for foreign affairs; but reasons grounded on the interest of the service induced the directors to desire their dismissal. Truguet was a butt for every attack of the royalist faction, and he partly deserved their attacks on account of his haughty and violent temper. He was a man of integrity and of great resources, but did not behave to individuals with evenness of temper, which is necessary at the head of a great administration. Besides, he might be employed with advantage in the diplomatic career; and he was himself desirous of superseding general Perignon in Spain, in order to obtain the concurrence of that power in his great plans respecting India. As for Delacroix, he had since proved himself capable of conducting the affairs of a department with ability; but he had neither the dignity or the information requisite for representing the republic with the European powers. Besides, the directors had a strong desire to see another person, M. de Talleyrand, at the head of the foreign department. The enthusiastic spirit of Madame de Staël was delighted with the cool, keen, and unfathomable mind of M. de Talleyrand. She had introduced him to M. Benjamin Constant, and Benjamin Constant had been desirous to put him in communication with Barras. M. de Talleyrand contrived to gain over Barras, as he would indeed have won over more subtle men. After he had got himself introduced by Madame de Staël to Benjamin Constant, and by Benjamin Constant to Barras, he got Barras to introduce him to Larévellière, and he knew how to gain the honest man just as he had gained the dissolute one. He appeared to all a person greatly to be pitied, odious to the emigrants as a partisan of the revolution, suspected by the patriots as a man of high birth, and the victim at once of his opinions and his birth. It was agreed to appoint him minister for foreign affairs. The vanity of the directors was flattered by attaching to themselves so distinguished a personage; and they were moreover sure that they were committing the foreign affairs to a clever, well-informed man, and one who was personally identified with the entire diplomacy of Europe.

There were left Ramel, minister of the finances, and Merlin (of Douai), minister of justice, who were more hateful to the royalists than all the others together, but who performed the duties of their respective offices with equal zeal and ability. These the three directors would not remove on any account. Thus, out of the seven ministers, they purposed to change Cochon, Pétiet, and Benezecq, for the sake of public opinion; Truguet and Delacroix, for the benefit of the service; and to retain only Merlin and Ramel.

In every state whose institutions are representative, whether monarchy or republic, it is by the selection of the ministers that the government declares its spirit and its conduct. It is also for the choice of the ministers that parties are set in motion, and they are desirous of influencing that appointment as much in support of their opinion as of their ambition. But if, among the parties, there is one that wishes for more than a simple reform in the system of the government, and aspires to overthrow the existing order of things, that party, dreading reconciliations, wants something more than a change of ministers, abstains from interfering in it, or interferes in order to prevent it. Pichegru and the Clichyens, who were in the secret of the plot, cared but little about the change of the ministry. They nevertheless associated again with Carnot, to have some conversation with him; but it was rather a pretext to sound him and to discover his secret intentions, than to arrive at a result which was in their eyes very unimportant. Carnot had frankly declared himself to them, personally and in writing, in his replies to the members who had made overtures to him. He had declared that he would sooner perish than suffer the constitution to be prejudiced, or the powers which it had constituted to be dishonoured—(the literal expressions of one of his letters). He had, therefore, obliged those who came to sound him to confine their remarks to constitutional projects, such as a change of ministers. As for such of the Clichyens as were not initiated in the secrets of the faction and the constitutionalists, they sincerely desired to obtain a ministerial revolution, and to stop there. The latter, therefore, collected themselves around Carnot. The members of the ancients and of the five hundred, who have already been named, such as Portalis, Tronçon-Ducoudray, Lacuée, Dumas, Thibaudeau, Doucet-Pontécoulant, Siméon, and Emery, conversed with Carnot and Barthélemy, and discussed the changes to be made in the ministry. The two ministers whom they particularly desired to have changed were Merlin, the minister of justice, and Ramel, minister of the finances. Having especially attacked the financial system, they were more hostile to the minister of the finances than to any other. They wished also for the removal of Truguet and Charles Delacroix. They were desirous of course to retain Cochon, Pétiet, and Benezecq. The two directors, Barthélemy and Carnot, were not difficult to persuade. The weak Barthélemy had no personal opinion; Carnot saw all his friends in the ministers retained, all his enemies among the rejected. But to this scheme, so readily formed in the constitutional cabals, it was not so easy to gain the assent of the other three directors, who having made up their minds as to the course they would take, wanted fairly enough to dismiss those whom the constitutionalists were anxious to retain.

Carnot, who was unacquainted with the connexion formed between his three colleagues, Rewbell, Larévellière, and Barras, and who knew not that Larévellière was the link that connected the two others, expected that he would be the easiest to disengage. He therefore advised the constitutionalists to address themselves to him, in order to endeavour to bring him over to their views. They accordingly repaired to Larévellière, but found that with all his moderation he was unalterably resolved. Larévellière, unaccustomed, like all the men of his time, to the tactics of representative governments, did not conceive that people could negotiate for the choice of ministers. "Stick to your part," said he, "that is, make laws; leave to us to perform our duties, that of choosing the public officials. It is our duty to give a preference according to our conscience and our opinion of the merit of individuals, and not according to the requisitions of parties." He had then to learn, and at that time no one was aware, that a ministry ought to be composed of influential persons; that these persons ought to be taken from among the existing parties; and that the choice of this or that minister, being a guarantee of the course which is about to be pursued, may fairly become a subject of negotiation. Larévellière had other reasons for rejecting any compromise; he was conscious that he and his friend Rewbell had never wished or voted but for what was right; he was sure that the directorial majority, whatever might be the personal views of the directors, had never voted otherwise; that in its financial arrangements, without being able to prevent all the subaltern malversations, the directorial administration had been upright and as little vicious as possible under the circumstances; that in politics, it had never had any personal ambition, and done nothing to extend its prerogatives; that in the direction of the war it had aspired only to a speedy but honourable and glorious peace. Larévellière could not, therefore, comprehend and admit the reproaches pointed against the directory. His good conscience rendered them unintelligible to him. Henceforward he considered the Clichyans but as so many perfidious conspirators, and the constitutionalists as so many men whose self-conceit had been wounded. He then with every one else had to learn that the temperament of parties, whether well or ill founded, must be conceded to, and that among all other claims must be reckoned even those of wounded self-love. Besides, what the constitutionalists offered, possessed no peculiar attraction. The three directors in coalition wished to give themselves a ministry acting in unison, in order to crush the royalist faction. The constitutionalists, on the contrary, required a ministry totally opposite to that which the directors deemed necessary in the existing danger, and they had nothing to offer in return but their votes, which were by no means numerous, and which moreover they would not pledge on any question. Their alliance, therefore, possessed no such great benefit as to induce the directory to listen to them, and to desist from its designs. Larévellière gave them no satisfaction. In their communications with him, they employed Faujas de Saint Fond, the geologist, with whom he was connected by conformity of tastes and studies. All was to no purpose. He concluded with his reply; "Whenever you attack us, we shall be ready for you. We shall kill you, but it will only be in a political sense. You want our blood, but yours shall not be spilt. You shall merely be deprived of the power to injure us."

This firmness caused them to despair of Larévellière. Carnot advised them to apply to Barras, hardly expecting they would be successful, for he was aware of his dislike. Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, an ardent oppositionist, and whose fondness for pleasure had frequently brought him into the company of Barras, was commissioned to speak to him. The complaisant Barras, who promised every body, though at bottom his sentiments were sufficiently decided, was apparently less intractable than Larévellière. Out of the four ministers whose removal the constitutionalists demanded, namely, Merlin, Ramel, Truguet, and Delacroix, he was willing to change two. It had been so agreed with Rewbell and Larévellière. He could, therefore, promise for those two latter, and he promised their dismissal. But whether, with his usual facility, he promised more than he intended to perform, whether he meant to deceive Carnot and to induce him to demand himself the change of the ministers, or whether his generally ambiguous language was interpreted too favourably, the constitutionalists went and informed Carnot that Barras consented to every thing, and would vote with him in regard to each of the ministers. The constitutionalists insisted that the change should take place immediately. Carnot and Barthélemy, by no means relying on Barras, hesitated to take the initiative. Barras was urged to take it, and he replied that the newspaper press being at that time very furious, the directory would appear to yield to their violence. Some endeavours were made in order to quiet the newspapers, but meanwhile Rewbell and Larévellière, ignorant of these intrigues, themselves took the initiative. On the 28th Messidor, Rewbell declared in the sitting of the directory, that it was high time to come to some conclusion, that they ought to put an end to the fluctuations of the government, and occupy themselves with the change of ministers. He proposed that they should proceed immediately to the ballot. The ballot was secret. Truguet and Delacroix, whom every body was for turning out, were unanimously excluded. As for Ramel and Merlin, whom the constitutionalists alone would have dismissed, they had only the two votes of Barthélemy and Carnot against them, and they were kept in by the votes of Rewbell, Barras, and Larévellière. Cochon, Pétiet, and Benezach, were turned out by the votes of the same three who had supported Merlin and Ramel. Thus the plan of reform agreed upon by the directorial majority was accomplished. Carnot finding himself baffled, tried to defer at least the appointment of successors, saying that he had not made up his mind on the subject. He was sternly reminded that a director ought always to be prepared, and that he ought not to remove one public officer without first determining as to his successor. He was obliged at once to vote. The five successors were appointed by the same majority. Ramel was retained in the department of the finances, and Merlin in that of justice; M. de Talleyrand was placed at the head of the foreign affairs; and over the navy an old and brave seaman and an excellent administrator, Pléville le Peley; over the interior, François (of Neufchâtel), a distinguished writer, but more ingenious than practical; over the police, Lenoir-Laroche, a discreet and intelligent man, who had written several good political articles for the Mouiteur; lastly, over the war-office, the young and illustrious general on whom it had been settled every reliance was to be placed, Hoche. The latter was not of the age required by the constitution, namely, thirty years. Every body knew this, but Larévellière had proposed to his two colleagues, Rewbell and Barras, to appoint him, notwithstanding they would have to find another in his place within two days, in order to attach him to their interests, and as paying a high compliment to the armies. Hence every one concurred in this change, which became decisive, as we shall presently see. It is common enough to see parties contributing to one and the same event, which they think will turn to their advantage. They all concur in producing it, but the strongest decides the result in his favour.

Even if Carnot had not possessed the most irritable pride, he must have been indignant, and have conceived himself deceived by Barras. The members of the legislative body who were interested in the negotiation listened to him, recapitulated the proceedings at the sitting of the directory which had just taken place, used extremely violent language against Barras, called him a base wretch, and evinced the warmest indignation. But one particular incident was soon to increase the ebullition, and raise it to the highest pitch. Hoche, on the recommendation of Barras, had put his troops in motion, with the intention of ultimately taking them to Brest, but of making them halt for a few days in the vicinity of the capital. He had chosen the legion of the Franks, commanded by Humbert, Lemoigne's division of infantry, the division of light horse commanded by Richepanse, and a regiment of artillery, in all fourteen or fifteen thousand men. Richepanse's division of light horse had already arrived at La Ferté-Alais, eleven leagues from Paris. This was an indiscreet act, for the constitutional radius was twelve leagues, and in awaiting for the moment of action, the limit fixed by law ought not to have been transgressed. This indiscretion was owing to the error of a commissariat, who had in ignorance violated the law. This unlucky act was not the only one. The troops, seeing whither they were being conducted, and knowing what was passing in the interior, had no doubt that they would be brought to act against the councils. The officers and soldiers said to each other by the way, that they were going to bring the aristocrats of Paris to reason. Hoche had contented himself with apprising the minister at war of a general movement of troops towards Brest, for the expedition against Ireland.

All these circumstances were evident signs to different parties that they were on the eve of some decisive event. The opposition and the enemies of government did their utmost to ward off the stroke that threatened them; and the directory for its own part neglected nothing that could accelerate the execution of its designs and ensure their success; and we see a little further that the directory was most completely successful.

CHAPTER X

CONCENTRATION OF THE MILITARY AROUND PARIS.—CHANGES IN THE MINISTRY.—PREPARATIONS OF THE OPPOSITION AND THE CLICHYANS AGAINST THE DIRECTORY.—CONTEST OF THE COUNCILS WITH THE DIRECTORY.—INTENDED ENACTMENT RESPECTING THE NATIONAL GUARD.—A LAW PASSED AGAINST POLITICAL SOCIETIES.—FÊTE TO THE ARMY OF ITALY.—MANIFESTATION OF THE GOVERNMENT POLICY.—AUGEREAU TAKES THE COMMAND OF THE PARIS FORCES.—NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE WITH THE EMPEROR.—CONFERENCE AT LILLE WITH ENGLAND.—THE COUNCILS REMONSTRATE AGAINST THE MOVEMENTS OF THE MILITARY.—THE ENERGETIC MESSAGE OF THE DIRECTORY IN REFERENCE TO THIS SUBJECT.—THE OPPOSITION PARTY DIVIDED.—MADAME DE STAËL'S INFLUENCE; UNSUCCESSFUL ATTEMPTS AT RECONCILIATION.—THE ANSWER OF THE COUNCILS TO THE MESSAGE OF THE DIRECTORY.—THE DIRECTORY ADOPT A DECISIVE LINE OF CONDUCT AGAINST THE MAJORITY IN THE COUNCILS.—DECISIVE MEASURES OF THE XVIII. FRUCTIDOR.—VIOLENCE OFFERED TO THE TWO COUNCILS BY THE ARMED FORCE.—BANISHMENT OF FIFTY-THREE DEPUTIES, TWO DIRECTORS, AND OTHER CITIZENS.—VARIOUS REVOLUTIONARY LAWS ARE REVIVED.—THE CONSEQUENCES OF THIS REVOLUTION.

THE news of the arrival of Richepanse's light horse, the particulars of their march and of their language, reached Pétiet, the minister, on the 28th Messidor. Pétiet communicated them to Carnot; and at the moment when the deputies had crowded to pour forth their resentment against the directorial majority, and to condole with the dismissed ministers, they were informed of the movement of the troops. Carnot said that the directory had not to his knowledge issued any order; that perhaps the three other directors had held a private deliberation, but in that case it ought to be entered in the secret register; that he would ascertain that point, and that it was not right to promulgate the circumstance before he had examined whether there existed any orders. But they were too much annoyed to conduct themselves with temper and moderation.

The dismissal of the ministers, the movement of the troops, and the appointment of Hoche in the place of Pétiet, left no doubt whatever as to the intentions of the directory. It was publicly said that the directory evidently had a design against the inviolability of the councils, to bring about a new 31st May, and to proscribe the deputies who adhered to the constitution. A meeting was held at the house of Tronçon-Ducoudray, who was one of the most influential members of the ancients. The Clichyans, as is usual with violent parties, had with pleasure seen the moderates, that is, the constitutionalists, disappointed in their hopes, and deluded in their scheme for composing a ministry according to their own fashion. They considered them as duped by Barras, and were glad of it. But the danger appeared serious, when they saw the troops advancing. Their two generals, Pichegru and Willot, knowing that every one was running to Tronçon-Ducoudray's to talk over what had taken place, repaired thither, though the meeting was composed of men who did not follow the same line of politics. Pichegru at this time possessed no effective means; his only resource was the angry feelings of the parties, and he had to run thither the moment they blazed forth, either to watch or animate them. At this meeting were Portalis, Tronçon-Ducoudray, Lacuée, Dumas, Siméon, Doulet-Pontécoulant, Thibaudau, Villaret-Joyeuse, Willot, and Pichegru. The excitement was great, as might be expected. They talked of the plans of the directory; they cited the language of Rowbell, Larévellière, and Barras, who declared they had made up their minds, and they concluded from the change of ministry and the march of troops that this determination was some decisive act against the legislative body. The most violent resolutions were proposed, such as to suspend the directory, to impeach its members, or even to outlaw them. But to carry out all these resolutions, some physical force would have been requisite; and Thibaudau, who did not participate in the general excitement, asked whence it was to be got. The reply to this was, that they had the twelve hundred grenadiers of the legislative body, part of the twenty-first regiment of light horse, commanded by Malo, and the national guard of Paris; that during the reorganization of that guard, they could send into every district of the capital companies of grenadiers to rally around them the citizens who had taken arms in Vendémiaire. There was a great deal of talking, but nothing was settled, as is almost always the case when the effectual means are wanting. Pichegru, cold and reserved as usual, made some observations on the insufficiency and danger of the means proposed, the coolness of which formed a contrast to the general excitement. They separated and returned to Carnot's, and to the dismissed ministers. Carnot disapproved of all the plans proposed against the directory. A second meeting was held at Tronçon-Ducoudray's, but Pichegru and Willot were not there. A great deal of loose conversation again took place, and the members, not daring to recur to violent measures, at length resolved to intrench themselves in constitutional means. They pledged themselves to demand the law relative to the responsibility of ministers, and the immediate organization of the national guard.

The same declamation took place at Clichy as was the case elsewhere, and to no better purpose; for although there was a greater degree of excitement, the means were not a whit more effective. They particularly regretted the police, which had just been taken from Cochin, and reverted to one of the favourite schemes of the faction, that of wresting the police of Paris from the directory, and giving it to the legislative body, by straining the construction of an article of the constitution. It was proposed at the same time to give the direction of this police to Cochin; but the proposition was so startling that no one durst move it. They fixed at last upon the idea of quibbling about the age of Barras, who, they said, was not forty years old at the time of his appointment to the directory, and of demanding the instantaneous organization of the national guard.

Accordingly, on the 30th Messidor (18th July), there was a grand disturbance at the five hundred. Delahaye, the deputy, denounced the movement of the military, and moved that the report on the national guard should be forthwith presented. Severe comments were passed upon the conduct of the directory; the state of Paris was painted in alarming colours, and the arrival of a multitude of known revolutionists, who required that the five hundred should form itself into a committee upon the political societies. It was settled that the report on the national guard should be made the next day but one, and that immediately afterwards the debate on the clubs should take place. The next day but one, the 2nd Thermidor (20th July), further particulars had arrived concerning the movement of the troops and their number, and it was known that there were already four regiments of cavalry at La Ferté-Alais.

Pichegru made the report on the organization of the national guard. His draught of the new bill was framed in the most perfidious manner. Every Frenchman qualified as a citizen was to be inscribed in the list of the national guard; but all were not to compose the effective force of that guard. Those who were to be on duty were to be chosen by the others; that is, to be elected by the mass. In this manner the national guard was to be formed, like the councils, by the electoral assemblies; and the result of the elections showed what kind of guard would be obtained by these means. It was to be composed of one battalion in every ward; in each battalion there was to be a company of grenadiers and light horse, so as to re-establish those select companies, which were always composed of the most violent men, and were usually employed by the parties for the execution of their views. It was proposed to vote the adoption of the plan immediately. The fiery Henri La Rivière declared that every thing then announced a 31st of May. "Let us go then! let us go!" cried some voices of the left, interpreting him. "Yes!" he resumed, "but I am cheered when I consider that we are at the 2nd Thermidor, and that we are near the 9th, a day fatal to tyrants." He proposed that the bill should be instantly passed, and that a message should be sent to the ancients, requesting them to remain sitting, that they might also pass it before they separated. Thibaudau, the leader of the constitutional party, justly remarked that, whatever expedition might be used, the national guard could not be organized in less than a month; that their precipitation to vote an important project would therefore be unavailing to secure the legislative body from the dangers with which it was threatened; that the national representation ought to confine itself to its rights and its dignity, and not look for support in measures that at the present time were utterly unavailable. He proposed a solemn deliberation. An adjournment of twenty-four hours for the consideration of the bill was adopted, but the principle of the reorganization was immediately afterwards decreed. At this moment a message arrived from the directory, giving explanations concerning the march of the troops. This message stated that the troops appointed for a remote station must necessarily take their road near Paris; that owing to the inadvantage of an army commissariat, they had transgressed the constitutional bounds; that the error of the commissariat was the sole cause of this infraction of the laws; and that, moreover, the troops had received orders to fall back immediately. This explanation was not satisfactory; a violent declamation ensued, and a commission was appointed to inquire into this message, and to make a report on the state of Paris, and the movement of the troops. On the following day the discussion of Pichegru's bill commenced, and four of its articles were passed. The assembly then turned its attention to the clubs, which were springing up on all sides, and seemed to indicate a rally of the Jacobin party. It was proposed to prohibit them absolutely, because the laws which restricted them were always evaded. It was decreed that no political assembly should be permitted for the future. Thus the society of Clichy committed a species of self-extinction, and consented to its own dissolution on condition of destroying the constitutional demarcation as well as the other subordinate clubs which were forming in all quarters. The leaders of the Clichy had, in fact, no need of that tumultuous assemblage for concerting their measures, and they could sacrifice the club without depriving themselves of any great resource. Willot then denounced Barras as not having attained the age required by the constitution at the time when he was appointed director; but an examination of the registers of the war-office proved that this was a mere quibble. Meanwhile other troops had arrived at Rheims; this caused a fresh alarm. The directory having repeated the former explanations, declared them insufficient, and the commission already appointed was directed to investigate and report.

Hoche had arrived in Paris, for he must have gone that way, whether he had to proceed to Brest, or to execute some decisive movement. He presented himself without fear to the directory, certain that, in ordering his divisions to move on, he had obeyed the directorial majority. But Carnot, who was at this moment president of the directory, strove to intimidate him. He asked by virtue of what order he had acted, and threatened him with an impeachment for having passed over the constitutional limits. Unfortunately, Rewbell and Larévellière, who were not informed of the order given to Hoche, could not help him out. Barras, who had given this order, had not the courage to take up the matter, so that Hoche was left exposed to the peremptory questions of Carnot. He replied that he could not go to Brest without troops. Carnot rejoined that there were still forty-three thousand men in Brittany, a number quite sufficient for the expedition. However, Larévellière perceiving the hobble Hoche was in, came at last to his assistance, informed him in the name of the majority of the directory the esteem and confidence which his services had merited, assured him that an impeachment against him was out of the question, and broke up the sitting. Hoche ran to Larévellière to thank him; he there learned that Barras had neither informed Rewbell or Larévellière of the movement of the troops; that he had given the order without their knowledge; and he was indignant against Barras, who, after compromising him, had not the courage to defend him. It was evident that Barras, in acting apart, and without apprising his two colleagues, had wanted to keep in his own hand the means of execution. Hoche, who was indignant, treated Barras with his usual haughtiness, and solemnly transferred his regard to Rewbell and Larévellière. Nothing was yet ready for the execution of the design that the three directors contemplated; and Barras, in summoning Hoche, had compromised him to no purpose. Hoche returned immediately to his head-quarters, which were at Wetzlar, and ordered the troops which he had brought to go into cantonments in the environs of Rheims and Sedan, where they would still be at hand to march for Paris. He was highly disgusted by the conduct of Barras towards him; but he was ready to be at his service again, if Larévellière and Rewbell should give him the signal. He was deeply compromised; some talked of impeaching him; but he awaited with firmness at his head-quarters what the majority of the five hundred, who were perfectly inveterate against him, might attempt. His age not having allowed his acceptance of the ministry at war, Schérer was called to that office in his stead.

The noise that this affair had created, effectually prevented Hoche being employed in the execution of the projects of the directory. Besides, the importance which such a participation must give him might excite the jealousy of the other generals. It was not impossible that Bonaparte might take it ill that any one should be sent to but himself. It was considered more advisable not to make use of any of the commanders-in-chief, but to select one of the most distinguished generals of division. The idea was conceived of asking for Bonaparte one of those generals who had gained such celebrity under his command, which would have the advantage of satisfying him personally, and at the same time avoid wounding the feelings of any of the commanders-in-chief. But, while they were considering as to sending for him, he made himself a party to the quarrel in a manner most annoying to the counter-revolutionists and embarrassing at least to the directory. He chose the anniversary of the 14th of July, corresponding with the 26th Messidor, for giving a fête to the armies, and causing addresses to be drawn up relative to the events in preparation. He ordered a pyramid to be erected at Milan, bearing trophies and the names of all the officers and soldiers who had fallen during the campaign in Italy. Around this pyramid the fête was held. It was magnificent. Bonaparte attended it in person, and addressed to his soldiers a threatening proclamation.

"Soldiers!" said he, "this day is the anniversary of the 14th of July. You see before you the names of your companions in arms who have died on the field of honour for the liberty of the country. Their example is before you. You are to devote yourselves wholly and entirely to the republic; you are bound to sacrifice yourselves wholly and entirely to the happiness of thirty millions of French; you are to devote yourselves wholly and entirely to the glory of that name which has received fresh lustre from your victories.

"Soldiers! I know that you are deeply affected with the calamities which threaten the country. But the country cannot incur any real dangers. The same men who have caused it to triumph over all Europe in league against us are there. Mountains separate us from France; you will cross them with the rapidity of the eagle, in case of need, to maintain the constitution, to defend liberty, to protect the government and the republicans.

"Soldiers! the government is watching over the laws which are committed to its care. The royalists, the moment they appear, will have ceased to live. Be no longer anxious, but let us swear by the manes of the heroes who have died by our side for liberty, let us swear upon our colours, implacable war against the enemies of the republic, and of the constitution of the year III !"

There was afterwards an entertainment, at which the most energetic toasts were given by the generals and the officers. The general gave for the first toast the brave Stengel, Laharpe, and Dubois, who had fallen in the field of honour. "May their manes," said he, "watch over us, and protect us from the secret devices of our enemies!" The company then drank to the constitution of the year III., to the directory, to the council of the ancients, to the French murdered in Verona, to the re-emigration of the emigrants, to the union of the French republicans, and to the destruction of the Clichy club. At this last toast the trumpets sounded a charge. Similar festivities took place in all the towns where divisions of the army were stationed, and they were celebrated with the same solemnity. Addresses were afterwards drawn up in each division. These were still more significant than the proclamation of the commander-in-chief. He had observed a certain propriety of language; but the Jacobin style of 1793 was displayed in full breadth in the addresses of the different divisions of the army. The divisions of Masséna, Joubert, and Augereau, made themselves quite notorious. The division of Augereau, in particular, exceeded all bounds. "O conspirators," it said, "tremble! From the Adige and the Rhine to the Seine is but one step! Tremble! the measure of your iniquities is full! and the point of our bayonets is the price you will pay for them!"

These addresses were subscribed by thousands of signatures and sent to the commander-in-chief. He put them up and transmitted them to the directory with his proclamation, that they might be printed and published in the newspapers. Such a step indicated clearly enough that he was ready to set himself in motion to put down the faction formed in the councils, and to afford his assistance to the execution of some necessary but decisive act. At the same time, knowing the directory to be divided, seeing that the scene was becoming complicated, and wishing to be informed of every thing, he selected one of his aides-de-camp, M. de Lavalette, who enjoyed his entire confidence, and who possessed the sagacity necessary for forming a correct judgment of events; he sent him off to Paris, with orders to observe every thing, and to get all the information he could; at the same time, he made an offer of funds to the directory, in case it should need them, for the purpose of effecting any rigorous measures.

When the directory received these addresses, it was placed in an extremely awkward predicament. These addresses were in some measure not warranted by law, for the armies had not the power of deliberating. To receive them and to publish them, was as much as to authorize the armies to interfere in the government of the state, and to deliver up the republic to the military power. But how was it to extricate itself from this dilemma? In addressing itself to Hoche, in applying to him for troops, and in asking for Bonaparte as a general, had not the government itself suggested this intervening power? Obligated to have recourse to force, to overstep the bounds of legality, how could it apply to any other supporters than the armies? To receive these addresses was but the consequence of what it had done, of what it had been obliged to do. Such was the fate of our unfortunate republic that, to extricate herself from her enemies, she was obliged to place herself in the power of the armies. It was the dread of a counter-revolution which, in 1793, had thrown the republic into the excesses and horrors whose melancholy history we have already related; it was the dread of counter-revolution which now obliged her to throw herself into the arms of the soldiery; in a word, it was always to avoid the same danger that she had recourse on one occasion to party violence, at another to bayonets.

The directory would have been glad to have kept these addresses secret, and not have published them, on account of the bad example they afforded; but it would have grievously offended the general, and perhaps have thrown him back among the enemies of the republic. It was therefore compelled to print and circulate them. They struck terror into the Clichy party, and made it sensible of the egregious imprudence which it had committed in attacking, by Dumolard's motion, the conduct of general Bonaparte at Venice. They gave rise to fresh complaints in the councils, to invectives against this interference of the armies; it was said that they had no right to deliberate, and they furnished fresh evidence of the designs imputed to the directory.

Bonaparte caused the directory further perplexity by the general of division whom he sent. Augereau excited a kind of agitation in the army by the violence of his opinions, in every respect worthy of the faubourg Saint-Antoine. He was ready to quarrel with any one who was less violent than himself; and Bonaparte was fearful of dissensions existing among his generals. To get rid of him, he sent him to the directory, conceiving that he would be very fit for the purpose for which he was destined, and that he would be better in Paris than at head-quarters, where want of occupation rendered him dangerous. Augereau was delighted; for he was as fond of the agitations of clubs as of fields of battle; and he was not insensible to the attractions of power. He set out immediately, and arrived in Paris in the middle of Thermidor. Bonaparte wrote to his aide-de-camp, Lavalette, that he sent Augereau because he could not keep him any longer in Italy; he recommended him to be on his guard against him, and to continue his observations, in keeping himself constantly aloof from him. He also recommended him to keep on the best terms with Carnot; for, though he distinctly declared himself in favour of the directory against the counter-revolutionary faction, he wished not to enter in the slightest degree into the personal quarrels of the directors.

The directory was by no means pleased at Augereau's arrival. That general was a very suitable person for Barras, who was willing enough to be herding with the Jacobins and patriots of the faubourgs, and who was always talking of putting himself on horseback; but he did not suit Rewbell and Larévellière, who wished for a prudent and temperate general, who could, if things came to the worst, make common cause with them against the schemes of Barras. Augereau could not have been better pleased than to find himself in Paris on such a mission. He was a brave man and an excellent soldier, with a good heart, but a great braggart, and altogether a very weak man. He went about Paris, receiving entertainments, enjoying the celebrity gained by his exploits, but attributing to himself part of the operations of the army of Italy, willingly allowing it to be supposed that he had suggested to the general-in-chief his most brilliant plans, and repeating on all occasions that he would soon bring the aristocrats to reason. Larévellière and Rewbell, who were concerned at this conduct, resolved to obtain his confidence, and by flattering his vanity, to bring him back to some degree of consistency. Larévellière paid him great attention, and succeeded in taming him, partly by well-placed compliments, partly by the respect he knew how to make him feel. He explained to him that he was not to dishonour himself by a sanguinary affray, but to acquire the title of saviour of the republic by an act distinguished by its energy and discretion, which should disarm the factions without spilling blood. He thus softened Angereau, and at length contrived to make him more reasonable. He was immediately invested with the command of the seventeenth military division, comprehending Paris. This new step sufficiently denoted the intentions which the directory had resolved upon. Hoche's troops were within a few marches; a signal was all that was wanted to bring them to the capital. The directory was only waiting for the funds promised by Bonaparte, as it would not take money from the treasury, lest it should compromise Ramel, the minister, who was so strictly watched by the commission of finance. These funds were partly appropriated for gaining over the grenadiers of the legislative body, who were twelve hundred in number, and who, without being formidable, might by resisting bring on a battle; and this was what it was most desirous to avoid. Barras, ever fertile in intrigues, was entrusted with this part of the business; and this was the motive for deferring the decisive act.

The events in the interior had a most pernicious influence on the highly important negotiations commenced between the republic and the powers of Europe. The implacable faction leagued against the liberty and the repose of France was about to add to its injurious acts that of compromising the peace which had been so long expected. Lord Malmesbury had arrived at Lille, and the Austrian ministers had conferred at Montebello with Bonaparte and Clarke, the two plenipotentiaries appointed to represent France. The preliminaries of Leoben, signed on the 29th Germinal (April 18), purported that two congresses should be opened, the one a general congress at Berne, for peace with the emperor and his allies, the other a special congress at Rastadt, for peace with the empire; that the peace with the emperor should be concluded within three months, otherwise the preliminaries were to be null and void; that nothing should be done in the Venetian states unless in concert with Austria, but that the Venetian provinces should not be occupied by the emperor till after the conclusion of the peace. The occurrences at Venice seemed to be somewhat inconsistent with these conditions, and Austria showed much haste to vary them more formally, on her part, by occupying the Venetian provinces of Istria and Dalmatia. Bonaparte winked at this infraction of the preliminaries, in order to spare recriminations in regard to what he had done at Venice, and what he was about to do in the islands of the Levant. The exchange of the ratifications took place at Montebello, near Milan, on the 5th Prairial (May 24). The marquis de Gallo, the Neapolitan minister at Vienna, was the emperor's envoy. After the exchange of the ratifications, Bonaparte conferred with M. de Gallo, for the purpose of inducing him to forego the idea of a congress at Berne, and to prevail on him to treat separately in Italy, without calling in the other powers. The reasons which he had to assign, tending even to the interest of Austria herself, were excellent. How could Russia and England, if they were called to this congress, allow Austria to indemnify herself at the expense of Venice, whose possessions they coveted themselves? It was impossible, and the very interest of Austria, as well as the necessity of a speedy conclusion, required that they should immediately confer, and that in Italy. M. de Gallo, a sagacious and intelligent man, felt the force of these reasons. In order to decide the matter and to gain the Austrian cabinet, Bonaparte made a concession of etiquette, to which the cabinet of Vienna attached great importance. The emperor still apprehended that the republic would not repudiate the ancient ceremonial of the kings of France, and not insist on the alternative in the protocol of the treaties. The emperor was always solicitous to be named first, and to preserve for his ambassadors their precedence before the ambassadors of France. Bonaparte, who had, at his desire, been authorized by the directory to concede such nothingnesses, assented to the request of M. de Gallo. The satisfaction was so great, that M. de Gallo immediately adopted the principle of a separate negotiation, and wrote to Vienna to obtain powers in consequence. But old Thugut, superannuated and ill-tempered, entirely attached to the English system, and every moment tendering his resignation, since the courts, influenced by the archduke Charles, seemed to be actuated by a contrary system—Thugut had other views. The peace was distasteful to him: the internal disturbances in France gave him hopes in which he indulged, although they had so often proved deceitful. Although it had cost Austria so much money, and she had been led into so many false steps and a disastrous war by giving ear to the emigrants, still Pichegru's new conspiracy suggested to Thugut the idea of deferring the conclusion of the peace. He resolved to oppose wilful delays to the urgency of the French plenipotentiaries. He caused the proceeding of the marquis de Gallo to be disavowed, and another negotiator, major-general count de Meerveldt, to be despatched to Montebello. This negotiator arrived on the 1st Messidor (June 19), and demanded the execution of the preliminaries, that is, the assembling of the congress at Berne. Bonaparte, indignant at this change of system, returned a most animated reply. He repeated all that he had previously said in regard to the impossibility of obtaining the adhesion of England and Russia to arrangements the bases of which had been fixed at Leoben; he added that a congress would involve fresh delays; that two months had already elapsed since the signing of the preliminaries of Léoben; that according to those preliminaries, peace ought to be concluded in three months, and that it would be impossible to conclude it in that time, if all the powers were to be summoned. These reasons again left the Austrian plenipotentiaries without reply. The court of Vienna appeared to give way, and fixed the conferences at Udine, in the Venetian states, that the place of negotiation might be nearer to Vienna. They were to recommence on the 13th Messidor (July 1). Bonaparte, whom business of the greatest importance detained at Milan amidst the new republics now being founded, and who, moreover, was anxious to watch the events at Paris as closely as possible, did not wish to suffer himself to be drawn uselessly to Udine, to be there overreached by Thugut. He sent Clarke thither, and declared that he should not repair thither in person until he was convinced, by the nature of the powers given to the new negotiators, and by their conduct in the negotiation, that the court of Vienna was sincere in its professions. In point of fact, he was not mistaken. The cabinet of Vienna, more than ever imposed upon by the wretched agents of the royalist faction, flattered itself that it would be discharged from entering into a treaty with the directory by a revolution, and it caused notes, rather extraordinary in the then state of the negotiation, to be sent. These notes, dated July 18th (30th Messidor), stated that the court of Vienna intended to adhere strictly to the preliminaries, and consequently to treat for a general peace at Berné; that the term of three months fixed for the preliminaries for the conclusion of peace, could only be understood to commence from the meeting of the congress, otherwise it would have been useless to have made this stipulation; that consequently the court of Vienna, insiating on confining herself to the tenor of those preliminaries, demanded a general congress of all the powers. These notes contained likewise bitter complaints on the occurrences at Venice and Genoa; they maintained that these occurrences were a serious infraction of the preliminaries of Léoben, and that France ought to give satisfaction for them.

On receiving these very strange notes, Bonaparte was highly indignant. His first idea was to collect all the divisions of his army immediately, to resume the offensive, to advance once more upon Vienna, and to insist this time on less moderate conditions than at Léoben. But the internal state of France, and the conferences opened at Lille, stopped him, and he conceived that he ought at this important juncture to leave the directory, placed as it was at the centre of all the operations, the responsibility of settling the conduct to be pursued. He contented himself with instructing Clarke to draw up a peremptory note. This note was to the following effect: That it was too late to demand a congress, the impossibility of which had been acknowledged by the Austrian plenipotentiaries, and to which the court had itself acceded, by appointing the conferences at Udine; that at the present time there was no reason for this congress, since the allies of Austria were separating themselves from her, and showing an intention of treating singly, which was proved by the conferences at Lille; that the term of three months could not be otherwise construed than to commence from the day of the signature at Léoben, otherwise by deferring the opening of the congress there would be no end of the delay, the very thing France had desired to prevent by fixing a certain period; that finally the preliminaries had not been violated in the conduct pursued towards Venice and Genoa; that those two countries could not have changed their government unless it had been discovered to be vicious; and finally, that by seizing upon Istria and Dalmatia, in defiance of all the written conventions, Austria had herself broken the preliminaries. After having thus replied in a firm and dignified manner, Bonaparte referred the whole to the directory, and awaited its orders, recommending to it as speedy a decision as possible, because it was of importance that hostilities should be resumed before the bad weather came, if such a resolution should become necessary.

The negotiation opened at Lille, was conducted with greater good faith, which cannot but appear singular, since it was with Pitt that the French negotiators had to deal. But Pitt was really alarmed at the situation of England. He had no further reliance upon Austria; he placed no confidence in the downright lies of the royalist agents, and wished to treat with France, before peace with the emperor should make her stronger and more importunate. If then he had in the last year only wanted to adroitly evade a treaty for the purpose of satisfying the public mind, and preventing an arrangement in regard to the Netherlands, this year he had every wish to negotiate, even though this peace should afford no more than two or three years' tranquillity. This downright Englishman could not, in fact, consent to absolutely relinquish the Netherlands to France.

Every thing showed that he was in earnest, as we have already observed, as well as the selection of lord Malmesbury, as the secret instructions given to that negotiator. According to the practice of English diplomacy, all was so arranged that there should be two negotiations at once; the one official and apparent, the other secret and substantive. Mr. Ellis had been associated with lord Malmesbury, in order to conduct under his direction the secret negotiation, and to correspond directly with Pitt. This practice of English diplomacy is compulsory in a representative government. In the official negotiation nothing more is said than may be repeated in the two houses of Parliament, and what cannot be published is reserved for the secret negotiation. When in particular the ministry is divided on the question of the peace, the secret conferences are communicated to that portion of the ministry which authorizes and directs the negotiation. The English legation arrived at Lille with a numerous retinue, and in great state, on the 16th Messidor (July 4).

The negotiators appointed to represent France were Letourneur, who had recently quitted the directory, Pléville le Peley, who stayed but a few days at Lille on account of his appointment to the commissionership of the navy, and Hugues Maret, since duke of Bassano. Of these three ministers the latter alone was capable of taking a useful part in the negotiation. Young, but early practised in diplomatic experience, he combined with much intelligence manners which had become rare in France since the revolution. He was indebted to

M. de Talleyrand for his introduction to public affairs; and on this occasion he had mutually settled with him that one of the two should have the ministry for foreign affairs, and the other the mission to Lille. M. Maret had been sent twice to London in the early days of the revolution; he had been favourably received by Pitt, and had acquired a perfect knowledge of the English cabinet. He was therefore a very fit person to represent France at Lille. He repaired thither with his two colleagues, and they arrived at the same time as the English legation. It is not ordinarily the case that diplomatic questions are disposed of in public conferences. The English negotiators, who exhibited great tact and dexterity, would have been glad to meet the French negotiators on familiar terms, and had too much good sense to evince any coolness. On the contrary, Letourneur and Pléville le Peley, upright men, but possessing no great experience in diplomacy, had much of the revolutionary coarseness; they considered the two Englishmen as dangerous persons, ready to intrigue and to deceive, against whom it was necessary for them to use the utmost caution. They refused to see them unless officially, and became apprehensive of compromising themselves if they adopted any other mode of communication. This was not the way to bring about a good understanding with each other.

Lord Malmesbury stated his powers, where the conditions of the treaty were left in blank, and required to be informed of the conditions of France. The three French negotiators showed the conditions which, as it may be conceived, were a very high maximum. They required that the king of England should renounce the title of king of France, which he continued to assume, according to one of those ridiculous customs retained in England; that he should restore all the ships captured at Toulon; that he should restore to France, Spain, and Holland, all the colonies which he had taken from them. In exchange for all these concessions, France, Spain, and Holland, offered nothing but peace, for they had taken nothing from England. It is true that France was justified by her present importance in requiring a great deal, but to demand every thing for herself and her allies, and to cede nothing, was in fact putting an end to all mutual arrangement. Lord Malmesbury, who wished to arrive at effective results, saw clearly that the official negotiation would lead to nothing, and sought to bring about a more unreserved mode of communication. M. Maret, more familiar than his colleagues with diplomatic usages, readily concurred in this, but he had to negotiate with Letourneur and Pléville le Peley, in order to prevail on them to meet the English envoys at the theatre. The young men of the two embassies were the first to associate together, and they were soon on the most friendly footing. France had so completely broken with the past since the revolution, that it cost great pains to re-establish her in her old relations with the other powers. They had nothing of the same nature to do in the preceding year, because all that time the negotiation not being conducted in good earnest, they had scarcely any thing to do than to make evasions, but this year they had to enter into a conclusive and kindly intercourse. Lord Malmesbury caused M. Maret to be sounded, with a view to engage him in a private negotiation. Maret, before he assented to it, wrote to Paris to obtain authority to do so from the French ministry. It was accorded without difficulty, and he immediately entered into conferences with the English negotiators.

There was no longer any idea of contesting for the Netherlands, or discussing the new position in which Holland was placed with regard to France; but England was desirous of keeping some of the principal colonies she had conquered, either to indemnify herself for the expenses of the war, or as a return for the concessions she should make to us. She consented to restore us all our colonies, she even agreed to renounce all pretensions to Saint Domingo, and even to assist us in re-establishing our government there; but she claimed to indemnify herself at the expense of Holland and Spain. Thus she would not restore Spain the island of Trinidad, of which she had possessed herself, and which was a very valuable colony from its position at the entrance of the Caribbean sea; she desired also, with respect to some of the possessions taken from the Dutch, to keep the Cape of Good Hope, which commands the navigation of the two oceans, and Trincomalee, the principal port of the island of Ceylon; she was willing to exchange the town of Negapatnam, on the Coromandel coast, for the town and fort of Cochin on the coast of Malabar, one of her most valuable settlements. As for disclaiming the title of the king of France, the English negotiators resisted it on account of the royal family, who were by no means disposed to peace, and whose vanity had to be considered. With respect to the ships taken at Toulon, which had been already fitted up and armed in the English fashion, they deemed it too degrading to restore them, and offered an indemnity in money of twelve millions. Lord Malmesbury gave as a reason to Maret, that he durst not return to London if he restored every thing, and did not retain for the English people some of the conquests acquired at the expense of their blood and treasure. In other respects, to prove his sincerity, he showed all the secret instructions sent to Mr. Ellis, which furnished evidence of the desire of Pitt to obtain peace. These conditions deserved consideration.

A circumstance which suddenly occurred gave great advantage to the French negotiators. Besides the junction of the Spanish, Dutch, and French squadrons at Brest, a junction that depended on the first gale which should remove admiral Jervis from Cadiz, England had another danger to apprehend. Portugal, terrified by France and Spain, had just abandoned her ancient ally and entered into a treaty with France. The principal condition was, that she should not admit more than six armed vessels belonging to the belligerent powers at once. England would thus lose her invaluable station in the Tagus. This unexpected treaty placed the English negotiators somewhat at the mercy of M. Maret. They began to discuss the definitive conditions. Trinidad was by no means to be taken from them; as for the Cape of Good Hope, which was the most important object, it was at length agreed that it should be restored to Holland, but on one express condition, that France should never take advantage of her ascendancy over Holland to possess herself of it. This was what England most dreaded. She was less anxious to hold it herself than to take it from us, and the restitution of that colony was agreed to on condition that we should never have it ourselves. With regard to Trincomalee, which involved the possession of Ceylon, it was to be kept by the English, but still with the appearance of an option. A Dutch garrison was to take turns with an English garrison; but it was agreed that this should be a mere illusory formality, and that this port should actually belong to the English. As to the exchange of Cochin for Negapatnam, the English insisted on this, but without making it a condition sine quâ non. The twelve millions were accepted for the ships taken at Toulon. As for the title of king of France, it was agreed that, without a formal abdication, the king of England should cense to assume it.

Such was the point at which the reciprocal claims of the negotiators had stopped. Letourneur, who was left alone with Maret since the departure of Pléville le Peley appointed to the commissionerhip of the navy, was completely ignorant of the secret negotiation. M. Maret made him amends for his nullity by paying him all external honours, and giving him precedence of which this honest and easy man was very tenacious. M. Maret had communicated all the particulars of the negotiation to the directory, and awaited its decision. Never had France and England been so near a reconciliation. It was evident that the negotiation of Lille was wholly unconnected with that of Udine, and that England was acting independently without caring for any secret intelligence with Austria.

The decision to be adopted on the subject of these negotiations could not fail to agitate the directory more than any other question. The royalist faction furiously demanded peace without wishing for it; the constitutionalists desired it sincerely, even at the price of some sacrifices; the republicans desired it without sacrifices, and they desired above all the glory of the republic. They would have insisted on the entire liberation of Italy, and the restitution of the colonies of our allies, even at the price of a new campaign. The opinions of the five directors were dictated by their position. Carnot and Barthélemy voted for accepting the conditions of Austria and England; the other three directors maintained the contrary opinion. These questions served to create a misunderstanding between the two parties in the directory. Barras bitterly censured Carnot for the preliminaries of Leoben, and spoke of him in no very measured terms. Carnot, on his part, said with reference to these conditions, that Austria ought not to be hardly used; which meant that in order to render the peace durable, the conditions ought not to be overstrained. But his colleagues took these expressions in very bad part, and Rowbell asked him whether he was a minister of Austria or a magistrate of the French republic. The three directors, on receiving Bonaparte's despatches, were for breaking off at once and resuming hostilities. But the present state of the republic, the fear of putting another weapon in the hands of the enemies of the government, and of furnishing them with a pretext for saying that the directory never would make peace, induced the directors to temporize for a while. They wrote to Bonaparte, that they must wait till their patience was exhausted, and until they had full proof of the insincerity of Austria, and in such a manner that the resumption of hostilities could be imputed to her alone.

With respect to the conferences at Lille, the question was not less embarrassing. As for France she could easily make up her mind, since every thing was to be restored to her; but so far as concerned Spain, who was to be deprived of Trinidad, and as regarded Holland, who was to lose Trincomalee, the question was a difficult one to resolve. Carnot, whose new position obliged him to be always in favour of peace, voted for the adoption of these conditions, although they did not make any liberal concessions to our allies. As the directors were greatly dissatisfied with Holland and the parties which divided her, Carnot advised that she should be left to herself, and that no further concern should be taken on her behalf; a piece of advice quite as illiberal as that of sacrificing her colonies. Rowbell was exceedingly angry on this question. Possessing the strongest affection for France, even to injustice, he wished that, so far from deserting Holland, the French should make themselves all powerful in that country, and make it a province of the republic; and he particularly opposed with all his might the adoption of the article by which France renounced possession for ever of the Cape of Good Hope. He maintained, on the contrary, that this colony and several others must some day be transferred to us in payment of our services. He defended, as we see, the interest of our allies, much more for our sake than for theirs. Larévellière, who, from a spirit of equity, was very attentive to their interests, was adverse to the proposed conditions for totally different reasons. He considered it as disgraceful to sacrifice Spain, whom we had drawn into a quarrel, which was in some measure foreign to her, and whom we obliged, as the price of her alliance, to sacrifice an important colony. He regarded it as equally dishonourable to sacrifice Holland, who had been hurried by France into the career of revolutions, of whose interest she had taken charge, and whom she was about to deprive at once of her richest possessions and to consign to a frightful anarchy. If, in fact, France were to withdraw her hand, Holland must fall into the most fatal disturbances. Larévellière said that the directory should be responsible for all the blood that should be spilt. This policy was liberal; perhaps it was not sufficiently prudent. Our allies were sustaining losses; the point was whether they would not sustain still greater by continuing the war. The event has proved this. But the triumphs of France on the continent then gave room to hope that when she was freed from Austria, she would obtain victories quite as glorious upon the seas. The desertion of our allies appeared disgraceful; a different course was adopted. It was resolved to address Spain and Holland, for the purpose of inquiring their intention. They were to declare if they wished for peace, at the price of the sacrifice required by England; and in case they should prefer a continuance of the war, they were further to declare what forces they proposed to collect for the defence of the common interests. Despatches were posted to Lille, stating that no answer could be given to the proposals of England before the allies of France had been consulted.

These discussions completely estranged the directors from each other. The moment of the catastrophe was near at hand. The two parties pursued their course, and daily became more and more exasperated. The commission of finances in the five hundred had amended its measures, in order to induce the ancients to pass them with some qualifications. The arrangements in respect of the treasury had been slightly varied. The directory was still to have nothing to do with the negotiation of securities; and without confirming or abolishing the distinction between the ordinary and the extraordinary, it was settled that the expenses relative to the pay of the armies should always have the preference. Anticipations were forbidden, but the anticipations which had already taken place were not revoked. Lastly, the new arrangements relative to the sale of the national estates were again brought forward, with an important amendment it is true; namely, that the treasury warrants and the bonds of the contractors were to be taken in payment for national estates, like the three-quarter bills. These measures, thus amended, had been adopted; they were less destructive of the means of the treasury, but still extremely dangerous. All the penal laws against the priests were abolished; the oath was changed into a mere affirmation, by which the priests declared that they submitted to the laws of the republic. Neither the question of the forms of worship or the question of the bells was yet taken into consideration. The heritable rights of the emigrants were no longer vested in the state, but went to the next of kin. The families which had already been obliged to account to the republic for the patrimonial share of an emigrant son or relative were to receive an indemnity out of the national estates. The sale of the parsonage-houses was suspended. Lastly, the most important of all the measures, the institution of the national guard, had been voted in a few days, on the basis already noticed. The composition of this guard was to be effected by way of election. It was on this measure that Pichegru and his partisans placed the greatest reliance for the execution of their designs. Accordingly, they had obtained the addition of an article, according to which the business of this organization was to commence ten days after the publication of the law. They were thus sure to have soon collected the Parisian guard, and with it all the insurgents of Vendémiaire.

The directory, on its part, convinced of the imminence of the danger, and still supposing a conspiracy ready to break out, had assumed the most threatening attitude. Augereau was not alone in Paris. The armies were inactive, and a shoal of generals had flocked thither. Chérin, chief of Hoche's staff; generals Lemoine and Humbert, who commanded the divisions which had marched to Paris; Kléber and Lefebvre, who were away on leave; and lastly Bernadotte, whom Bonaparte had sent to carry the colours that were yet to be presented to the directory, were all in Paris. Besides these superior officers, officers of all ranks, out of commission since the reduction of the companies, and looking out for employment, were very numerous in Paris, and held the most threatening language against the councils. A great number of revolutionists had flocked thither from the provinces, as they always did whenever they expected a commotion. In addition to all these symptoms, the direction and destination of the troops could scarcely leave any doubt; their cantonnements were in the neighbourhood of Rheims. It was alleged that if they had been destined solely for the expedition to Ireland, they would have continued their march to Brest, and not have been staying in the departments contiguous to Paris, that Hoche would not have returned to his head-quarters, and, finally, that so large a body of cavalry would not have been collected for a naval expedition. A commission had been appointed, as we have seen, to investigate and to report upon all these circumstances. The directory had given only very vague explanations to this commission. The troops, it was said, had been marched for a remote expedition, by an order from general Hoche, who had received that order from the directory; and if they had transgressed the limits of the constitutional limit, that was through the mistake of an army commissariat. But the councils had replied, through Pichegru, that troops could not be transferred from one army to another upon the mere order of the general in chief; that he ought to derive his orders from a higher authority; that he could not receive them from the directory, unless through the medium of the minister at war; that Pétiet, the minister at war, had not counter-signed that order; that consequently general Hoche had acted without a formal authority; that finally, if the troops had to be marched to a remote place, they ought to pursue their march, and not to collect around Paris. These observations were well founded, and the directory had good reasons for not answering them. The councils decreed, in consequence of these observations, that a circle should be drawn around Paris, with a radius of twelve leagues; that columns should mark on all the roads the circumference of this circle, and that the officers of the troops who should pass it should be considered as guilty of high treason.

But fresh circumstances soon occurred to renew the alarm. Hoche had collected his troops in the departments of the north, around Sedan and Rheims, a few marches from Paris, and he had despatched fresh troops in the same direction. These movements, the language held by the soldiers, the agitation which prevailed in Paris, and the quarrels of the regular officers with the golden age of youth (jeunesse dorée), furnished Willot with the opportunity of making a second denunciation. He ascended the tribune, spoke of a new movement of troops, of the spirit which manifested itself in their ranks, of the fury excited in them against the councils; and while on this subject, he inveighed against the addresses of the army of Italy, and against the publicity given them by the directory. In consequence, he proposed that the inspectors of the hall should be directed to collect fresh information, and to make a new report. The deputies called the inspectors of the hall were charged with the police of the councils; and consequently it was their duty to provide for their safety. Willot's proposal was adopted, and on the suggestion of the commission of inspectors, several embarrassing questions were on the 17th ~~th~~ midor (August 4) addressed to the directory. They reverted to the nature of the orders by virtue of which general Hoche had acted. Could, in short, the nature of those orders be explained? Had means been used to enforce the execution of the constitutional article which forbade the troops to deliberate?

The directory resolved to reply by an energetic message to the new questions which were addressed to it, without, however, giving those explanations which it did not suit it to give. Larévellière drew it up, Carnot and Barthélemy refused to sign it. This message was presented on the 23rd Thermidor (August 10). It contained nothing more concerning the movement of the troops. The generals of division, said the directory, had received orders from general Hoche, and general Hoche from the directory. The channel through which they had been transmitted was not yet mentioned. As to the addresses, the directory said that the signification of the word deliberate was too vague for it to be possible to determine whether the armies had done wrong in presenting them; that it admitted the danger of allowing armies to express their opinions, and that it would prevent fresh publications of that nature; but that under all circumstances, before the step which the soldiers of the republic had ventured to take could be imputed to them as a crime, it was necessary to go back to the causes which had occasioned it; that the chief reason was, the general restlessness that had for some months past possessed every one; that the cause lay in the deficiency of the public revenue, which left all the departments of the administration in the most deplorable situation, and frequently deprived of their pay the men who for years had been spilling their blood and spending their strength in the service of the republic; in the persecutions and the murders perpetrated on the purchasers of the national estates, on the public functionaries, and on the defenders of the country; in the impunity of crime and the partiality of certain tribunals; in the insolence of the emigrants and the refractory priests, who, openly recalled and favoured, overran every place, fanned the flame of discord, and excited contempt for the laws; in that multitude of newspapers, which deluged the army and the interior, and preached up nothing but royalty and the overthrow of the republic; in the partiality, always ill-dissembled and often boldly manifested, for the glory of Austria and England; in the efforts that were made to depreciate the just renown of our warriors; in the scandals reported against two illustrious generals, who had, the one in the west, the other in Italy, added to their exploits the immortal honour of the most admirable political conduct; finally, in the sinister projects announced by men who possessed more or less influence on the fortunes of the state. The directory added, that at any rate it entertained the firm resolution and the well-founded hope of saving France from the new convulsions with which she was threatened. Thus, so far from explaining and excusing its conduct, the directory, on the contrary, recriminated, and openly manifested an intention to engage in the conflict, and its expectation to come off victorious. This message was considered as an actual manifesto, and created the strongest sensation. The five hundred immediately appointed a commission to examine and to answer the message.

The constitutionalists began to be alarmed at the state of affairs. They saw, on the one hand, the directory ready to rely on support from the armies; on the other, the Clichyans ready to collect the band of Vendémiaire, under pretext of organizing the national guard. Those who were sincerely republicans would rather that the directory should prove victorious, but they would altogether have preferred that there should not have been any contest; and they could not but perceive how pernicious their opposition had been in alarming the directory and encouraging the reactionists. They did not confess their faults, but they lamented the present state of things, imputing it as usual to their adversaries. Those Clichyans who were not in the secret of the counter-revolution, who did not even wish for it, and who were solely actuated by an imprudent hatred against the excesses of the revolution, began to be alarmed, and feared lest by their opposition they had awakened all the revolutionary propensities of the directory. Their ardour was cooled. Those Clichyans who were out and out royalists were in a great hurry to act, and were afraid of being anticipated. They importuned Pichegru, and urged him on with great earnestness. The latter, with his usual phlegm, made promises to the agents of the pretender, and was always temporizing. Besides all this, he possessed no real appliances; for a few emigrants, and some few Chouans in Paris, did not constitute a sufficient force; and until he should have the national guard at his disposal, he could not make any serious attempt. Cool and wary, he took a just view of his situation, and replied to all solicitations that it was requisite to wait. He was told that the directory was about to strike; he replied that the directory durst not. At any rate, as he did not give the directory credit for sufficient boldness, finding his own means yet inadequate, playing a great part, and having plenty of money at his disposal, it was not to be wondered at that he was in no great hurry to be up and be doing.

In this state of things, temperately-disposed persons sincerely desired that a conflict might be avoided. They would have rather wished for a reconciliation, which in bringing the constitutionalists and the moderate Clichyans round to the directory, should restore it the majority it had lost, and relieve it from the necessity of recurring to violent means for safety. Madame de Staël was so circumstanced as to wish for, and to attempt, such an accommodation of differences. She was the centre of that brilliant and enlightened society, which, though it deemed the government and its leaders rather coarse, was attached to the republic, and cleaved to it. Madame de Staël preferred that form of government, as the fairest arena for the human mind. She had already placed one of her friends in an elevated position; she hoped to provide for them all in the same way, and to become their Egeria. She was not insensible of the perils to which this order of things, which had become dear to her, was exposed; she admitted men of all the parties, and paid them attention, and could foresee a speedy collision. She was generous, and active; she could not remain inattentive to events; and it was natural that she should strive to use her influence in bringing together men whose estrangement did not proceed from any great difference in opinion. She assembled in her drawing-room the republicans, the constitutionalists, and the Clichyans; she endeavoured to allay the violence of the discussions, by interposing herself between their self-love, with the tact of a kind-hearted and superior woman. But she was not a whit more successful than people ordinarily are in effecting party reconciliations; and the men most strongly opposed to one another began to stay away from her house. She strove to obtain an interview with the members of the two commissions appointed to reply to the recent message of the directory. Some were constitutionalists, as Thibaudeau, Emery, Siméon, Tronçon-Ducoudray, and Portalis; through them some impression might be created by the style of the two reports, and these reports were extremely important, for they were the answer to the manifesto of the directory. Madame de Staël bestirred herself personally, and through her friends. The constitutionalists wished to reconcile matters, for they were sensible of the danger; but this accommodation required on their part sacrifices which it was difficult to wring from them. If the directory had committed substantive errors and had taken culpable measures, then a negotiation might have been opened for the revocation of certain of those measures, and a treaty concluded upon the basis of mutual concessions; but excepting the private misconduct of Barras, the majority of the directory had conducted itself with as much zeal and attachment to the constitution as could possibly be desired. No arbitrary act, no usurpation of power, could be imputed to it. The administration of the finances, so severely censured, was the forced result of circumstances. The change of the ministers, the movement of the troops, the addresses of the armies, the appointment of Angereau, were the only facts that could be mentioned as indicating formidable intentions. But these were precautions rendered indispensable by the danger, and the danger could only be made to vanish entirely by ensuring the majority to the directory, so as then to have a right to demand that these precautionary measures be abandoned. The constitutionalists, on the other hand, had supported the newly-elected members in all their attacks, were they unjust or imprudent, and it was for them alone to make concessions. There was nothing therefore to demand at the hands of the directory, but much from the constitutionalists; which rendered reciprocity of concessions impracticable, and their wounded self-conceit irreconcilable.

Madame de Staël took great pains, personally and by her friends, to make it understood that the directory was ready to run all risks, that the constitutionalists would be the victims of their obstinacy, and that the republic would be ruined along with them. But the latter would not abandon their old notions for new, and refused every species of concession, and insisted that the directory should go over to them. Rewbell and Laréveillière were spoken to. The latter, without avoiding the argument, entered into a long enumeration of the acts of the directory, asking, at the mention of each of these acts, whether it was censurable. To this no answer was made. As for sending back Angereau, and the revocation of all the measures which indicated a speedy revolution, Laréveillière and Rewbell were not to be moved. They would accede to nothing, and proved by their cold firmness that a high resolve had been taken.

Madame de Staël and those who seconded her in her laudable but fruitless undertaking, pressed the members of the two commissions very hard, that they should not propose too violent legislative measures, and in particular, that when they replied to the grievances expressed in the message of the directory, they should not indulge in angry and dangerous recriminations. All this trouble was thrown away; for there is no instance of a party having ever followed advice. In both commissions there were Clichyans, and they in all reason would call for the most violent measures. In the first place, they wanted to give the criminal jury of Paris exclusive cognizance of all offences committed against the safety of the legislative body, and to demand the exclusion of all troops from the constitutional boundaries, they required in particular that the constitutional boundaries should not be included within any military division. The aim of this last measure was to take the command of Paris from Angereau, and to accomplish by a decree what could not be obtained by way of negotiation. These measures were adopted by the two commissions. But Thibaudeau and Tronçon-Ducoudray who had to make the report, the former to the five hundred, the latter to the ancients, refused, with equal prudence and firmness, to submit the last proposition. The idea was then relinquished, and the two former propositions were thought quite sufficient. Tronçon-Ducoudray made his report on the 3rd Fructidor, Thibaudeau on the 4th. They replied indirectly to the reproaches of the directory, and Tronçon-Ducoudray addressing the ancients, exhorted them to interpose their wisdom and their dignity between the vivacity of the young legislators of the five hundred, and the susceptibility of the heads of the executive power. Thibaudeau strove to justify the councils, to prove that they had not intended either to attack the government or to scandalize the armies. He referred to Dumolard's motion relative to Venice. He insisted that nobody meant to attack the heroes of Italy; but maintained that their appointments would not be durable unless they had the sanction of the two councils. The two insignificant measures proposed were adopted, and these two reports, from which so much had been expected, produced no effect whatever. They clearly manifested the impotence to which the constitutionalists were reduced by their equivocal situation between the royalist faction and the directory, in resolving not to conspire with the one or to make concessions to the other.

The Clichyans complained much of the insignificance of these reports, and declaimed against the weakness of the constitutionalists. The most ardent wished for the conflict, and especially for an opportunity of engaging in it, and inquired what the directory was doing towards organizing the national guard. This was precisely what the directory had no wish to do, and in point of fact, it had resolved not to organize it.

Carnot was in a still more singular position than the constitutional party. He had fairly quarrelled with the Clichyens on observing their conduct; he was useless to the constitutionalists, for he had taken no share in their attempts at accommodation, and he was too irritable to reconcile himself with his colleagues. He was alone, without support, amidst the void, with no longer any object in view, for he had fallen short in ministering to the personal vanity he once possessed, and the new majority which he had dreamt of could not be obtained. Nevertheless, from a ridiculous perseverance in supporting the sentiments of the opposition in the directory, he formally demanded the organization of the national guard. His presidency of the directory was about to expire, and he availed himself of this circumstance to bring that subject under discussion. Larévellière then rose with considerable assurance, and having never had any personal quarrel with him, he resolved to address him once more in order to reconcile him to his colleagues. Addressing him at once in a firm but yet mild tone, he put several questions to him. "Carnot," said he, "hast thou ever heard us make any proposition tending to abridge the prerogatives of the councils, to increase our own, or to compromise the constitution of the republic?" "No," replied Carnot, with some confusion. "Hast thou," resumed Larévellière, "ever heard us in a matter of finance, war, or diplomacy, propose a measure that was not conformable with the public interest? As to what is personal to thyself, hast thou ever heard us detract from thy merit, or deny thy services? From the time that thou hast separated thyself from us, canst thou accuse us of any disrespect for thy person? Has thy opinion been the less listened to when it appeared to us useful, and proposed with good intentions? For my own part," added Larévellière, "although thou hast belonged to a faction which has persecuted both myself and my family, have I ever shown the least resentment against thee?" "No, no," replied Carnot to all these questions. "Well, then," added Larévellière, "how canst thou separate from us to attach thyself to a faction which deceives thee, which would make use of thee to ruin the republic, which would ruin thee after making a tool of thee, and which in ruining will also effect thy dishonour?" Larévellière employed the most friendly and the most persuasive terms to convince Carnot of the error and the danger of his conduct. Rewbell and Barras even did violence to their hatred. Rewbell from a sense of duty, and Barras from habitual complaisance talked to him almost as friends. But demonstrations of kindness serve only to stir up a certain sort of pride. Carnot remained unmoved, and after all the pains taken by his colleagues, he again drily pressed his proposal for discussing the organization of the national guard. The directors then broke up the sitting and retired, convinced as men easily are on such occasions, that their colleague was betraying them, and that he was in correspondence with the enemies of the government.

It was resolved that the decisive blow should include him and Barthélemy, as well as the principal members of the councils. The plan definitely adopted was as follows. The three directors still believed that the Clichyan deputies were in the secret of the conspiracy. They had not obtained, either against them or against Pichegru, any fresh evidence that would warrant judicial proceedings.

They were therefore obliged to have recourse to some extraordinary and violent measure to save the state. They had in the two councils a decided minority, which would be joined by all those wavering men, whom half measures irritate and estrange, but whom great energy overpowers and brings back. They purposed to close the halls in which the ancients and the five hundred met, to appoint some other place for their sittings, to summon thither all the deputies on whom they could rely, to draw up a list containing the two directors, and one hundred and twenty deputies selected from among the most suspected, and to propose their banishment without judicial discussion, and by an extraordinary legislative procedure. They meditated no person's death, but the forced removal of all the dangerous men. Many have thought that this extraordinary measure had become useless, because the councils, intimidated by the evident resolution of the directory, appeared to relax. But this was a transient impression. To every one acquainted with the course of the parties and their lively imagination, it is evident that the Clichyens, on seeing the directory inactive, would have plucked up their courage. If they had kept themselves under till the new election, they would have increased their ardour on the arrival of the third third (troisième tiers), and would then have displayed an irresistible impetuosity. The directory would not even have then found the conventional minority which remained in the councils to support it, and to give a sort of legality to the extraordinary measures of which it intended to avail itself. Lastly, without taking into consideration this inevitable result of a new election, the directory, in remaining quiet, would have been obliged to execute the laws, and to reorganize the national guard; that is, to give the army of Vendémiaire to the counter-revolution, which would have produced a frightful civil war between the national guards and the troops of the line. And in fact, while Pichegru and a few intriguers had no other means than making motions in the five hundred, and some emigrants or Chouans in Paris, their schemes were little to be feared; but supported by the national guard, they would be able to give battle, and to commence the civil war.

In consequence, Rewbell and Larévellière agreed that it was necessary to act without delay, and no longer remain in suspense. Barras alone hung back, and gave some uneasiness to his two colleagues. They were still apprehensive lest he should treat with the royalist party, or join with the Jacobin faction to excite a commotion. They watched him closely, and still strove to win Angereau, by addressing themselves to his vanity, and endeavouring to render him sensible to the esteem of upright men. Still some further preparations were requisite, as well to gain over the grenadiers of the legislative body, as to prepare the troops, and to obtain funds. It was agreed to wait a few days longer. The directors would not apply to Ramel, the minister, for money, lest they should compromise him, and they were expecting that which Bonaparte had offered, but which had not yet arrived.

Bonaparte had, as we have seen, sent his aide-de-camp, Lavalette, to Paris, to give daily accounts of every intrigue. The aspect of Paris had created an unfavourable impression on the mind of M. de Lavalette, and he had communicated his ideas to Bonaparte. So many personal resentments are mixed up with political animosities, that on a close view of the parties, the sight becomes repulsive. Frequently also, if we suffer ourselves to dwell exclusively on what is personal in political dissensions, we shall be tempted to believe that there is nothing generous, sincere, and patriotic in the motives which divide men. Such was precisely the effect likely to be produced by the struggles of the three directors, Barras, Larévellière, and Rewbell, with Barthélemy and Carnot, and of the constitutionalists with the Clichyans; it was a terrible affair, wherein morified self-conceit and private ends would appear at first sight to act the principal part. The military officers in Paris added their pretensions to all those that were already in agitation; although irritated against the Clichy faction, they were not very well disposed towards the directory. It is usual for men to become importunate and susceptible when they deem themselves necessary. Grouped around the minister Schérer, these officers were disposed to complain, as if the government had not done enough for them. Kléber, the noblest but the most intractable of these characters, and who has been correctly described when it was said that he did not wish to be either the first or the second,—Kléber had told the directory in his original language, I will fire upon your enemies if they attack you; but in facing them I shall turn my back upon you. Lefebvre, Bernadotte, and all the others, expressed themselves in the same manner. Struck with this confusion of ideas, M. de Lavalette wrote to Bonaparte in such a way as to induce him to remain independent. Thenceforward the latter, satisfied with having communicated the impulse, would not proceed further, but resolved to await the result. He never wrote more. The directory then addressed itself to the gallant Hoche, who, having alone a right to be dissatisfied, sent fifty thousand francs, forming the greatest part of his wife's portion.

It was the commencement of Fructidor. Larévellière had just succeeded Carnot as president of the directory; he was commissioned to receive Visconti, the envoy of the Cisalpine republic, and general Bernadotte, the bearer of some colours which the army of Italy had not yet sent to the directory. He resolved to declare himself in the boldest manner, and thus to force Barras to come to a decision. He made two vehement speeches, in which he replied to the two reports of Thibaudau and Tronçon-Ducoudray, but without alluding to either. Speaking of Venice and the recently emancipated people of Italy, Thibaudau had said that their fate would not be settled until the legislative body of France should have been consulted. Alluding to this expression, Larévellière said to Visconti, that the people of Italy had wished for liberty, that they had a right to take it themselves, and so far wanted nobody's consent. "That liberty," said he, "of which some would deprive both you and us, we will defend together, and take care to preserve." The threatening tone of the two speeches left no doubt of the inclinations of the directory: men who broach such doctrines are reasonably supposed to have the means of supporting them. It was the 10th Fructidor; the Clichyans were in the utmost alarm. In their rage, they returned to their old plan of impeaching the directory. The constitutionalists were apprehensive of such a design, because they felt that it would afford the directory an excuse for an outbreak, and they declared that they would in their turn set about procuring evidence of the treason of certain deputies, and call for their impeachment. This threat stopped the Clichyans, and prevented the preparation of an act of impeachment against the five directors.

The Clichyans had long wished to add Pichegru and Willot to the commission of the inspectors, who were considered as the two generals of the party. But this addition of two new members, increasing the number to seven, was contrary to rule. They awaited, therefore, the renewal of the commission, which took place at the beginning of every month, and appointed Pichegru, Vaublanc, Delarue, Thibaudau, and Emery. The commission of the inspectors had charge of the police of the hall; it gave orders to the grenadiers of the legislative body, and it was in some measure the executive power of the councils. The ancients possessed a similar establishment; this commission had united itself with that of the five hundred, and both watched together over the common safety. A great number of deputies frequented the commission, without having a right to a seat in it; so that it was transformed into a new Clichy club, in which the most violent and the most idle motions were made. At first, it was proposed to organize a police, in order to gain daily information of the designs of the directory, and one Dossouville was appointed to superintend it. As they had no funds, each contributed his share; but only a small sum was collected. Amply provided as he had been, Pichegru could have contributed a considerable subscription; but it does not appear that he employed on this occasion the funds received from Wickham. These police agents went about gathering falso rumours, and then came to the commissions to alarm them.

Every day they said, "To-day, to-night, the directory intends to apprehend two hundred deputies, and have them put to death by the faubourgs." These rumours struck terror into the commissions, and this terror gave rise to the most indiscreet schemes. The directory received through its spies an exaggerated report of all these propositions, and in its turn experienced the most alarming apprehensions. It was then said in the reception-rooms of the directory that it was high time to strike the blow, unless they desired that some one else should be beforehand with them, and threats were thrown out, which, repeated in their turn, communicated one alarm in return for another.

Separated and distinct as the constitutionalists were between the two parties, they every day became more sensible of their faults, and the dangers to which they were exposed. They became a prey to the greatest uneasiness. Carnot, still more disconnected than they, embroiled with the Clichyans, odious to the patriots, suspicious even to the moderate republicans, slandered, and misunderstood, received daily the most alarming intelligence. He was told that he was about to be put to death by order of his colleagues. Barthélemy, threatened and apprized in like manner, was in a state of the utmost perturbation.

i At any rate, the same warnings were given to others. Larévellière had been informed, in such a way as to leave no room to doubt the fact, that Chouans had been hired to assassinate him. Finding him the firmest of the three members of the majority, it was he who was fixed upon to be despatched, for the purpose of dissolving it. Certain it is, that his death would have changed every thing, for the new director nominated by the councils would certainly have voted with Carnot and Barthélemy. The purposes which led to the intended commission of this crime and the particulars given to Larévellière, ought to have induced him to be upon his guard. However he affected to disregard these warnings, and continued his evening walks to the Jardin des Plantes. A plan was laid to insult him by means of Malo, a chef d'escadron of the 21st dragoons, who had cut down the Jacobins at the camp of Grenelle, and afterwards denounced Brottier and his accomplices. This Malo was the creature of Carnot and Cochin, and he had, without intending it, inspired the Clichyans with hopes which rendered him suspected. Cashiered by the directory, he attributed his dismissal to Larévellière, and went to the Luxembourg to insult him. The intrepid magistrate was not to be daunted by a cavalry officer, and seizing him by the shoulders, pushed him out of his presence.

Rewbell, though strongly attached to the common cause, was more violent but less firm. Some one came to tell him that Barras was treating with an emissary of the pretender's, and was ready to betray the republic. The connexion of Barras with all the parties was liable to excite all sorts of apprehensions. "We are undone," said Rewbell, "Barras is betraying us; we shall be murdered; we have nothing else for it than to run; for it is no longer in our power to save the republic." Larévellière, more calm, told Rewbell in reply, that instead of giving way, they ought to go to Barras, speak peremptorily to him, oblige him to speak out, and overawe him by their firmness. Both of them accordingly went to Barras, questioned him in an authoritative manner, and asked why he still delayed. Barras, engaged in making preparations with Augereau, asked for three or more days more, and promised to delay no longer. This was the 13th or 14th Fructidor; Rewbell was satisfied, and consented to wait.

Barras and Augereau had, in fact, prepared every thing for the execution of the decisive blow which had been so long in contemplation. Hoche's troops were arranged around the constitutional boundaries, ready to cross it and to repair at a few hours' notice to Paris. A great part of the grenadiers of the legislative body had been gained by availing themselves of Blanchard, the second in command, and several other officers who were devoted to the directory. A sufficient number of defections in the ranks of the grenadiers had been made sure of so as to prevent a battle. Ramel, the commander-in-chief, had continued true to the councils, in consequence of his connexion with Cochin and Carnot, but his influence was not much to be feared. As a precautionary measure, orders had been given that the troops of the garrison of Paris, and also the grenadiers of the legislative body, should have a grand firing review.

These movements of troops, this din of arms, was one way of concealing the day when this decisive measure was actually to take place.

The event was expected to suddenly develop itself every day; it was looked for on the 15th Fructidor, then on the 16th; but the 16th corresponded with the 2nd of September, and the directory would not have chosen that day of awful memory. However, the terror of the Clichyans was extreme. The police of the inspectors, deceived by false appearances, had persuaded them that the event was fixed for the night between the 15th and 16th. That same evening they assembled tumultuously in the hall of the two commissions. Rovère, the fierce reactionist, one of the members of the commission of the ancients, read a police report, according to which two hundred deputies were to be apprehended in the night. Others came in out of breath, to report that the barriers were closed, that four columns of troops were entering Paris, and that the directing committee was acting in concurrence with the directory. They said also that the hotel of the minister of the police was lighted up. An extraordinary confusion took place. The members of the two commissions, who ought to have been but ten, and who were about fifty, complained that they could not deliberate. At length messengers were sent to the barriers and to the hotel of the police to verify the reports of the agents, and it was ascertained that the greatest tranquillity prevailed every where. It was stated that the police agents could not be paid on the following day for want of funds; each emptied his pockets to furnish the requisite sum. They then broke up. The Clichyans attended Pichegru, to persuade him to act. They proposed in the first place to make the councils permanent, then to collect the emigrants and the Chouans whom they had in Paris, to join with them a number of young men to march with against the directory, and to secure the three directors. Pichegru declared all these plans ridiculous and impracticable, and again repeated that there was nothing yet to do. However, the foolish heads of the party did not the less resolve to open the proceedings of the following day by obtaining a declaration of permanence.

The directory was apprized by its police of the confusion of the Clichyans, and of their desperate plans. Barras, who had in his hands all the means of execution, resolved to employ them that very night. Every thing was so arranged that the troops could pass over the constitutional boundary in a few hours. In the interval it was supposed that the Paris garrison would be sufficient. A grand firing review was appointed for the next day, so that an excuse should not be wanting. Neither the ministers or the two directors, Rewbell and Larévellière, or any other person, were apprized of the moment, so that every body was ignorant of the event which was about to take place. That day, the 17th (3rd September), went off quietly enough; no proposition was made to the councils. Many of the deputies absented themselves, so as not to be present at the catastrophe they had so imprudently provoked. The sitting of the directory was held as usual. The five directors were present. At four in the afternoon, the moment the sitting was over, Barras took Rewbell and Larévellière aside, and told them that it would be necessary to strike the blow that very night, in order to anticipate the enemy. He had asked them for four days more, but anticipated that period that he should not be surprised. The three directors then repaired to Rewbell's, where they remained. It was agreed to summon all the ministers to Rewbell's, to shut themselves up there till the event was completed, and not to allow any one to go out. They were to have no communication with any person outside excepting Augereau and his aides-de-camp. This resolution taken, the ministers were summoned for the evening. All of them being assembled with the three directors, they began preparing the requisite orders and proclamations. The plan was to surround the palace of the legislative body, to take from the grenadiers the posts which they occupied, to dissolve the commissions of the inspectors, to close the halls of the two councils, to appoint another place of meeting, to summon thither the deputies on whom they could depend, and to cause them to pass a law against those whom the directors wanted to expel. They were certain that such as were enemies to the directory would not venture to repair to the new place of meeting. In consequence, proclamations were drawn up, stating that a great plot had been formed against the republic, that its principal originators were members of the two commissions of inspectors; that it was from these two commissions that the conspirators were to proceed; that to prevent their treason, the directory commanded the halls of the legislative body to be closed, and fixed upon another place for the meeting of the deputies, who remained true to the republic. The five hundred were to meet in the Odéon theatre, and the ancients in the amphitheatre of the School of Medicine. A narrative of the conspiracy, supported by the declaration of Duverne de Presle and the paper found in the portfolio of d'Entraignes, was appended to these proclamations. All this was printed immediately, and was to be posted in the night on the walls of Paris. The ministers and the three directors remained shut up at Rewbell's, and Augereau set out with his aides-de-camp to execute the plan as settled.

Carnot and Barthélémy, having retired to their apartments in the Luxembourg, knew nothing of what was in preparation. The Clichyans, still greatly agitated, thronged the hall of the commissions. But Barthélémy, deceived, sent word that it would not be that night. Pichegru, on his part, had just left Schérer, and assured him that nothing was yet in preparation. Some movements of troops had been observed, but these, it was said, were occasioned by the firing review, and no one took the slightest alarm at that circumstance. Every one went home quite satisfied. Rovère alone remained in the inspectors' hall, and laid himself on a bed provided for the member whose turn it was to keep watch.

About midnight, Augereau placed all the troops of the garrison about the palace, and brought forward a numerous artillery. The greatest tranquillity pervaded Paris; nothing was heard but the tramp of the soldiers and the rolling of the guns. It became necessary, but without resorting to violence, to deprive the grenadiers of the legislative body of the posts they occupied. About one in the morning, orders were transmitted to Ramel, the commandant, to go to the minister at war. He refused, guessing what was going forward, ran to awaken Rovère, the inspector, who would not yet believe the danger, and then hastened to the barracks of his grenadiers, to get the reserve under arms. Nearly four hundred men occupied the different posts of the Tuileries; the reserve was eight hundred. It was immediately put under arms, and drawn up in battle array in the garden of the Tuileries. The greatest order and the most profound silence prevailed in the ranks.

Nearly ten thousand troops of the line occupied the environs of the palace, and were preparing to force it. The firing of a cannon charged with powder, about three o'clock in the morning, served for a signal. The commandants of the columns presented themselves at the different posts. An officer went in the name of Augereau to order Ramel to give up the post of the Pont Tournant, which communicated between the garden and the Place Louis Quinze; but Ramel refused. Fifteen hundred men having advanced to this post, the grenadiers, most of whom were gained over, surrendered it. The same thing occurred at other posts. All the outlets of the garden and of the Carrousel were given up, and the palace was surrounded on all sides by numerous bodies of infantry and cavalry. Twelve pieces of cannon, with the horses to them, were pointed at the palace. All that remained now was the reserve of the grenadiers, eight hundred strong, drawn up ready for action, and having Ramel at their head. Part of the grenadiers were disposed to do their duty; the others, corrupted by the agents of Barras, were inclined, on the contrary, to join the troops of the directory. Murmurs were heard in the ranks. "We are not Swiss," exclaimed several voices. "I was wounded by the royalists on the 13th Vendémiaire," said an officer; "I won't fight for them on the 18th Fructidor." The spirit of desertion thus gained ground among these troops. Blanchard, second in command, excited them by his words and his presence. Their commander, Ramel, was still determined to do his duty, when he received an order, issued from the hall of the inspectors, forbidding him to fire. At that moment Augereau arrived at the head of a numerous staff. "Commandant Ramel," said he, "do you recognize me as chief of the seventeenth military division?" "Yes," replied Ramel. "Well then, as your superior officer, I order you to consider yourself under arrest." Ramel obeyed; but he was ill-treated by some furious Jacobins mingled among the staff of Augereau. The latter got him away, and sent him to the Temple. The report of the cannon and the investment of the palace had awakened every body. It was five o'clock in the morning. The members of the commissions had flocked to their post, and were met in their hall. They were surrounded, and could no longer doubt as to the extent of the danger. A company of soldiers stationed at their door had orders to allow all who should present themselves with the deputies' medal to enter, but to let no one out. They saw their colleague Dumas coming to his post; but they threw a note to him out of the window, to apprise him of the danger and to exhort him to escape. Augereau ordered the swords of Pichegru and Willot to be delivered him, and themselves he sent to the Temple, as well as several other deputies, seized in the inspectors' hall.

While this operation was being carried on against the councils, the directory had ordered an officer to put himself at the head of a detachment, and take Carnot and Barthélemy. Carnot, who had received timely warning, got away from his apartments, and contrived to escape by a back door of the garden of the Luxembourg, of which he possessed the key. As for Barthélemy, he was found at home, and arrested. His capture placed the directory in an awkward situation. With the exception of Barras, the directors were delighted that Carnot had made his escape; they sincerely wished that Barthélemy had done as much. They had recommended him to seek safety in flight. Barthélemy answered that he would comply, if they would order him to be openly conveyed, and in his own name, to Hamburg. The directors could not undertake to do this. After purposing to banish several members of the legislative body, they could not show such favour to one of their colleagues. Barthélemy was taken to the Temple; he arrived there at the same time as Pichegru, Willot, and the other deputies, seized at the commission of inspectors.

It was eight o'clock in the morning: numerous deputies, though forewarned, resolved courageously to repair to their post. Siméon, president of the five hundred, and Lafond-Ladebat, president of the ancients, reached their respective halls, which were not yet closed, and were able to take the chair in the presence of some few deputies. But some officers arrived and intimated to them that they were ordered to withdraw. They had only time to declare that the national representation was dissolved. They retired to the residence of one of their number, and the most courageous meditated a new attempt. They resolved to meet a second time, to traverse Paris on foot, and to present themselves, with their president at their head, at the gates of the legislative palace. It was nearly eleven in the forenoon. All Paris was apprised of the event; it had not disturbed the tranquillity of that great city. It was no longer the passions that produced an outbreak. It was a methodical act of authority against some of the representatives. A crowd of persons drawn thither by feelings of curiosity thronged the streets and the public places without saying a word. Some detached groups from the faubourgs alone, composed principally of Jacobins, passed through the streets, shouting, The republic for ever! Down with the aristocrats! They found neither response or approbation in the mass of the population. It was in the neighbourhood of the Luxembourg that the groups were most dense. In that quarter they shouted, The directory for ever! and some, Barras for ever!

The group of deputies passed in silence through the dense crowd in the Carrrousel, and presented itself at the gates of the Tuileries. They were refused admittance; they insisted; then it was that a detachment drove them back, and pursued them till they were dispersed—a sad and deplorable spectacle, which betokened the speedy and inevitable domination of the Pretorian guard! Why was it decreed that a perfidious faction should have compelled the revolution to seek the aid of bayonets? The deputies thus pursued retired, some to the residence of Lafond-Ladebat, the president, and others to a neighbouring house. They there confusedly deliberated, and were engaged in drawing up a protest, when an officer came to notify the order for their separation. A certain number of them were apprehended and conveyed to the Temple: these were Lafond-Ladebat, Barbé-Marbois, Tronçon-Ducoudray, Bourdon (of the Oise), Goupil of Préfeln, and some few others. They were carried to the Temple, whither the members of the two commissions had already preceded them.

In the mean time the directorialist deputies had repaired to the new place assigned for the meeting of the legislative body. The five hundred went to the Odéon, the ancients to the School of Medicine. It was nearly noon, and they were still far from numerous; but the number increased every moment, either because the tidings of this extraordinary convocation were communicated by one to another, or because all the waverers, fearful of declaring themselves not agreed, were eager to repair to the new legislative body. The members present were counted at short intervals; and at length, when the ancients amounted to one hundred and twenty-six, and the five hundred to two hundred and fifty-one, being one more than half of both councils, their deliberations commenced. A certain irresolution manifested itself in both assemblies, for the act which they were called upon to legalize was notoriously an act of necessary violence. The first thing done by both councils was to declare themselves permanent, and reciprocally to apprise one another that they were constituted. Poulain-Grandpré, a member of the five hundred, was the first who spoke. "The measures that had been taken," said he, "the building we now occupy, all proclaim that the country has incurred, and is still incurring great dangers. Let us thank the directory; for it is to the directory we owe the salvation of the country. But it is not enough that the directory watches over it; it is our duty also to take effectual measures to ensure the public welfare and the constitution of the year III. To effectuate this I move the formation of a commission of five members."

This motion was adopted, and the commission was composed of deputies devoted to the directorial system. These were Sieyès, Poulain-Grandpré, Villers, Chazal and Boulay (of La Meurthe). It was notified that at six o'clock a message would be sent by the directory to the two councils. This message contained a narrative of the conspiracy, so far as it was known to the directory, the two documents which we have already mentioned, and fragments of letters found among the papers of the royalist agents. These documents contained nothing more than the proofs already in evidence: they proved that Pichegru was in negotiation with the pretender, that Imbert-Colomès corresponded with Blankenburg, that Mersan and Lemerer were the depositaries of the conspiracy with the Clichy deputies; and that a vast royalist connexion existed throughout France. There were no other names in them than those already mentioned. These documents, nevertheless, excited a great sensation. By satisfying a moral conviction, they showed the impossibility of proceeding in a judicial mode, by reason of the insufficiency of direct and positive proof. The commission of five had to express themselves on the subject of this message. The directory, not being entitled to take the initiative in any thing proposed, it lay with the commission of five to begin; but that commission was in the secret of the directory, and meant to propose the legalizing of the stroke of policy so long settled beforehand. Boulay (of La Meurthe), appointed to speak in the name of the commission, gave the reasons with which extraordinary measures are usually accompanied, reasons which, under the circumstances, were unfortunately but too well founded. After observing that they were at that moment on a field of battle; that some prompt and decisive measure must be taken, and that without spilling a drop of blood the conspirators should be incapacitated from doing mischief, he made the propositions previously determined upon. The principal consisted in annulling the electoral operations of forty-eight departments; in thus delivering the legislative body from a set of deputies identified with a faction, and in selecting from their number the most dangerous in order to banish them. The council had scarcely an option in regard to the measures to be taken; the circumstances admitted of no others than those which were proposed to it, and besides, the directory had assumed such an attitude that the assembly would not have dared to refuse them. The wavering and uncertain portion of the members, those over whom in a popular assembly energy always gains an ascendancy, were rung on the side of the directorialists, and ready to vote whatever they pleased. Chollet, however, asked for a delay of twelve hours, in order to examine the propositions. The cry of question silenced him. The assembly confined themselves to striking out a few names from the banishment list, such as Thibaudeau, Douleat de Pontécoulant, Tarbé, Crécy, Desorcy, Normand, Dupont (of Nemours), Remusat, and Bailly, some as being good patriots, notwithstanding their opposition; others as too contemptible to be dangerous. After these erasures the proposed resolutions were immediately voted. The electoral operations of forty-eight departments were annulled. These departments were Ain, Ardèche, Ariège, Aube, Aveyron, Bouches-du-Rhône, Calvados, Charente, Cher, Côte-d'Or, Côtes-du-Nord, Dordogne, Eure, Eure-et-Loire, Gironde, Hérault, Ile-et-Vilaine, Indre-et-Loire, Loiret, Manche, Marne, Mayenne, Mont-Blanc, Morbihan, Moselle, Deux Nèthes, Nord, Oise, Orne, Pas-de-Calais, Puy-de-Dôme, Bas-Rhin, Haut-Rhin, Rhône, Haute-Saône, Saône-et-Loire, Sarthe, Seine, Seine-Inférieure, Seine-et-Marne, Seine-et-Oise, Somme, Tarn, Var, Vaucluse, and Yonne. The deputies returned by these departments were excluded from the legislative body. All public officials, such as judges or municipal administrators, elected by these departments were also declared disqualified from holding their appointments. The following individuals were condemned to banishment to a place to be chosen by the directory: in the council of five hundred, Aubry, Job Aimé, Bayard, Blain, Boissy-d'Anglas, Borne, Bourdon (of the Oise), Cadroi, Couchery, Delahaye, Delarue, Doumère, Dumolard, Duplazier, Duprat, Gilbert Desmolieres, Henri La Rivière, Imbert-Colomès, Camille-Jordan, Jourdan (of the Bouches-du-Rhône), Gau, Lacarrière, Lemarchant-Gomicourt, Lemeroy, Mersan, Madiet, Maillard, Noailles, André, Mac-Curtain, Pavée, Pastoret, Pichetru, Polissart, Praire-Montand, Quatremer, Quincy, Saladin, Siméon, Vauvilliers, Vaublanc, Villaret-Joyeuse, and Willot; in the council of the ancients, Barbé-Marbois, Dumas, Ferraut-Vaillant, Lafond-Ladebat, Laumont, Murais, Murinais, Paradis, Portalis, Rovère, and Tronçon-Ducoudray.

The two directors Carnot and Barthélémy, Cochin the ex-minister of police; Dossouville his clerk; Ranel, commandant of the guard of the legislative body, and the three royalist agents, Brottier, Laville-Heurnoise, and Duverne de Presle, were likewise sentenced to banishment. The directors did not stop there: the journalists had been not less dangerous than the deputies, and there was quite as much difficulty in bringing them within the scope of a judicial procedure. It was resolved to proceed in revolutionary fashion with them, as was done in the case of the members of the legislative body. The proprietors, editors, and publishers of forty-two newspapers were condemned to banishment; for no restrictions being then imposed on the political journals, their number was immense. Among the forty-two figured the Quotidienne. To these proceedings against individuals, others were added for strengthening the authority of the directory, and re-establishing the revolutionary laws which the five hundred had abolished or amended. Thus the directory was to have the appointment of all the judges and municipal magistrates, whose election had been annulled in the forty-eight departments. As for the deputies' seats, they remained vacant. The articles of the noted law of the 3rd Brumaire, which had been repealed, were again put in force and even extended. The relatives of emigrants, excluded by this law from public functions until the peace, were excluded by the new law for the space of four years after the peace. They were deprived, moreover, of the electoral franchise. The emigrants who had returned upon the pretext of applying for their erasure [from the lists] were to leave the communes in which they were within twenty-four hours, and the French territory in a fortnight. Such of them as should be taken offending this law were to be convicted within twenty-four hours. The laws which recalled the banished priests, released them from the oath, and imposed no more on them than a mere declaration, were repealed. All the laws relative to the police of religious worship were re-established. The directory was empowered to banish by a mere ordinance such priests as they knew to misconduct themselves. As for the newspapers, it was to have in future the power to suppress such as should appear dangerous. The political societies, that is, the clubs, were put upon their former footing; but the directory was armed with the same power against them as it had been permitted to exercise against the journals. It could close their offices whensoever it pleased. Lastly, and this was a point not less important than any of the others, the organization of the national guard was suspended and deferred to a later period.

None of these enactments were sanguinary, for blood-thirsty times had gone by, but they invested the directory with a power completely of a re-antiquary character. They were voted in the evening of the 18th Fructidor, year V. (4th September), in the five hundred. No voice was raised against their adoption. Some deputies applauded, but the majority were silent and submissive. The resolution which contained them was then carried to the ancients, who were in permanence, like the five hundred, and waiting to be furnished with a subject for deliberation. The mere reading of the resolution and of the report occupied them till the morning of the 19th. Wearied with too long a sitting, they adjourned for a few hours. The directory, impatient to obtain the sanction of the ancients, and to be enabled to support by a law the blow which it had struck, sent a message to the legislative body. "The directory," it said, "has devoted itself to the salvation of liberty, but it relies on you to support it. It is now the 19th, and yet you have not done any thing to second the directory." The resolution was immediately passed as a law, and was sent to the directory.

No sooner was the directory furnished with this law than it made haste to make it available, being determined to execute its plan with despatch, and immediately afterwards take every thing else in its appropriate order. A great number of those who were condemned to banishment had fled; Carnot had secretly bent his steps in the direction of Switzerland. The directory would have been glad if Barthélemy could have also escaped, but he persisted in his refusal for reasons which have been already stated. Out of the list of persons to be banished, the directory selected fifteen, who were considered as either the most dangerous or the most guilty, and condemned them to a transportation which to some of them was as miserable as death itself. They were sent off the same day in grated carriages for Rochefort, whence they were to be conveyed in a frigate to Guiana. These were Barthélemy, Pichegru, and Willot, who were thus treated either by reason of their importance or their guilt; Rovère, on account of his known correspondence with the royalist faction; Aubry, on account of the part which he had performed in the reaction; Bourdon (of the Oise), Murinais, and Delarue, on account of their conduct in the five hundred; Ramel, on account of his conduct at the head of the grenadiers; Dossonville, by reason of the office he had filled under the commission of inspectors; Tronçon-Ducoudray, Barbé-Marbois, and Lafond-Ladebat, not so much by reason of their guilt, for they were sincerely attached to the republic, but for their importance in the council of the ancients; lastly, Brottier and Laville-Héurinois for their conspiracy. Their accomplice, Duverne de Presle was spared in consequence of the private information he had given. Personal animosity doubtless took its ordinary part in the selection of the victims, for among those fifteen persons, Pichegru was the only person to be feared. The number was increased to sixteen, by the attachment of Letellier, Barthélemy's servant, who insisted on accompanying his master. They were sent off without delay, and exposed, as it always happens in such cases, to the brutality of the inferior officers. The directory, however, having been informed that general Dutertre, who commanded the escort, behaved with brutality towards the prisoners, immediately cashiered him. These exiles on account of royalism were bound for Sinamari, where they would find themselves in the company of Billaud-Varennes and Collot-d'Herbois. The others were banished to the Isle of Oléron.

During these two days, Paris continued in a state of tranquillity. The patriots of the faubourgs deemed the punishment of transportation too mild; they were accustomed to revolutionary measures of another description. Relying upon Barras and Augereau, they expected something more. They formed groups beneath the windows of the directory, and shouted, The republic for ever! The directory for ever! Barras for ever! They attributed the measure to Barras, and desired that he might be charged with the suppression of the aristocrats for a few days. These groups, however, which were far from numerous, did not cause the least disturbance in Paris. The sectionists of Vendémiaire, who but for the law of the 19th would soon have been reorganized as national guards, had no longer sufficient energy to voluntarily take up arms. They offered no resistance to this violent but necessary act of state policy. In other respects, public opinion continued unsettled. The sincere republicans clearly perceived that the royalist faction had rendered an energetic measure inevitable, but they deplored the violation of the laws and the interference of the military power. They almost doubted the guilt of the conspirators when they saw such a man as Carnot mixed up with them. They feared that personal animosity had too strongly influenced the determinations of the directory. Lastly, even though considering its determinations as necessary, they felt melancholy, and not without reason; for it became evident that the constitution, on which they had placed all their hope, was not the termination of our troubles and our discord. The mass of the population submitted, and ceased from that day to take any great part in political events. We have observed the people on the 9th Thermidor passing from hatred against the old regime to hatred against the system of terror. Of late they had never evinced any desire to interfere in public affairs, other than for the purpose of creating a reaction against the directory, which it confounded with the convention and the committee of public welfare. Fairly terrified at present by the energy of the directory, the people regarded the 18th Fructidor as a warning not to identify itself with political events. Accordingly, from that day political zeal was observed to be on the wane.

Such were the necessary consequences of this act of state policy of the 18th Fructidor. It has been asserted that it was inoperative from the moment of its execution; that the directory in causing dismay to the royalist faction had already succeeded in overawing it; that by persisting in this violent mode of procedure, the directory had paved the way to military usurpation, by being the first to violate the laws. But as we have observed, the royalist faction was intimidated but for a moment; on the junction of the new third, it would infallibly have overturned every thing, and overpowered the directory. A civil war between the directory and the armies must have been the necessary consequence. The directory, in foreseeing this movement, and timely repressing it, prevented a civil war; and if by that means it placed itself under the 1797. Consequences of the 18th Fructidor.

September. Two new directors appointed in the (Fructidor.) room of the exiled directors.

THE DIRECTORY.

Two new directors appointed in the room of the exiled directors.

protection of the military, it submitted to a melancholy but inevitable necessity. The assumed legality of the act is chimerical after such a revolution as ours. It was not under the protection of the legal power that all the parties could resort for tranquillity and peace; it required a stronger power to repress them, to unite them, to blend them together, and to protect them all against Europe in arms; and that power was the military power. The directory, therefore, by the 18th Fructidor, prevented civil war, and substituted in its stead an arbitrary but necessary act of power, carried out with energy, but with all the mildness and moderation that revolutionary times would allow.

CHAPTER XI.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE 18TH FRUCTIDOR.—THE APPOINTMENT OF MERLIN (OF DOUAI), AND OF FRANÇOIS (OF NEUCHÂTEAU), IN THE ROOM OF THE EXILED DIRECTORS.—THE CIRCUMSTANCES BROUGHT AT LAST TO LIGHT AGAINST MORDAU, AND HIS DISGRACE.—THE DECEASE OF HOCHÉ.—REPAYMENT OF TWO-THIRDS OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.—LAW ENACTED AGAINST THE FORMER NOBILITY.—THE CONFERENCES AT LILLE WITH ENGLAND ABRUPTLY TERMINATED.—CONFERENCES AT UDINE.—BONAPARTE'S OPERATIONS IN ITALY; THE CISALPINE REPUBLIC FOUNDED; ARBITRATION BETWEEN LA VAILLÈNE AND LES GRISONS; LIGURIAN CONSTITUTION; ESTABLISHMENT IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.—THE TREATY OF CAMPO FORMIO.—BONAPARTE'S RETURN TO PARIS, AND TRIUMPHAL FÊTE.

THE 18th Fructidor struck terror into the ranks of the royalists. The priests and the emigrants, who had already returned in great numbers, quitted Paris and the large towns to regain the frontiers. Those who were ready to come back retired into Germany and Switzerland. The directory had just been rearm'd with the entire revolutionary power by the law of the 19th, and there was no one to withstand it. It began by reforming the administrations, a course almost always pursued upon every change of system, and appointed decided patriots to most of the public offices. The directory possessed the right of nominating to all the elective functions in forty-eight departments, and could thus greatly extend its influence and patronage. Its attention was first directed to the appointment of two directors in the place of Carnot and Barthélemy. Rowbell and Larévellière, whose influence was singularly increased by the recent event, were unwilling to furnish a pretext for accusing them of having excluded two of their colleagues, in order that they should remain masters of the government. They therefore demanded that the legislative body should be immediately desired to nominate two new directors. This was not the recommendation of Barras, and still less so of Angereau. That general was delighted with the proceedings of the 18th, and quite proud of having conducted it so adroitly. By mixing himself up with public events, he had acquired a taste for politics and power, and had become ambitious of obtaining a seat in the directory. He was desirous that the directors, without applying to the legislative body for colleagues, should call him up to sit among them. As they would not gratify this pretension, he had no other means left for becoming director than to obtain the majority in the councils. But in this expectation also he was deceived. Merlin (of Douai), and François (of Neuchâteau), minister of the interior, obtained a great majority of votes over their opponents. Masséna and Angereau were the candidates who next to them had the greatest number of votes. Masséna had some few more than Angereau. The two new directors were installed with the accustomed ceremonial. They were republicans, rather after the manner of Rew-bell and Larévellière than after the manner of Barras; they had besides different habits and different manners. Merlin was a lawyer, François (of Neuchâteau) was a man of letters. Both of them lived in a style consistent with their professions, and were on good understanding with Rewbell and Larévellière. It might perhaps have been desirable, for the influence and the consideration of the directory with the armies, that one of our celebrated generals had been called up thither.

The directory appointed two excellent administrators from the provinces to succeed the two ministers thus called up. It thus hoped to compose the government of men less identified with the intrigues of Paris, and less accessible to private interest. Lambrechts was appointed minister of justice, the same who was commissioner to the central administration of the department of the Dyle, that is to say, prefect. He was an upright magistrate. Letourneur was appointed to the interior; he had been commissioner to the central administration of the Loire-Inférieure, an able, active, and honest public functionary, but too great a stranger to the capital and its ways not to appear sometimes ridiculous at the head of a great administration.

The directory had reason to congratulate itself on the manner in which the events had gone off. Its only uneasiness was the silence of general Bonaparte, who had neither written for a long time or sent the promised funds. Lavalette, his aid-de-camp, had not appeared at the Luxembourg during the event, and it was suspected that he had prejudiced his general against the directory, and given him false particulars concerning the state of things. M. de Lavalette had, in fact, never ceased to advise Bonaparte to hold back, to take no part in the meditated blow, and to confine himself to the aid he had afforded to the directory by his proclamations. Barras and Angereau sent for M. de Lavalette, threatened him, and said that he had no doubt deceived Bonaparte, and they declared that, but for the regard due to his general, they would have had him arrested. Lavalette set out immediately for Italy. Angereau lost no time in writing to general Bonaparte, and to his friends in ne army, in order to represent the circumstance in the most favourable colours.

The directory, dissatisfied with Moreau, had resolved to recall him, when it received from him a letter which produced the greatest sensation. Moreau, in crossing the Rhine, had taken the papers of general Klinglin, among which he had found the whole correspondence of Pichegru with the prince of Condé. This correspondence he had kept secret, but on the 18th Fructidor he resolved to communicate it to the government. He asserted that he had decided on this step before he was acquainted with the events of the 18th, and in order to furnish the directory with the necessary proof for confounding enemies of the most dangerous character. But we are assured that Moreau had received by telegraph intelligence of the events of the 18th on the very same day, and that he had then hastened to write, in order to lay an information which would not compromise Pichegru more than he already was, and which would relieve himself from a heavy responsibility. Whatever ground there may be for these different conjectures, it is clear that Moreau had long been the depositary of an important secret, and had not made up his mind to disclose it till the very moment of the finale. Every body said that, not being republican enough to impeach his friend, he had not been so staunch a friend as to keep the secret till all was over. Herein his political character showed itself as it really was, that is to say, weak, vacillating, and uncertain. The directory summoned him to Paris to account for his conduct. On examining this correspondence, it found the confirmation of all that it had heard concerning Pichegru, and could not but regret not being sooner informed of it. In these papers it discovered also evidence of the fidelity of Moreau to the republic; but the directory punished him for his lukewarmness and his silence by taking his command from him, and leaving him out of office in Paris.

Hoche, still at the head of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, had passed a whole month in a state of the most painful suspense. He was at his head-quarters in Wetzlar, having a carriage completely ready to fly with his young wife to Germany, if the party of the five hundred should gain the ascendancy. It was on that occasion that he had thought for the first time of his own interests, and of collecting a sum of money to supply his wants during his absence. We have already observed that he had lent to the directory the greatest part of his wife's portion. The news of the 18th Fructidor filled him with joy, and relieved him from all apprehension on his own account. The directory, to reward his zeal, consolidated the two large armies of the Sambre and Meuse and of the Rhine, by the name of the army of Germany, and gave him the command. It was the most extensive command under the republic. Unfortunately, the health of the young general scarcely allowed him to enjoy the triumph of the patriots, and the testimonies of confidence bestowed by the government. For some time, a dry and frequent cough and nervous convulsions had alarmed his friends and his medical attendants. An unknown disease was consuming this young man, lately in such robust health, and who united with superior talents the advantage of manly beauty and health.

Notwithstanding his state, he was occupied with the consolidation of the two armies, with the command of which he had just been invested, and he was still meditating his expedition to Ireland, by means of which the directory hoped to alarm England. But towards the end of Fructidor, his cough became more violent, and he began to suffer excruciating pains. His friends wished him to cease from his labours, but he would not. He sent for his physician. Give me, said he, a cure for fatigue, but let not that cure be rest. Exhausted by his disease, he took to his bed, on the first complementary day of the year VI., and expired on the following day in great agony. The army was much troubled, for it adored its young general. The tidings spread with rapidity, and deeply afflicted all the republicans, who reckoned upon the talents and patriotism of Hoche. A report immediately got abroad that he was poisoned. People could not believe that a man of such youth, such strength, such health, could have died a natural death. A post-mortem examination was made; the stomach and intestines were examined by the faculty, who found them full of livid spots, and though the medical men did not declare these to be symptoms of poison, they seemed at least to believe them to be so. The poisoning was attributed to the directory, which was absurd, for no one of the directory was capable of that crime so foreign to our manners, and, moreover, there was no motive for the commission of such an act. Hoche was in fact the strongest support of the directory, as well against the royalists as against the ambitious conqueror of Italy. It was conjectured, with much greater probability, that he had been poisoned in the west. His medical attendant recollected, as he thought, that an alteration had taken place in his health ever since his last stay in Brittany, whither he had gone to embark for Ireland. It was supposed, though without any proof, that the young general had been poisoned at an entertainment which he gave to persons of all parties, for the purpose of bringing them together.

The directory ordered a magnificent funeral to be prepared. It took place in the Champ de Mars, and was attended by an immense concourse of people. A considerable army followed the corpse, headed by the aged father of the general, as chief mourner. This solemnity produced a profound impression, and was one of the most interesting of our heroic age.

Thus terminated the life of one of the most glorious and most interesting characters of the revolution. In this instance, at least, it was not by the scaffold. Hoche was twenty-nine years old. A soldier in the French guards, he had educated himself in a few months. With the physical courage of a soldier, he combined an energy of character, a superior understanding, great knowledge of mankind, tact in political events, and lastly, the all-powerful spring of the passions. His were ardent, and they were perhaps the sole cause of his death. A particular circumstance heightened the interest excited by his qualities. His fortune had always been interrupted by unforeseen accidents; conqueror at Weissenburg, and just entering upon the most glorious career, he was all at once consigned to a dungeon; released from confinement, he went to waste his life in La Vendée, he there played a most useful political part, and at the signature, to which he put his hand, and M. de Talleyrand and Bruix hurried away with it to Bonaparte. From that moment Gohier and Moulins made vain efforts to gain access to him, but learned that he had resigned. Constrained to rely solely on themselves, having no longer the right to deliberate, they knew not what course to pursue, and yet were anxious to faithfully fulfil their obligations to the constitution of the year III. They resolved, therefore, to repair to the commission of the inspectors, and to ask their colleagues, Sieyès and Ducos, if they would unite with them to reconstitute the majority, and to promulgate at least the decree of translation. This was but a poor shift. It was not possible to collect an armed force, and to raise a standard hostile to Bonaparte's; it was therefore perfectly useless to go to the Tuileries and openly defy Bonaparte in the midst of his camp and all his forces.

They nevertheless did go thither, and no impediment was offered them. They found Bonaparte surrounded by Sieyès, Ducos, a multitude of deputies, and a numerous staff. Bottot, secretary to Barras, had just before met with an ungracious reception. Bonaparte had said to him, raising his voice, "What have they done with that France which I left in such a flourishing condition? I had left behind me peace, I have now found war; I had left her victorious, I have now found her suffering from her losses. I left behind me the riches (millions) of Italy, and I have now discovered her reduced by extreme taxation and wretchedness. What is become of the hundred thousand French whom I know so well, all my companions in glory?—they are dead!" The emissary Bottot retired in confusion; but at this moment the resignation of Barras had come in, and had pacified the general. He told Gohier and Moulins that he was glad to see them; that he relied upon their resignation, because he looked upon them as worthy citizens, too honest to oppose an absolutely necessary and salutary revolution. Gohier replied in a very spirited tone, that he had come with his colleague, Moulins, for no other intent than that of labouring to save the republic. "Yes," replied Bonaparte, "save it; and with what?—with the means of the constitution, which is crumbling to pieces on all sides?" "Who told you so?" replied Gohier. "A set of people who have neither the courage or the will to go hand in hand with her." High words were taking place between Gohier and Bonaparte, when a note was delivered to the general. This letter communicated the intelligence that there was a great commotion in the faubourg Saint-Antoine. "General Moulins," said Bonaparte, "you are a relation of Santerre?" "No," replied Moulins, "I am not his relation, but his friend." "I am informed," added Bonaparte, "that he is stirring up a commotion in the faubourgs. Tell him that on the very first outbreak I will have him shot." Moulins replied very pointedly to Bonaparte, who repeated that he would have Santerre shot. The conversation was continued in the same strain by Gohier. Bonaparte concluded it by saying, "The republic is in danger—it must be saved: it is my will. Sieyès and Ducos have given in their resignation. Barras has just given his. You are but two; diversify your associates, you are powerless; you can do nothing: I advise you to hold out no longer."

Gohier and Moulins replied that they would not desert their post. They returned to the Luxembourg, in which they were from that moment placed under the guard of sentinels, separated from one another, and deprived of all communication by the orders of Bonaparte transmitted to Moreau. Barras had just left Paris for his estate at Gros Bois, his country seat, under the escort of a company of dragoons.

There was now no longer any executive power! Bonaparte had in his own person centralized absolute supremacy. All the ministers resorted to him at the commission of the inspectors. All orders emanated thence, as from the only point where any lawfully-constituted authority existed. The day went off quietly enough. The patriots formed numerous secret associations, and proposed desperate resolutions, but without imagining that they could put them in execution, so much did they dread the ascendancy of Bonaparte over his men.

In the evening, a council was held at the commission of the inspectors. The object of this council was to settle with the principal members of the ancients what was to be done on the morrow at Saint-Cloud. The plan arranged with Sieyès was to propose the adjournment of the councils, with a provisional consulate. This proposition involved certain objections. Many of the members of the ancients, who had rendered their assistance in getting the decree of translation passed into law, were nevertheless extremely alarmed at the domination of the military party. It had never entered their heads that the object had been the formation of a dictatorship in behalf of Bonaparte and his two associates; all they would have desired was that the directory should be differently constituted, and, notwithstanding Bonaparte's age, they would have consented to his being appointed a director. They made a proposal to that effect. But Bonaparte replied in a decided tone that the constitution was no longer able to go alone, that a more centralized authority had become necessary, and especially an adjournment of all those political discussions that caused confusion in the republic. The appointment of three consuls, and the suspension of the councils till the 1st Ventôse were then proposed. After a somewhat lengthened debate these measures were adopted. Bonaparte, Sieyès, and Ducos, were chosen for consuls. The act was drawn up, and was to be moved in the council on the following morning at Saint-Cloud. Sieyès, well acquainted with the revolutionary manoeuvres, was for arresting forty of the chief conspirators of the five hundred in the night. Bonaparte did not accord with this counsel, and was afterwards sorry for it.

The night was tolerably quiet. Next morning, the 19th Brumaire (November 10), the road to Saint-Cloud was covered with troops, carriages, and those whom curiosity drew thither. Three halls had been prepared at the castle, the first for the ancients, the second for the five hundred, and the third for the commission of the inspectors, and for Bonaparte. They were to have been fitted up by noon, but they could not be got ready before two o'clock. This delay had nearly proved fatal to the originators of the new revolution. The members of the two councils were walking in the gardens of Saint-Cloud, and were talking together rather loud. The members of the five hundred, annoyed at having been excluded, as it were, by the members of the ancients, before they could say a word for themselves, naturally asked what it was they wanted, and what they intended to do that day. "The government is dissolved," said they; "be it so; we agree that its parts must be reunited, which is much wanted. Are all of you agreed that instead of incapable and obscure individuals, you are to introduce persons calculated to inspire respect and attention? Will you bring in Bonaparte? Even though he may not be of the requisite age, we still have no objection." Those pointed interrogations confused the ancients. They had to admit that something else was wanted, and that the object of the present procedure was a complete abrogation of the constitution. Some among them very plainly hinted that this was the case; but their observations were unfavourably received. The ancients, already intimidated on the preceding day by what had passed at the commission of the inspectors, were utterly aghast on perceiving the opposition that was exhibited in the five hundred. From that moment the intentions of the legislative body seemed unsettled, and this revolutionary design was greatly jeopardized. Bonaparte was on horseback at the head of his troops; Sieyès and Ducos had a post-chaise and six waiting for them at the gate of Saint-Cloud. Many other persons had provided themselves in a similar way, so as to be able, in case the plan miscarried, to save themselves by flight. However, Sieyès displayed throughout this whole scene extraordinary coolness and presence of mind. Apprehensions were entertained lest Jourdan, Augereau, or Bernadotte, should go and make speeches to the military. Orders were given to cut down the first person who should make his appearance for the purpose of haranguing them, no matter were he general or representative.

The sitting of the two councils commenced at two o'clock. In the ancients some remonstrances were made by those members who had not been summoned on the preceding day to attend the discussion on the decree of translation. These remonstrances were not attended to, and the next thing was the consideration of a message to be sent to the five hundred, to inform them that a sufficient number of its members had convened, and were ready to begin business. In the five hundred, the debates opened in a different manner. The deputy Gaudin, who was commissioned by Sieyès and Bonaparte to open the debate, first alluded to the risks to which the republic was exposed, and proposed two things: first, accord a vote of thanks to the ancients for having translated the legislative body to Saint-Cloud; and secondly, to form a commission who should make a report on the perils to which the republic was exposed, and the means of providing against those perils. If this proposition had been adopted, a report had already been got up for the occasion, and a provisional consulship and an adjournment would have been proposed. But Gaudin had hardly finished speaking, before a most tremendous explosion of feeling burst forth in the assembly. The most violent exclamations resounded on all sides, from all parts were heard, "Down with the dictators!"—"No dictatorship!"—"The constitution for ever!"—"The constitution or death!" exclaimed Delbrel. "There is no fear of bayonets; here we are free." These words were followed by more shouting. Some deputies, highly excited, looking steadily at the president, Lucien, repeated, "No dictatorship! down with the dictators!" At these insulting exclamations, Lucien addressed them, "I am too sensible of what is due," said he, "to the dignity of president, to endure any longer the insolent menaces of certain speakers; I call them to order." This reprimand did not allay the excitement, but only rendered them more outrageous. After a protracted scene of disorder, the deputy Grandmaison proposed to take the oath to the constitution of the year III. The motion was instantly agreed to. A call of the assembly was also demanded. This also was agreed to. Each deputy went in his turn to the tribune to take the oath, amidst the shouts and plaudits of all present. Lucien himself was obliged to quit the chair for the purpose of taking that oath, which was entirely to subvert his brother's schemes.

Things were taking a dangerous turn. Instead of appointing a commission to receive proposals for plans of reform, the five hundred took an oath to uphold what existed, and the ancients, already daunted, were on the point of shrinking back. This was a revolution that could not stand its ground. The danger was imminent. Augereau, Jourdan, and the influential patriots were at Saint-Cloud, waiting for the propitious moment for bringing the military round to their side of the question. Bonaparte and Sieyès immediately judged that it was time to be up and be doing, and to gain over the undecided mass to their side. Bonaparte resolved on making his appearance before the two councils at the head of his staff. He came across Augereau, who said to him in an ironical tone, "A pretty pickle you are in!" "Matters were much worse at Arcola," replied Bonaparte, and he repaired to the bar of the ancients. He was unaccustomed to public assemblies. To speak for the first time in public is embarrassing, nay, has its terrors for the most collected minds, and under the most ordinary circumstances. Amidst such events, and to a man who had never appeared at a tribune, it could not fail to be far more disagreeable. Bonaparte, under strong agitation, made his speech, and in broken accents, but in a loud voice, thus addressed the ancients. "Citizens, representatives!" said he, "you are not acting as in the ordinary course of business; but you are at the crater of a volcano. Allow me to explain. You have considered the republic in danger; you have translated the legislative body to Saint-Cloud; you have summoned me to assist in enforcing the execution of your decrees; I have issued from my privacy to perform your behests, and already myself and my brave companions in arms are subjected to every species of misrepresentation and attacks. There is talk of a new Cromwell and a new Caesar. Citizens! if I had desired to assume such a character, it would have been easy for me to have taken that part on my return from Italy, in the moment of the most glorious triumph, and when the army and the parties invited me to take it. I did not wish for it then, I do not desire to assume the character now. Nought else than the perils of my country have called forth my zeal and yours." Bonaparte then depicted, but constantly with a voice choked with emotion, the dangerous situation of the republic, torn by the popular factions (les partis), threatened with a new civil war in the north, and with an invasion in the south. "Let us," he added, moment when he was about to execute a grand design against Ireland, he was again stopped short by a storm and misunderstandings; removed to the army of the Sambre and Meuse, he gained a splendid victory, and found his progress suspended by the preliminaries of Léoben; lastly, while at the head of the army of Germany, and as Europe was at that time circumstanced with a grand prospect before him, he was suddenly stricken in the midst of his career, and carried off by an illness of forty-eight hours. At all events, if a glorious memory can reconcile any one to the loss of life, he could receive no better exchange for such an early death. Victories, an important pacification, universality of talents, unimpeachable integrity, the idea entertained by all republicans that he would single-handed have opposed the conqueror of Rivoli and the Pyramids, that his ambition would have continued of a republican character, and would have proved an invincible obstacle to the great ambition that aspired to the throne—in a word, brilliant exploits, expanded ideas, and twenty-nine years, such are the associations which are connected with his memory. It is indeed glorious enough. Let us not lament his premature decease; it will far better serve the memory of Hoche, Kleber, and Desaix, that they did not live to be marshals. They had the honour to die citizens and free men, without being reduced, like Moreau, to seek an asylum in foreign armies.

The government gave the army of Germany to Augereau, and thus got rid of his turbulence, which began to cause inconvenience at Paris.

The directory had made in a few days all the arrangements that circumstances required, but it had yet to direct its attention to the finances. The law of the 19th Fructidor, by delivering it from its most formidable adversaries, by re-establishing the law of the 3rd Brumaire, by furnishing it with new means of severity against the emigrants and the priests, by arming it with the power of suppressing the journals and closing those societies whose politics it censured, by permitting it to appoint to all the vacant places after the annulling of the elections, and by adjourning indefinitely the reorganization of the national guards,—the law of the 19th Fructidor had restored all that the two councils had intended to deprive it of, and had even added thereto a kind of revolutionary omnipotence. But the directory had advantages quite as important to recover in the department of finances; for the councils had been not less desirous to restrict it in that respect than in every other. An extensive scheme had been submitted for the expenditure and the income of the year VI. The first thing to be done was to restore to the directory the powers of which it had been deprived relative to negotiations of the treasury, the order of payments, in short, the management of the funds. All the articles on this subject adopted by the councils before the 18th Fructidor were repealed. It was necessary, in the next place, to consider as to the creation of new taxes, to relieve landed property which was too heavily burdened, and to raise the receipts to a level with the expenditure. The establishment of a lottery was authorized, a duty was imposed upon the roads, and another upon contracts of pledge. The duty on registration was so regulated as to considerably increase its revenue; and the duty on foreign tobacco was raised. Owing to these new sources of income, the land-tax could be reduced to two hundred and twenty-eight millions [francs], and the poll-tax to fifty, and yet the total amount of the revenue for the year VI. raised to six hundred and sixteen millions. In this sum the presumed sales of national domains were estimated at no more than twenty millions [francs].

The receipts being raised to six hundred and sixteen millions by these different means, it became necessary to reduce the expenditure to the same sum. It was supposed that the war would not cost this year more than two hundred and eighty-three millions, even in case of a new campaign. The other general services were estimated at two hundred and forty-seven millions, making a total of five hundred and thirty millions. The purposes of the debt amounted alone to two hundred and fifty-eight millions; and if they had been entirely provided for, the expense would have amounted to a sum far above the means of the republic. It was therefore proposed to pay no more than the third, or eighty-six millions. In this manner the war, the general services, and the debt, would raise the expenditure to no more than six hundred and sixteen millions, the total of the receipts. But in order to confine it within these limits, it would be requisite to take a decisive measure in regard to the debt. Since the abolition of paper money and the return to money, the payment of the interest could not be very strictly kept up. One-fourth had been paid in money, the other three-fourths in bills on the national estates, called three-quarter bills. This was in some respects like paying one-fourth in money, and three-fourths in assignats. The debt, therefore, had hitherto only been provided for with resources arising from the national estates, and it became necessary to adopt some measure in this behalf for the benefit of the state and of the creditors. A debt whose annual charge amounted to two hundred and fifty-eight millions [francs] was really enormous for that period. The resources of credit and the power of the sinking fund were not yet known. The revenue was much less considerable than it has since become; for there had not yet been time to reap the blessings of the revolution, and France, which has since been enabled to furnish a thousand millions in general taxes, could then scarcely supply six hundred and sixteen millions. Thus the debt was overwhelming, and the state was in the situation of an individual who was unable to meet his engagements. It was resolved, therefore, to continue to pay a portion of the debt in money, and instead of paying the remainder in bonds upon the national estates, to pay off the capital itself with these estates. It was proposed to retain one-third only; the third retained was to be called the consolidated third, and to remain on the Great Book as a perpetual annuity. The other two-thirds were to be paid off at the rate of twenty times the annuity, and in bonds receivable in payment of national estates. It is true that these bonds fell in traffic to less than one-sixth of their value, and that for those who did not wish to purchase lands it was an absolute bankruptcy.

Notwithstanding the quiescence and tractability of the councils since the 18th Fructidor, this measure excited a strong opposition. The opponents of the paying-off scheme maintained that it was a downright bankruptcy; that the payment of the debt at the commencement of the revolution had been confided to the national honour, and that it was dishonouring the republic to pay off the two-thirds; that the creditors who would not purchase the national estates would lose nine-tenths by negotiating their bonds, inasmuch as the issue of so large a quantity of paper would considerably lower its value; that even without entertaining prejudices against the origin of the national property, most of the creditors of the state were too poor to buy lands; that there was no forming companies to effect their purchase as a joint stock; that consequently an actual loss of nine-tenths of their capital in most cases took place; that the third, assumed to be consolidated and secured from reduction in future, was only promised; that one-third promised was worth less than three-thirds promised; that lastly, if the republic could not at the moment provide for the whole interest of the debt, it would be better for the creditors to wait as they had hitherto done, but to wait in the hope of seeing their lot ameliorated, rather than find themselves all at once stripped of their security. There were even many persons who could have wished that a distinction should be made between the different species of annuities subscribed for in the Great Book, and that those only should be liable to be paid off which had been bought at a low rate. Some of them had actually been sold at the rate of ten and fifteen francs, and those who had bought them would still be considerable gainers by the reduction to one-third.

The advocates of the directorial scheme replied that a state had a right, like a private individual, to give up its property to its creditors, when it could no longer pay them; that the debt far exceeded the means of the republic, and that under these circumstances, it had a right to give up to them the very pledge of this debt, that is, the national estates; that in buying lands they would lose very little; that these lands would rise very rapidly in their hands, till they regained their former value, and that they would recover in this way as much as they had lost; that there would still be left national estates to the amount of one thousand three hundred millions (the thousand millions promised to the armies having been transferred to the creditors of the state); that peace was near at hand; that at the peace, the bonds in which the debt had been paid off would alone be received in payment for national estates; that consequently, the part of the capital paid off, amounting to about three thousand millions, would find wherewith to purchase one thousand three hundred millions worth of national estates, and lose at most two-thirds, instead of nine-tenths; that moreover, the creditors had not hitherto been treated otherwise, that they had always been paid in national property, whether assignats had been given to them or three-quarter bills; that the republic was obliged to give them what it had; that they would get nothing by waiting, for it would never be in its power to provide for the whole debt; that in being paid off their condition was fixed; that the payment of the consolidated third would commence immediately, because there existed means of providing for it, and that the republic, on her part, would be relieved from an enormous burden; that she would thereby be enabled to resort to regular means; that she would present herself before Europe with a lightened debt, and that she would thus command more respect, and be better able to obtain peace; that lastly, it was impossible to make a distinction between the different annuities according to the price at which they were bought, and that they must be all treated alike.

This measure was inevitable. The republic did in this instance as she had always done; all engagements beyond her ability of performance she had fulfilled with lands, at the price to which they had fallen. It was in assignats that she had paid the old charges, as well as all the expenses of the revolution, and it was with lands she had paid off the assignats. It was in assignats, that is, with lands, that she had discharged the interest of this debt, and it was with lands that she now finished by discharging the capital itself. In short, she gave what she had. The debt of the United States had been liquidated in the same manner. The creditors had received nothing but the shores of the Mississippi in payment. Measures of this nature inflict, like revolutions, much individual hardship; but they must be put up with when there is no remedy for them.

The measure was adopted. Thus, by means of the new taxes, which raised the revenue to six hundred and sixteen millions, and owing to the reduction of the debt, which allowed the expenditure to be limited to the same sum, some equilibrium was re-established in our finances; and there was room for expectation that there would be less confusion in the year VI. (September, 1797, to September, 1798.)

To all these measures, the results of victory, the republican party wished to add another. It alleged that the republic would always be in danger, while a hostile caste, that of the ci-devant nobles, should be nurtured in her bosom: it proposed that all the families which had formerly been noble, or who laid claim to nobility, should be banished from France; that the value of their possessions should be given to them in French commodities, and that they should be compelled to transfer their prejudices, their passions, and their persons, to other countries. This plan was warmly supported by Sieyès, Boulay (of La Meurthe), and Chuzal, all of them decided republicans, but was strongly opposed by Tallien and the friends of Barras. Barras was a noble; the commander of the army of Italy was a gentleman by descent; many of the friends who participated the pleasures of Barras, and who filled his withdrawing-rooms, were likewise of the old nobility; and though an exception was made in favour of those who had rendered services to the republic, the withdrawing-rooms of the director were highly incensed against the proposed law. Indeed, without adducing reasons of so personal a character, the danger and the severity of that law was easy of demonstration. It was nevertheless submitted to the two councils, and excited a sort of commotion, which obliged it to be withdrawn, for the purposes of amendment. The measure was brought forward in another shape. The ci-devant nobles were no longer to be condemned to exile, but to be considered as foreigners, and required, in order to recover the status of citizens, to go through the formalities and undergo the ordeal of a naturalization. An exception was made in favour of those who had usefully served the republic, either in the armies or in the assemblies. Barras, his friends, and the conqueror of Italy, on whose birth people were constantly making reflections, were thus exempted from the consequences of this measure.

The government had resumed an energy in every respect revolutionary. The opposition, which affected to become clamorous for peace in the directory and the councils, being removed, the government showed itself more firm and more peremptory in the negotiations at Lille and Udine. The government immediately ordered all soldiers having leave of absence to return, put every thing upon the war system, and sent fresh instructions to its negotiators. Maret at Lille had contrived, as we have seen, to reconcile the claims of the maritime powers. Peace was concluded, provided that Spain would sacrifice Trinidad, and Holland Trincomalee, and provided that France would engage never to take the Cape of Good Hope for herself. The only question was to get the consent of Spain and Holland. The directory thought Maret too easy, and resolved to recall him: Bonnier and Treillard were next sent out to Lille, with fresh instructions. According to these instructions, France required the unconditional restitution not only of her own colonies, but those of her allies. With respect to the negotiations at Udine, the directory was by no means less peremptory and positive. The directory would no longer adhere to the preliminaries of Léoben, which gave Austria the limit of the Oglio in Italy; the directory, however, wanted the liberation of entire Italy as far as the Isonzo, and that Austria should be content to indemnify herself by the disannexation from the Church of various ecclesiastical states in Germany. The directory also recalled Clarke, who had been chosen and sent by Carnot, and who, in his correspondence, had not spoken of those generals of the army of Italy reputed to be the most republican in the mildest terms. Bonaparte remained invested with the powers of the republic for treating with Austria.

The ultimatum that the directory caused to be communicated at Lille by the new negotiators, Bonnier and Treillard, caused the abrupt termination of the negotiation, now nearly brought to a close. Lord Malmesbury felt extremely annoyed, for he wished for peace, either as a glorious termination to his career, or to procure a momentary respite for his government. He expressed the most lively concern, but it was impossible for England to renounce all her maritime conquests, and get nothing in return. So sincere was lord Malmesbury in his desire to treat, that he desired M. Maret to make inquiry in Paris whether it was not possible to influence the determination of the directory on this point, and he even offered several millions [francs] to purchase the vote of one of the directors. M. Maret refused to undertake any negotiation of this description, and left Lille. Lord Malmesbury and Mr. Ellis set out immediately, and did not return. Although the directory could on this occasion be charged with having rejected a certain and advantageous peace for France, still its motive was honourable. It would have been in very bad faith for us to leave our allies in the lurch, and make them sacrifice their interests in return for their self-devotion to our cause. The directory, flattering itself that it could soon have peace with Austria, or at least that it could dictate a peace upon a movement of our armies, expected to get rid of its continental enemies, and to be able to turn its whole force against England.

The ultimatum notified to Bonaparte displeased him exceedingly, for he had no reasonable expectation of compelling its acceptance. In point of fact, it would be difficult to compel Austria to entirely renounce Italy, and to be content with the disannexation of a few ecclesiastical states in Germany, unless he marched to Vienna. Now Bonaparte could not lay claim to that honour, for he had all the forces of the Austrian monarchy on his hands, and it was the army of Germany who ought to have the advantage of making an inroad on the former, and forcing its way into the hereditary states. This dissatisfaction was not the only one he experienced, when he received intelligence of the suspicions that were conceived of him in Paris. Augereau had sent one of his aids-de-camp with letters for many of the officers and generals of the army of Italy. This aid-de-camp seemed to have something in the nature of a special mission confided to him, and to be employed to correct the opinion of the army concerning the 18th Fructidor. Bonaparte soon perceived that he was mistrusted. He quickly assumed the air of an offended person, and began to complain with the warmth and bitterness of a man who knows himself to be indispensable. He said that the government treated him with horrible ingratitude; that it behaved towards him as it had done towards Pichegru after Vendémiaire; and he requested leave to resign. This man, of so lofty and resolute a disposition, and who could assume such a commanding attitude, here gave way to his petulance, like an unruly and forward child. The directory made no reply to his application for leave to resign, but contented itself by assuring him that the directory had nothing to do with the letters or with the sending of the aid-de-camp. Bonaparte was pacified, but again applied to be reinstated in his functions of negotiator, and in those of organizer of the Italian republics. He repeated incessantly that he was ill, that he could no longer endure the fatigue of riding, and that it would be impossible for him to make another campaign. Still, though he was really ill, and borne down by the overwhelming exertions he had been making for the preceding two years, he had no wish to be superseded in any of his employments; and indeed he was well aware how soon he could bring his mental energies to the assistance of his physical infirmities, in great emergencies.

In point of fact, he resolved to prosecute the negotiation, and to add to the glory of being the first captain of the age, the additional glory of pacificator. The ultimatum of the directory annoyed him; but he was not more decided on this occasion than on many others to implicitly obey his government. His operations at this moment were prodigious. He was organizing the Italian republics, fitting up a navy in the Adriatic, had great schemes on foot with regard to the Mediterranean, and was treating with the plenipotentiaries of Austria.

He had commenced the organization of the provinces he had liberated in Upper Italy as two distinct states. He had long since erected the duchy of Modena and the Legations of Bologna and Ferrara into the Cispadane republic. His plan was to unite this petty state with revolutionized Venice, and thus to indemnify her for the loss of her continental provinces. He purposed to organize Lombardy separately, under the appellation of the Transpadane republic. But he soon changed his intentions, and preferred that the emancipated provinces should constitute a single state. The spirit of locality, which at first was so opposed to the union of Lombardy with the other provinces, was now, on the contrary, in favour of their being united. Romagna, for instance, objected to be united with the Legations and the duchy of Modena, but consented to be dependent on the central government established in Milan. Bonaparte soon perceived that as each of these states detested its neighbour, it would be easier to subject them all to a central authority. Lastly, there was the difficulty of deciding upon the supremacy between Venice and Milan, and of preferring one of the two and making it the seat of government; now that difficulty no longer existed. He had resolved to sacrifice Venice. He disliked the Venetians; he saw that the change of government had not produced among them a change in opinion. The greater nobility, the lesser nobility, and the populace, were enemies of the French and of the revolution, and still had a hankering for the Austrians. A very small number of wealthy citizens might perhaps approve the new order of things. The democratic municipality manifested the utmost ill-will towards the French. Almost every person in Venice seemed to desire that a turn of fortune would permit Austria to restore the late government. The Venetians moreover were not in a situation to command the respect of Bonaparte in regard to another point, which was important in his eyes, power. Their canals and their harbours were almost choked up; their navy was in a sad state; they were themselves rendered degenerate by luxury, and were entirely destitute of energy. "It is a soft, effeminate, and cowardly race," he wrote, "without land or water, and we can do as we please with it." He therefore thought seriously of ceding Venice to Austria, on condition that Austria, renouncing the boundary of the Oglio, as stipulated in the preliminaries of Léoben, would go back to the Adige. That river, which forms an excellent boundary line, would then separate Austria from the new republic. The important fortress of Mantua, which, according to the preliminaries, was to be restored to Austria, would then remain to the Italian republic, and Milan would of course become the capital. Bonaparte deemed it much better to form a single state, having Milan for its capital, and to give to this state the frontier of the Adige and Mantua, than to keep Venice; and it was for the interest of Italian liberty itself that he should do so. Unless he could be the liberator of entire Italy as far as the Isonzo, it would be rather preferable to sacrifice Venice than the frontier of the Adige and Mantua. Bonaparte had perceived, in conversing with the Austrian negotiators, that the new arrangement could be accepted. In consequence, he comprehended Lombardy, the duchies of Modena and Reggio, the Legations of Bologna and Ferrara, the Bergamasco, the Bresciano, and the Mantuan, in one state extending to the Adige, which possessed excellent fortresses, as Pizzighetone and Mantua, a population of three million six hundred thousand inhabitants, an admirable soil, with rivers, canals, and harbours.

He immediately set about making it into a republic. He would have preferred a different constitution from that given to France. In that constitution he considered the executive power as too weak; and, even without having yet any particular bias for this or that form of government, still his object being the creation of a vigorous state, capable of contesting with the neighbouring aristocracies, he would have desired a more centralized and energetic organization. He desired that Sieyès should be sent to him, that he might consider the subject with him; but the directory did not concur in Bonaparte's notions, and insisted that the French constitution should be given to the new republic. The directory was obeyed, and our constitution was immediately adapted to Italy. The new republic was called the Cisalpine. It was proposed in Paris to call it the Transalpine; but that would have been taking Paris, as it were, for the centre, and the Italians desired to have it at Rome, because all their aspirations pointed to the liberation of their country, its unity, and to the re-establishment of the ancient metropolis. The term Cisalpine was therefore a far more suitable term. It was deemed most prudent that the first formation of their government should not be left to the choice of the Italians. On this first occasion, Bonaparte appointed himself the five directors and the members of the two councils. He took great pains to make the best selection he could, so far, at least, as his situation permitted him. He appointed Serbelloni, one of the highest nobles of Italy, director; he caused national guards to be every where organized, and collected thirty thousand of them at Milan, for the federation of the 14th of July. The presence of the French army in Italy, its great achievements, and its glory, had begun to diffuse a military enthusiasm in that country, too unaccustomed to arms. Bonaparte strove to excite it by all possible means. He could not affect to be ignorant how weak the new republic was in a military point of view. The only Italian army he considered worthy of notice was the Piedmontese, because the court of Piedmont alone had been engaged in war during the course of the century. He wrote to Paris that a single regiment of the king of Sardinia's would overthrow the Cisalpine republic; that warlike habits should be introduced into this republic; that then it would be an important power in Italy; but that this must be a work of time, and that such revolutions were not to be effected in a few days. Nevertheless he made some progress herein, for he possessed in the highest degree the art of communicating to others the strongest of his partialities—a taste for warfare. No one knew better how to employ his glory in order to make military honours peculiarly attractive, and to direct to that point every species of vanity and ambition. From that time a change of manners commenced in Italy. "The long loose coat, which was the fashionable dress for young men, was superseded by the uniform. Instead of passing their lives at the feet of the women, the young Italians frequented the riding-schools, the fencing-rooms, and reviews. The boys no longer played at chapel: they had tin soldiers, and imitated in their sports the events of war. In broad comedy, and in the street drolls, had been always represented an Italian, a great coward, though witty, and a sort of blustering captain, sometimes French, more frequently German, very strong, very brave, and very brutal, who finished by giving a sound drubbing to the Italian, amidst the applause of the spectators. The people would no longer suffer such allusions: dramatists introduced upon the stage, to the satisfaction of the public, brave Italians, putting foreigners to flight in support of their honour and their rights. A national spirit was forming. Italy had her songs, both patriotic and martial. The women rejected with contempt the homage of men who affected effeminate manners in order to please them*."

The revolution, however, had scarcely commenced. The Cisalpine could not acquire strength without the assistance of France. The plan was to leave there, as in Holland, a portion of the army, who were there to refresh themselves after its toils, to enjoy its glory in quiet, and to animate the whole country with its martial ardour. Bonaparte, with that foresight which comprehended every thing, had formed a vast and magnificent project for the Cisalpine. That republic was to be an advanced post for France: and that our armies should be able to reach it without loss of time, Bonaparte had formed the plan of a road from France to Geneva, and running from Geneva through the Valais, crossing the Simplon, and descending into Lombardy. He was already in treaty with Switzerland on this subject; he had sent engineers to make an estimate of the expense, and he arranged all the details of execution with that precision which he displayed even in apparently the most extensive and chimerical projects. He desired that this high road, the first that should cross the Alps in a direct line, should be broad, safe, and magnificent—a masterpiece of liberty, and a monument of French power.

While he was thus engaged with a republic which owed its existence to him, he also administered justice, and was chosen as arbiter between two states. The Valtelline had revolted against the sovereignty of the Grison league. The Valtelline consists of three valleys, which belong to Italy, for their rivers flow into the Adda. They were subject to the yoke of the Grisons, a yoke they found insupportable, for there is none so heavy as that which one people presses upon another. There was more than one tyranny of this kind in Switzerland. That of Berne over the Pays de Vaud was notorious. The people of the Valtelline rose, and desired to form part of the Cisalpine republic. They appealed to Bonaparte for protection, and supported their claim upon ancient treaties, which placed the Valtelline under the protection of the sovereigns of Milan. The Grisons and the people of the Valtelline agreed to refer the matter to the arbitrament of Bonaparte. With the permission of the directory, he accepted the mediation. He advised the Grisons to recognize the rights of the people of the Valtelline, and to associate them with themselves as a new member of the Grison league. They refused to comply, and wished to plead the cause of their tyranny. Bonaparte fixed a time for their appearance before him. At the appointed time, the Grisons, at the instigation of Austria, refused to appear. Bonaparte, then taking his stand on the submission to arbitration and on ancient treaties, gave judgment against the Grisons in default, declared the people of the Valtelline free, and permitted them to unite themselves with the Cisalpine republic. This sentence, founded in law and equity, excited a strong sensation in Europe. It terrified the aristocracy of Berne, delighted the Vandois, and added to the Cisalpine a wealthy, brave, and numerous population.

Genoa at the same time availed herself of his recommendation in the choice of a constitution. Genoa was not conquered. She had a right to choose her own laws, and in this respect was wholly independent of the directory. The two parties, aristocratic and democratic, had come to blows. A first insurrection had broken out, as we have already observed, in the month of May; there had been a second, more general, in the valley of La Polcevera, which had nearly proved fatal to Genoa. This insurrection was got up by the priests against the new constitution. The French general, Duphot, who was there with some troops, restored order. The Genoese addressed themselves to Bonaparte, who answered them in a severe letter, full of sound advice, and in which he reproved their democratic intemperance. He made alterations in their constitution, instead of five magistrates invested with the executive power, he left only three. The councils were far from numerous; the government was organized in a less popular, but in a stronger manner. Bonaparte conferred greater privileges on the nobles and the priests, in order to reconcile them with the new order of things; and as it had been proposed to exclude them from public functions, he condemned that idea. You would do, wrote he to the Genoese, what they themselves have done. He had a motive in publishing the letter containing this expression. It was a censure directed against the course pursued in Paris in regard to the nobles. He was delighted with the opportunity of thus indirectly interfering in politics, of uttering an opinion, of giving it against the directory, and above all, of separating himself at once from the victorious party, for he affected to remain independent; not to approve of any thing, to serve none of the factions, to despise them, and to sway them all.

While he was thus the legislator, the arbiter, and the adviser of the people of Italy, he was engaged in other plans not less vast, and which demonstrated a still greater foresight. He had seized the navy of Venice, and summoned admiral Brueys to the Adriatic to take possession of the Greek islands belonging to Venice. He had thus been led to reflect on the Mediterranean, on its importance, and on the part which we might act there. He had thence concluded that if we had to meet with our masters on the Atlantic, we ought not to encounter them in the Mediterranean. Whether Italy should or should not be completely liberated, and whether Venice should or should not be ceded to Austria, he desired that France should keep the Ionian islands, Corfu, Zante, Saint Maura, Cerigo, and Cephalonia. The inhabitants of those islands wanted to become our subjects. Malta, the most important post in the Mediterranean, belonged to an obsolete order, which must soon disappear before the influence of the French revolution. Malta moreover must soon fall into the hands of the English, if France did not take possession of it. Bonaparte had caused the property of the knights in Italy to be seized, with a view to complete their extinction. He had set on foot intrigues in Malta itself, which was guarded only by a few knights and a slender garrison, and his plan was to send thither his little squadron, and to make himself master of it. "From these different positions," he wrote to the directory, "we shall command the Mediterranean, we shall keep an eye upon the Ottoman empire, which is entirely crumbling to pieces, and we shall be at hand to support it, or to secure our share of it. We shall be able to do more," added Bonaparte; "we shall be able to render the sovereignty of the Atlantic almost useless to the English. They have disputed with us at Lille the possession of the Cape of Good Hope. We can do without it. Let us occupy Egypt. We shall be in the direct road for India, and it will be easy for us to found there one of the finest colonies in the world."

* Napoleon's memoirs by count Montholon, vol. iv. p. 196, (Paris ed. Trans.)

Thus it was in Italy, while turning his attention to the Levant, that he conceived the first idea of that celebrated expedition which was put in motion the following year. "It is in Egypt," wrote he, "that we must attack England." (Letter of 16th August, 1797, 29th Thermidor, year V.)

To attain these ends, he had caused admiral Brueys to be sent into the Adriatic, with six sail of the line and some frigates and cutters. He had moreover devised means for capturing the Venetian navy. According to the treaty concluded, he was to be paid three millions in naval stores. Upon this pretext, he took all the hemp, iron, and other materials, which constituted the sole wealth of the Venetian arsenal. After seizing these stores under pretence of the three millions, Bonaparte took possession of the ships, upon the pretext of sending them to occupy the islands on the behalf of democratic Venice. He ordered those which were building to be finished, and thus succeeded in fitting out six sail of the line, six frigates, and several cutters, which he joined to the squadron which admiral Brueys had brought from Toulon. He replaced the million which the treasury had stopped, furnished Brueys with funds for pressing excellent seamen in Albania and on the coast of Greece, and thus created a naval force capable of awing the whole Mediterranean. He fixed its principal station at Corfu, for excellent reasons, and which were approved by the government. From Corfu, this squadron could sail up the Adriatic, and act in unison with the army of Italy, in case of new hostilities; it could go to Malta, overawe the court of Naples, and there would be no difficulty if it were wanted in the Atlantic to make it available for any other service, to fly to the straits more speedily than from Toulon. Lastly, at Corfu the squadron might learn naval tactics and be made more complete than at Toulon, where it generally lay inactive. "You will never have seamen," wrote Bonaparte, "so long as you let them lay in harbour."

Such was the way in which Bonaparte employed his time during the intentional delays which Austria made him experience. He turned his attention also to his military position in regard to that power. Austria had made very great preparations since the signature of the preliminaries of Leoben. She had transferred the greater part of her forces to Carinthia, in order to protect Vienna, and to shelter herself from the fiery assaults of Bonaparte. She had caused a levy en masse in Hungary, eighteen thousand Hungarian horse had been in training for three months past on the banks of the Danube. Thus she possessed the means of supporting the negotiations of Udine. Bonaparte had scarcely more than seventy thousand troops, a very small portion of which was cavalry. He applied to the directory for reinforcements that he might be able to face the enemy, and he particularly pressed for the ratification of the treaty of alliance with Piedmont, in order to obtain ten thousand of those Piedmontese soldiers on whom he laid such stress. But the directory would not send him reinforcements, because the removal of the troops would have occasioned numerous desertions. The directory rather preferred accelerating the march of the army of Germany, to extricate the army of Italy than to reinforce it; and the directory still hesitated to sign the alliance with Piedmont, because it would not guarantee a throne, the natural fall of which it looked for and desired. The directory had merely sent a few dismounted cavalry. In Italy there was plenty wherewithal to mount and fit them for service.

Deprived of the resources on which he had relied, Bonaparte saw himself exposed to a storm from the quarter of the Julian Alps. He had endeavoured to supply himself in every possible manner with the means that were refused him. He had armed and fortified Palma Nova with extraordinary activity, and had made it a fortress of the first order, which would of itself require a long siege. This circumstance alone produced a material change in his position. He had caused bridges to be thrown over the Isonzo, and piers constructed, in order to be ready to debouch upon the enemy with his accustomed promptitude. If the rupture should take place before the snowy season, he hoped to surprise the Austrians, to throw them into disorder, and in spite of the superiority of their forces, to be very soon at the gates of Vienna. But if the rupture should not take place till after the snowy season, he could no longer anticipate the Austrians, but be obliged to receive them in the plains of Italy, whereon they could debouch at all times of the year, and then the disadvantage of number would no longer be compensated by his taking the offensive. In this case he considered himself as being in danger.

Bonaparte was therefore desirous that the negotiations should be speedily terminated. After the ridiculous note of the 18th July, wherein the plenipotentiaries had again insisted upon a congress at Berne, and remonstrated against what had been done at Venice, Bonaparte had replied in a vigorous manner, which proved to Austria that he was ready to fall once more upon Vienna. MM. de Gallo, de Meerfeldt, and a third negotiator, M. de Degelmann, had arrived on the 31st August (14th Fructidor), and the conferences had immediately begun. But the object evidently was delay; for while accepting a separate negotiation at Udine, they constantly reserved to themselves the right to revert to a general congress at Berne. They notified that the congress of Rastadt, in respect of the peace with the empire, was about to open immediately; that the negotiations would be conducted there at the same time as those at Udine, which could not fail to singularly confound interests, and to give rise to as many difficulties as a general congress at Berne. Bonaparte observed that there was no negotiating peace with the empire till after peace had been concluded with the emperor; he declared that if the congress were opened, France would not send envoys thereto; and he added that, if on the 1st October peace were not concluded with the emperor, the preliminaries of Leoben should be considered as null.

Things were at this point, when the 18th Fructidor (September 4) frustrated all the false hopes of Austria. M. de Cobentzel immediately hurried from Vienna to Udine. Bonaparte repaired to Passeriano, a fine country mansion at some distance from Udine, and every thing seemed to demonstrate that in treating both parties acted in good faith. The conferences took place alternately at M. de Cobentzel's, at Udine, and at Passeriano, at Bonaparte's. M. de Cobentzel was a man of a shrewd, fertile, but illogical mind: he was haughty and morose. The other three negotiators kept silence. Bonaparte was the sole representative of France since the dismissal of Clarke. He possessed sufficient arrogance, and his language was quite prompt and keen enough for the purpose of replying to the Austrian negotiator. Though it was evident that the intention on the part of M. de Cobentzel to treat was really sincere, he nevertheless set up the most extravagant claims. It was just as if Austria ceded the Netherlands to us, but would not undertake to secure to us the boundary of the Rhine, saying that it was for the empire to make this concession. As an indemnification for the rich and populous provinces of Belgium, Austria required possessions not in Germany but in Italy. The preliminaries of Leoben had assigned to her the Venetian states as far as the Oglio, that is to say, Dalmatia, Istria, the Friule, the Bresciano, the Bergamasco, and the Mantuan, together with the fortress of Mantua; but these provinces would not half indemnify her for what she lost by the cession of the Netherlands and Lombardy. It would not be too much, said M. de Cobentzel, to leave her not only Lombardy, but also give her Venice and the Legations, and reinstate the duke of Modena in his duchy.

To all the eloquence of M. de Cobentzel, Bonaparte only replied by unbroken silence, and to his absurd requirements by pretensions equally extravagant, uttered in a firm and decisive tone. He demanded the line of the Rhine, including Mentz, for France, and the line of the Isonzo for Italy. A medium was to be settled between these opposite claims. Bonaparte, as we have already observed, had a slight notion that, by ceding Venice to Austria (a concession not included in the preliminaries of Leoben, because he had then no thought of destroying that republic), he could prevail upon the emperor to remove his boundary further back from the Oglio to the Adige, so that the Mantuan, the Bergamasco, and the Bresciano, might be given to the Cisalpine, which would thus have the frontier of the Adige and Mantua; and further, that the emperor should guarantee to France the boundary of the Rhine, and even surrender Mentz; and lastly, that he should consent to leave France the Ionian islands. Bonaparte resolved to treat on these conditions: they presented to his mind substantial advantages, and all those that France could obtain at the moment. The emperor, in accepting Venice, would compromise himself in the opinion of Europe, for it was on his account that Venice had betrayed France. By abandoning the Adige and the Mantua, the emperor would give great consistence to the new republic. By leaving us the Ionian islands, he would pave the way for us to the empire of the Mediterranean; by guaranteeing to us the boundary of the Rhine, he would put it out of the power of the empire to refuse it; by surrendering Mentz to us, he would virtually put us in possession of that boundary, and would again compromise himself with the empire in the most serious manner, by giving up to us a fortress belonging to one of the Germanic princes. It is true that in another campaign, France would certainly have annihilated the Austrian monarchy, or at least have compelled it to renounce Italy. But Bonaparte had more than one personal reason for avoiding a new campaign. It was now the month of October, and too late to advance into Austria. The army of Germany, commanded by Augereau, must have all the advantage, for there was nothing to oppose it. The army of Italy would have all the Austrian forces upon its hands, and it could no longer act the brilliant part it had formerly played when compelled to act on the defensive; and it could no longer be the first at Vienna. Lastly, Bonaparte was jaded. He wished to repose for some short time upon his laurels. One battle more would be no addition to his two wonderful campaigns, and in signing the peace, he would receive an immense accession to his glory. To the reputation he had gained as a warrior would be added that of the politician, and he would be the only general of the republic who had combined both, for not one of them had ever signed a treaty. He would fulfil one of the most ardent aspirations of France, and return to her bosom loaded with every mark of honourable distinction. Certainly it was a practical disobedience to sign a treaty on those principles, for the directory required the entire liberation of Italy; but Bonaparte felt confident that the directory would not dare to decline the ratification of the treaty, as it would then be setting itself in opposition to the public opinion in France. The directory had already given it great offence by breaking off the negotiations at Lille, and certainly would be doing so in a greater degree by abruptly terminating the conferences at Udine; and would justify all the reproaches of the royalist faction, which accused the directory of designing a perpetual war. Bonaparte therefore felt that by signing the treaty, he should be able to hold the directory to its ratification.

He boldly delivered his ultimatum to M. de Cobentzel. This was Venice for Austria, but the Adige and Mantua for the Cisalpine, the Rhine and Mentz for France, with the Ionian islands into the bargain. On the 16th of October (25th Vendémiaire, year VI.), the last conference was held at M. de Cobentzel's at Udine. A declaration was made by both parties that they would no longer negotiate; and M. de Cobentzel intimated that his carriages were ready. They were seated at an oblong square table; the four Austrian negotiators being on one side, Bonaparte by himself on the other. M. de Cobentzel recapitulated all that he had said, insisted that the emperor, in giving up the keys of Mentz, ought to receive those of Mantua; that he could not do otherwise without breaking his word; that after all, France had never made a more glorious treaty, and certainly she could not desire one more advantageous; that she wished above all things for peace, and would know how to appreciate the conduct of the negotiator who should sacrifice the interest and tranquillity of his country to his military ambition. Bonaparte, who had remained cool and impenetrable during this insulting apostrophe, suffered M. de Cobentzel to finish his speech; then stepping up to a sideboard upon which stood a porcelain tea-service, a present from the great Catharine to M. de Cobentzel, and displayed as an article of peculiar value, he took it up and dashed it upon the floor with these words: "War is declared; but remember, that before three months are over, I will break up your monarchy, just as I break this porcelain." This act and these words struck the Austrian negotiators with astonishment. He made his bow to them, withdrew, and getting immediately into his carriage, ordered an officer to go and acquaint the archduke Charles that hostilities would recommence in twenty-four hours. M. de Cobentzel, alarmed, instantly sent the ultimatum signed to Passeriano. One of the conditions of the treaty was the release of M. de Lafayette, who had for five years heroically endured his imprisonment at Olmütz.

Next day, October the 17th (26th Vendémiaire), the treaty was signed at Passeriano; it was dated from a small village situated between the two armies, to which, however, the negotiators did not repair, because it possessed no suitable place for their reception. This village was Campo-Formio. It gave its name to this celebrated treaty, the first concluded between the emperor and the French republic.

It was agreed that the emperor, as sovereign of the Netherlands, and as a member of the empire, should confirm to France the boundary of the Rhine; that he should deliver Mentz to our troops; and that the Ionian islands should remain in our possession. It was further agreed that the Cisalpine republic should have Romagna, the Legations, the duchy of Modena, Lombardy, the Valteline, the Bergamasco, the Bresciano, and the Mantuan, with the Adige and Mantua for its boundary. The emperor subscribed, moreover, to various conditions resulting from this treaty and from anterior treaties which bound the republic. In the first place, he engaged to give the Brigau to the duke of Modena as a compensation for his duchy. He also engaged to use his influence for the purpose of obtaining for the stadtholder a compensation in Germany for the loss of Holland, and for the king of Prussia a compensation for the loss of the little territory which he had ceded to us on the left bank of the Rhine. By virtue of these engagements, the voice of the emperor was ensured at the congress of Rastadt for the solution of all questions that specially interested France. The emperor received, in return for all that he had granted, the Friule, Istria, Dalmatia, and the mouths of the Cattaro.

France had never before made so glorious a peace. She had at length obtained her natural confines, and obtained them with the concurrence of her continental neighbours. A great revolution had taken place in Upper Italy. There an ancient state had been destroyed and a new state founded. But the state destroyed was a despotic aristocracy, an irreconcilable enemy of liberty. The state founded was a republic liberally constituted, and which might be the means of communicating liberty to all Italy. It was to be regretted, it is true, that the Austrians had not been driven beyond the Isonzo, that all Upper Italy, and the city of Venice itself, had not been united with the Cisalpine; with another campaign that result would have been obtained. Extraordinary circumstances had prevented the young warrior from making that campaign. Personal interest began to affect the calculations of the great man, and to attach a stain to the first, and perhaps the brightest act of his life.

Bonaparte could scarcely doubt but that the treaty would be confirmed; yet he was not without anxiety, for this treaty was an open contravention of the instructions of the directory. He transmitted this treaty by Berthier, the faithful and complaisant chief of his staff, his intimate friend, and whom he had not yet sent to France to enjoy the congratulations of his fellow-citizens. With his usual tact, with the military officer he associated a scientific man: this was Monge, who had been a member of the commission for the selection of works of art in Italy, and who, notwithstanding his rank demagogic spirit and stiffness of character, had yielded as so many others had done, to the attractions of genius, elegance, and glory.

Monge and Berthier got to Paris in a few days. They arrived there in the middle of the night, and roused Larévellière-Lépeaux, president of the directory, from his bed. Although they came the bearers of a treaty of peace, the two envoys were far from feeling the joy and confidence usual under such circumstances; they were embarrassed, like men who have to commence with a painful avowal; in point of fact, they were compelled to state that the government had been disobeyed. In introducing the tenor of this treaty, and justifying their general, they used the most measured and cautious language. Larévellière received them with all the attention due to two such distinguished individuals, especially as one of them was well known to possess great scientific attainments: but all he said concerning the treaty was that the directory would consider of it. He laid it in the morning before the directory. The news of the peace had already spread throughout Paris; the utmost self-gratulation was every where visible; the terms were not yet published, but, whatever they were, they made sure that they were highly satisfactory. They extolled Bonaparte and his double glory. As he had foreseen, they were delighted at the character of pacificator and the warrior united in him; and a peace which he had only signed from selfish motives, was held forth as an act of military disinterestedness. The young general, it was said, has declined the glory (Brumaire.

1797. Nov.
Frimaire.)

Circumstances under which the directory ratified the treaty of Campo-Formio.

THE DIRECTORY.

Bonaparte concludes his revolutionary arrangements in Italy.

703

of a new campaign in order that his country might enjoy the blessings of peace.

The public demonstrations of joy were so decided, that it would have been very difficult for the directory to have nullified them by repudiating the treaty of Campo-Formio. This treaty was the consequence of a decided act of disobedience; the directory, therefore, could have had excellent reasons for refusing its ratification; and it would have done considerable service had a severe lesson been given to the young audacious negotiator who had violated its explicit orders. But how disappoint the general expectation? How venture to refuse peace a second time, after having refused it at Lille? It would thus afford a ground for all the charges made by the victims of Fructidor, and seriously compromise them with the public. There would be another danger equally formidable to encounter. In point of fact, by rejecting the treaty, Bonaparte would tender his resignation, and reverses must inevitably follow the resumption of hostilities in Italy. What a responsibility would not the government take upon itself in this case? Besides, this treaty was exceedingly advantageous; it presented a splendid prospect for the future; it gave us Mentz and Mantua in addition to what we obtained by the treaty of Leoben; lastly, it left all the forces of France unemployed, so that they might be the better able to invade England.

The directory, therefore, approved of the treaty. The general joy now became more animated, and more settled. The directory skilfully sought to avail itself of this event for calling public attention against England. The hero of Italy and his invincible companions were to hurry from one enemy to another, and the very day on which the treaty was published, an ordinance appointed Bonaparte commander-in-chief of the army of England.

Bonaparte made his arrangements for leaving Italy, in order to taste a few moments' repose, and to enjoy a reputation greater than had been ever recognized in modern times. He was appointed plenipotentiary at Rastadt, with Bonnier and Treilhارد, to treat for peace with the empire. It was also agreed that he should meet M. de Cobentzel at Rastadt, and exchange with him the ratifications of the treaty of Campo-Formio. At the same time, he was to attend to the execution of the conditions relative to the occupation of Mentz. With his usual foresight, he had taken care to stipulate that the Austrian troops should not enter Palma-Nova, until after his own troops should have entered Mentz.

Before he set out for Rastadt, he resolved to put a finishing hand to the affairs of Italy. He nominated to the appointments that yet remained vacant in the Cisalpine; he settled the conditions of the continuation of the French troops in Italy, and their relations with the new republic. These troops were to be commanded by Berthier, and to form a body of thirty thousand men, to be maintained at the expense of the Cisalpine. They were to remain there till a general peace in Europe. He withdrew the corps which he had at Venice, and delivered up that city to an Austrian corps. The Venetian patriots, on finding themselves transferred to Austria, were indignant. Bonaparte had caused an asylum to be secured for them in the Cisalpine, and had stipulated with the Austrian government for the power to sell their possessions. They were not sensible of these attentions, and poured forth vehement and very natural imprecations against the conqueror by whom they were sacrificed. Villetard, who seemed to have pledged himself with them for the French government on this occasion, wrote to Bonaparte, and was treated by him with extraordinary harshness. But after all, it was not the patriots alone who manifested great concern on this occasion. The nobles and the populace, who so lately preferred Austria to France, because they liked the principles of the one and abhorred those of the other, felt a revival of all their natural sentiments, and showed an attachment to their ancient country, which rendered them worthy of an interest that they had not yet inspired. The despair became general; a noble lady was known to have poisoned herself; and the old doge fell motionless at the feet of the Austrian officer between whose hands he was taking the oath of allegiance.

Bonaparte addressed a proclamation to the Italians, in which he took leave of them, and gave them his parting advice. It breathed that noble, firm, and somewhat rhetorical tone, which he had the art of imparting to his public addresses. "We have given you liberty," said he to the Cisalpines; "take care to preserve it. To be worthy of your destiny, do not merely content yourselves with making discreet and merciful laws; cause them to be executed with energy. Favour the diffusion of knowledge and respect religion. Form your battalions not of disreputable men, but of citizens imbued with the principles of the republic, and closely linked to its prosperity. You have in general need to impress yourselves with the feeling of your strength, and with the dignity which is consistent with the free man. Divided and bowed down for ages by tyranny, you would not have acquired your liberty; but in a few years, were you to be left to yourselves, no power on earth will be strong enough to wrest it from you. Till then the great nation will protect you against the attacks of your neighbours; its political system will be united with yours. I shall leave you in a few days. The orders of my government and an imminent danger to the Cisalpine republic will alone bring me back among you."

This last sentence was a reply to those who asserted that he aimed at making himself king of Lombardy. There was nothing that he preferred to the title and the character of first general of the French republic. One of the Austrian negotiators had offered him, in the name of the emperor, a state in Germany. He replied, that he was determined to owe his fortune to the gratitude of the French people alone. Did he possess a glimmering of what was hereafter to take place? Certainly not; but had he been only the first citizen of the republic, it is easy to conceive that he would have preferred it. The regret of the Italians accompanied him, and they saw with concern the disappearance of this bright apparition. Bonaparte rapidly traversed Piedmont, intending to proceed through Switzerland to Rastadt. Magnificent entertainments, and presents for himself and his wife, awaited him on his route. Princes and common people were anxious to see that celebrated warrior, that arbiter of so many destinies. At Turin the king had caused presents to be prepared, to testify his acknowledgments for the support he had obtained through Bonaparte with the directory. In Switzerland, the enthusiasm of the Vaudois for the liberator of the Valteline was extreme. Young maidens in tri-coloured dresses presented him with chaplets. Every where this maxim, so dear to the Vaudois, was inscribed: One people cannot be subject to another people. Bonaparte desired to see the bone-house of Morat; he there met with a multitude, who were never tired in following his steps. The cannon fired salutes in the towns through which he passed. The government of Berne, who observed with spleen the enthusiasm excited by the liberator of the Valteline, forbade its officers to fire the cannon. The order was not obeyed. On reaching Rastadt, he found all the German princes impatient to see him. He immediately caused the French negotiators to assume the position in accordance with their mission and their station. He refused to receive M. de Fersen, whom Sweden had sent to represent her at the congress of the empire, and whose connexions with the former court of France rendered him an unfit person to treat with the French republic. This refusal produced a strong sensation, and evidenced Bonaparte's constant solicitude to sustain the dignity of the great nation, as he called it in all his harangues. Having exchanged the ratifications of the treaty of Campo-Formio, and made the necessary arrangements for the re-delivery of Mentz, he resolved to set out for Paris. He saw nothing of importance to be discussed at Rastadt, and above all, he foresaw interminable delays before all these petty German princes could be brought to agree. Such a part was not to his taste; besides he was fatigued, and some impatience to arrive at Paris and ascend the capitol of modern Rome was very natural.

He left Rastadt, travelled incognito through France, and arrived in Paris on the evening of the 15th Frimaire, year VI. (December 5th, 1797.) He retired to a house of unpretending appearance, which he had caused to be purchased for him in the Rue Charteraine. This man, whose pride was unbounded, had all the address of a female in concealing himself from public view. On the surrender of Mantua, he had hurriedly avoided the honour of seeing Wurmser and the garrison file off before him; and in Paris he determined to retire to the most obscure abode. He affected in his language, his dress, and in all his habits a simplicity which took every one by surprise, and the effect was more deeply impressed on the imagination when the contrast was considered. All Paris, apprized of his arrival, was impatience itself to see him; this was only natural, especially in Frenchmen. M. de Talleyrand, the minister for foreign affairs, for whom, though absent, he had conceived a strong partiality, would have gone and seen him the same evening. Bonaparte apologized for not being able to see him, and went to the minister on the following morning. The reception-room of the foreign-office was filled with distinguished persons, anxious to see the hero. Reserved towards every body, he perceived Bougainville, and went straight up to him, and addressed him in terms which, falling from his lips, could not fail to produce the deepest impressions. He already affected the air of a sovereign towards the useful and celebrated man. M. de Talleyrand introduced him to the directory. Though there were many reasons for dissatisfaction between the general and the directors, yet the interview demonstrated the utmost confidence and cordiality. It was far more suitable for the directory to affect satisfaction, and the general a show of deference. At any rate, his services were so important, and his glory so resplendent, that dissatisfaction was forced to give way to accordance with the general feeling. The directory prepared a triumphant fête for the delivery of the treaty of Campo-Formio. This did not take place in the reception-room of the directory, but in the great court of the Luxembourg. Every arrangement was made for rendering this solemnity one of the most impressive of the revolution. The directors were seated on a dais at the further end of the court, at the foot of the altar of the country, and habited in the Roman costume. Around them, the ministers, the ambassadors, the members of the two councils, the magistrates, the chiefs of the administrations, were placed on seats, amphitheatrically arranged. Magnificent trophies, formed of numberless flags taken from the enemy, rose at a little distance from one another all round the court; beautiful tri-coloured hangings adorned the walls. The galleries were filled with the best company of the capital; bands of musicians were placed in the area; and a numerous artillery was drawn up around the palace, to add its thunders to the sounds of the music and the din of acclamations. Chenier had composed one of his finest hymns in honour of that day.

It was the 20th Frimaire, year VI. (December 10, 1797.) The directory, the public functionaries, and the spectators, having taken their places, waited with impatience for the illustrious man, whom few of them had ever seen. He made his appearance, accompanied by M. de Talleyrand, who was commissioned to present him; for it was the negotiator who was now being congratulated. Every one of his contemporaries, struck by that slender figure, that pale Roman visage, that bright eye, even at this time speak of the effect which he produced, and of the indescribable sensation of genius and authority which he impressed upon the imagination. A great sensation was manifested. Unanimous acclamations burst forth at witnessing a person so simple in his appearance, surrounded by such renown. The republic for ever! Bonaparte for ever! were echoed from all sides. M. de Talleyrand then addressed the assembly, and in a neat and concise speech, strove to refer the glory of the general, not to himself, but to the revolution, to the armies, and to the great nation. He seemed in this anxious to relieve the modesty of Bonaparte, and with his accustomed intelligence, to guess how the hero would like to be spoken of before his face. M. de Talleyrand next spoke of what might, he said, be called his ambition; but in alluding to his antique taste for simplicity, to his fondness for the abstract sciences, to his favourite reading, to that sublime Ossian, with whom he learned to wean himself from the earth, M. de Talleyrand said that it would perhaps be necessary to solicit him to tear himself some day from his studious retirement. What M. de Talleyrand had been saying was in every body's mouth, and went its round in all the speeches delivered at this great solemnity. Every body declared, and repeated that the young general was without ambition, so fearful were they that he had it. After M. de Talleyrand had finished, Bonaparte spoke, and delivered in a firm tone the following disconnected sentences :

"Citizens,

"The French people, in order to be free, have had to contend with kings.

"Before we could obtain a constitution founded upon reason, we have had the prejudices of eighteen centuries to overcome.

"The constitution of the year III. and yourselves have triumphed over all obstacles.

"Religion, feudalism, royalty, have successively for twenty centuries past governed Europe; but the peace which you have just concluded is the date from which all representative governments will date their era.

"You have succeeded in organizing the great nation, whose vast territory is circumscribed only because nature herself has fixed its limits.

"You have done more. The two finest countries in Europe, formerly so renowned for the arts, the sciences, and the great men whose cradle they were, see with the greatest hopes genius and freedom issuing from the tomb of their ancestors.

"These are two pedestals on which the destinies are about to place two powerful nations.

"I have the honour to deliver to you the treaty signed at Campo-Formio, and ratified by his majesty the emperor.

"Peace ensures the liberty, the prosperity, and the glory of the republic.

"When the happiness of the French people shall be founded on better organic laws, all Europe will become free."

This speech was scarcely concluded before another burst of applause was heard; Barras, the president of the directory, replied to Bonaparte. His address was prolix, rambling, and inconsistent. He highly extolled the modesty and the simplicity of the hero; he cleverly introduced a tribute to the memory of Hoche, the supposed rival of the conqueror of Italy. "Ah! why is not Hoche here," said the president of the directory, "to see and to embrace his friend?" Hoche had in fact in the preceding year defended Bonaparte with generous warmth. In accordance with the new impulse given to the public mind, Barras promised new laurels to the hero, and exhorted him to go and gather them in England. After these three speeches, Chenier's hymn was sung in chorus accompanied by a magnificent orchestra. Two generals then advanced, attended by the minister at war. These were the brave Joubert, the hero of the Tyrol, and Andreossi, one of the most distinguished officers of the artillery. They came forward, bearing a handsome flag. This was the flag which the directory had just given at the conclusion of the campaign to the army of Italy, the new consecrated standard (oriflamme) of the republic. Its field was charged with numberless letters in gold, and these letters formed the following inscriptions :

The army of Italy has made one hundred and fifty thousand prisoners, it has taken one hundred and seventy pair of colours, five hundred and fifty pieces of siege artillery, six hundred pieces of field artillery, five portable bridge equipages, nine sail of the line, twelve frigates, twelve cutters, and eighteen galleys.—Hostilities suspended with the kings of Sardinia, Naples, the Pope, the Dukes of Parma and Modena.—Preliminaries of Leoben.—Convention of Montebello, with the republic of Genoa.—Treaties of peace of Tolentino and Campo-Formio.—Freedom given to the people of Bologna, Ferrara, Modena, Massa Carrara, La Romagna, Lombardy, Brescia, Bergamo, Mantua, Cremona, part of Verona, of Chiavenna, of Bormio, and of the Valtellina; to the people of Genoa, to the Imperial Fiefs, to the people of the departments of Corsica, the Egean Sea, and Ithaca. Transferred to Paris the masterpieces of Michael Angelo, Guerotino, Titian, Paul Veronese, Coreggio, Albano, the Carracci, Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci, &c. Triumphed in eighteen pitched battles, MONTENOTTE, MILLESIMO, MONDOVI, LODI, BORGHESTO, LONATO, CASTIGLIONE, ROVEREDO, BASSANO, SAINT GEORGE, FONTANA-NOVA, CALDIERO, ARCOLA, RIVOLI, LA FAVORITA, THE TAGLIAMENTO, TARVIS, NEWMARKET,—fought sixty-seven actions.

Joubert and Andreossi spoke in their turn, and received a flattering reply from the president of the directory. After all these speeches, the general went to receive the fraternal embrace from the president of the directory. The moment that Bonaparte had received it from Barras, the other four directors threw themselves, as if by an involuntary impulse, into the arms of the general. Unanimous acclamations rent the air; the people who thronged the neighbouring streets joined their shouts, the cannon its thunders. Every one yielded to the intoxicating impulse of the moment. Thus we see has France thrown herself into the arms of an extraordinary man! Let us not censure the weakness of our fathers. That glory comes down to our times but through the clouds of time and adversity, and brings us back to the past! Let us say with Æschylus; "What would it have been had we seen the monster himself."

CHAPTER XII.

GENERAL BONAPARTE AT PARIS; HIS SITUATION WITH THE DIRECTORY.—PROJECTED INVASION OF ENGLAND.—POLITICAL RELATIONS OF FRANCE WITH THE CONTINENT.—THE CONGRESS OF RASTATT. CAUSES THAT IMPEDED THE NEGOTIATIONS.—REVOLUTION IN HOLLAND, AT ROME, AND IN SWITZERLAND.—INTERNAL STATE OF FRANCE; ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR VI.; ELECTORAL SCHISMS. TRAILHARD APPOINTED A DIRECTOR.—EXPEDITION IN EGYPT SUBSTITUTED BY BONAPARTE FOR THE INTENDED ENGLISH INVASION; THE PREPARATIONS MADE FOR THAT EXPEDITION.

THE triumphant reception which the directory had prepared for Bonaparte was followed by splendid entertainments given to him individually by the directors, the members of the councils, and the ministers. Each strove to surpass the other in magnificence. The hero of these festivities was struck with the taste displayed on his account by the minister for foreign affairs, and felt a strong inclination for ancient French elegance. Amidst this pomp, he appeared simple and affable, but constrained, almost insensible to pleasure, seeking among the crowd the useful and celebrated man, in order to converse with him on the art or science in which he was known to excel. Men of the highest renown felt honoured at having been distinguished by general Bonaparte.

The acquirements of the young general ranked no higher than those of an officer who had recently quitted the military schools. But, owing to the instinct of genius, he could converse on subjects the most foreign to his profession, and throw out some of those bold, but original ideas, which frequently are nought else than the impertinences of ignorance, but which, coming from superior men, and expressed in their style, create a false notion, and captivate even men who have made those subjects their particular study. Bonaparte's facility of conversing generally upon all subjects excited surprise. The journalists who detailed the most trifling particulars respecting the person of general Bonaparte, who reported with what personage he had dined, how he had looked, whether he was cheerful or melancholy, these journalists stated that in dining with François (of Neufchateau), he had conversed on mathematics with Lagrange and Laplace, on metaphysics with Sieyès, on poetry with Chenier, and on legislation and political economy with Daunou. In general, few persons ventured to ask him many questions when they were in his company, but every one extremely desired to lend him to talk of his campaigns; but whenever that was the case, he never spoke of himself, but of his army, of his soldiers, and of republican bravery; he gave a graphic description of the uproar and confusion that attended battles; made every one understand the value of a decisive moment—how it should be made available; and charmed all who heard him by his clear, striking, and dramatic narratives. If his achievements had proclaimed a great commander, his conversations disclosed an original and cultivated mind. alternately varied and precise, and always seductive when he pleased. He had gained the ascendancy over the mass by his glory; by the powers of his conversation he began to gain over, one by one, the most distinguished men in France. The infatuation, already great, became still greater when they had seen him. There was nothing about him, not even the traces of a foreign extraction, which time had not yet effaced from his person, but contributed to the effect. Singularity always adds to the influence of genius, especially in France, where, with the greatest uniformity of manners, eccentricity is greatly admired. Bonaparte affected to shun the crowd, and to conceal himself from observation. Sometimes he even manifested displeasure at too marked demonstrations of enthusiasm. Madame de Staël, who was, and who had a right to be fond of greatness, genius, and glory, was all impatience to see Bonaparte, and to express her admiration of him. Like an imperious man, who wishes every body to keep his place, he disliked her for sometimes leaving hers; he found her too clever, too enthusiastic, and even felt her independence amidst all her admiration; with regard to her he was cold, harsh, and unjust. She asked him one day, in rather an off-hand manner, who was in his estimation the greatest woman? He drily replied, "She who has borne most children." From this moment commenced that reciprocal antipathy which cost her so much unmerited persecution, and which led him to commit acts of petty and brutal tyranny against her. He went abroad but little; lived in his humble dwelling in the Rue Charteraine, which had changed its name, and which the department of Paris had ordered to be called the Rue de la Victoire. He admitted only a few men of science, Monge, Lagrange, Laplace, and Berthollet; a few generals, Desaix, Kléber, and Caffarelli; a few artists, and especially the celebrated actor of whom France was so soon to be deprived, Talma, for whom he already manifested an extraordinary partiality. Whenever he went abroad, it was generally in a very common sort of carriage; he never went to the theatre but in a private box; and he seemed not to participate at all in his wife's fondness for dissipation. For her he showed extreme affection. He was enthralled by that peculiar grace, which either in private life, or upon the throne, never forsook Madame Beauharnais, and which in her supplied the place of beauty.

A place having become vacant in the institute by the banishment of Carnot, it was immediately offered to Bonaparte. He eagerly accepted it. At the meeting held for his reception, he took his seat between Lagrange and Laplace, and thenceforth, in public ceremonies, he assumed the dress of a member of the institute, affecting thus to conceal the warrior under the habit of the man of science.

So much glory could not fail to give umbrage to the heads of the government, who, having on their 1798, Jan.

(Nivôse.
Pluviôse.)

distrust his rising greatness.

THE DIRECTORY.

Preparations made for an invasion of England under Bonaparte.

767

side neither priority of rank or personal greatness, were wholly eclipsed by the warrior peacemaker. They nevertheless paid him the highest respect, to which he replied by the utmost demonstrations of deference. The sentiment that most engrosses, is the one that is least in our mouths. The directory was far from giving vent to its apprehensions. It received numerous reports from its spies, who went to the barracks and to the public places to listen to the language used concerning Bonaparte. Bonaparte, it was said, would soon put himself at the head of affairs, overthrow an enfeebled government, and thus save France both from the royalists and the Jacobins. The directory, with a feigned frankness, showed him these reports, and affected to treat them with contempt, as if it had deemed the general incapable of ambition. The general, who was not behindhand in dissembling, acknowledged his gratitude for these testimonials, by assuring the directory that he was worthy of the confidence reposed in him. But on either side there was extreme distrust. If the spies of the police talked to the directory of plans of usurpation, the officers who surrounded the general talked to him of poisoning schemes. The death of Hoche had given rise to absurd suspicions; the general, who, though exempt from puerile apprehensions, was nevertheless prudent, was extremely cautious when he dined with a certain director; he ate little, and only of such dishes as he had seen the director himself eat of, and drank no wine of which he had not seen him drink.

Barras wished to encourage a belief that he was the author of Bonaparte's fortune, and that, being no longer his protector, he had continued to be his friend. He showed in particular an extraordinary devotion for his person; he strove with his usual complaisance to convince him of his attachment. He took every opportunity of exposing his colleagues to him, and affected to hold himself apart. Bonaparte received the professions of this director with coldness, as he placed no reliance on their sincerity, and did not reward his servility by the slightest token of confidence.

Bonaparte was frequently consulted on certain questions. A minister was sent to summon him to the directory; he would go, take his seat beside the directors, and give his opinions with that superiority of tact which distinguished him in matters of administration and government, as well as those of war. He affected in politics a line of ideas depending upon the position which he had assumed. Immediately after the 18th Fructidor, we have seen him, when the impulse was once given and the fall of the royalist faction assured, stop short all at once, with the resolution of affording the government no more than the support absolutely necessary for preventing the restoration of monarchy. This point obtained, he did not wish to appear to attach himself to the directory. He chose to show all parties that he kept aloof from them, without being either connected or embroiled with any. The attitude of a censor was the position which suited his ambition. This part it is very easy to sustain in regard to a government assailed in contrary directions by factions, and constantly in danger of falling; it has its advantages, because it brings about you all the malcontents, that is, all the parties who soon become universally disgusted with the government that attempts to repress, without having strength sufficient to crush them. The proclamations of Bonaparte to the Cisalpines and the Genoeese, relative to the laws they had proposed to pass against the nobles, were quite enough to indicate the course his present ideas were about to follow. It was plainly perceptible, and his language rendered it sufficiently obvious, that he censured the conduct pursued by the government subsequently to the 18th Fructidor. It was natural that the patriots should in some measure have resumed the ascendancy since that event. The directory was not controlled, but slightly impelled by them. This was evident in its appointments, in its measures, and in its spirit. Bonaparte, though keeping up considerable reserve, manifested disapprobation at the course the government was pursuing. He appeared to consider it as feeble, incompetent, suffering itself to be beaten by one faction after having been beaten by another. It was obvious, in short, that he would not identify himself with its measures. He even conducted himself in such a manner as to prove that, though determined to oppose the return of royalty, he was by no means willing to undertake for the responsibility of the revolution and its acts. The anniversary of the 21st of January was at hand; it was considered necessary to sound him as to whether he would undertake to appear at the fête, which was about to be celebrated for the fifth time. He had arrived in Paris in December, 1797. The year 1798 was commencing (Nivôse and Pluviôse, year VI.). He would not attend the ceremony, as if he had disapproved of the act that was celebrated, or as if he had wished to do something for those whom his proclamations of the 18th Fructidor, and the grape-shot slaughter of the 13th Vendémiaire, had alienated from him. It was intended that he should figure there under all his titles. Lately commander-in-chief of the army of Italy and plenipotentiary of France at Campo-Formio, he was now one of the plenipotentiaries to the congress of Rastadt, and general of the army of England; it was therefore obligatory upon him to be present at the solemnities of his government. He said that those were not distinctions that necessarily involved his figuring there, and that therefore, his presence being voluntary, would look like an assent which he was not prepared to give. The matter was compromised. The institute was to attend the ceremony in a body; he mingled in its ranks, and seemed to perform a duty imposed on him as a member. Among all the titles already heaped upon him, that of member of the institute was certainly the most convenient, and he contrived to make a good use of it.

Rising power is soon discerned. A number of sycophants and flatterers already surrounded Bonaparte; they asked him whether he would always confine himself to the command of armies, and whether he would not at length take that part in the government of affairs which his ascendancy and his political genius entitled him. Without yet being fully aware of what he had the power of doing, and what he ought to be, he saw plainly enough that he was the first man of his time. On observing the influence of Pichegru in the five hundred, and that of Barras in the directory, he might well consider that he could play an important political part; but at that time he had none to perform. He was too young to be a director; he must be forty years old before he could be a director, and he was not yet thirty. Certainly there was some talk of a dispensation in regard to age, but this was a concession to be obtained which would alarm the republicans, would make them raise a great outcry, and certainly would not compensate for the annoyances that it would bring upon him. To be associated, as a fifth member, in the government, to have nothing but a bare vote in the directory, to wear himself out in contesting with the councils, who were as yet independent, was by no means a part he would be desirous of acting; and it was not for such a purpose worth while to dispense with the law. France had yet a powerful enemy to combat, England; and though Bonaparte was covered with glory, it was better for him to go and gather fresh laurels, and to leave the government to waste its strength still further in its arduous struggle with the various parties.

We have seen that on the very day that the signature of the treaty of Campo-Formio was known in Paris, the directory, with a view to excite the public mind against England, immediately created an army, called the army of England, and gave the command to general Bonaparte. The government considered frankly and sincerely of going the shortest way to attack England, and purposed to make an invasion in that country. The hardy mode of thinking at this period caused such an enterprise to be considered as extremely practicable. The expedition already experimented in Ireland showed that it was possible to cross over under cover of a fog or a gale of wind. The general belief was, that with all its patriotic feelings, the English nation, which had not yet got together sufficient land forces for its protection, could not be able to withstand the admirable soldiers of Italy and of the Rhine, and above all, the genius of the conqueror of Castiglione, Arcola, and Rivoli. The government did not intend to leave more than twenty-five thousand men in Italy, all the rest were brought back into the interior. As for the grand army of Germany, composed of the two armies of the Rhine and of the Sambre and Meuse, it meant to reduce that to a force no more than enough for overawing the empire during the congress of Rastadt, and to move off the rest towards the sea-coasts. The same course was to be taken with all the troops remaining undisposed of. The generals of engineers inspected the coasts, to select the best points for making the descent; orders were given to collect considerable flotillas in the ports; and a great spur was imparted to the naval department. Every one was still waiting for a gale that would at length drive off the English squadron, that was blockading the harbour of Cadiz, so that then the Spanish fleet would be able to come out and join that of France. As for the Dutch fleet, which the French government had flattered itself with the prospect of uniting with its own, it had just sustained a severe loss within sight of the Texel, and its wrecks only had returned to the ports of Holland. But the Spanish and French fleet would be sufficient to convoy the passage of a flotilla, and to ensure the transport of sixty or eighty thousand men to England. To second all these preparations, care had been taken to provide additional means of finance. The budget, fixed, as we have seen, at six hundred and sixteen millions for the year VI., was inadequate to an extraordinary armament. It was desirable to obtain the concurrence of commercial men in an enterprise most favourable to their interests, and therefore government proposed a voluntary loan of eighty millions. It was to be secured upon the state. Part of the profits of the expedition were to be converted into premiums, for which lots were to be drawn by the subscribers. The directory, through the medium of the principal merchants, applied to open the loan. The plan was submitted to the legislative body, and from the first it appeared to gain credit. Subscriptions to the amount of fifteen or twenty millions were received. The directory exerted not only all its efforts, but all its severity against England. A law prohibited the introduction of English goods; this law authorized the usage of domiciliary visits to discover them, and caused them to be carried into effect throughout all France on the same day, and at the same hour*.

Bonaparte seemed to forward and approve this great movement, but at bottom he had no great inclination for the design. To march to London, to gain an entrance there, and to get sixty thousand men into England, did not appear to him the most difficult part of the affair. But he was sensible that to conquer the country, and to establish himself there would be impracticable; that all he could do would be to ravage it, despoil it of part of its wealth, retard its improvements, and render it a mere cypher for half a century; but that he must necessarily sacrifice the army he should have brought over, and return almost alone after a sort of barbarian incursion. At a later period, with a more extended power, with greater experience of his means, with a strong personal feeling against England, he thought seriously of engaging her hand to hand, and staking his fortune against hers; but at this time he had different ideas and other designs. One reason in particular diverted him from this enterprise. The preparations that were making would take several months more; the fine weather was approaching, and it would be necessary to wait for the fogs and the storms of the ensuing winter, in order to attempt a landing. Now, he had no desire to remain a year idle in Paris, making no addition to his great exploits, and sinking in public opinion for the sole reason that he was not rising in it. He therefore contemplated a plan of a different kind, a plan quite as gigantic as the invasion of England, but more original, more extensive in its consequences, more in conformity with his imagination, and above all, sooner accomplished. We have seen that in Italy he turned his particular attention to the Mediterranean; that he had created a sort of navy there; that in the partition of the Venetian states, he had taken care to reserve the Ionian islands for France; that he had been forming intrigues in Malta, in the hope of depriving the knights and the English of that island; that finally, he had frequently turned his attention to Egypt, as the intermediate point that France should occupy between Europe and Asia, to ensure herself either the commerce of the Levant or India. This idea had taken possession of his imagination, and wholly engrossed it. There were in the foreign office some valuable documents concerning Egypt, throwing considerable light on its colonial, maritime, and military importance; these were, at his request, sent him by M. de Talleyrand, and he set about reading them as if he would have devoured them. Compelled to make a tour round the sea-coasts for the purposes of the design against England, he filled his carriage with travels in and memoirs concerning Egypt. Thus, while apparently acting in obedience to the commands of the directory, he was contemplating quite a different enterprise; his person was on the level shores and beneath the sky of ancient Batavia, while his imagination was roaming on the shores of the East. He had a glimmering of confused and great forthcoming events. To penetrate into those countries of light and glory, where Alexander and Mahomet had conquered and founded empires, to make them ring with his name, and to have it sent back to France repeated by the echoes of Asia, was for him a most ravishing prospect.

* The 15th Nivôse, year VI. (4th January, 1798.)

He set about, therefore, his inspection of the coasts, during the months of Pluviose and Ventôse (January and February, 1798), making valuable notes in respect of the preparations for invasion, but wholly occupied by other thoughts and other designs.

While the republic was turning all her forces against England, she had still important interests to look after on the continent. Her political labours in that quarter were immense. She had to treat with the empire at Rastadt, that is, with feudality itself; she had to train up three republics, her political daughters, in the way they should go, the Batavian, the Cisalpine, and the Ligurian republics. Placed at the head of the democratic system, and confronted with the feudal system, she had to prevent collisions between these systems, that she might not have to recommence the struggle which she had just then so gloriously terminated, but which had cost her such dreadful efforts. Such was her task, and it scarcely presented less difficulties than the attack and destruction of England.

The congress of Rastadt had been assembled for the last two months. Bonnier, a very intelligent man, and Treilhard, an upright but coarse man, were the representatives of France. Bonaparte, in the few days he spent at the congress, had secretly settled with Austria the arrangements necessary for the occupation of Mentz and the tête de pont of Mannheim. It had been settled that the Austrian troops should retire on the approach of the French troops, and leave the troops of the empire to themselves; the French troops were then to take possession of Mentz, and the tête de pont of Mannheim, either by intimidating the troops of the empire, when left to themselves, or by a prompt and bold assault. This was accordingly done. The troops of the elector, finding themselves abandoned by those of Austria, surrendered Mentz. Those who were at the tête de pont of Mannheim made a show of defence, but were obliged to give in. Several hundred men, however, were sacrificed. It was plain enough from these two events, that Austria had, by the secret articles of the treaty of Campo-Formio, recognised the right of the republic to the line of the Rhine, since she consented to guarantee her the two most important points. It was further agreed, that during the negotiations, the French army should quit the right bank of the Rhine, and return to the left bank, from Bâle to Mentz, so that from this point the French army might continue to occupy the right bank, but by keeping along and without crossing the Maine. As for the Austrian armies, they were to retire beyond the Danube, and as far as the Lech, and to evacuate the fortresses of Ulm, Ingolstadt, and Philipshurg. Their position with respect to the empire would be nearly the same as that of the French armies. The deputation of the empire would thus have to deliberate between a double line of soldiers. Austria did not fairly carry out the secret articles, for, under colour of a deception, she left garrisons in Philipshurg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt. France winked at this infraction of the treaty, for the purpose of not disturbing the good understanding that existed. The next point was, that each party was to send ambassadors. Austria replied, that for the present the two powers might content themselves with corresponding through the ministers whom the powers had at the congress of Rastadt. This was not showing any great anxiety to renew amicable relations with France; but after her defeats and humiliations, this last exhibition of ill temper might be accounted for and passed over.

The first explanations between the deputation of the empire and the ministers of Austria were warm. In fact, the states of the empire complained that Austria had been art and part in stripping them of their possessions by recognising the right of the republic to the line of the Rhine, and perfidiously surrendering Mentz and the tête de pont of Mannheim. They complained also that Austria, after involving the empire in her quarrel, had left her to shift for herself, and was bartering away her provinces in order to get possessions in Italy in exchange. The ministers of the emperor replied that he had been involved in the war in respect of the interests of the empire, and for the defence of the princes who had possessions in Alsatia; that after taking up arms on their behalf, he had made extraordinary efforts for six consecutive years; that he had found himself successively abandoned by all the states of the confederation; that he had almost single-handed sustained the whole burden of the war; that he had lost in this conflict part of his dominions, and especially the rich provinces of Belgium and Lombardy; that after such efforts, which had cost him so much, he expected gratitude, and not to be subjected to complaints. The truth was, that the emperor had made use of the name of the princes having possessions in Alsatia as a pretext for making war; that he had carried it on for his own ambitious purposes; that he had hurried the Germanic confederation into it against their inclination; and that now he was betraying them, in order to indemnify himself at their expense. After some warm explanations, which came to nothing, they were obliged to proceed, and occupy themselves with settling the basis of the negotiations. The French wanted the left bank of the Rhine, and proposed the expedient of disannexation from the Church, in order to indemnify the princes dispossessed of their dominions. Austria, who, not content with having acquired the greater part of the Venetian territory, wanted to indemnify herself still further with a few bishoprics, and who, moreover, had secret conventions with France; Prussia, who had agreed with France to indemnify herself on the right bank for the duchy of Cleves, which she had lost on the left bank; the dispossessed princes, who desired rather to acquire states on the right bank, protected from the neighbourhood of the French, than to recover their old principalities,—Austria, Prussia, and the dispossessed princes, all voted alike for ceding the line of the Rhine, and for recurring to disannexations from the Church as a means of indemnity. The empire could then scarcely defend itself against such a concurrence of determinations. However, the powers given to the deputation making the entirety of the Germanic empire an express condition, the French plenipotentiaries declared these powers too limited and insufficient, and required others. The deputation required fresh powers from the diet; but although from that time the deputation had the power of ceding the line of the Rhine and renouncing the left bank, it nevertheless persisted in opposing this concession. The deputation alleged many reasons, for reasons can always be found. The Germanic empire, said the deputation, had not been the first to declare war. Long before the diet of Ratisbon had proclaimed war, Custine had surprised Mentz and overrun Franconia. The Germanic empire had therefore done no more than act in self-defence. The loss of part of its territory would overthrow its constitution and compromise its existence, which was a matter that concerned all Europe. The provinces on the left bank, of which it was proposed to deprive the Germanic empire, were of very little consequence to a state that had become so extensive as the French republic. Some other military line, the Moselle, for instance, might be substituted for the line of the Rhine. Lastly, the republic was renouncing, for very paltry advantages, a glory that was so splendid, so pure, and so advantageous for her, the credit of political moderation. Consequently, the deputation proposed to abandon all that the empire had possessed beyond the Moselle, and to take that river for the boundary line. France had a good reply to make to all this. Certain it was that she had taken the offensive, and in point of fact begun the war; but the actual war, the war of intention, of plottings, and of preparations, had been commenced by the empire. It was at Trèves and at Coblenz that the emigrants had been collected and organized; it was from those places that the phalanxes commissioned to humble, to brutalise, to dismember France, were to come. France, instead of being vanquished, came off victorious; she availed herself of her position, not to render evil for all the evil others had intended to do her, but to indemnify herself for the war which had been made upon her for demanding her true natural boundary, the line of the Rhine.

They therefore went on disputing; for concessions, even when they can no longer be withheld, are yet contested. But it was evident that the deputation was about to cede the left bank, and that it made this opposition merely to obtain better terms on other disputed points. Such was the state of the negotiations at Rastadt in the month of Pluviôse, year VI. (February, 1798.)

Augereau, to whom the directory, in order to get rid of him, had given the command of the army of Germany, had surrounded himself with the most outrageous Jacobins. He could not fail to give umbrage to the empire, which particularly dreaded the contagion of the new principles, and complained of the inflammatory publications circulated in Germany. So many heads in Europe were in a ferment, that there was no necessity for assuming French interference to account for the circulation of revolutionary writings. But it was of consequence to the directory to obviate all complaints; besides, it was dissatisfied with the turbulent conduct of Augereau; the directory deprived him of his command, and sent him to Perpignan, upon pretext of collecting there an army intended, so it was said, to be sent against Portugal. That court had, at the instigation of Filt, not ratified the treaty concluded with the republic, and France threatened to inflict a blow on her as an ally of England. At any rate this was but an empty demonstration, and the commission given to Augereau was a concealed disgrace.

France, in addition to the direct relations which she began to renew with the powers of Europe, had, as we have observed, to regulate the new republics. They were naturally agitated by contrary parties. It was the duty of France to spare them the convulsions by which she had herself been torn. Besides, it was for this that she had been appealed to and paid. She had armies in Holland, in the Cisalpine, and in Liguria, maintained at the expense of these republics. If, in order to avoid the appearance of interfering with their independence, she were to leave them to themselves, there would either be a counter-revolution or an outburst of Jacobinism to be apprehended. In the one case, the republican system would be jeopardised; in the other, the maintenance of the general peace would be hazarded. The Jacobins once having obtained the mastery in Holland, might alienate Prussia and Germany; if they made themselves masters in Liguria and the Cisalpine, they had the power of convulsing Italy and summoning Austria once more to the struggle. It was requisite, therefore, to moderate the course of these republics, but in so doing, the government exposed itself to another inconvenience. Europe complained that France had made the Dutch, the Cisalpines, and the Genoese, subjects rather than allies, and reproached her with having a view to universal dominion. It was expedient, therefore, to choose agents who had precisely the shade of opinion adapted to the country in which they were to reside, and who had tact enough to make the power of France felt without suffering it to be openly perceptible. There were, as we see, all sorts of difficulties to be overcome, in order to keep in existence, and that without collision, the two systems which had of late been arrayed one against the other in Europe. We have seen them at war for six years; we are now about to see them during a year of negotiation, and that year will go to prove, more than the war itself, their natural antipathy.

We have already described the different parties that divided Holland. The moderate and prudent party, that desired an uniform and temperate con-

1798.
Feb.
(Pluviose.)

Conduct of the French in Holland, which is revolutionized.

THE DIRECTORY.

Disturbances in the Italian republics.

771

stitution, had to contend with the Orangists, the creatures of the stadtholder; the federalists, the partisans of the old provincial divisions, aspiring to universal domination in their provinces, and willing to submit to nothing else than a weak federal bond; and lastly, the democrats, or Jacobins, wanting unity and pure democracy. The directory would naturally support the first party, opposed, as it was, to the other three, because it was solicitous, without going into any of the contrary extremes, to reconcile the old federative system with a sufficient centralization of the government. The directory has been frequently accused of wishing to establish every where the republic one and indivisible, and people in general have argued very unfairly concerning its system in this particular. The republic one and indivisible, conceived in 1793, would have been a subtle idea, if it had not been the offspring of a mighty instinct. A state so consistent in all its parts, and founded on so solid a basis as France, could not admit the federal system. A state so threatened as France, would have been undone by admitting it. It was not adapted either to its geographical position, or to its political situation. To have attempted to introduce unity and indivisibility every where in the same degree as in France, would certainly have been absurd; but the directory, placed at the head of a new system, obliged to create powerful allies for itself, would naturally seek to give strength and consistence to its new allies, and there is no strength or consistence without a certain degree of concentration and unity. Such was the conception, or more correctly speaking the instinct, which directed and could not help directing, almost unknown to themselves, the heads of the French republic.

Holland, with its former federative system, would have been reduced to complete impotence. Its national assembly had not yet been able to give it a constitution. It was still subjected to all the regulations of the ancient states of Holland; federalism there reigned supreme; the advocates of unity and of a limited constitution demanded the abolition of these regulations, and the speedy establishment of a constitution. The envoy Noel was accused of favouring the federalists. France could no longer delay declaring herself; she sent Joubert, one of Bonaparte's lieutenants in Italy, subsequently celebrated for his march into the Tyrol, a modest, disinterested, and brave man, also a warm patriot, to command the army of Holland. Delacroix, formerly minister for foreign affairs, was substituted for Noel; a better choice might certainly have been made. The directory unfortunately was deficient in persons versed in diplomatic knowledge. There were certainly among the members of the past or present assemblies many well-informed and distinguished men, but these men were not conversant with diplomatic forms. They were dogmatic and supercilious; and it was difficult to find among them persons combining firmness of principles with an habitual deference to forms; and this it was absolutely necessary our envoys to foreign countries should possess, the better to enforce respect for our principles, and conciliate the prejudices of antiquated Europe. Delacroix, on his arrival in Holland, attended a banquet given by the diplomatic committee. All the foreign ministers were invited. After having used in their presence the most democratic language, Delacroix, glass in hand, exclaimed, "How is it there is not a Batavian who will dare to despatch the ordinance on the altar of the country?" It is easy to conceive what an effect such sallies as these must produce on foreigners. It was not long, in fact, before the ordinance was despatched. Forty-three deputies had already protested against the operations of the national assembly. They met on the 3rd Pluviose (January 22nd, 1798), at the hotel of Haardem, and there, supported by our troops, they adopted the same line of proceeding as had been taken at Paris four months previous, on the 18th Fructidor. They excluded from the national assembly a certain number of suspected deputies, put some of them into confinement, abolished the ordinance, and organized the assembly into a kind of convention. In a few days, a constitution closely resembling that of France was framed and put in force. From a desire to imitate the convention, the new leaders composed the government of the members of the existing assembly, and constituted themselves into a directory and legislative body. The persons who come forward to effect movements of this kind are always the most decided of their party. It was to be feared that the new Batavian government would be strongly impressed with democracy, and that, under the influence of an ambassador like Delacroix, it would overstep the limits which the directory would have wished to have marked out for it. This kind of 18th Fructidor in Holland did not fail to cause the remark to be made by the members of the European diplomacy, and of Prussia in particular, that France governed Holland, and that her influence in fact extended to the Texel.

The Ligurian republic went on very well, although secretly disquieted like all new states, by two equally intemperate parties. As for the Cisalpine, it was a prey to the most vehement passions. The spirit of locality divided the Cisalpines, who belonged to old states successively dismembered by Bonaparte. Besides this spirit of locality, the agents of Austria, the nobles, the priests, and the furious democrats, violently agitated the new republic. But the democrats were the most dangerous, because they had a powerful support in the army of Italy, composed, as we have seen, of the most fiery patriots in France. The directory had as much ado to direct the spirit of these armies in foreign countries as that of its ministers, and in this particular it had as many difficulties to surmount as in every other. As yet there was no minister to the new republic. It was Berthier who, as commander-in-chief, had hitherto represented the French government. It now became necessary to regulate by a treaty of alliance the relations of the new republic with the mother state. This treaty was prepared in Paris, and sent for the ratification of the councils. The two republics formed an alliance offensive and defensive for all cases; and till the Cisalpine should have a military establishment, France was to grant the assistance of twenty-five thousand men on the following conditions. The Cisalpine was to provide buildings for barracks, hospitals, and magazines, and ten millions per annum for the subsistence of the twenty-five thousand men. In case of war, she was to furnish an extraordinary subsidy. France gave up to the Cisalpine great part of the artillery taken from the ency to strengthen her fortresses. These conditions were not exorbitant; yet many of the Cisalpine deputies in the council of the ancients, who were unfavourably disposed towards the republican system and France, pretended that this treaty was too burdensome, that undue advantage was taken of the dependence in which the new state was placed, and they rejected the treaty. In this there was evidently a manifestation of bitter feeling. Bonaparte, obliged to select the persons composing the councils and the government, had not been able to ascertain the sentiments of them all, and it became necessary to remodel them. The existing councils, nominated according to martial law by Bonaparte, were remodelled in martial fashion by Berthier. The latter removed some of the most obstinate members, and then submitted the treaty, which was immediately accepted. It was unfortunate that the hand of France was necessarily visible in this, for Austria instantly asserted that, notwithstanding all the promises made at Campo-Formio, the Cisalpine was not an independent republic, but evidently a French province. Austria raised difficulties concerning the admission of Marescalchi, the minister accredited at her court by the Cisalpine.

The territory formed by France and the new republics dovetailed with yet feudal Europe in a most dangerous manner for the peace of both systems. Switzerland, still entirely feudal, though republican, was encircled by France, by Savoy which had become a French province, and by the Cisalpine. Piedmont, with whom France had contracted an alliance, was surrounded by France, Savoy, the Cisalpine, and the Ligurian. The Cisalpine and Ligurian surrounded the Parmesan and Tuscany, and might communicate the contagion of their principles to Rome and Naples. The directory had recommended their agents to adopt the greatest reserve, and had forbidden them to hold out any hopes to the democrats. Guin-géné in Piedmont, Cacault in Tuscany, Joseph Bonaparte at Rome, and Trouvé at Naples, had express orders to testify the most amicable inclinations towards the princes in whose capitals they resided. They were to assure them that the directory had no intention whatever to propagate revolutionary principles, that it would content itself with maintaining the republican system where it was already established, but that it would take no steps to extend it to powers who kept good faith with France. The intentions of the directory were founded in good faith and discretion. It certainly was desirous that the revolution should progress, but its movements were no longer to be advanced by arms. The directory was determined, in case the revolution should break out in fresh states, that there should be no occasion to reproach France with an active participation therein. Besides, Italy was full of princes, the relations or allies of the great powers, whom it was impossible to injure without running the risk of the most determined hostilities. Austria would not fail to interfere in behalf of Tuscany, of Naples, and perhaps of Piedmont; Spain would certainly interfere on account of the prince of Parma. It was requisite therefore to make a point, if new events should break out, that we should not identify ourselves with them.

Such were the instructions of the directory; but the passions are not to be governed, and especially the passion for liberty. Could France prevent the French, Ligurian, and Cisalpine democrats from corresponding with the Piedmontese, Tuscan, Roman, and Neapolitan democrats, and from communicating to them the warmth of their opinions, their encouragement, and their hopes? They told them that policy forbade the French government to interfere ostensibly in the revolutions which were every where in preparation, but that it would protect them when these revolutions were once effected; that they must have the courage to attempt them, and that relief would immediately be afforded.

Agitation pervaded all the Italian states. Arrests were multiplied there, and our accredited ministers confined themselves to the duty of occasionally claiming the persons unjustly imprisoned. In Piedmont, the apprehensions were numerous, but the intercession of France was frequently successful. In Tuscany, great moderation prevailed. At Naples there was a class of men who identified themselves with the new opinions; but a court equally malicious and senseless combated those opinions by imprisonment and punishments. Our ambassador Trouvé, was overwhelmed with humiliations. He was shunned, like one infected with the plague. The Neapolitans were forbidden to visit him. He had even found great difficulty in procuring a physician for himself. Those who were accused of having had communication with the French legation, and who wore their hair cropped and unpowdered, were thrown into prison. The letters of the French ambassador were seized, opened, and kept by the Neapolitan police for ten or twelve days. Frenchmen had been assassinated. Even when Bonaparte was in Italy, he had great difficulty in restraining the fury of the court of Naples; and now that he was no longer there, it is easy to conceive what it must have been capable of doing. The French government was strong enough to punish it severely for its wrongs; but to avoid disturbing the general tranquillity, it had directed Trouvé, its minister, to observe the utmost moderation, to confine himself to remonstrances, and to strive to bring the Neapolitan court to reason.

The government, whose ruin was nearest at hand, was the Papal government. This was not for want of defending itself; it ordered arrests also; but an aged pope, whose pride was humbled, and aged incompetent cardinals, could scarcely uphold a state tottering on all sides. Already, at the suggestion of the Cisalpines, the March of Ancona had revolted, and formed itself into the Anconitan republic. From this quarter the democrats excited rebellion throughout the whole of the Roman states. They had indeed no great number of partisans there, but they were strongly seconded by the public discontent. The Papal government had lost that splendour which dazzled the eyes of the people, since the levies imposed at Tolentino had obliged it to give up even the valuable movables and the precious stones belonging to the holy see. The new taxes, the creation of paper-money, which had diminished in more than two-thirds of its value, and the alienation of one-fifth of the property of the clergy, had made all classes dissatisfied, including the ecclesiastics themselves. The grandees of Rome, who were not deficient in the intelligence generally diffused throughout Europe during the eighteenth century, uttered loud murmurs against a feeble, paltering government, and said that it was high time the temporal rule of the Roman states should be transferred from the hands of ignorant, incapable monks, unacquainted with worldly affairs, to those who were true citizens, experienced in the business of life and knowledge of the world. Thus the inclinations of the Roman people were by no means favourable to the pope. However, the democrats were far from numerous; they were obnoxious to great prejudices with respect to religion, to which they were supposed hostile. The French artists at Rome considerably excited the Romans; but Joseph Bonaparte strove to repress them, saying that they were not strong enough to attempt a decisive movement; that they would ruin themselves and compromise France to no purpose; that at any rate she would not support them, but leave them exposed to the consequences of their imprudence.

On the 6th Nivôse (December 26th, 1797), they came to apprise him that a movement would take place. He sent them away, charging them to keep quiet, but they did not believe the French minister meant what he said. The system of all the undertakers of revolutions was to dare every thing, and to enlist France in their cause even against her will. They accordingly assembled on the 8th Nivôse (December 28th), for the purpose of attempting a movement. Dispersed by the pope's dragoons, they sought refuge in the jurisdiction of the French ambassador, and under the piazza of the Corsini palace where he resided. Joseph hurried thither with some French military, and among them general Duphot, a very distinguished young officer of the army of Italy. He wanted to interpose between the Papal troops and the insurgents, in order to prevent a massacre. But the Papal troops, without attending to the ambassador, fired and killed the unfortunate Duphot by his side. This young man was engaged in marriage to a sister-in-law of Joseph. His death produced an extraordinary commotion. Several foreign ambassadors, particularly the Spanish minister, d'Azara, hastened to Joseph's residence. The Roman government alone let fourteen hours pass by without sending to the minister of France, though he had written to him repeatedly during the day. Joseph indignantly demanded passports forthwith; they were given to him, and he set out immediately for Tuscany.

This event produced a great sensation. It was clear enough that the Roman government could have prevented this commotion, of which it had received information two days previous; but that its object was to suffer it to break out, for the purpose of inflicting severe chastisement on the democrats; and that in the tumult it had not taken care to adopt such precautions as to prevent a violation of the law of nations, and an outrage upon the French legation. In the Cisalpine and with all the Italian patriots, great indignation was immediately manifested against the Roman government. The army of Italy loudly shouted their desire for a march to Rome.

The directory was extremely embarrassed; they looked upon the pope as the spiritual head of the party opposed to the revolution. The directory felt strongly tempted to destroy the pontiff of that antiquated and tyrannical Christian religion, in spite of the danger of offending the powers and provoking their interference. But whatsoever might be the inconveniences of a hostile determination, the revolutionary passions triumphed on this occasion, and the directory ordered general Berthier, who commanded in Italy, to march against Rome. The directory hoped that as the pope was neither the kinsman or ally of any one court, his fall would not excite any powerful interference.

All the republicans and advocates of philosophy were in high glee. On the 22nd Pluviôse (February 10th, 1798), Berthier came in sight of the ancient capital of the world, as yet unvisited by the republican armies. Our soldiers paused for a moment to contemplate the old and magnificent city. The Spanish minister, d'Azara, the usual mediator of the Italian powers with France, hastened to the head-quarters to negotiate a convention. The castle of Saint-Angelo was delivered up to the French on the terms ordinarily accorded between civilized nations, to respect religion, the public establishments, persons, and property. The pope was left at the Vatican, and Berthier, introduced at the Porta di Popolo, was conducted to the capitol, like the Roman generals of old who triumphed over foreign enemies. The democrats, at the height of their ambition, assembled in the Campo-Vaccino, where they witnessed the remains of the ancient forum, and surrounded by a senseless rabble, ready to applaud all new events, proclaimed the Roman republic. A notary drew up an act by which the populace, who styled itself the Roman people, declared that it resumed its sovereignty and constituted itself a republic. The pope had been left alone at the Vatican. A message was sent to require at his hands the abdication of his temporal sovereignty, for there was no intention of meddling with his spiritual authority. He replied, at any rate, with dignity, that he could not divest himself of an inheritance not his own, but which had been transmitted to him from the apostles, and was only a trust in his hands. This theological course of reasoning had no force with our republican generals. The pope, treated with the respect due to his age, was removed during the night from the Vatican and taken into Tuscany, where he received an asylum in a convent. The Roman people seemed to feel little regret for this sovereign, who had nevertheless reigned more than twenty years.

Unfortunately, a series of excesses not only committed against persons but against property, reflected disgrace on the entry of the French into the ancient capital of the world. There was no longer at the head of the army that severe and inflexible commander, who, less from a feeling of probity than from a horror of disorder, had so severely punished pillagers. None other than Bonaparte could have restrained rapacity in so wealthy a country. Berthier had just left for Paris; Masséna had taken his place. This hero, to whom France will owe everlasting gratitude for having saved her at Zurich from apparently inevitable ruin, was accused of having been the first to set the example. It was soon followed. The palaces, the convents, and the rich collections were soon pillaged. Jews in the train of the army purchased at a low price the magnificent objects placed in their hands by the depredators. The spoliation was revolting. The truth must be told; it was neither the subaltern officers or the soldiers who indulged in these excesses, it was the superior officers. All the articles they took away, and over which they could exercise rights of conquest, ought to have been collected in a repository, and sold for the benefit of the army, who had not received pay for five months. The army had come from the Cisalpine, the defective financial organization of which had hitherto prevented it from paying the subsidy agreed upon by our treaty. The soldiers and the inferior officers were in the most deplorable state of destitution; they were indignant at seeing their chief clogged with spoils, and compromising the glory of the French name, without imparting the slightest advantage to the army. A mutiny broke out against Masséna. The officers assembled in a church, and declared that they would no longer obey him. Part of the population, unfavourably disposed towards the French, prepared to seize the moment of this misunderstanding to attempt a movement. Masséna withdrew the army from Rome, leaving a garrison in the castle of Saint-Angelo. The danger put an end to the mutiny, but the officers persisted in keeping together, and demanding the punishment of the plunderers, and the recall of Masséna.

We observe that to the difficulty of rendering the proceedings of the new republics less violent, and of choosing and directing our agents, was added that of keeping the armies in order, and all this at immense distances for means of official communication. The directory recalled Masséna, and sent a commission to Rome composed of four upright men of superior intelligence, to organize the new republic. These were Daunou, Monge, Florent, and Faypoult. The latter, an able and honest public officer, had charge of every thing relating to the finances. The army of Italy was divided in two; that which had just dethroned the pope was called the army of Rome.

The next thing was to explain the causes of the new revolution to the foreign powers. Spain, whose piety might have occasioned some apprehension, but who was under French influence, was perfectly silent. But self-interest is less likely to hear reason than even religious zeal. So the two most discontented courts were those of Vienna and Naples. The court of Vienna saw with concern the spread of French influence in Italy. In order not to aggravate her grievances, it was resolved not to consolidate the new republic with the Cisalpine. It was therefore constituted individually. To have united both of them, would too suddenly have roused the idea of Italian unity, and given credence to the plan for democratising all Italy. Although the emperor had as yet no minister at Paris, Bernadotte was despatched to give him explanations, and to be resident at Vienna. As for the court of Naples, its rage was extreme at witnessing the revolution brought to its doors. Naples demanded nothing less than two or three Roman provinces as the price of appeasing her anger. She particularly wanted the duchy of Benevento and the territory of Ponte-Corvo, which were situated most conveniently at hand. Garat was sent to Naples to come to an understanding with that court; and Trouvé was appointed for the Cisalpine.

The revolution was thus making unrestricted and much more rapid strides than the directory could have wished. We have already named a country whither it threatened to introduce itself, and this was Switzerland. It seems that Switzerland, that ancient abode of liberty and of simple and pastoral manners, had nothing to receive from France, and was the sole state that had no revolution to undergo; yet though the thirteen cantons were governed by republican forms, it was by no means a necessary consequence that equity should prevail in the mutual relations of these petty republics, and especially in their relations with their subjects. Feudalism, which is nothing else than the military hierarchy, existed among these republics, and there were people dependent on other people, as a vassal upon his sovereign lord, and groaning under a yoke of iron. The Aargau and the canton of Vaud were dependent on the aristocracy of Berne; the Lower Valais on the Upper Valais; the Italian bailiwicks, that is, the valleys sloping towards Italy, on various cantons. There were, moreover, a vast number of petty corporations (communes) dependent on certain towns. The canton of Saint-Gall was under the feudal domination of a convent. All the subject countries were only become so by force of the conditions contained in charters consigned to oblivion, and which it was forbidden to bring forth to light. The whole extent of country was almost every where holden of the towns as superior lords, and subject to the most odious monopolies; and no where was the tyranny of trade corporations so oppressive. In every department of government, the aristocracy had gradually possessed itself of the entire power. At Berne, the principal of these petty states, a few families had seized the supreme authority, and excluded all others from it for ever; they had their golden book (livre d'or), in which the names of all the ruling families were inscribed. Manners frequently temper the severity of the laws, but it was not so here. These aristocracies revenged themselves with a malicious acrimony peculiar to petty states. Berne, Zurich, Geneva, had frequently, and very recently too, exhibited the spectacle of [political] executions. Throughout all Europe there were scattered Swiss, who were either banished, or who had withdrawn themselves by voluntary exile from aristocratic vengeance. At any rate, ill united to one another, the thirteen cantons had lost their importance; they were brought so low as to be unable to defend their liberty. From that feeling of bad brotherhood so common in federative states, almost all of them in their bickerings had recourse to the neighbouring powers, and had particular treaties, some with Austria, others with Piedmont, and others again with France. Switzerland, therefore, was nought else than a glorious association and an admirable soil; in a political point of view, she presented nothing else than a continuity of petty and humiliating tyrannies.

Hence it may well be conceived the effect produced by the example of the French revolution in its bosom. At Zurich, Bâle, and Geneva, the greatest agitation prevailed. In this latter city, in particular, the disturbances had not been unaccompanied with bloodshed. Throughout the whole French part, and especially in the Pays de Vaud, revolutionary sentiments had made great progress. The Swiss aristocrats, on their part, had not omitted any bad office they could render to France, and had made it their business to displease her as much as they could without provoking her omnipotence. The gentry of Berne had welcomed the emigrants, and rendered them all the services that lay in their power. It was in Switzerland that all the plots hatched against the republic were devised. The reader will recollect that it was at Bâle that Wickham, the English agent, guided all the threads of the counter-revolution. The directory therefore had reason to be highly displeased. The directory possessed one mode of revenging itself on Switzerland, and that was easy enough. The Vaudois, persecuted by the gentry of Berne, solicited the interference of France. When the duke of Savoy ceded them to Berne, France had undertaken to guarantee their rights by a treaty, dated in 1565*; that treaty had several times been appealed to and carried into execution by France. There was nothing extraordinary, therefore, in the interference of the directory, claimed on this occasion by the Vaudois. Besides, several of those petty dependent districts had foreign protectors.

We have seen with what enthusiasm the Vaudois received the liberator of the Valteline, when he passed through Switzerland, on his way from Milan to Rastadt. The Vaudois, buoyed up by hope, had sent deputies to Paris, and urgently insisted upon the protection of France. Their countryman, the brave and unfortunate Laharpe, had died for us in Italy, at the head of one of our divisions; they were subjected to the most horrible oppressions, and without any political reason, mere humanity would suffice to induce France to interfere. It was not to be understood how France, with her new principles, could decline the carrying out treaties conservative of the liberty of a neighbouring people, and executed even by the ancient monarchy. There was nothing but policy to prevent her, for it was giving a new alarm to Europe, especially at the very moment when the pontifical throne was crumbling to pieces at Rome. But France, who was endeavouring to avoid giving offence to Germany, Piedmont, Parma, Tuscany, and Naples, did not consider that the same circumspection should be adopted in respect to Switzerland; and was particularly desirous of establishing a government similar to her own in a country which was considered as the military key to all Europe. In this case, as in regard to Rome, the directory was drawn beyond the line of its cautious policy by a more absorbing interest. To get the Alps back into the hands of powers in amicable relation with ourselves, was an object quite as attractive as that of overthrowing the papacy.

Consequently, on the 8th Nivôse (December 28, 1797), the directory declared that it took the Vaudois under its protection, and that the members of the governments of Berne and Friburg should be answerable for the safety of their persons and property. General Menard, at the head of the division that was lately Masséna's, immediately recrossed the Alps, and encamped at Carouge, in sight of the Lake of Geneva. General Schawenburg ascended the Rhine with a division of the army of Germany, and stationed himself at Erguel, in the environs of Bâle. At this signal there was a burst of joy in the Pays de Vaud, in the bishopric of Bâle, and in the country of Zurich. The Vaudois thereupon immediately demanded their ancient states. Berne replied that it would receive individual petitions, but that there should be no assemblies of states, and required the renewal of the oath of allegiance. This was the signal for the Vaudois to rise. The bailiffs, whose tyranny was odious, were expelled, but beyond that received no ill-treatment: trees of liberty were every where planted, and in a few days the Pays de Vaud constituted itself into the Lemanic republic. The directory recognised it, and ordered general Menard to occupy it, at the same time notifying to the canton of Berne that its independence was guaranteed by France. In the mean time, a revolution was in progress at Bâle. Ochs, the tribune, a man of superior intelligence, a staunch advocate for revolutionary principles, and in close connexion with the French government, was the principal mover in it. The inhabitants of the country had been admitted with the citizens to form a kind of national convention, for the purpose of framing a constitution. Ochs was its originator; it was, with some trifling difference, not dissimilar to the French constitution, which at that time served as a model for all republican Europe. It was translated into the three languages, French, German, and Italian, and circulated in all the cantons, to excite their zeal. Mengaud, who was the French agent to the cantons, and who resided at Bâle, contributed to the impulsive movement. In Zurich, the rural population had revolted, and demanded their reinstatement to their rights.

In the mean time, the gentry of Berne had collected an army, and convoked a general diet at Aarau, to consider of the state of Switzerland, and to demand the federal contingent from each canton. They caused to be diffused among their German subjects a report that the French part of Switzerland wanted to separate itself from the confederation, and to unite itself with France; that religion was in danger; and that the atheists of Paris wished for her annihilation. Thus it was they caused to descend from the mountains of the Oberland a simple, ignorant, fanatic population, who were fully persuaded that their ancient religion was about to be attacked. They collected nearly twenty thousand men, divided into three divisions, stationed at Friburg, Morat, Buren, and Soleure, guarding the line of the Aar, and watching the French. In the mean time, that is to say, in Pluviôse (February, 1798), the diet assembled at Aarau was embarrassed, and knew not what course to pursue. Its presence did not prevent the inhabitants of Aarau from rising, planting the tree of liberty, and declaring themselves free. The Bernese troops entered Aarau, cut down the tree of liberty, and committed some excesses there. Mengaud, the agent, declared the people of Aarau under the protection of France.

The parties were thus confronting each other without being as yet in open war. France, called upon by the people whom she had promised to protect, covered them with her troops, and threatened to employ force, in case the least violence was offered them. On its own side, the Bernese aristocracy claimed the rights of sovereignty, and declared that she wished to live at peace with France, but to be restored to her dominions. Unfortunately for her, all the old governments were falling around her, either by their own acts or by violence offered them. Bâle had emancipated, so far as she was concerned, the Italian bailiwicks; the Upper Valais had emancipated the Lower Valais; Friburg, Soleure, and Saint-Gall were in a state of revolution. The Bernese aristocracy, finding itself pressed on all sides, made some concessions with a good grace, and admitted fifty persons from the country to share the privileges hitherto reserved for the ruling families; but it postponed all constitutional reform for a year. This was but an empty concession, which could do no good. A French flag of truce had been sent to the Bernese troops posted on the frontiers of the Pays de Vaud, to tell them that they would be attacked if they advanced. The bearer was assaulted, and two horsemen belonging to his escort were murdered. This circumstance decided the directory for war. Brune, appointed to the command, had some conferences at Paverne, but they came to nothing, and on the 12th Ventôse (March 2) the French troops set themselves in motion. General Schawenburg, with the division which had come from the Rhine and was stationed in the territory of Bâle, made himself master of Soleure and of the course of the Aar. Brune, with the division from Italy, made himself master of Friburg. General Erlach, who commanded the Bernese troops, retired into the strongholds of Fraubrunnen, Gmüden, Laupen, and Neueneck. These positions protect Berne on every side, whether the enemy debouch from Soleure or from Friburg. This retreating movement produced among the Bernese troops the usual effect of such a movement upon fanatic and undisciplined bands. They cried out that they were betrayed, and massacred their officers. Part of them dispersed. Erlach, however, had still about him some of those battalions, distinguished in all the armies of Europe by their discipline and their bravery, and a certain number of resolute peasants. On the 15th Ventôse (March 5), Brune, who was on the Friburg road, and Schawenburg on the Soleure road, made a simultaneous attack on the positions of the Swiss army. General Pigeon, who formed Brune's advanced guard, came to close quarters with the position of Neueneck. The Swiss made an heroic resistance, and favoured by the advantage of the ground, stopped the way to our veteran bands of Italy. But at the same moment, Schawenburg, who had come from Solothurn, took from Erlach the position of Fraubrunnen, and the city of Berne found itself left unprotected on one side. The retreat of the Swiss became compulsory, and they fell back in disorder upon Berne. The French found before the city a multitude of fanatic and desperate mountaineers. Women and old men came and threw themselves upon their bayonets. They were compelled to sacrifice with regret these unfortunate wretches, who thus to no purpose sought death. The French entered Berne. The people of the mountains upheld their ancient reputation for valour, but they behaved with the blind ferocity of the Spanish rabble. They again murdered their officers, and among them the unfortunate Erlach. Steiger, the celebrated chief magistrate (avoyer) of Berne, the head of the Bernese aristocracy, with difficulty escaped from the fury of the fanatics, and fled across the mountains of the Oberland to the petty cantons and from them into Bavaria.

* See Koch's Revolutions of Europe, forming a portion of the present Series of "Popular Library of Modern Authors," p. 92, col. 1. Trans.

The capture of Berne decided the submission of all the great Swiss cantons. Brune, called up, as our generals have so often been, to be the founder of a republic, thought of composing with the French part of Switzerland, the Lake of Geneva, the Pays de Vaud, part of the canton of Berne, and the Valais, a republic which should be styled the Rhodanie. But the Swiss patriots would not have required a revolution in their own country, but in the expectation of two great advantages: the abolition of every dependence of one people upon another people as superior lords, and the Helvetic unity. They wanted to see the abolition of all internal tyrannies, and to form themselves into one common power, by the establishment of a central government. They procured the concession that an individual republic should be founded out of all the parts of Switzerland. A meeting was convoked at Aarau, for the purpose of there proposing the constitution framed at Bâle. The directory despatched the ex-conventionalist Lecarlier, to conciliate the views of the Swiss, and to settle with them the establishment of a constitution which should be in accordance with their wishes. Some relics of opposition were getting up in the small mountain cantons of Uri, Glarus, Schwitz, and Zug. The priests and the defeated aristocrats persuaded these unfortunate mountaineers that the French were coming to outrage their religion, and annul their independence. They circulated, among other absurd reports, that as France was in want of soldiers to fight the English, she meant to press the robust youths of Switzerland, to put them on shipboard and send them forthwith to the British coasts.

The French, on entering Berne, seized the coffers of the government, which is the usual and the least contested consequence of the right of war, for all the public property of the vanquished government belongs to the victorious government. All these petty, economical, and avaricious states, possessed accumulated hoards. Berne had a small treasury, which has furnished all the enemies of France with a never-ending theme of reproach. It has been rated as high as thirty millions; it was no more than eight. It has been asserted that the sole object of France in making war was to possess herself of it, and to devote it to the Egyptian expedition, as if she could have supposed that the authorities of Berne would be so improvident as not to remove it, and as if it were possible that she should plunge into a war and defy the consequences of such an invasion, in order to gain eight millions [francs]. These absurdities will not bear the slightest examination*. A levy was imposed on the members of the old aristocracies of Berne, Friburg, Soleure, and Zurich, to supply the troops with pay and provisions.

It was near the end of the winter of 1798 (year VI.). Five months had scarcely elapsed since the treaty of Campo-Formio, and the situation of Europe was already strangely altered; the republican system was daily making fresh invasions: to the three republics previously founded by France were now to be added two new ones, created within two months. Europe every where resounded with the names of Batavian republic, Helvetic republic, Cisalpine republic, Ligurian republic, and Roman republic. Instead of three states, France had now the control of five. She was involved in a new complication of business, and had fresh explanations to give to the foreign powers. The directory found itself thus insensibly carried away with the stream. There is nothing more ambitious than a system; it conquers almost always of itself, and frequently even against the will of its originators.

* They are repeated by Madame de Staël and a whole tribe of authors.

While the directory was obliged to attend to external affairs, the elections afforded it cause for anxiety. Ever since the 18th Fructidor, there had remained in the councils only such deputies as the directory had voluntarily left in them, and on whom it could rely. They consisted of all those who had either desired or had yielded to the violent but necessary measures of that day. Six months of tolerable quiet between the executive power and the councils had elapsed, and the directory had employed them, as we have seen, in negotiations, in maritime projects, and in the creation of new states. Although there had been a great calm, it cannot be said that the union was perfect; two powers having opposite interests cannot long remain in perfect union with each other.

A new opposition was being formed, composed no longer of royalists but of patriots. The reader must have remarked that, after one party had been conquered, the government found itself compelled to enter into a conflict with the party who had assisted its operations, because the latter became too encroaching, and began in its turn to rebel. Since the 9th Thermidor, the epoch at which the factions become equal in strength, and had begun to be alternately defeated and victorious, the patriots had caused a reaction in Germinal and Prairial, and immediately after them, the royalists in Vendémiaire. Since Vendémiaire and the institution of the directory, the patriots had taken their turn, and had shown themselves the most audacious, till the rash attempt on the camp at Grenelle. Computing from that day the royalists had regained the ascendancy, they had lost it on the 18th Fructidor, and it was now for the patriots to raise their heads. To characterize this state of things, a word was devised, which we have seen make its appearance at a later period, that of see-saw (bascule). That was denominated a see saw system, which consists in alternately elevating either party. The directory was reproached with adopting this system, and thus being by turns the slave of that faction of whose services it availed itself. This reproach was unjust; for unless it take the helm of state with a victorious sword in its hand, no government can destroy all the parties at one blow, and govern without them, and independent of them. At every change of system, changes in the administration have to be made, and those naturally are summoned to its assistance who have manifested opinions in conformity with the system which has triumphed. All the members of the victorious party, giving the rein to their expectations, press forward in a body, beset the government, and are ready to attack it if it does not do all that they desire. All the patriots were stirring, and getting the support of the deputies who had voted with the directory in the councils. The directory had resisted many calls of this nature, but had been obliged to comply with some. Numerous patriots had been appointed commissioners in the departments (prefects). A shoal of others were preparing to seize the opportunity of the elections to gain an entry into the legislative body. The authorities recently nominated gave them a good opportunity for advancing themselves.

Besides the new opposition, composed of all the patriots who wished to make the 18th Fructidor serve their turn, another had formed, which styled itself constitutional. This opposition made its appearance anew; it pretended to have no bias either to the royalists or to the patriots; it affected independence, moderation, and attachment to the written law; it comprehended men who, without being carried down by the stream of party, had personal causes for discontent. Some had not been able to obtain an embassy, a step in promotion, or a contract for a relation; others had missed the place vacant in the directory by a few votes. Nothing is more common than this sort of discontent under a new government, recently established, composed of men who were but the other day in the station of mere citizens. It is said that hereditary office is a curb to ambition, and reasonably so if limited to places of a particular description. Nothing can equal the impatience displayed towards men who were yesterday your equals. You have helped to appoint them, or perhaps you feel that they are above you merely by the accident of a few votes; it seems as if you had a right to ask for and have every thing of them. The directory, without intending it, had made a great number of malcontents among the deputies who were formerly called directorialists, and whom their assistance afforded in Fructidor, had rendered it extremely difficult to satisfy. One of Bonaparte's brothers, Lucien, returned by Corsica to the five hundred, had ranged himself in this constitutional opposition, not that he had any reason for personal discontent, but because he affected to act the same part as his brother, and assumed the part of censor of the government. This was the attitude that seemed most consistent to a family that sought to dwell apart. Lucien was intelligent, and endowed with a remarkable talent for public oratory. He there showed off with great effect, surrounded as he was by the halo of his brother's glory. Joseph had returned to Paris ever since he left Rome; he there maintained great state, and received a great number of generals, deputies, and eminent persons. The two brothers, Joseph and Lucien, could thus do many things, from which good taste and his great reserve excluded the general.

However, if public opinion, which for six months past had been nearly uniform, now began to exhibit various shades, no striking difference was as yet perceptible; cautious behaviour and mutual respect prevailed in the councils, and every measure introduced by the directory was carried by immense majorities.

Every thing indicated that the elections of the year VI. would be in favour of the patriots. They now ruled supreme in France and in all the new republics. The directory had determined to employ all legal means to avoid being overrun with them. Its commissioners issued moderate circulars, which contained exhortations but no threats.

At any rate, the directory had not at its disposal any of those ascendancies or infamous tricks devised in our days for carrying elections as parties in power might please. In the elections of the year V. some assemblies were divided, and to avoid violence, a portion of the electors had gone and voted apart. This example was proposed in the electoral assemblies of this year; political schisms were very prevalent, and in almost every locality the electors in the minority alleged some infraction of the law, or some violence exercised towards them, as a pretext for assembling apart, and making their particular elections. It is right to observe, that in many departments the patriots comported themselves with their accustomed turbulence, and legally justified the withdrawal of their opponents. In some of the assemblies it was the patriots who were in a minority, and who seceded; but almost every where they had a majority, because the mass of the population, who was opposed to them, and who had thronged to the elections of the year V. and of the year VI., now intimidated by the 18th Fructidor, had, as it were, withdrawn from public affairs, and durst no longer take any part therein. In Paris, the agitation was very great; there were two assemblies, one at the Oratoire, composed entirely of patriots, and comprehending at least six hundred electors; the other at the Institute, composed of moderate republicans, and amounting to no more than two hundred and seventy-eight electors. The latter made an excellent selection.

The elections, in general, had been doubled. Already the malcontents, the lovers of novelty, those who, from all sorts of motives, wished to modify the existing order of things, cried, This will never do; after having got up an 18th Fructidor against the royalists, we shall be obliged to get up another against the patriots. Already they circulated reports that the constitution was about to be changed; a proposition to that effect was even made to the directory, who peremptorily rejected it.

Different courses had to be taken with regard to the elections. In acting upon strict principles, the councils must sanction the elections made by the majorities; otherwise the consequences would be that the minorities, by seceding, would have power of gaining the day, and carrying the nominations. Riots and illegal proceedings might be a reason for annulling the selection made by the majorities, but not for adopting the choice of the minorities. The patriots in the councils strongly maintained this opinion, because their party having shown a far greater number at almost all the assemblies, they would then have gained their point. But the mass of the two councils were by no means anxious to help them to gain their cause, and two expedients were proposed, either to choose between the nominations made by the seceding assemblies, or to make a new 18th Fructidor. This last measure was not to be thought of; the former was by far the milder and much more natural course. It was adopted. Almost every where the elections of the patriots were annulled, and those of their adversaries confirmed. The elections made in Paris, in the assembly of the Institute, though it contained only two hundred and twenty-eight electors, while that at the Oratoire comprehended six hundred, were approved of. In spite of this system, however, the new third brought an effectual reinforcement to the patriotic party in the two councils. That party was highly incensed at the expedient adopted for excluding the men of its choice, and became somewhat more impatient against the directory.

A new director had to be elected. The ballot designated François (of Neuf-château) as the member going out. He was succeeded by Treillard, one of our plenipotentiaries at Rastadt. Treillard entertained precisely the same opinions as Larévellière, Kewbell, and Merlin. He introduced no change in the spirit of the directory. He was an honest man, well acquainted with the forms of business. Thus there were in the government four sincere republicans, voting absolutely alike, and combining intelligence with integrity. Treillard was succeeded at Rastadt by Jean Debry, formerly a member of the legislature and of the national convention.

Since the parties had been obliged, by the establishment of the constitution of the year III. to struggle within the narrow space of a constitution, the scenes in the interior had attracted less notice. Since the 18th Fructidor, in particular, the tribune had lost much of its importance. Every body was intent upon what was doing abroad. The great influence of the republic in Europe, her singular and multiplied relations with foreign powers, her train of republics, the revolutions which she was every where effecting, her designs against England, solely absorbed public attention. How would France address herself to attack her rival, and strike her severe blows as she had already inflicted on Austria! Such was the question that people put to themselves. The public were so familiarized with hardy plans and extraordinary enterprises, that the crossing the channel seemed a mere matter of course. Friends and enemies of England alike conceived her to be in extreme jeopardy. She herself considered that she was seriously exposed, and made extraordinary efforts for defending herself. The whole world had its eyes fixed on the straits of Calais.

Bonaparte, whose thoughts were upon Egypt, in the same way he had two years previously thought of Italy, indeed in the mode in which he thought of every thing, that is, with irresistible impulse, had submitted his plan to the directory, who at this moment was engaged in discussing its practicability. Those great geniuses who have consulted the map of the world, have all turned their thoughts towards Egypt. We may mention three, Albuquerque, Leibnitz, and Bonaparte. Albuquerque had been impressed with the idea that the Portuguese, who had just opened a way to India by the Cape of Good Hope, might be stripped of that important commercial monopoly, if proper use were made of the Nile and the Red Sea. Thus he conceived the gigantic idea of diverting the course of the Nile, and bringing it into the Red Sea, so as to render that way for ever impracticable, and secure the India trade to the Portuguese for ever after. Vain foresight of genius, that would seek to create a perpetuity in a changeful and shifting world! Had Albuquerque's plan been successful, the benefit of his labours would have been reaped by the Dutch, and subsequently by the English. Under Louis XIV., the great Leibnitz, whose mind was most comprehensive, addressed a memorial to the French monarch, which is one of the most splendid monuments of political reasoning and eloquence. Louis XIV. had resolved, for the sake of earning a few medals, to invade Holland. "Sire," said Leibnitz, "it is not at home that you will be able to conquer those republicans; you will not cross their dikes, and you will have all Europe arrayed on their side. It is in Egypt where you must strike them. There it is that you will find the real track of the commerce of India; you will wrest that commerce from the Dutch, you will secure for ever the dominion of France in the Levant, you will rejoice all Christendom, you will fill the world with astonishment and admiration; and so far from leaguings against you, Europe will applaud your policy."

Such were the vast conceptions, neglected by Louis XIV., that absorbed the attention of the young republican general.

At a still later period, Egypt had been the subject of attention. M. de Choiseul had thought of occupying it when all the American colonies were in danger. It again became an object of consideration, when Joseph II. and Catherine threatened the Ottoman empire. Still more recently, M. Magallon, the French consul at Cairo, a man of superior abilities, and thoroughly acquainted with the state of Egypt and the east, had addressed memorials to the government, either to complain of the extortions practised by the Mamelukes upon French commerce, or to make the government sensible of the advantages that would accrue from the retaliations inflicted upon them. Bonaparte had surrounded himself with all these documents, and had formed his plan from their contents. Egypt was, in his opinion, the real point of correspondence between Europe and India; there was the place where France ought to establish herself in order to ruin England; from thence could a command be ensured over the Mediterranean, make it, to use one of his own expressions, a French lake; and either guarantee the existence of the Turkish empire, or take the best share of her spoil. Once established in Egypt, he would have it in his power to do two things; either create a navy in the Red Sea, and proceed to destroy the settlements of the English in the great Indian peninsula, or make Egypt a colony and a magazine. The Indian trade could not fail soon to transfer itself thither, and desert the Cape of Good Hope. All the caravans of Syria, Arabia, and Africa, already crossed each other at Cairo. The trade of those countries alone might prove immense. Egypt was the most fertile country in the world. Besides a great abundance of different kinds of grain, it was capable of furnishing all the productions of America, and forming a complete substitute for them. Thus, whether Egypt were made a point of departure for the purpose of attacking the English settlements, or whether it were made a mere magazine, it was certain to bring an enormous trade back into its true channels, and to make those channels lead to France.

This daring enterprise, in the next place, had in the eyes of Bonaparte the credit of possessing peculiar advantages. According to the luminous reports of the consul, Magallon, this was the very moment for an expedition to Egypt. By hastening the preparations and the voyage, the expedition might arrive there in the early part of the summer. It would then find the harvest finished and got in, and a favourable wind for ascending the Nile. Bonaparte maintained that it would be impossible to make his descent upon England before the winter; that, besides, she was too well forewarned; that the expedition to Egypt being totally unexpected, would meet with no impediments; that a few months would suffice for the French to form a settlement; and that he would himself return in the autumn to carry into execution the invasion of England; that the period would then be favourable; that England would by that time have sent part of her fleet to India, so that they would meet with less impediments on nearing the British shores. Besides all these incitements, Bonaparte had others of a personal nature; the inactive life he was leading in Paris was insupportable to him; there was no new path to be opened in politics; he was afraid of wearing himself out; he looked to still further aggrandizement for himself. "Great names," he had observed, "are only made in the east."

The directory, who have been accused of having desired to get rid of Bonaparte by sending him to Egypt, on the contrary, made strong objections against the scheme. Larévellière-Lépeaux in particular, was one who was most obstinately opposed to it. He said that the government would be exposing thirty or forty thousand of the best soldiers of France, consigning them to the risk of a naval engagement, and depriving itself of its best general, of that general whom Austria most dreaded, at a moment when the continent was far from being in a settled state, and at a time when the foundation of the new republics had excited the most bitter resentments; that moreover it might, perhaps, stir up the Porte to engage in hostilities by invading one of his provinces. Bonaparte had an answer to every objection. He said that nothing was easier than to escape the English by keeping them in ignorance of the design; that France with three or four hundred thousand soldiers would not miss thirty or forty thousand; that as for himself he should soon return; that the Porte had long ago lost Egypt through the usurpation of the Mamelukes; that the Porte would be very glad to witness their chastisement by France; that some understanding might be come to with her; and that the continent would not so soon evince its indignation, &c. &c. He also spoke of Malta, which he should take from the knights as he went along, and which he should secure for France. Some warm words took place, and occasioned a scene that has always been incorrectly related. Bonaparte, in one of his impatient moods, uttered the word "resignation." "I am far from desiring that you should tender it," said Larévellière with firmness; "but if you do tender it, I am of opinion that it ought to be accepted*." From that moment Bonaparte never uttered the word resignation again.

Overcome at last by the reasons in reply and the arguments of Bonaparte, the directory assented to the proposed expedition. It was seduced by the grandeur of the enterprise, by its commercial advantages, by the promise that Bonaparte gave to the conservation of the fortified posts, bridges, and têtes de pont, the fate of the monasteries, and of the greater nobility on the left bank, the payment of the debts of the countries ceded to France, and how the laws against emigrants were to be enforced in them, &c. &c. These were questions which it was difficult to resolve, putting German tardiness out of the question.

* This expression has been alternately attributed to Rewbell or to Barras. The discussion has been ascribed to a perfectly different cause than the true one. It was on the occasion of mooted the Egyptian expedition and with Larévellière that this scene took place.

Such was the state of the continent. The horizon seemed somewhat clearer, and Bonaparte at length obtained permission to set out for Toulon. It was settled that M. de Talleyrand should start immediately afterwards for Constantinople, in order to gain the assent of the Porte to the expedition of Egypt.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE EGYPT EXPEDITION. DEPARTURE FROM TOULON; ARRIVAL OFF MALTA; CONQUEST OF THAT ISLAND, DEPARTURE FOR EGYPT; LANDING AT ALEXANDRIA; CAPTURE OF THAT PLACE. MARCH TO CAIRO; BATTLE OF CHEBREISS—BATTLE OF THE PYRAMIDS; CAIRO OCCUPIED BY THE FRENCH.—ADMINISTRATIVE OPERATIONS OF BONAPARTE IN EGYPT; A NEW COLONY ESTABLISHED THERE. NAVAL BATTLE OF ABOUKIR; THE FRENCH FLEET DESTROYED BY THE ENGLISH.

BONAPARTE arrived at Toulon on the 20th Floréal, year VI. (May 9th, 1798). His presence cheered the army, which had exhibited some discontent in the apprehension that he would not be at the head of the expedition. This was the old army of Italy. It was well provided for, covered with glory, and one might say of it that its fortune was made. Hence its zeal for war was not so great, indeed it required all the zeal with which the general inspired it, to induce it to go on shipboard, and proceed to an unknown destination. Nevertheless, on seeing him at Toulon, it exhibited the utmost enthusiasm. The army had not seen him for eight months. Bonaparte, without acquainting his army of its destination, published the following proclamation:—

"Soldiers!

"You are one of the wings of the army of England, you have gained warlike experience in mountains, in plains, and at sieges; it still remains for you to earn some experience in a naval battle.

"The Roman legions, whom you have sometimes imitated but never yet equalled, combated Carthage by turns on the sea, and on the plains of Zama. Victory never forsook them, because they were constantly brave, patient in enduring fatigue, well disciplined, and in unity with themselves.

"Soldiers, the eyes of Europe are upon you! You have great destinies to fulfil, battles to fight, dangers and hardships to surmount; you will do more than you have yet done for the prosperity of your country, the happiness of mankind, and your own glory.

"Soldiers, seamen, infantry, artillery, cavalry, be unanimous: recollect that on the day of battle you have to rely upon one another.

"Soldiers, seamen, you have hitherto been neglected; now the greatest solicitude of the republic is for you. You will be worthy of the army of which you form a part.

"The genius of liberty, which has made the republic from her birth the arbitress of Europe, decrees that she shall assume this character before the most remote seas and nations."

It was impossible to proclaim a great enterprise in a more distinguished manner, and at the same time leave it in the mystery in which it was intended to be involved.

The squadron of admiral Brueys consisted of thirteen sail of the line, of which one of 120 guns, (this was the Orient, which was to carry the admiral and the commander-in-chief), two of 80, and ten of 74. There were besides two Venetian ships of 64 guns, six Venetian and eight French frigates, seventy-two brigs, cutters, luggers, gun-boats, and small vessels of all sorts. The transport ships assembled at Toulon, Genoa, Ajaccio, and Civita Vecchia, amounted to four hundred. There were thus five hundred sail, which were to float at once upon the Mediterranean. Never before had such an armament appeared at sea. The fleet carried about forty thousand men of all arms, and ten thousand seamen. It had water for one month, and provisions for two.

This fleet set sail on the 30th Floréal (May 19th), amid the thunders of the cannon, and the cheers of the whole army. Violent gales did some damage to a frigate on leaving the port. The same gales caused such loss to Nelson, who was cruising with three sail of the line, that he was obliged to bear up for the islands of St. Pierre to refit. He was thus kept at a distance from the French fleet, and did not witness its departure. The fleet first sailed for Genoa, to join the convoy collected in that port, under the command of general Baraguid'Hilliers. It then steered for Corsica, to rejoin the convoy at Ajaccio, commanded by Vaubois, and afterwards proceeded into the Bay of Naples, to join the convoy of Civita Vecchia, under the command of Desaix. Bonaparte's intention was to stop at Malta, and there make by the way a bold attempt, the success of which he had long since endeavoured to secure by secret intrigues. He meant to make himself master of that island, which, commanding the navigation of the Mediterranean, became important to Egypt, and could not fall soon to fall into the hands of the English, unless they were anticipated. The order of the Knights of Malta was like all the institutions of the middle ages. It had lost sight of the origin of its institution, and consequently possessed neither its former dignity or strength. It was nothing else than an abuse of an institution, and profitable only to those who were concerned in it. The knights possessed considerable estates in Spain, Portugal, France, Italy, and Germany, conferred on them by the piety of good Catholics, in order to protect the (Prairial.

1798. May. June.
Messidor.)

Bonaparte's intention to take Malta in his way.

THE DIRECTORY.

Malta is attacked and surrendered, and Bonaparte then steers for Alexandria, escaping Nelson's pursuit. 783

Christians going on pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Now that there had ceased to be pilgrimages of this kind, the duty of the knights was to protect the Christian nations against the Saltee Rovers, and to destroy the infamous system of piracy that infested the Mediterranean. The property of the order was sufficient to maintain a considerable naval force; but the knights took no pains whatever to form one; they had but two or three old frigates, that never saw the outside of the port, and a few galleys, that went to give and receive entertainments in the ports of Italy. The bailiffs and the commanders, dispersed over all Christendom, consumed in luxury and indolence the revenues of the order. There was not a single knight who had ever fought against the Saltee Rovers. Besides, all feeling of interest for the order was extinct. In France, the knights' possessions had been appropriated by the government, and Bonaparte had also caused them to be seized in Italy, without a single remonstrance being made on their behalf. We have seen that Bonaparte had already taken care to form secret connexions in Malta. He had gained over some of the knights, and he purposed to intimidate them by a bold stroke, and to make them surrender, for he had neither time or means for a regular attack against a fortress reputed to be impregnable. The order, which had for some time forebodings of the dangers to which it was exposed, on seeing the French squadrons scouring the Mediterranean, had placed itself under the protection of the emperor, Paul I.

Bonaparte made great efforts to rejoin the division from Civita Vecchia; but he could only join it at Malta. The five hundred French sail came in sight of the island on the 21st Prairial (June 9), twenty-two days after leaving Toulon. This sight caused great consternation in the city of Malta. Bonaparte, in order to have a pretext for stopping there, and for picking a quarrel, applied to the grand master for leave to take in water. The grand master, Ferdinand de Hompesch, replied by a peremptory refusal, alleging that the rules of the order forbade the entry of more than two ships belonging to belligerent powers. The English had been received in a far different manner when they had made their appearance. Bonaparte said that this was a proof of the most marked ill-will, and immediately ordered a landing to be effected. On the following day, the 22d Prairial (June 10th), the French troops landed on the island, and completely invested La Valetta, which contains a population of nearly thirty thousand souls, and is one of the strongest fortresses in Europe. Bonaparte ordered artillery to be landed, for the purpose of cannonading the forts. The knights returned his fire, but very feebly. They resolved to make a sally, but a great number of them were taken. The confusion extended itself to the inside of the fortress. Several knights, Frenchmen by birth, declared that they could not fight against their countrymen. Some of them were thrown into dungeons. The consternation was general, and the inhabitants were for a surrender. The grand master, who possessed little energy, and recollected the generosity of the conqueror of Rivoli at Mantua, thought only of protecting his own interest from destruction, enlarged one of the French knights whom he had thrown into prison, and sent him to Bonaparte to negotiate. The treaty was soon concluded. The knights surrendered to France the sovereignty of Malta and its dependant islands; in return France promised her interference at the conference of Rastadt to obtain for the grand master a principality in Germany, in default of which she promised him a life annuity of three hundred thousand francs, and a compensation of six hundred thousand francs in ready money. She granted to each knight of French birth a pension of seven hundred francs, and one thousand for those of sixty years of age; she promised her mediation with a view that those of other nations might be put in possession of the estates belonging to the order in their respective countries. Such were the conditions by means of which France gained possession of the best harbour in the Mediterranean, and one of the strongest fortresses in the world. Nothing short of the ascendancy Bonaparte had acquired could have obtained it without fighting; all that was requisite for this purpose was his venturing to lose some days there, with the English close after him. Caffarelli-Dufalga, as witty as he was brave, when he went over the place, the fortifications of which he greatly admired, facetiously said, "It is fortunate there was somebody in the place to let us in."

Bonaparte left Vaubois at Malta with a garrison of three thousand men. He placed Kegnault (of Jean-Saint d'Angely) there in quality of civil commissioner. He made all the administrative regulations that were necessary for the establishment of the municipal system in the island, and set sail immediately to steer for the coast of Egypt.

He weighed anchor on the 1st Messidor (June 19), after a stay of ten days. The main thing now was, to escape falling in with the English. Nelson, having refitted at the islands of Saint-Pierre, had obtained from lord Saint-Vincent a reinforcement of ten sail of the line and several frigates, which formed a squadron of thirteen sail of the line and some vessels of lower rate. He had returned on the 13th Prairial (1st June) off Toulon, but the French squadron had been gone twelve days. He had run from Toulon to the roads of Tagliamon, and from the roads of Tagliamon to Naples, where he had arrived on the 2d Messidor (20th June), at the very moment when Bonaparte was leaving Malta. Receiving intelligence that the French had been seen off Malta, he followed with the intention of attacking them, if he could but overtake them.

The French on board the whole squadron were ready for battle. The possibility of the English coming up with them presented itself to every body, but excited no alarm. Bonaparte had distributed in each ship of the line five hundred picked men, who were daily exercised in working the guns, and at the head of whom was one of those generals so accustomed to stand fire under his command. He had made it a principle in maritime tactics, that each ship was to have but one object in view, that of getting close to another, fighting with, and boarding her. Orders were issued in consequence, and he reckoned upon the bravery of the picked men distributed on board the ships. These precautions taken, he calmly steered for Egypt. This man, who, according to absurd detractors, feared the dangers of the sea, coolly exposed himself to the chances of fortune amidst the English squadrons, and actually had the hardihood to spend some days at Malta to conquer that island. A light-hearted feeling prevailed on board the fleet; none of them precisely knew whither they were going, but the secret began to transpire, and they waited with impatience to get sight of the shores which they were going to conquer. Of an evening, the men of science and the general officers on board the L'Orient joined the commander-in-chief, and there commenced the ingenious and learned discussions of the Institute of Egypt. At one moment, the English squadron was only a few leagues distant from the immense French convoy, and neither party was aware of it. Nelson, beginning to suppose that the French were bound for Egypt, set sail for Alexandria, and got thither before them; but not finding them there, he flew to the Dardanelles, to endeavour to meet with them there. By singular good fortune, the French expedition did not come in sight of Alexandria till two days afterwards, the 13th Messidor (July 1st). It was very nearly six weeks since it had set sail from Toulon.

Bonaparte immediately despatched a messenger to find out the French consul. He learned that the English had made their appearance two days before, and supposing them to be close at hand, he resolved not to lose an instant in attempting to gain a landing. There was no gaining an entrance into the harbour of Alexandria, for the place appeared disposed to defend itself; he had therefore to go some way further down on the neighbouring coast, at a creek called the Marabout's. It was blowing hard, and the sea broke with fury over the reefs on the shore. The day was far advanced. Bonaparte gave the signal, and made up his mind to go on shore immediately. He was the first who got into a long boat. The soldiers loudly insisted on accompanying him. The boats were now being let down, but the sea ran so high that they were in danger of being dashed every moment against each other. At length, with great hazards, they got to land. At that moment a sail appeared on the horizon; it was supposed to be an English sail. "O Fortune!" exclaimed Bonaparte, "dost thou desert me? Why, I only want five days!" Fortune had not deserted him, it was but a French frigate about to join them. There was great difficulty experienced in landing four or five thousand men that evening and night. Bonaparte resolved to march forthwith for Alexandria, in order to surprise the place, and not to allow the Turks time to make preparations for defence. Marching orders were given. Not a single horse was yet landed; the staff, Bonaparte, and Caffarelli himself, notwithstanding his wooden leg, had to go four or five leagues over the sands, and came at daybreak within sight of Alexandria.

That ancient city, Alexander's daughter, no longer possessed its magnificent edifices, its innumerable houses, and its immense population. Three-fourths of it were in ruins. The Turks, the wealthy Egyptians, and the European merchants, dwell in the modern town, which was the only part preserved. A few Arabs lived among the ruins of the ancient city: an old wall, flanked by towers, enclosed the new and the old town, and all around nothing was visible but those sands which in Egypt advance wherever civilization recedes.

The four thousand French led by Bonaparte arrived there at daybreak. Upon this sandy beach they met with no one save a few Arabs, who, after a few musket-shots, sheltered themselves in the desert. Bonaparte divided his men into three columns: Bon, with the first, marched on the right towards the Rosetta gate; Kléber, with the second, marched in the centre towards the Pillar gate; Menou, with the third, advanced on the left towards the Catacombs gate. The Arabs and the Turks, very good soldiers, were behind a wall, and kept up a steady fire, but the French ascended with scaling ladders, and got over the old wall. Kléber was the first who fell, struck by a ball on the forehead. The Arabs were driven from ruin to ruin, up to the new town. The battle was about to be continued from street to street, and to become sanguinary, when a Turkish captain served as a mediator for negotiating an arrangement. Bonaparte declared that he had not come to plunder the country, or to take it from the Grand Signior, but merely to free it from the domination of the Mamelukes, and to revenge the outrages they had committed against France. He promised that the authorities of the country should be upheld, that the ceremonies of religion should continue to be performed as theretofore, that property should be respected, &c. Upon these terms, the resistance ceased: that same day the French were masters of Alexandria. In the mean time, the rest of the army had effected their landing. The next thing to be done was to place the squadron in some place of shelter, either in the harbour or in one of the neighbouring roads; to form at Alexandria an administration adapted to the manners of the country; and to settle upon a plan of invasion for gaining possession of Egypt. At present, the dangers of the sea and meeting with the English were over; the greatest obstacles were surmounted with that success which seems always to accompany the youth of a great man.

Egypt, on which we had just effected our landing, is a country the most peculiar, the best situated, and one of the most fertile in the world. Its [geographical] position every one knows. Africa is connected with Asia by an isthmus a few leagues across, called the Isthmus of Suez, and which, if cut through, would furnish a communication from the Mediterranean to the Indian Sea, and dispense with the necessity of sailors in future doubling by a long voyage and in stormy weather the Cape of Good Hope. Egypt is situated parallel with the Red Sea and the Isthmus of Suez. She is mistress of that isthmus. It was this country through which, in the time of the ancients and in the middle ages, during the prosperity of the Venetians, the commerce of India flowed. Such is its situation between the East and the West. Its physical constitution and form are not less extraordinary. The Nile, one of the largest rivers in the world, takes its rise in the mountains of Abyssinia, runs six hundred leagues through the deserts of Africa, then enters, or rather falls into, Egypt, throwing itself down the cataracts of Syene, and, after a course of two hundred leagues more, falls into the sea. The banks of the Nile form the whole of Egypt. It is a valley two hundred leagues

1798.
July 1.
(18 Messidor.)

Description of Egypt, the Mamelukes, Arabs,
Sheiks, population, &c.

THE DIRECTORY.

Description of Egypt, the Mamelukes, Arabs,
Sheiks, population, &c.

785

in length, and five or six in breadth. On either side it is bordered by an expanse of sand. Several chains of mountains, low, dry, and rugged, make a melancholy break to these sands, and throw something of a shadow over their vast extent. Some of these mountains separate the Nile from the Red Sea, others divide this river from the great desert, in which they disappear to the eye. On the left bank of the Nile, at a certain distance in the desert, wind two strips of land capable of cultivation, which form a contrast to the sands, and are covered with some verdure. These are the oases, a kind of islands where vegetation exists amidst an expanse of sand. There are two, the great and the little. An effort of man, by diverting thither a branch of the Nile, would convert them into fertile provinces. Fifty leagues from the sea, the Nile divides into two branches, which fall, at the distance of sixty leagues one from the other, into the Mediterranean, the one at Rosetta, the other at Damietta. The Nile was once known to have seven mouths. They are still to be traced, but only two of them are now navigable. The triangle formed by its two great branches and the sea measures sixty leagues at its base and fifty on the sides. It is called the Delta. It is the most fertile part of Egypt, because it is the best watered and most intersected by canals. The country is divided into three parts: the Delta or Lower Egypt, which is called Bahireh; Middle Egypt, called Westanieh; and Upper Egypt, called the Saïd.

The trade winds (vents étiésiens) constantly blowing from north to south, during the months of May, June, and July, carry with them all the clouds formed at the mouth of the Nile, entirely prevent their making a stay in that ever serene country, and convey them towards the mountains of Abyssinia. There these clouds gather, descend in rain, during the months of July, August, and September, and produce that celebrated phenomenon of the rising of the Nile. Thus this land receives from the overflowings of the river that moisture which is not imparted to it from the heavens. It never rains; and the marshes of the Delta, which would be pestilential beneath the sky of Europe, in Egypt never occasion a single fever. The Nile, after its inundation, leaves a fertile mud, which is the only soil that can be cultivated on its banks, and produces those abundant harvests which of old were appropriated to the subsistence of Rome. The farther the inundation extends, the greater is the extent of the soil fit for cultivation. The owners of this soil, levelled every year by the waters, divide them among themselves every year by measurement. Hence land-surveying is an important art in Egypt. Canals might be made a means of extending the inundation, which would also have the advantage of diminishing the rapidity of the waters, of making them stay a longer time, and of diffusing fertility at the expense of the desert. No where else would the labour of man be productive of more salutary effects; no where else would civilization be more desirable. The Nile and the desert hold divided sway in Egypt, and it is civilization that would furnish the Nile with the means of conquering the desert, and causing it to recede. It is believed that Egypt formerly supported twenty millions of inhabitants, exclusive of the Romans; it could hardly subsist three millions of souls when the French arrived there.

The inundation is over about September. Then it is that field labour commences. In October, November, January, and February, the country in Egypt exhibits a delicious spectacle of fertility and luxuriance. It is then covered with the richest crops, enamelled with flowers, and depasturing immense herds and flocks. In March, the summer heats begin; the earth gapes in such deep clefts, that it is sometimes dangerous to travel on horseback. Agricultural labour at this time terminates. The Egyptians have by that time got in all the productions of the year. Besides corn, Egypt produces the best rice, the finest vegetables, sugar, indigo, senna, cassia, carbonate of soda, flax, hemp, cotton, and all these in marvellous abundance. Egypt produces no oil, but this it obtains on the opposite coasts of Greece; neither does it grow tobacco or coffee, but these it finds by its side in Syria and Arabia. It is also devoid of wood, for vegetation on a larger scale cannot protrude roots a sufficient depth of soil in the annual mud deposited by the Nile upon a sandy substratum. A few sycamores and palms are the only trees of Egypt. For want of fuel, the inhabitants burn cow-dung. Egypt rears immense herds. Poultry of every description swarms there. Egypt possesses those beautiful horses, so celebrated all over the world for their beauty, their spirit, and their familiarity with their masters; and also that useful beast, the camel, able to supply itself at one time with food and drink for several days, whose foot sinks without fatigue in the moving sands, and serves like a living ship for crossing the sandy sea.

Every year there arrive at Cairo prodigious caravans, who meet like fleets on both sides of the desert. Some come from Syria and Arabia, others from Africa and the coasts of Barbary. They are importers of every production peculiar to the countries of the sun, gold, ivory, feathers, inimitable shawls, perfumes, gums, spices of all kinds, coffee, tobacco, wood, and slaves. Cairo becomes a magnificent emporium of the most exquisite productions of the globe, such as the mighty genius of the people of the west can never imitate, because it is the sun which bestows them, and which their delicate taste will always make them covet. Thus the trade of India is the only one to which the progress of nations will never put an end. There would, therefore, be no necessity for making Egypt a military station, for the purpose of violently putting an end to the English trade with India, all that would be required for this purpose would be the establishment of a grand commercial depository, enjoying personal safety, laws, and European commodities, to draw thither the wealth of the world.

The population of Egypt is, like the towns that cover it, an assemblage of the wrecks of several nations. The Copts, the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, the Arabs, who conquered Egypt from the Copts, and the Turks, the conquerors of the Arabs; such are the races whose degenerate remains lead a wretched life in a land of which they are unworthy. On the arrival of the French, the Copts amounted at most to two hundred thousand. Poor, contemned, and brutalized, they had devoted themselves, like all the proscribed classes, to the most ignoble employments.

The Arabs formed almost the entire mass of the population. They were descendants of the fellow warriors of the prophet. Their condition was infinitely varied; some of high birth, carrying back their pedigree to Mahomet himself, great landed proprietors, possessing some traces of Arabian knowledge, combining with nobility the functions of the priesthood and the magistracy, were, under the title of Sheiks, the real grandeens of Egypt. In the Divans, they represented the country, when its tyrants wish to address themselves to it; in the Mosques they formed a sort of universities, in which they taught the religion and the morality of the Koran, and a little philosophy and jurisprudence. The great mosque of Jemil-Azar was the first learned and religious body in the East. Next to these grandeens came the smaller land-owners, composing the second and more numerous class of the Arabs; then the lowest orders of the population, who had sunk into the state of absolute Ilots. These last were hired peasants, cultivating the land by the name of fellahs, and living in distress and abject poverty. There was a fourth class of Arabs, namely, the Bedouins or wandering Arabs; these would never attach themselves to the soil; they were the children of the desert. Mounted on horses or camels, driving before them numerous herds of cattle, they wandered about seeking pasturage in the Oases, or coming annually to sow the strips of land capable of cultivation, situated on the borders of Egypt. Their occupation was to escort caravans, or to lend their camels for the purposes of conveyance. But like faithless robbers, they frequently plundered the merchants whom they escorted, or to whom they lent their camels. Sometimes, even violating the hospitality granted to them on the borders of the land capable of cultivation, they fell upon the valley of the Nile, which, five leagues in breadth, was easy of access, plundered the villages, and remounting their horses, carried off their booty into the heart of the desert. Turkish negligence left their ravages almost always unpunished, and made no greater struggle against the robbers of the desert, than it would to fight against the sands. These wandering Arabs, divided into tribes on both sides of the valley, amounted to one hundred or one hundred and twenty thousand, and could furnish from twenty to twenty-five thousand horse, brave indeed, but only fit to harass an enemy, not to fight with him.

The third and last race was that of the Turks; but this race was hardly more numerous than the Copts, that is to say, it amounted to about two hundred thousand individuals at the most. This race was divided into Turks and Mamelukes. The Turks, who had come since the last conquest of the sultans of Constantinople, were almost all enrolled in the list of the janizaries; but it is well known that in general they got their names inscribed in those lists merely that they might enjoy the privileges of janizaries, and that a very small number of them were really in the service. Very few of them composed the military force of the pacha. This pacha, sent from Constantinople, was the sultan's representative in Egypt; but escorted only by a few janizaries, he found his authority enfeebled by the very precautions which sultan Selim had formerly taken to preserve it. That sultan, judging that from its remoteness Egypt might be able to escape from the dominion of Constantinople, and that a clever and ambitious pacha might there create an independent empire, had devised a counterpoise by instituting a Mameluke soldiery. But as it is impossible to conquer those physical conditions which render one country dependent or independent of another, instead of the pacha, it was the Mamelukes who had rendered themselves independent of Constantinople and masters of Egypt. The Mamelukes were slaves purchased in Circassia. Selected from among the handsomest children of the Caucasus, carried young to Egypt, brought up in ignorance of their origin, and in the practice of and taste for arms, they became the bravest and most agile horsemen in the world. They considered it an honour to be without family, to have been bought at a high price, and to be handsome and brave. They had twenty-four beys, who were their owners and their chiefs. These beys had each of them five or six hundred Mamelukes. It was a herd of which they had the burden of feeding, and which they bequeathed sometimes to a son, but more frequently to a favourite Mameluke, who became bey in his turn. Every Mameluke was served by two fellahs. The entire band consisted of nearly twelve thousand horse, served by twenty-four thousand Ilots. They were the real masters and tyrants of the country. They lived either on the produce of the lands belonging to the beys, or on the revenue arising from the numerous taxes imposed in every possible form. The Copts, whom we have already described as engaged in the most ignoble occupations, were their tax-gatherers, their spies, their men of business; for the brutified part of society is always under the subjection of the strongest. The twenty-four beys, equal by right, were not so in fact. They made war upon one another, and the strongest, subduing the rest, possessed a sovereignty for life. He was entirely independent of the pacha representing the sultan of Constantinople, allowed him at most a sort of nullity at Cairo, and frequently refused him the miri, or land tax, which, representing the right of conquest, belonged to the Porte.

Egypt was, therefore, an absolute feudality, like that of Europe in the middle ages. It exhibited at once a conquered people; a conquering soldiery, in rebellion against its sovereign; and lastly, an ancient brutified class, in subjection to, and hired by the stronger.

Two beys, superior to the others, bore sway in Egypt at this moment. The one, Ibrahim Bey, wealthy, crafty, and powerful; the other, Murad-Bey, intrepid, valiant, and impassioned. They had agreed between themselves upon a sort of division of authority, by which Ibrahim Bey enjoyed the civil prerogatives, and Murad Bey the military power. The latter had the conduct of the wars; in these he excelled, and he possessed the affection of the Mamelukes, who were all eager to follow him.

Bonaparte, who with the genius of the captain combined the tact and the address of the founder of governments, and who had, moreover, so frequently regulated the affairs of conquered countries as to have gained peculiar experience therein, immediately apprehended the line of policy he had to follow in Egypt. He must in the first place wrest that country from its real masters, the Mamelukes. It was that class with whom he had to contend, and to destroy as well by arms as by policy. Besides, he had reasons of great weight against them, for they had unceasingly ill-used the French. As for the Porte, he had to dissemble any attack upon its sovereignty, and on the contrary, to profess a great respect for it. Such was the state to which it was reduced, that this sovereignty became of no moment. The Porte could be treated with, whether it were for the cession of Egypt, whether it were by giving certain advantages elsewhere, or for a partition of authority, in which there would be nothing mortifying; for in leaving the pacha at Cairo in precisely the same condition he had hitherto been, and themselves succeeding to the power of the Mamelukes, would furnish no great cause of disquiet. As for the inhabitants, in order to attach them to us, the real population would have to be gained over, namely, the Arabs. By respecting the Sheiks, by courting their old pride, by increasing their power, by encouraging a secret desire, which it was discovered they possessed, as was the case in Italy, and indeed every where, a desire for the restoration of their ancient country, the country of the Arabs, it was certain they would be entirely under our control, and firmly attached to us. It was also expected that by showing consideration to life and property, with a people accustomed to consider conquest as conferring a right to murder, pillage, and devastation, he should cause a surprise that would operate most advantageous for the French army; and if besides all this, the French were to respect women and the prophet, the conquest of hearts would be as firmly secured as that of the soil.

Bonaparte conducted himself in perfect conformity with these notions, which were equally just and profound. Endowed with an entirely eastern imagination, it was easy for him to assume the solemn and imposing style which was suited to the Arab race. He made proclamations, which were translated into Arabic and circulated throughout the country. To the pacha he wrote, "The French republic has resolved to send a powerful army to Egypt to put an end to the plunder of the beys, as it has been obliged to do several times during this century against the beys of Tunis and Algiers. Thou, that oughtest to be the ruler of the beys, and whom they nevertheless hold at Cairo without authority and without power, thou shouldst witness my arrival with pleasure. Thou art, doubtless, already aware that I am not come to do any thing against the Koran or the sultan. Thou knowest that the French nation is the only ally that the sultan has in Europe. Come then to meet me, and curse with me the impious race of the beys." Speaking to the Egyptians, Bonaparte addressed them in these words: "People of Egypt, you will be told that I am come to overthrow your religion. Believe it not; make answer and say, that I am come to restore you to your rights, to punish the usurpers, and that I respect God, his prophet, and the Koran, more than I do the Mamelukes." Speaking of the tyranny of the Mamelukes, he said, "Is there a richly-cultivated territory? it belongs to the Mamelukes. Is there a beautiful slave, a fine horse, a good house? it belongs to the Mamelukes. If Egypt is their farm, let them produce the lease which God has granted them of it. But God is just and merciful to the people, and he hath ordained that the empire of the Mamelukes shall no longer exist." Speaking of the sentiments of the French, he added, "We, too, are true Mussulmans! Was it not us who destroyed the pope, who said that war must be made upon the Mussulmans? Was it not we who destroyed the knights of Malta, because those bigots believed that God had decreed that they should make war upon the Mussulmans? Thrice happy those who shall side with us. They shall prosper in their fortune and their rank. Happy those who shall be neuter. They will have time to become acquainted with us, and they will range themselves on our side. But woe, threefold woe, to those who shall arm for the Mamelukes, and fight against us! For them there will be no hope; they shall perish."

Bonaparte said to his soldiers, "You are going to undertake a conquest, the effects of which on the civilization and the commerce of the world are incalculable. You will give England a certain home-thrust, which will be but a prelude to your shortly giving her a death-blow."

The people with whom we are going to live are Mahometans. The first article of their faith is this: "There is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet." Do not contradict them. Act towards them as you have acted towards the Jews, towards the Italians. Demonstrate the same respect to their muftis and to their imams, as you have done to the rabbis and to the bishops. Exhibit the same toleration for the ceremonies prescribed by the Koran and for the Mosques, as you have done for the convents, for the synagogues, for the religion of Moses, and for that of Jesus Christ. The Roman legions protected all religions. You will here find customs differing from those of Europe; you must habituate yourselves to them. The people among whom we are come treat women differently from us. Recollect that in every country he who commits a rape is a coward.

"The first city that we shall come to was built by Alexander. We shall meet at every step with glorious associations, worthy to excite the emulation of Frenchmen."

Bonaparte lost no time in making his arrangements for establishing the French authority at Alexandria, for quitting the Delta, and gaining possession of Cairo, the capital of Egypt. It was in July; the Nile was about to inundate the country. He was anxious to reach Cairo before the rising of the Nile, and to employ the time of its duration in completing his establishment. He ordered that every thing at Alexandria should remain in the same state as before, that the offices of religion should be continued; and that justice should be administered as before by the cadis. His intention was merely to enforce his succession to the rights of the Mamelukes, and to appoint a commissioner to levy the accustomed imposts. He caused a divan, or municipal council to be formed, composed of the Sheiks and principal citizens of Alexandria, so as to be able to consult with them upon all measures that the French authority would have to adopt. He left three thousand men in garrison at Alexandria, and gave the command to Kléber, whose wound was likely for a month or so to keep him from active exertion. He directed a young officer of extraordinary merit, and who gave promise to France of becoming a great engineer, to put Alexandria in a state of defence, and to construct there all the necessary works. This was colonel Crotin, who at a small charge, and in a short period of time, completed at Alexandria some well-constructed outworks. Bonaparte then issued orders for the fleet to be brought into some safe harbour of shelter. It was a matter of some doubt whether the large ships could enter the port of Alexandria. A commission of naval officers was appointed to sound the harbour and to make a report. In the mean time, the fleet was anchored in the road of Aboukir. Bonaparte ordered Brueys to ascertain the fact, and to repair to Corpe if it should be ascertained that the ships could not enter the harbour of Alexandria.

After he had despatched these affairs, he made his arrangements for marching. A considerable flotilla, laden with provisions, artillery, ammunition, and baggage, was to proceed along the coast to the Rosetta mouth, enter the Nile, and go up the river at the same time with the French army. He then set out with the main body of the army, which, exclusive of the two garrisons in Malta and Alexandria, was about thirty thousand strong. He had ordered his flotilla to proceed to the height of Ramanieh on the banks of the Nile. There he purposed to join it, and to proceed up the Nile parallel with it, in order to quit the Delta and to reach Upper Egypt or Bahireh. To go from Alexandria to Ramanieh there were two roads, one through inhabited countries by the side of the sea-coast and the Nile, the other shorter, and as a bird would fly, but across the desert of Damanhour. Bonaparte never hesitated, but chose the shorter. It was of consequence for him that he should reach Cairo as speedily as possible. Desaix marched with the advanced guard; the main body followed at a few leagues distance. The army put itself in motion on the 18th Messidor (July 6). When the soldiers found themselves amidst this boundless plain, with a shifting sand beneath their feet, a scorching sun over their head, no water, no shade, with nothing for the eye to rest upon but scanty tufts of palm trees, seeing no living beings save light troops of Arab horsemen, who appeared and disappeared on the horizon, and sometimes concealed themselves behind sandhills to murder those who lagged behind, they were dreadfully dispirited. The desire for rest had already occupied their mind, after the long and obstinate campaign in Italy. They had accompanied their general to a distant country, because they had a blind faith in him, because he had held forth to them the prospect of a land of promise, from which they were to return rich enough to purchase each of them a field of six acres. But when they beheld this desert, discontent was the only feeling exhibited, which almost approached despair. They found all the wells, which at intervals border the road through the desert, destroyed by the Arabs. There were left only a few drops of water quite brackish, and wholly insufficient for quenching their thirst. They had been informed that at Damanhour they should find some relief; they met with nothing there but miserable huts, and could neither procure bread or wine, but only lentils in great abundance, and a little water. They were obliged to push forward again into the desert. Bonaparte saw the brave Lannes and Murat themselves take off their hats, dash them on the sand, and trample them under foot. Nevertheless he overawed all; his presence enforced silence, and sometimes restored cheerfulness. The soldiers would not impute their sufferings to him; they vented their moroseness against those who took pleasure in observing the country. Whenever they observed scientific persons stop to examine the smallest remains of ruins, they said that they were only brought thither for them, and revenged themselves with coarse jokes in their way. Caffarelli, in particular, brave as a grenadier, and inquisitive as a scholar, was considered by them as the man who had deceived the general and drawn him into this remote country. As he had lost a leg on the Rhine, they said, "What does he care for all this; as for him, he has one foot in France." However, after severe hardships, endured at first with impatience, and afterwards with gaiety and fortitude, they reached the Nile on the 22nd Messidor (July 10), after a march of four days. At sight of the Nile and the water, so much longed for, the soldiers rushed into it, and bathing in its waters, forgot all their fatigues. Desaix's division, which from the advanced guard had gone to the rear guard, saw two or three hundred Mamelukes galloping before it, who were dispersed by a few volleys of grape-shot. These were the first that had been seen. They proclaimed the approaching conflict with the hostile army. In fact, the brave Murad Bey, having been put on his guard, was collecting his forces in the neighbourhood of Cairo. Until he could get them together, he was hovering with a thousand horse about our army, so as to keep an eye upon its march.

The army waited at Ramanieh for the arrival of the flotilla, and took rest till the 25th Messidor (July 13), when it set out on the same day for Chebreiss. Murad Bey was there waiting for us with his Mamelukes. The flotilla which had been first to set out, and which had preceded the army, found itself engaged before it could be supported. Murad Bey was also provided with a flotilla, and from the shore he joined his fire to that of his djermes (light Egyptian vessels). The French flotilla was severely attacked. Perrée, an officer of marines, who had the command, displayed extraordinary courage; he was supported by the cavalry who had come dismounted to Egypt, and who, until they could serve themselves at the expence of the Mamelukes, were brought thither by water; two gun-boats were retaken from the enemy, and he was repulsed. At that moment the army came up; it was composed of five divisions. It had not yet been in action with its singular opponents. To rapidity of movement, charge of horse, and the use of the sabre, the French had to oppose the fixed position of the foot soldier, his long bayonet, and masses presenting a front on every side. Bonaparte formed his five divisions into five squares, in the centre of which were placed the baggage and the staff. The artillery was placed at the angles. The five divisions flanked one another. Murad Bey set upon these living citadels a thousand or twelve hundred intrepid horse; who rushing onwards with loud shouts and at full gallop, discharging their pistols, and then drawing their formidable scymetars, came and threw themselves upon the front of the squares. Encountering every where a hedge of bayonets and a tremendous fire, they hovered about the French ranks, fell before them, or got away in the plain at the utmost speed of their horses. Murad, after losing two or three hundred of his bravest horse-men, retired for the purpose of gaining the point of the Delta, and getting on so as to wait for us above Cairo at the head of all his forces.

This battle sufficiently familiarised the army with this new species of opponents, and to suggest to Bonaparte the sort of tactics he should use against them. He went on towards Cairo. The flotilla kept on the Nile above the army, which marched without halting for the following days. The soldiers had to experience further privations, but they kept close to the Nile, and could bathe therein every night. The sight of the enemy had restored all their animation. "I found," said Bonaparte, "that these soldiers, already averse to fatigue, as is always the case when men have got sufficient reputation, stood fire very well. While under marching orders, they frequently vented their spleen, but after their moroseness they exhibited their coarse wit. The scientific men began to command respect by the courage which they displayed. Monge and Berthollet had shown heroic intrepidity at Chébreiss. The soldiers, although they still made them the subject of their mirth, yet regarded them highly. As the capital of Cairo, so highly extolled as one of the wonders of the East, did not yet make its appearance, they declared that it never had existence, or that they should find it, like Damanhour, a collection of wretched huts. They further said that this poor general had been deceived, and that he had suffered himself to be sent away like a good boy, himself and his companions in glory. In the evening, when they halted, the soldiers who had read the tales of the Thousand and One Nights, or heard them recited, repeated them to their comrades, and promised themselves gorgeous palaces glittering with gold. They were still without bread, not from the want of corn, but because there was neither mill or oven. They ate lentils, pigeons, and an exquisite water melon, known in southern climates by the name of pastèque. The soldiers called it St. Pastèque."

Cairo was near at hand, and there the decisive battle was to be fought. Murad Bey had there collected the greatest part of his Mamelukes, nearly ten thousand or thereabouts. They were attended by double the usual number of fellahs, to whom arms were given, and whom they compelled to fight behind the intrenchments. He had also assembled some thousands of janizaries or spahis, dependent on the pacha, who, notwithstanding Bonaparte's letter, had suffered himself to be drawn in to join the side of his oppressors. Murad Bey had made preparations for defence on the banks of the Nile. The great capital, Cairo, is seated on the right bank of that river. It was on the opposite bank, that is to say, on the left, that Murad Bey had pitched his camp, in a long plain that lay between the river and the pyramids of Giseh, the highest in Egypt. These were his arrangements. A large village, called Embabeh, lay with its back towards the river. Murad Bey had ordered some works to be thrown up there, conceived and executed with true Turkish stupidity. They were nothing else than a mere ditch, which encompassed the village, with fixed batteries, the guns of which, not being placed on field carriages, could not be shifted. Such was Murad's intrenched camp. He had there posted his twenty-four thousand fellahs and janizaries, intending to make his stand there with the accustomed obstinacy of the Turks behind walls. This village, intrenched and supported upon the river, formed his right. His Mamelukes, to the number of ten thousand horse, extended over the plain, between the river and the pyramids. Some thousand Arab horse, who were no farther the auxiliaries of the Mamelukes than as performing the part of plunderers and murderers in case of victory, filled the space between the Mamelukes and the pyramids. Ibrahim, Murad Bey's colleague, less warlike and less brave than Murad, kept on the other side of the Nile, with about a thousand Mamelukes, and with his women, his slaves, and his wealth, ready to leave Cairo and seek refuge in Syria, if the French should prove victorious. A considerable number of djermes covered the Nile, and were laden with the valuable effects of the Mamelukes. Such was the order in which the two beys waited for Bonaparte.

On the 3rd Thermidor (July 21), the French army set itself in march before daybreak. Every one was aware that they should soon come in sight of Cairo and encounter the enemy. At break of day, the army at last descried on its left, and on the other side of the river, the lofty minarets of that great capital, and on its right, in the desert, the gigantic pyramids gilded by the beams of the rising sun. The army, on witnessing these monuments of antiquity, halted as if seized with curiosity and admiration. The face of Bonaparte was lighted up with enthusiasm. He began to gallop before the ranks of the soldiers, and pointing to the pyramids, "Consider," he exclaimed, "that from the summits of those pyramids, forty centuries look down upon you." They advanced at a rapid pace. As they approached, they observed the minarets of Cairo rise up; they saw the pyramids increase in height, they saw the thickening of the multitude that guarded Embabeh, they saw the glistening arms of the ten thousand horsemen resplendent with gold and steel, and forming an immense line. Bonaparte immediately made his arrangements. The army, as at Chébreiss, was divided into five divisions. Those of Desaix and Regnier formed the right, towards the desert; Dugua's division formed the centre; and the divisions of Menou and Bon formed the left, all along the Nile. Bonaparte, who, since the battle at Chébreiss, had well considered the ground and the enemy, made his arrangements accordingly. Each division, as at Chébreiss, formed a square; each square was composed of six ranks. Behind were the grenadier companies in platoons, ready to reinforce the points of attack. The artillery was at the angles. The baggage and the generals were in the centre. These squares were moving. When they were in motion, two sides marched upon the flank. When they were charged, they were to halt, so as to present a front on all sides. Again, when they were to carry a position, the first ranks were to detach themselves and to form columns of attack, and the others were to remain in rear, still forming the square, but only three deep, and ready to support the columns of attack. Such were the arrangements ordered by Bonaparte. He was afraid lest his impetuous soldiers of Italy, accustomed to advance at the charge step, would find it difficult to resign themselves to that chilling and negative fixity of walls. He had taken pains to prepare them for this. Orders were issued, in particular, not to be in a hurry to fire, to wait coolly for the enemy, and not to fire till he was at the muzzle of the guns.

The army advanced almost within cannon-shot. Bonaparte, who was in the centre square, formed by Dugua's division, examined with a telescope the state of the camp of Embabeh. He saw that the artillery of the camp, not being mounted on field carriages, could not be moved into the plain, and that the enemy would not quit the intrenchments. It was on these views that he based his movements. He resolved to bear with his divisions upon the right, that is, upon the main body of the Mamelukes, moving round out of the range of the cannon of Embabeh. His intention was to cut off the Mamelukes from the intrenched camp, to surround them, to drive them into the Nile, and not to attack Embabeh till he had entirely got rid of them. After he had destroyed the Mamelukes, it would not be difficult for him to settle matters with the multitude which thronged that camp.

He immediately gave the signal. Desaix, who formed the right extremity, was the first to put himself in motion. Next to him came Regnier's square, and then Dugua's, where Bonaparte was. The two others moved round Embabeh, beyond the range of the cannon. Murad Bey, who, though uneducated, was endowed with great natural abilities and great perspicacity, immediately guessed his adversary's object, and resolved to charge during this decisive movement. He left two thousand Mamelukes to support Embabeh, and then rushed with the rest on the two squares upon the right. Desaix's square, having got among some palm-trees, was not yet formed at the time the first horsemen came up to it. But it formed instantaneously, and was ready to receive the charge, an enormous mass must have been, composed, as it was, of eight thousand horse, galloping all at once in a plain. They rushed with extraordinary impetuosity upon Desaix's division. Our brave soldiers, who had become as cool as they had formerly been fiery, waited for them calmly, and received them at the muzzle of their guns with a tremendous fire of musketry and grape. Checked by this fire, these innumerable horsemen hovered along the ranks, and galloped around the blazing citadel. Some of the bravest threw themselves on the bayonets, then, turning their horses and backing them on our infantry, they succeeded in making a breach, and thirty or forty actually expired in the very centre of the square, at the feet of Desaix. The entire body, facing to the right about, quitted Desaix's square, and turned upon Regnier's, which came next. Being received with the same fire, they then returned to the point from whence they had started; but they found in their rear Dugua's division, which Bonaparte had moved in the direction of the Nile, and was put completely to the rout. The enemy then fled in disorder, one part of the fugitives ran off on our right towards the pyramids, another, passing under Dugua's fire, went to throw itself into Embabeh, carrying confusion along with it. From that moment disorder became visibly perceptible in the intrenched camp. Bonaparte, the moment he observed this, ordered his two divisions on the left to approach Embabeh for the purpose of taking it. Bon and Menou advanced under the fire of the intrenchments, and on coming within a certain distance they halted. The square divided; the foremost ranks formed columns of attack, while the others remained in squares in shape always resembling real citadels. But at the same moment the Mamelukes, as well those whom Murad had left at Embabeh as those who had fled thither, attempted to anticipate us. They rushed upon our columns of attack while yet in march. But the latter, halting immediately and forming into square with wonderful rapidity, received them with firmness, and overthrew a great number of them. Some hastily got into Embabeh, where the utmost confusion prevailed; others flying to the plain between the Nile and our right, were either shot or driven into the river. The columns of attack pressed closely on Embabeh, made themselves masters of the place, and threw the crowd of janizaries and fellahs into the Nile. Many were drowned, but as the Egyptians are excellent swimmers, the greater number somehow or other contrived to escape. All was now over. The Arabs who were near the pyramids, and who were making sure of victory, fled into the desert. Murad, with the wrecks of his cavalry and his face all over blood, retired towards Upper Egypt. Ibrahim, who from the opposite bank had been a witness of this disaster, pushed on in the direction of Belbeys, so as to effect a retreat into Syria. The Mamelukes immediately set fire to the djermes which contained their property. This prey escaped us; and our soldiers saw, during the whole night, the flames consuming a rich booty.

Bonaparte took up his head-quarters at Gisch, on the banks of the Nile, where Murad Bey had a magnificent residence. A great quantity of provisions was found either at Gisch or Embabeh; and our soldiers were enabled to make themselves amends for their long privations. They found vines laden with magnificent grapes in the gardens of Gisch, and a short vintage they made of them. But they gained a booty of a different nature on the field of battle, and this consisted of splendid shawls, weapons of fine workmanship, horses, and purses, containing as many as two or three hundred pieces of gold, for the Mamelukes carried all their ready money on their persons. They passed the evening, the night, and the next day, in collecting those spoils. Five or six hundred Mamelukes had been killed. More than a thousand were drowned in the Nile. The soldiers set about dragging for their bodies for the purpose of stripping them, and spent several days in this kind of pursuit.

The battle could scarcely have cost us a hundred killed and wounded; for if defeat be terrible for squares when broken, the loss is insignificant when the squares come off victorious. The Mamelukes had lost their best horsemen by the fire or by the water. Their forces were dispersed, and we were now complete masters of Cairo. This capital was in a state of the most extraordinary agitation. It contained more than three hundred thousand inhabitants, filled with a ferocious and brutal populace, and abandoned to every species of excess, and 1798.

July.
(Thermidor.)

Bonaparte's political carriage
after the battle of Cairo,

THE DIRECTORY.

and his relations with the countries around.

701

desiring to take advantage of the disturbance to pillage the rich palaces of the beys. Unfortunately, the French flotilla had not yet ascended the Nile, and we had no means of crossing to take possession of Cairo. Some French merchants who happened to be there were sent to Bonaparte by the sheiks to settle as to the occupation of the city. He procured a few djermes, so as to despatch a detachment that restored tranquillity, and placed life and property beyond the reach of the populace. On the next day but one, Bonaparte entered Cairo, and took possession of the palace of Murad Bey.

He had hardly been settled in Cairo before he hastened to pursue the same policy he had already pursued at Alexandria, and which was to attach the country to his interest. He visited the principal sheiks, paid them compliments, gave them hopes of the re-establishment of the Arab dominion, promised to respect their religion and customs, and completely succeeded in winning their hearts by a well-managed mixture of flattery and high-flown expressions impressed with the grandeur of Oriental diction. The main point was to obtain from the sheiks of the mosque of Jemil-Azar a declaration in favour of the French. This is much the same as a Papal edict among Christians. In this matter Bonaparte called forth his greatest powers of address, and perfectly succeeded in his object. The great sheiks issued the desired declaration, and exhorted the Egyptians to submit to the envoy of God, who revered the prophet, and who had come to deliver his children from the tyranny of the Mamelukes. Bonaparte established a divan at Cairo as he had done at Alexandria, composed of the principal sheiks and the most distinguished inhabitants. This divan, or municipal council, was to avail him in gaining over the minds of the Egyptians, by making them party to his counsels, and receiving intelligence from them as to all the details of home administration. It was settled that similar institutions should be established throughout all the provinces, and that these subordinate divans should send deputies to the divan of Cairo, which would thus become the great national divan.

Bonaparte resolved to permit justice be administered by the cadis. In furtherance of his scheme for succeeding to the rights of the Mamelukes, he seized their estates, and caused the duties previously imposed to be continued for the purposes of the French army. To do this, he was obliged to have the Copts under his own control. He omitted nothing to attach them to him, by making them conceive hopes of bettering their present state. He sent out generals with detachments to go again down the Nile to complete the occupation of the Delta, which had been nothing more than traversed. He also despatched other detachments towards the Upper Nile, to take possession of Middle Egypt. Desaix was stationed with a division at the entrance of Upper Egypt, which he had to take from Murad Bey, as soon as the waters of the Nile should subside in autumn. Each of the generals, furnished with detailed instructions, was to re-enact in the country what had been done at Alexandria and at Cairo. They were to influence the sheiks, to win the Copts, and to establish the levy of the taxes, to administer to the wants of the army.

Bonaparte next occupied himself with the well-being and health of his soldiers. Egypt began to be agreeable to them; they there found rest, plenty, and a pure and wholesome climate. The singular manners of the country became familiar to them, and became a never-failing source of mirth. But, guessing with their accustomed sagacity the intention of the general, they assumed a mock reverence for the prophet, and with him laughed at the part which policy obliged them to play. Bonaparte ordered ovens to be built, that they might have bread. He lodged them in the excellent houses of the Mamelukes, and exhorted them, above all things, to respect the women. They had found in Egypt, asses of a very fine breed, in great numbers. It was one of their great amusements to ride about in the environs, and to gallop about upon these animals over the country. Their quick movements caused some accidents among the formal inhabitants of Cairo. It became necessary to prohibit their running about the streets at such speed. The cavalry was mounted on the finest horses in the world, namely, on the Arabian horses taken from the Mamelukes.

Bonaparte, in like manner, did not omit to uphold kindly relations with the neighbouring countries, in order to preserve and appropriate to himself the rich commerce of Egypt. He himself appointed the Emir-Hadgi. This is an officer annually chosen at Cairo, to convey the great caravan from Mecca. He wrote to all the French consuls on the coast of Barbary, to inform the beys that the Emir-Hadgi was appointed, and that the caravans might set out. At his desire the sheiks wrote to the sherif of Mecca, to acquaint him that the pilgrims would be protected, and that the caravans would find safety and protection. The pacha of Cairo had followed Ibrahim Bey to Belbeys. Bonaparte wrote to him, as well as to the several pachas of St. Jean d'Acre and Damascus, to assure them of the kindly inclinations of the French towards the Sublime Porte. These last precautions were unfortunately useless, and the officers of the Porte were hardly to be persuaded that the French, who had just invaded one of the richest provinces belonging to their sovereign, could in fact be his friends.

The Arabs were struck by the character of the conqueror. They could not comprehend how it was that a mortal who wielded the thunderbolt of war, could at the same time be so forbearing. They called him the worthy son of the prophet, the favourite of the great Allah; they had even chanted in the great Mosque the following litany.

"The great Allah is no longer angry with us. He hath forgotten our faults, sufficiently atoned for by the long oppression of the Mamelukes! Let us sing the mercies of the great Allah.

"Who is he that hath saved from the dangers of the sea and the rage of his enemies victory's favoured son? Who is he that hath led safe and unharmed to the banks of the Nile the brave men of the west?

"It is the great Allah, the great Allah, who is no longer angry with us. Let us sing the mercies of the great Allah.

"The Mameluke beys had put their trust in their horses. The Mameluke beys had set their infantry in battle array.

"But the favoured son of victory, at the head of the brave men of the west, hath destroyed the footmen and the horsemen of the Mamelukes.

"As the morning dews which rise in the morning from the Nile, are dispersed by the rays of the sun, so hath the army of the Mamelukes been dispersed by the brave men of the west, because the great Allah is at present angry with the Mamelukes, because the brave men of the west are as the apple of the right eye of the great Allah."

Bonaparte was desirous, in order to go further into the manners of the Arabs, of being present and taking a part in their festivals. He was present at that of the Nile, which is one of the greatest in Egypt. This river is the benefactor of the country, and therefore is held in great veneration by the inhabitants, and is the subject of a species of worship. During the inundation, the river is introduced into Cairo by a great canal; a dike prevents its issuing into this canal until it has attained a certain height; at that time it is cut, and the day fixed for this operation is a day of rejoicing. A proclamation of the height to which the river has risen is then made, and when there are hopes of a great inundation a public rejoicing takes place, for it is a sign of future plenty. It is on the 18th of August (1st Fructidor) that this sort of fête is celebrated. Bonaparte had issued orders for all his army to be under arms, and had drawn them up on the banks of the canal. An immense concourse had assembled, and witnessed with joy the brave men of the west taking a part in their public rejoicings. Bonaparte, at the head of his staff, accompanied the principal authorities of the country. The first thing was for a sheik to proclaim the height to which the Nile had risen: it was twenty-five feet, which occasioned great joy. The next thing was to cut the dike. The whole of the French artillery resounded at once, at the moment when the water of the river poured in. According to custom a great number of boats hastened to the canal, in order to obtain the prize appointed for that which should first get there. Bonaparte himself delivered the prize. A multitude of men and boys plunged into the waters of the Nile, attributing various beneficial effects to this ablution. Women also threw in hair and pieces of stuff. Bonaparte then ordered the city to be illuminated, and the day concluded with entertainments. The feast of the Prophet was celebrated with no less pomp; Bonaparte repaired to the great Mosque, seated himself on cushions, cross-legged like the sheiks, and repeated with them the litanies of the Prophet, slowly moving the upper part of his body to and fro, and shaking his head. He edified the entire holy college by his piety. He then attended the banquet given by the grand sheik elected that day.

It was by such means that the young general, as profound a politician as he was a great captain, contrived to ingratiate himself with the people. While he temporarily indulged their prejudices, he laboured for the diffusion in that quarter of the light of science, by creating the celebrated institute of Egypt. He assembled the scientific men and artists whom he had brought with him, and, associating with them some of the better informed of his officers, composed that institute to which he appropriated revenues and one of the greatest palaces in Cairo. Some were to occupy themselves in making an accurate description, and preparing a finished map of the country; others were to explore its ruins, and afford new light to history; others, again, were to study its natural productions, to make observations useful to natural philosophy, astronomy, and natural history; others were to employ themselves in devising means for introducing improvements in the condition of the inhabitants, by means of machinery, canals, works upon the Nile, and processes adapted to this peculiar soil, so different from that of Europe. If Fortune had some day to deprive us of that beautiful country, at least she could not deprive us of the acquisition science was about to make in that quarter; a monument was in preparation which was to reflect honour on the genius and the perseverance of our men of science, in the same degree that the expedition did credit to the heroism of our soldiers.

Monge was the first who obtained the presidency; Bonaparte was but the second. He proposed the following subjects: To inquire the best mode of building wind and water mills; to find a substitute for the hop, which does not grow in Egypt, for the making of beer; to determine the spots most adapted to the cultivation of the vine; to settle upon the best means for procuring water to the citadel of Cairo; to dig wells in different spots in the desert; to inquire the means of clarifying and cooling the water of the Nile; to devise some useful application of the rubbish with which the city of Cairo, as well as all the ancient towns of Egypt, was encumbered; and to discover materials wherewith to manufacture gunpowder in Egypt. Some judgment may be formed from these inquiries alone of the bent of the general's mind. Instantly were engineers, draughtsmen, and scientific men dispersed throughout all the provinces, to begin describing and making a map of the country. Such were the first objects to which this rising colony turned its attention, and the manner in which the founder directed its operations.

The conquest of the provinces of Lower and Middle Egypt had been effected without difficulty, and had cost only a few skirmishes with the Arabs. A forced march upon Belbeys had been sufficient to drive Ibrahim Bey back into Syria. Desaix was waiting for the autumn, to take Upper Egypt from Murad Bey, who had retired thither with the wreck of his army.

But during this period fortune was preparing for Bonaparte the most direful reverses. On leaving Alexandria he had strongly recommended admiral Bruys to keep his squadron safe from the English, either by getting it within the harbour of Alexandria, or by taking it to Corfu; but above all not to stay in the road of Aboukir, for it was much better to fall in with an enemy when under sail, than to receive him when at anchor. A warm discussion had arisen on the question whether ships of eighty and one hundred and twenty guns could be taken into the harbour of Alexandria. There was no doubt as to the others, but the two eighty gun ships and the one hundred and twenty gun ship would have to be lightened sufficient to enable them to draw three feet less water. For this purpose it would be necessary to take out their guns, or to construct half-pontoons. Admiral Bruys would not take his squadron into the harbour on such terms. He conceived that if compelled to adopt such precautions for his three largest ships, he never should be able to get out of the harbour when in face of the enemy, and that he might thus be blockaded by a squadron of very inferior force! he therefore made up his mind to proceed to Corfu. But, being strongly attached to general Bonaparte, he would not sail before he had received intelligence of his entry into Cairo, and his establishment in Egypt. The time which he spent, either in sounding the channels of Alexandria, or in waiting for news from Cairo, caused his discomfiture, and occasioned one of the most fatal events of the revolution, and one of those which, at that period, had the greatest influence on the destinies of the world.

Admiral Bruceys was moored in the road of Aboukir. That road forms a very regular semicircle. Our thirteen ships formed a semicircle parallel to the shore. The admiral, in order to secure his line of mooring had supported it at one extremity upon a small island called the islet of Aboukir. He never imagined that a ship could pass between that islet and his line to take him in the rear; and in that belief he thought he had done sufficient by placing there a battery of twelve pounders, for the sole purpose of preventing the enemy from landing there. He considered himself so impregnable on this side, that he had placed his worst ships there. He felt more uneasy in respect of the other extremity of his semicircle. On this side he deemed it possible the enemy might pass between the shore and his line of mooring, so he had there placed his strongest and best officered ships. Moreover, he felt secure from an important circumstance, and that was, that this line being to the south, and the wind blowing from the north, an enemy that would attempt to attack on this side would have the wind right against him, and would hardly expose himself to fight under such a disadvantage.

In this situation, protected on his left by an islet, which he deemed strong enough for closing the road, and on his right by his best ships and by the wind, he awaited in security the intelligence that was to settle the time of his departure.

Nelson, after visiting the Archipelago, and having returned to the Adriatic, Naples, and Sicily, had at length obtained certain intelligence of the landing of the French at Alexandria. He immediately steered for that place in order to come up with and to fight their squadron. He sent a frigate to find it out, and observe its position. This frigate, having discovered it in the road of Aboukir, was able to examine our line at her leisure. If the admiral, who had a great number of frigates and light vessels in the harbour of Alexandria, had taken the precaution of having a few of them under sail, he could have kept the English always aloof, have prevented them from observing his line, and have had sufficient notice of their nearing him. Unfortunately, he did nothing of the kind. The English frigate, having made her observations, returned to Nelson, who being informed of all the particulars of our position, immediately steered right in for Aboukir. He arrived there on the 14th Thermidor (August 1st, 1798,) about six in the evening. Admiral Bruceys was at dinner; he immediately ordered the signal for battle to be given. But so little was the enemy expected, that the hammocks were not stowed away on board any of the ships, and part of the crews were on shore. The admiral despatched officers to send the seamen on board, and to collect part of those who were in the transports. He never thought that Nelson would dare attack him the same evening, and believed that he had plenty of time to get the reinforcements for which he had applied.

Nelson resolved to make the attack immediately, and to try a daring manœuvre, on which he hoped the victory would depend. He was determined to fall upon our line on the left, that is to say, by the islet of Aboukir, to pass between that islet and our squadron, in spite of the danger of shoals, and thus place himself between the shore and our line of mooring. This manœuvre was a dangerous one, but the intrepid Englishman did not hesitate. The number of ships was equal on both sides, namely, thirteen sail of the line. Nelson attacked about eight in the evening. His manœuvre was not at first quite successful. The Culloden, in attempting to pass between Aboukir islet and our line, got on a shoal. The Goliath, which followed her, was more fortunate, and went on; but owing to the wind, she drifted past our first ship, and could not bring to till opposite to the third. The English ships, the Zealous, the Audacious, the Theseus, and the Orion, followed this movement, and succeeded in placing themselves between our line and the shore. They advanced as far as the Tonnant, which was our eighth, and thus engaged the whole of our left and centre. Their other ships advanced outside the line, and placed it between two fires. As the French squadron never expected an attack of this description, the guns on the side next to the shore were not yet cleared, and our first two ships could fire on one side only: the consequence was, that one of them was disabled, and the other dismantled. But in the centre where L'Orient, the admiral's ship, was, the firing was terrible. The Bellerophon, one of Nelson's best ships, had her rigging shot away, was dismantled, and was obliged to bring to. Other English ships, dreadfully crippled, were also compelled to quit the battle. Admiral Bruceys had received no more than part of his complement of seamen; nevertheless he still kept his ground with advantage; he even hoped, in spite of the success of Nelson's manœuvre, to gain the victory, if the orders which he gave at this moment to his right were executed. The English had engaged only the left and the centre; our right, composed of our five best ships, had no enemy before it. Admiral Bruceys signalled it to make sail, and to bring itself round outside the line of battle. This manœuvre succeeding, the English ships that attacked us from without would then have been between two fires, but the signals were not perceived. In such a case, a lieutenant ought not to hesitate to run into danger, and to fly to the relief of his commander. Rear-admiral Villeneuve, a brave but irresolute man, continued motionless, still waiting for orders. Our left and our centre remained, therefore, between two fires. Nevertheless, the admiral and his captains performed prodigies of valour, and gloriously sustained the honour of the flag. We had lost two ships; the English also had lost two, one of which was aground and the other dismantled: our fire was greater than theirs. The unfortunate Bruceys was wounded; he would not leave the deck of his ship. "An admiral," said he, "ought to die in the act of giving orders." A cannon-ball killed him on his quarter-deck. About eleven o'clock a fire broke out on board the magnificent ship L'Orient. She blew up. This tremendous explosion suspended for a short time this obstinate conflict. Without suffering themselves to be dispirited, our five ships in action, the Franklin, the Tonnant, the Peuple Souverain, the Spartiate, and the Aquilon, kept up their fire the whole of the night. There still would have been time for our right to weigh anchor, and to come to their assistance. Nelson trembled for the execution of this manœuvre; he was so crippled that he could not have sustained the attack. At length Villeneuve made sail, but it was but to stand out to sea and to save his wing, which he did not think could be exposed with any chance of success against Nelson. Three of his ships threw themselves upon the coast: he escaped with the other two, together with two frigates, and sailed for Malta. The engagement had lasted upwards of fifteen hours. All the crews of the ships attacked had performed prodigies of valour. The brave captain Du Petit-Thouars had two of his limbs shot off. He ordered snuff to be brought him, remained on his quarter-deck, and, like Brueys, waited till a cannon-ball carried him off. The entire of our squadron, excepting the two ships and two frigates carried off by Villeneuve, was destroyed. Nelson was so crippled that he could not pursue the ships that had taken to flight.

Such was the famous naval battle of Aboukir, the most disastrous that the French navy had ever sustained, and one the military consequences of which must necessarily prove the most prejudicial. The fleet which had carried the French to Egypt, which might have either afforded them relief or assistance, which was to second their movements on the coast of Syria, had there been any to execute, which was to overawe the Porte, to force it to put up with false reasoning, and to oblige it to permit the invasion of Egypt, which finally, in case of reverse, was to convey the French back to their country,—that fleet was destroyed. The French ships were burned, but they had not been burned by themselves, a circumstance which was quite another thing so far as the moral effect was concerned. The news of this loss spread rapidly in Egypt, and for a moment filled the army with despair. Bonaparte received the tidings with imperturbable composure. "Well," said he, "we must die in this country, or get out of it as great as the ancients." He wrote to Kléber. "This will oblige us to do greater things than we ever intended. We must keep ourselves ready." The great soul of Kléber was worthy of being thus addressed. "Yes," replied Kléber, "we must do great things. I am preparing myself accordingly." The courage of these great men supported the army, and made it retain its self-respect. Bonaparte strove to divert the thoughts of the soldiers by various expeditions, and soon made them forget this disaster. At the fête given to commemorate the founding of the republic, celebrated on the 1st Vendémiaire, he would yet excite their imagination: he had engraved on Pompey's Pillar the names of the first forty soldiers slain in Egypt. These were the forty who had fallen in the attack of Alexandria. These forty names of men sprung from the villages of France were thus associated with the immortality of Pompey and Alexandria. He addressed this grand and extraordinary language to his army, in which was summed up his own remarkable history.

"Soldiers,

"We celebrate the first day of the year VII. of the republic.

"Five years since the independence of the French people was threatened; but you took Toulon: this was a presage of the destruction of your enemies.

"A year afterwards you were fighting with the Austrians at Dego.

"The following year you were on the summits of the Alps.

"Two years since you were in conflict with Mantua, and you gained the famous victory of St. George.

"Last year you were at the sources of the Drave and the Isongo, on your return from Germany.

"Who would then have said that you would this day be on the banks of the Nile, in the centre of the old continent?

"From the Englishman, celebrated in arts and commerce, down to the hideous and ferocious Bedouin, the world has its eyes fixed upon you.

"Soldiers, you have an extraordinary destiny to fulfil, because you are worthy of what you have done, and of the opinion that is entertained of you. You either will die with honour, like the brave men whose names are inscribed on this pyramid, or else you will return to your country covered with laurels and with the admiration of all nations.

"During the five months that we have been far away from Europe, we have been the object of the unceasing solicitude of our countrymen. On this day, forty millions of citizens are celebrating the era of representative governments: forty millions of citizens are thinking of you; they all say, 'It is to their labours and to their blood, that we are indebted for the general peace, for repose, for the prosperity of commerce, and for the blessings of civil liberty.'"

1798. Aug.
(Thermidor.
Fructidor.)

The effect produced by the Egypt expedition and the battle of

THE DIRECTORY.

Aboukir.—The Porte proclaimed war against France.

795

CHAPTER XIV.

WHAT EFFECT THE EGYPT EXPEDITION PRODUCED IN EUROPE.—DISASTROUS CONSEQUENCES OF THE NAVAL BATTLE OF ABOUKIR.—WAR PROCLAIMED BY THE PORTE.—THE EFFORTS MADE BY ENGLAND TO FORM A NEW LEAGUE.—CONFERENCES WITH AUSTRIA AT SELE.—PROGRESS OF THE NEGOTIATIONS OF RASTATT.—RENEWED COMMOTIONS IN HOLLAND, SWITZERLAND, AND THE ITALIAN REPUBLICS.—ALTERATION OF THE CISALPINE CONSTITUTION; THE DIRECTORY GREATLY EMBARRASSED IN REGARD TO THIS MATTER.—OUR SITUATION AT HOME.—A NEW OPPOSITION DECLARES ITSELF IN THE COUNCILS.—A GENERAL INCLINATION DISPLAYED IN FAVOUR OF WAR.—THE CONScription ACT.—FINANCES OF THE YEAR VII.—RESUMPTION OF HOSTILITIES.—THE ROMAN STATES INVADED BY THE NEAPOLITAN ARMY.—CONQUEST OF THE KINGDOM OF NAPLES BY GENERAL CHAMPIONNET.—ABDICATION OF THE KING OF PIEDMONT [SARDINIA].

THIS expedition to Egypt remained a mystery in Europe long after the departure of our fleet. The capture of Malta induced more certain conjectures. This place, reputed impregnable, and taken in their way, cast a halo of extraordinary renown around the French argonauts. The landing in Egypt, the occupation of Alexandria, the battle of the Pyramids, electrified all France and Europe. The name of Bonaparte, which had appeared so great when it came from the Alps, produced a still more singular and striking effect when coming from the remote countries of the east. Bonaparte and Egypt were in every body's mouth. The plans already executed were as nothing to the still more gigantic schemes yet in preparation. Bonaparte was going, it was said, to traverse Syria and Arabia, and to make a rush upon Constantinople or India.

The unfortunate battle of Aboukir came, not to destroy the spell of the enterprise, but to revive all the hopes of the enemies of France, and accelerate the success of their plots. England, who was extremely alarmed for her commercial power, and was only waiting for a favourable moment to turn new enemies against us, had filled Constantinople with her intrigues. The Grand Signor was not sorry to see the Mamelukes punished, but he was by no means minded to lose Egypt. M. de Talleyrand, who was to have gone to offer explanations to the divan, had not set out. The agents of England had a clear field. They persuaded the Porte that the ambition of France was insatiable; that after disturbing Europe, she would turn the East upside down, and that in violation of an ancient alliance she had invaded the richest provinces of the Turkish empire. These suggestions, and money distributed in the divan, would not have been powerful enough to decide it if the fine fleet of Brueys could have come to cannonade the Dardanelles; but the battle of Aboukir deprived the French of all their ascendancy in the Levant, and gave to England a decided preponderance. The Porte solemnly proclaimed war against France*, and, for the sake of a province she had long lost, she quarrelled with her natural friend, and connected herself with her most formidable enemies, Russia and England. The sultan ordered an army to be collected to go and recover Egypt. This circumstance placed the French in an extremely difficult position. Separated from France, and deprived of all relief by the victorious fleets of England, they were, in addition, exposed to the irruption of all the hordes of the east. The French were no more than about thirty thousand to struggle against such a host of perils.

Nelson, now victorious, proceeded to Naples to refit his crippled squadron, and to receive the honours of a triumph. In spite of the treaties which connected the court of Naples with France, and which forbade her to give any relief to our enemies, all the ports and dockyards of Sicily were open to Nelson. He was himself received with extraordinary honours. The king and queen came to meet him on his entering port, and called him the hero and liberator of the Mediterranean. It now began to be the talk that Nelson's triumph ought to be the signal for a general uprising; that the powers ought to take advantage of the moment when the most formidable army of France and her greatest captain were penned up in Egypt, to march against her, and to fling back her soldiers and her principles upon her interior. Such suggestions were diligently offered at every one of the foreign courts. A correspondence was set on foot with Tuscany and Piedmont to rouse their hitherto disguised hatred. Now was the time, it was said, to second the court of Naples, to make leagues against the common enemy, to rise all at once on the rear of the French, and to slay them from one end of the peninsula to the other. Austria was told that she ought to take advantage of the moment, when the Italian powers should take the French in the rear, so as to attack them in front, and to recover Italy from them. There was no great difficulty in doing this, for Bonaparte and his terrible army were no longer on the Adige. Recourse was had to the empire, despoiled of part of its states, and compelled to cede the left bank of the Rhine; the utmost was done to get Prussia to secede from her neutrality; lastly, such means were used with the emperor Paul as were calculated to act upon his morbid disposition, and to make him decide on furnishing that assistance so long and so vainly promised by Catharine.

These suggestions could not fail to be well received at all the courts; but they were not all of them in a condition to comply therewith. Those nearest to France were the most exasperated, and most disposed to spurn the revolution from them; but from the very circumstance that they stood nearer to the republican colossus, they were obliged to exercise greater reserve and caution before they entered into a contest with it. Russia, the farthest removed from France, and the least exposed to her vengeance, either from her remote position, or by reason of the moral state of her people, made up her mind more readily. Catharine, whose able policy had always tended to place the West in perplexities, either to afford an opportunity for her interference with its policy, or obtain time for effecting her purposes in Poland,—Catharine had not carried her policy along with her. This policy is inborn in the Russian cabinet; it proceeds from her very position: that cabinet may change its proceedings or its means, just as the sovereign may happen to be crafty or violent; but it constantly points, by an irresistible impulse, to the same end. The intelligent Catharine had contented herself with affording hopes and relief to the emigrants; she had preached the crusade without sending a single soldier. Her successor was about to pursue the same end, but with his peculiar tone of mind. That prince, violent and almost insane, but at any rate sufficiently generous, had at first appeared to disavow Catharine's policy, and refused to execute the treaty of alliance concluded with England and Austria; but after this momentary deviation, he had soon returned to the policy of his cabinet. He was observed to afford an asylum to the pretender, and take emigrants into his pay after the treaty of Campo-Formio. He had been persuaded that it was he who ought to make himself the chief of the European nobility threatened by the demagogues. The step taken by the order of Malta, who constituted him their protector, contributed to unsettle his mind, and he embraced the idea held out to him with all the facility of transition, and with all the ardour characteristic of Russian princes. He made an offer of his protection to the empire, and would tender himself guarantee for its integrity. The capture of Malta filled him with indignation, and he offered the co-operation of his armies against France. England triumphed, therefore, at St. Petersburg as at Constantinople, and was making enemies heretofore irreconcilable go hand in hand with each other.

* 18th Fructidor, year VI. (4 September.)

The same enthusiasm was not manifested every where. Prussia found herself too much benefited by her neutrality and by the exhaustion of Austria, to have any desire to interfere in the struggle of the two systems. She merely watched her frontiers towards Holland and France, in order to prevent the revolutionary infection. She had placed her armies in such a manner as to form a cordón sanitaire. The empire, which had learned to its cost to appreciate the power of France, and which was always liable to become the theatre of war, was anxious for peace. Even the dispossessed princes wished for it also, because they were sure of obtaining indemnities on the right bank. The ecclesiastical princes alone, threatened with a disannexation from the Church, wished for war. The Italian powers of Piedmont and Tuscany wanted nothing better than an opportunity, but they trembled under the iron hand of the French republic. They were waiting till Naples or Austria gave them the signal. With respect to Austria, although she might be the best disposed of the courts forming the monarchical league, she yet hesitated with her usual dilatoriness to declare herself, and, above all, had fears on account of her subjects, already much exhausted by the war. France had opposed to Austria two new republics, Switzerland and Rome, one on her flank, the other in Italy, which had greatly exasperated her, and in every respect inclined her to engage in the contest anew; but she would have taken no notice of these fresh encroachments of the republican league, if she had been indemnified by some acquisitions. It was with this view that she had proposed the conferences at Selz. These conferences were to take place in the summer of 1798, not far from the congress of Rastadt, and concurrent in point of time with the congress at that place. On their result would depend the determination of Austria and the success of the efforts made to form a new league.

François (of Neuchâteau) was the envoy chosen by France. This was why the little town of Selz had been selected. It was situated on the bank of the Rhine not far from Rastadt, but on the left bank. This last condition was necessary, because the constitution prohibited a director, on relinquishing office, to leave France till the end of a specified term. M. de Cobentzel was the envoy for Austria. From the first moment the bias of that power was plainly perceptible. Her desire was to be indemnified by an extension of territory for the conquests which the republican system had made in Switzerland and Italy. France was particularly desirous that some understanding should be come to with respect to the events at Vienna, and that some satisfaction should be made for the insult offered to Bernadotte. But Austria carefully avoided to render any explanation on that point, and constantly adjourned that portion of the negotiation. The French negotiator reverted to it incessantly; at any rate he had orders to be content with the slightest satisfaction. France would have wished that Thugot the minister, apparently in disgrace, should be so in reality, and that some excuse, the most insignificant in the world, should be made to Bernadotte in reparation of the insult he had received. M. de Cobentzel contented himself by stating that his court disapproved of what had taken place at Vienna, but he did not accede to the notion of making any satisfaction whatever, and continued to insist on the extension of territory he claimed. It was clear that the concessions sought for wounded pride would not be granted till the demands of ambition had been gratified. Austria alleged that the institution of the two republics, Roman and Helvetic, and the manifest influence exercised over the Cisalpine, Ligurian, and Batavian republics, were violations of the treaty of Campo-Formio, and a dangerous alteration in the state of Europe: she maintained that France, if she desired that her recent usurpations should be forgiven should concede indemnifications; and as such indemnification, the Austrian negotiator demanded new provinces in Italy. He wanted the line of the Adige to be carried further, and that the Austrian possessions should extend to the Adna and the Po, that is to say, that they were to give the emperor the greater half of the Cisalpine republic. M. de Cobentzel proposed to indemnify the Cisalpine republic with a portion of Piedmont; the remainder of the kingdom was to have been given to the grand duke of Tuscany; and the king of Sardinia would have taken the states of the Church as an indemnity. Thus at the price of an augmentation of territory for himself in Lombardy, and for his family in Tuscany; the emperor would have sanctioned the institution of the Helvetic republic, the overthrow of the pope, and the dismemberment of the Piedmontese [Sardinian] monarchy. France could not assent to these proposals for a host of reasons. In the first place she could not dismember the Cisalpine, as yet hardly formed, and again place under the Austrian yoke the very provinces she had enfranchised, to whom she had promised, and whom she had made pay for liberty; lastly, she had, in the preceding year, concluded a treaty with the king of Piedmont [Sardinia], by which she guaranteed his dominions to him. This warranty was in particular vouched against Austria. France then could not sacrifice Piedmont; consequently François (of Neufchâteau) could not give his adherence to the proposition of M. de Cobentzel. They parted without having settled any thing. No satisfaction was made for the occurrence at Vienna. M. de Degelmann, who was to have been sent to Paris in the character of ambassador, did not arrive, and it was stated that the two cabinets would continue to correspond through their ministers at the congress of Rastadt. This parting was generally considered as a kind of rupture.

From that time it became evident that Austria had taken her resolutions; but before recommencing hostilities with France, she wished to make herself certain of the concurrence of the principal powers of Europe. M. de Cobentzel set out for Berlin, and was to proceed from Berlin to St. Petersburg. The object of this running to and fro was to assist England in the formation of a new league. The emperor of Russia had sent to Berlin one of the most distinguished personages in his empire, the prince Repnin; M. de Cobentzel was to unite his efforts with those of prince Repnin and the English legation to draw the young king over to their side.

France, on her part, had sent to Berlin one of her most illustrious citizens; this was Sieyès. The reputation of Sieyès had been immense before the reign of the convention. It had vanished under the level of the committee of public welfare. It had suddenly revived when the position of individuals in society could renew their natural advantages; and the name of Sieyès had again become the greatest name in France after Bonaparte; for in France a reputation for profound thinking, next to a high military renown, produces the greatest effect. Sieyès was one of the two great men of the time. Always discontented with, and criticising the government, not like Bonaparte from ambition, but from a feeling of ill-temper against a constitution which he had not framed, he could not be otherwise than a stumbling-block. The idea, therefore, was started of giving him an embassy. This would afford an opportunity of getting rid of him, for making him useful, and above all, for furnishing him with some means of existence. The revolution had taken away all from him, when it abolished ecclesiastical benefices. A dignified embassy would allow their being restored to him. The most important embassy was that of Berlin, for there were no envoys either in Austria, Russia, or England. Berlin was the theatre of all intrigues, and Sieyès, though not the best of all practical men, was nevertheless a keen and a careful observer. Besides, his high reputation peculiarly qualified him to represent France, especially in Germany, for which he was better suited than for any other country.

The king was by no means pleased to see such a celebrated revolutionist as Sieyès arrive in his capital, yet he durst not refuse him. Sieyès conducted himself with propriety and dignity; he was received as others had been, but left entirely to himself. Like all our envoys abroad, he was carefully watched, and as it were removed from society. The Germans were very curious to have an interview with him, but they durst not. He possessed no influence whatever at the court of Berlin. It was a sense of his interests that supported the king of Prussia against the urgent solicitations of England, Austria, and Russia.

While every endeavour was being made in Germany to decide the king of Prussia, the court of Naples, in the plenitude of her inconsiderate rejoicings since Nelson's victory, was making mighty preparations for war, and redoubled her solicitations at the courts of Tuscany and Piedmont. France, by a species of acquiescence, had suffered it to occupy the duchy of Benevento, but this concession did not render Naples more tranquil. This court flattered herself that in the approaching war she should gain half of the papal dominions.

The negotiations at Rastadt went on successfully for France. Treillard, who had become director, and Bonaparte, who had gone to Egypt, had been succeeded at the congress by Jean Debry and Roberjot. After having obtained the line of the Rhine, a host of military, commercial, and political questions had to be settled. Our deputation had become extremely encroaching, and demanded much more than it had a right to obtain. In the first place, it required all the islands in the Rhine, which was an important article, especially in a military point of view. It next insisted on keeping Kehl and its territory, opposite to Strasburg; and Cassel and its territory, opposite to Mentz. It insisted that the commercial bridge between the two Breisachs should be restored; that fifty acres of land facing the old bridge of Huningen should be granted to us, and that the important fortress of Ehrenbreitstein should be demolished. It next demanded that the navigation of the Rhine, and of all the German rivers falling into the Rhine, should be free; that all the passage tolls should be abolished; that goods should be subject to the same customs on both sides of the river; that the towing-paths should be kept up by the owners of lands adjoining the river. It lastly demanded an ultimate and highly important condition, namely, that the debts of the countries on the left bank ceded to France should be transferred to the countries on the right bank, intended to be given as indemnities.

The deputation of the empire replied with justice, that the line of the Rhine ought to afford an equal security to both nations: that it was the reason of an equal security which had been more particularly alleged in order to cause this line to be granted to France; but that this security would no longer exist for Germany, if France should keep all the offensive points, as well by reserving for herself the islands, as by appropriating Cassel, Kehl, and fifty acres of land opposite to Huningen, &c. The deputation of the empire, therefore, would not admit the demands of France, and proposed as the real boundary line the Thalweg; that is, the middle* of the principal navigable branch. All the islands on the right of this line were to belong to Germany, all those on the left were to belong to France. Thus they placed between the two nations the real obstacle that converts a river into a military line, namely, the principal navigable branch. As a consequence of this principle, the deputation demanded the demolition of Cassel and Kehl, and refused the fifty acres opposite Huningen. The deputation was opposed to France retaining any offensive point, while Germany was to lose them all. With less reason, the deputation refused to concur in the demolition of Ehrenbreitstein, which was inconsistent with the safety of the city of Coblenz. The deputation accorded the free navigation of the Rhine, but demanded it for the whole length of the stream, and wanted France to compel the Batavian republic to recognise this privilege. As for the free navigation of the rivers of the interior of Germany, that article exceeded, said the deputation, its limits of action, and concerned each state individually. The towage-path was ceded. The deputation desired that every thing relative to passage tolls and their abolition should be referred to a treaty of commerce. Lastly, it proposed, with respect to the countries on the left bank ceded to France, that they should continue to bear the charge of their own debts, on the principle that the debt follows its pledge, and that the estates of the greater nobility should be considered as private property, and acknowledged by that title. The deputation demanded as a matter of consequence, that the French troops should evacuate the right bank, and raise the blockade of Ehrenbreitstein, because it reduced the inhabitants to famine.

These contrary claims gave rise to a series of notes and counter-notes during the whole summer. At length, about the month of Vendémiaire, year VI. (August and September, 1798), the Thalweg was admitted by the French deputation. The principal navigable branch was taken for the boundary between France and Germany, and the islands were consequently to be divided upon this principle. France consented to the demolition of Cassel and Kehl, but insisted upon having the island of Petersau, which is placed in the Rhine, a little above Mentz, and of great importance for that place. The Germanic empire consented on its part to the demolition of Ehrenbreitstein. The free navigation of the Rhine and the abolition of passage tolls were conceded. Some arrangement had yet to be made concerning the commercial bridges, the possessions of the greater nobility, the administration of the laws of emigration in the ceded countries; and as to the debts of those countries, the secular princes had declared that every concession consistent with the honour and the security of the empire ought to be made, to obtain that peace which was so necessary to Germany. It was evident that most of those princes wished to treat; Prussia induced them so to do. As to Austria, she began to exhibit the very opposite inclinations, and to excite the resentment of the ecclesiastical princes against the tenor of the negotiations. The deputies of the empire, while they declared for peace, behaved with the utmost caution on account of the fear which Austria caused them, and sailed close to the wind on their tack between that power and Russia. As for the French ministers, they exhibited a certain austerity of demeanour; they lived apart, and in a sort of seclusion, as did all our ministers in Europe. Such was the state of the congress at the conclusion of the summer of the year VI. (1798.)

While these occurrences were taking place in the east and in Europe, France, still charged with the direction of the five republics instituted around her, had troubles without end. These consisted of the everlasting difficulties that presented themselves in giving a direction to public opinion, in keeping up an army at home, in maintaining a good understanding between our ambassadors and our generals, and keeping up friendly relations with the neighbouring states.

It had been necessary almost every where to do what had been done in France, that is, after striking a blow at one party, soon afterwards to exterminate another. In Holland, on the 3rd Pluviôse (January 22nd), there had been executed a kind of 18th of Fructidor, to throw out the federalists, to abolish the old regulations, and to give a military constitution to the country, somewhat resembling that of France. But this revolution had turned too much in favour of the democrats. These latter had engrossed all the powers. After excluding from the national assembly all the deputies whom they looked upon as suspected characters, they had constituted themselves into a directory and two councils, without having recourse to new elections. They had by this mode of procedure intended to imitate the national convention of France, and its celebrated decrees of the 18th and 18th Fructidor. They had since possessed themselves of the entire direction of affairs, and they went beyond the line which the French directory had prescribed to all the republics under its care. General Daendels, one of the most distinguished men of the moderate party, arrived at Paris, came to an understanding with our directors, and returned to Holland, to inflict on the democrats there an extermination similar to that which they had recently experienced in Paris, by excluding them from the legislative body by the separation of parties (scissions). Thus, whatever was done in France, had to be repeated immediately afterwards in the states dependent on her. Joubert was ordered to support Daendels. The latter joined the ministers, and, with the aid of the Batavian and French troops, dispersed the directory and the councils, formed a provisional government, and issued orders for new elections. Delacroix, the French minister, who had supported the democrats, was recalled. These scenes produced their ordinary effect. It gave a handle to the assertion that the republican constitutions could not go alone, that they were every moment requiring the support of bayonets, and that the new states found themselves in the most complete dependence on France.

In Switzerland, the establishment of the republic, one and indivisible, could not take place without fighting. The small cantons of Schwytz, Zug, and Glarus, excited by the priests and the Swiss aristocrats, had sworn to oppose the adoption of the new system. General Schaumburg, without intending to reduce them by force, had prohibited all intercourse between the other cantons with the latter. The refractory petty cantons immediately took up arms and invaded Lucerne, where they committed great pillage and spoliation. Schauburg had marched against them, and, after some obstinate combats, had reduced them to sue for peace. The pledge of that peace had been the acceptance of the new constitution. It had even been necessary to employ fire and sword in quelling the peasants of the Upper Valais, who had made an incursion into the Lower Valais for the purpose of re-establishing their dominion there. Notwithstanding these obstacles, in Prairial (May, 1798), the constitution was every where in force. The Helvetic government had assembled at Aarau, composed of a directory and two councils it began to endeavour to gain experience in the administration of the country. The new French commissioner was Rapinat, the brother-in-law of Rewbell. The Helvetic government was to come to some arrangement with Rapinat respecting the administration of affairs. Circumstances rendered this administration an arduous affair. The priests and the aristocrats, posted in the mountains, were on the look-out for a favourable moment to raise the population afresh. The government had to be on its watch against them, to maintain and to satisfy the French army which was had to oppose them, to organize the administration, and to put itself in a situation to exist soon in an independent manner. This task was no less difficult for the Helvetic government, than for the French commissioner sent thither.

* The medium flum aqua. Trans.

It was natural that France should seize the funds belonging to the ancient aristocrat cantons, to pay the expenses of the war. The money contained in the chests, and the stores in the magazines formed by the late cantons, were indispensable for the support of her army. This was no more than exercising the most ordinary right of conquest; she might, certainly, have renounced this right; but necessity compelled her to avail herself of it at the moment. Rapinat was therefore ordered to put seals upon every one of the chests. A great number of the Swiss, even among those who had wished for the revolution, considered it very wrong that they should lay hold of the hoards and the stores of the old governments. The Swiss are, like all mountaineers, prudent and brave, but extremely avaricious. They heartily desired that liberty should be brought to their doors, and that they should be freed from their oligarchs, but they had no notion of paying the expenses of the war. While Holland and Italy had supported, almost without complaining, the enormous burden of the longest and most devastating campaigns, the Swiss patriots made a great outcry about a few millions, of which they were robbed. The Helvetic directory, on its part, caused fresh seals to be put over those which had just been placed by Rapinat, and thus protested against the regulation that placed the chests at the disposal of France. Rapinat immediately ordered the seals of the Helvetic directory to be taken off, and declared to that directory that its office was confined to merely administrative functions, that it could not do any thing contrary to the authority of France, and that, in future, its laws and decrees should have no force, unless they contained nothing contrary to the ordinances of the commissioner and of the French general. The enemies of the revolution, and more than one had crept into the Helvetic councils, triumphed on witnessing this contest, and cried out against tyranny. They said that their independence was violated, and that the French republic, who had pretended to bring liberty to their doors, had in reality brought them nought else than subjection and misery. The opposition did not solely manifest itself in the councils, it also existed in the directory and in the local authorities. At Lucerne and at Berne old aristocrats occupied the administrations; they raised obstacles of all sorts against the levy of fifteen millions [francs] assessed upon the ancient noble families for the wants of the army. Rapinat took upon himself to purify the Helvetic government and administrations. By a letter of the 28th Prairial (June 16), he required at the hands of the Helvetic government the dismissal of two directors, named Bay and Pfoiffer, and that of the minister for foreign affairs, and the remodelling of the administrative chambers of Lucerne and Berne. This demand, made with the tone of an order, could not be refused. The dismissals were immediately given, but the rudeness with which Rapinat conducted himself caused a fresh outcry to be raised, and cast all the blame on his own side. He compromised his government, in fact, by openly violating forms, in order to effect changes which could easily have been effected by other means. The French directory lost no time in writing to the Helvetic directory to express its disapprobation of Rapinat's conduct, and to give satisfaction for this open violation of order. Rapinat was recalled; nevertheless the dismissed members continued to be excluded. The Helvetic councils nominated, as successors to the two dismissed directors, Ochs, the originator of the constitution, and colonel Laharpe, brother of the general who had fallen in Italy, one of the originators of the revolution in the Canton de Vaud, and one of the most upright and best intentioned citizens of his country.

A treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, was concluded between the Helvetic and French republics on the 2nd Fructidor (August 19). According to this treaty, whichever of the two powers that should be at war, had a right to require the intervention of the other, and to call upon it for assistance, the extent of which was to be determined according to circumstances. The querent power was to pay the troops that should be furnished by the other; the free navigation of all the rivers of France and Switzerland was mutually stipulated. Two routes were to be opened, the one from France to the Cisalpine, across the Valais and the Simplon; the other from France into Suabia, taking the upward course of the Rhine, and then following the eastern shore of the lake of Constance. In this system of united republics, France thus secured for herself two military high-roads, to take her to the states of her allies, and enable her to debouch rapidly in Italy or in Germany. It has been said that those two roads transferred the theatre of war to the allied states. It was not the roads, but the alliance of France which rendered these states exposed to the liability of becoming the theatre of war. The roads were nought else than a quicker means of occasional transit and protection for them, whenever they took the offensive in Germany or in Italy.

The city of Geneva was incorporated with France, and so was the town of Mûchlihausen. The Italian bailiwicks, which had long wavered between the Cisalpine and the Helvetic republics, declared for the latter, and voted for their incorporation. The Grison leagues, whom the directory would have united with Switzerland, were divided between two rival factions, and hesitated between Austrian and Helvetic domination. The monks and the foreign agents brought about fresh troubles in Unterwalden. They excited the peasants of that valley to rise against the French troops. A most obstinately contested battle took place at Stanz, and it was found necessary to set fire to that unfortunate village before it could be cleared of the fanatics who had there established themselves.

The same difficulties presented themselves on the other side of the Alps. A sort of anarchy prevailed between the subjects of the new states and their governments, between those governments and our armies, and between our ambassadors and our generals. The confusion was frightful. The petty Ligurian republic was inveterate against Piedmont, and determined to introduce the revolution there whatever might be the consequence. A great number of Piedmontese democrats had sought refuge in its interior, and issued therefrom armed and organized, to make incursions into their country, and to attempt to overthrow the royal government. Another band came from the Cisalpine, and had advanced by Domo-d'Ossola. But these attempts had been repulsed, and a crowd of victims uselessly sacrificed. The Ligurian republic had not for all that desisted from harassing the government of Piedmont; it collected and armed a new set of refugees, and intended to make war on its own account. It was with the greatest difficulty that Sotin our minister at Genoa repressed it. Guingéné, our minister at Turin, had on his part no less trouble in replying to the continual complaints of Piedmont, and to restrain that court in carrying out its vengeance upon the patriots.

The Cisalpine was in frightful disorder. While Bonaparte was constituting it, he had not had time to make an exact calculation of the relative proportions that ought to have been observed in the divisions of the territory, and in the number of the functionaries; nor yet to organize the municipal and the financial systems. This little state had for itself alone two hundred and forty representatives. The departments were too numerous; it was devoured by a multitude of officials; it had no regular and uniform system of taxation. With considerable wealth, it had no finances, and it could scarcely find means to pay the subsidy agreed upon for the support of our armies. Moreover, in every other branch the confusion could not be greater. Ever since the exclusion of some members of the council as decreed by Berthier, when he would have compelled the acceptance of the treaty of alliance with France, the revolutionists had retained the ascendancy, and the language of the Jacobins predominated in the councils and the clubs. Our army seconded this movement, and supported all its extravagances. Brune, after completing the subjection of Switzerland, had returned to Italy, where he had been invested with the general command of all the French troops, since the departure of Berthier for Egypt. He was at the head of the most vehement patriots. Lahoz, the commandant of the Lombard troops, whose organization had been commenced under Bonaparte, was attached to the same notions and the same sentiments. Besides all this, there existed other causes of disorder in the misconduct of our officers. They conducted themselves in the Cisalpine as though they had been in a conquered country. They maltreated the inhabitants, exacted billets, to which in accordance to the treaties, they were not entitled, despoiled the places where they took up their abode, frequently availed themselves of requisitions as in time of war, extorted money from the local authorities, and dipped into the municipal chests without alleging any kind of reason beyond their good pleasure. The commandants of fortresses, in particular, committed intolerable exactions. The commandant of Mantua, for instance, had taken upon himself to let out for his own private gain the fishing of the lake. The generals proportioned their exactions to their rank, and, independently of all that they exacted, they made scandalous profits with the trading companies. The contracting company that had the charge of supplying of the army of Italy, allowed the staffs a commission of forty per cent; and some opinion may be formed of its profits before it could make such allowances to those who took care of its interests. As a consequence of desertions, there was not in the ranks half the men entered in the lists, so that the republic was paying double what it ought. Notwithstanding all these malversations, the soldiers were ill paid, and the pay of most of them was several months in arrear. Thus the country which we occupied was dreadfully oppressed by exactions, without our soldiers firing a bit the better. The Cisalpine patriots tolerated all these disorders without complaining, because the staff lent them its support.

At Rome, things went on better. There a commission composed of Daunou, Florent, and Faypoult governed the liberated country with wisdom and integrity. These three men had framed a constitution, which had been adopted, and which, with some trifling exceptions, and the appellations which were not the same, was an exact resemblance of the French constitution. The directors were termed consuls; the council of the ancients was called the senate; and the second council the tribunate. But it was not sufficient to give a constitution, it had to be put in force. It was not, as may easily be imagined, the fanaticism of the Romans that obstructed its establishment, but their indolence. There were no malcontents, except in a few peasants of the Apennines, urged on by the monks, and very easy to bring to subjection. But there was in the inhabitants of Rome, who had been called to compose the consulate, the senate, and the tribunate, a careless and extreme inaptitude for business. It had cost considerable pains to induce them to sit every other day, and they absolutely insisted on summer vacations. To this laziness must be added an absolute inexperience and incapacity in point of administration. There was far more zeal in the Cisalpines, but it was zeal without intelligence and without self-restraint, which rendered it quite as detrimental as carelessness. There was reason to apprehend that, on the departure of the French commission, the Roman government would be broken up by the inaction or retirement of its members. Yet, notwithstanding all this, there was a great desire for public offices at Rome, they were an object of great interest, as is always the case in states devoid of industrious habits.

The commission had put an end to all the corruptions practised at the first moment of our entry into Rome. This commission had taken into its own hands the management of the finances, and directed them with integrity and ability. Faypoult, who was an upright and able functionary, had introduced into the whole Roman state a system of taxation that was well understood. He was thereby enabled to provide for the wants of our army; he had paid up all arrears of pay, not only to the army of Rome, but also to the division that had embarked at Civita-Vecchia. If the finances had been as well conducted in the Cisalpine, the country would not have been so oppressed with exactions, and our soldiers would have wanted for nothing. Military authority was at Rome in every respect subject to the commission. General St. Cyr, who had succeeded Masséna, distinguished himself by strict integrity; but partaking of that fondness for authority now becoming general among his comrades, he appeared dissatisfied at being under the control of the commission. At Milan in particular, considerable dissatisfaction was shown with all that was going on at Rome. The Italian democrats were angry to see the Roman democrats made mere nullities and kept in order by the commission. The French staff on whom the divisions stationed at Rome were dependent, witnessed with vexation a rich portion of the conquered countries evade their grasp, and sighed for the moment when the commission should be divested of its functions.

It would be wrong to charge the French directory with the disorder that prevailed in the allied countries. No power, how strong soever it might be, could have prevented the excesses which distracted them; and as for extortions, the power of Napoleon himself was not sufficient to prevent them in the conquered provinces. What a single individual, in the plenitude of genius and vigour could not effect, a government composed of five members, and placed at immense distance, was still less able of perfecting. Nevertheless, there existed in the majority of our directory the greatest zeal for ensuring the welfare of the new republics, and the most lively indignation against the insolence and exactions of the generals, and against the manifest robberies committed by the companies. With the exception of Barras, who shared in all the profits of the companies, and who was the hope of all the firebrands of Milan, the other four directors denounced with the greatest energy the transactions in Italy. Larévellière in particular, whose strict integrity revolted from such excesses, submitted to the directory a plan which was assented to. His object was, that a commission should continue to direct the Roman government, and keep the military authority within bounds; that an ambassador should be sent to Milan, to represent the government at that place, and to deprive the staff of all influence whatever; that this ambassador should be authorized to make in the Cisalpine constitution necessary alterations, such as reducing the number of the local divisions, the public functionaries, and the members of the councils; that lastly, this ambassador should have for his associate a functionary of sufficient capacity to institute a system of taxation and responsibility. This plan was adopted; Trouvé, late minister of France at Naples, and Faypoult, one of the members of the commission at Rome, were sent to Milan, to carry into execution the measures proposed by Larévellière.

Trouvé was, as soon as he arrived at Milan, to take into his confidence the most intelligent men of the Cisalpine, and to arrange with them as to what alterations it would be necessary to make, either in the constitution or in the officers of the government. When all these changes were resolved upon, he was to get them proposed in the councils of the Cisalpine by deputies under his influence, and in case of need, to support them with the authority of France. At the same time, he was to keep his own power out of sight as far as it was possible.

Trouvé, having repaired from Naples to Milan, acted there in the manner prescribed as his rule of conduct. But it was a difficult matter to conceal the object of his mission. It soon got abroad that he had come to make alterations in the constitution, and especially to reduce the number of offices of every description. The patriots, who were very sensible from the conduct of the ambassador, that the reductions would affect them, became furious. They placed their chief reliance on the staff of the army, which was of itself extremely alienated from the new authority, to which it had to obey, and a scandalous struggle was witnessed between the French legation and the French staff, who were associated with the Italian patriots. Trouvé, and those who visited him, were denounced with extreme violence in the Cisalpine councils. It was alleged that the French minister had come to violate the constitution, and to renew one of those acts of oppression which the directory had exercised upon all the allied republics. Trouvé experienced vexations of every description from the Italian patriots, and of our officers. The latter conducted themselves with the utmost indecency at a ball which he gave, and caused the greatest scandal. These scenes were pitiable, particularly with regard to the effect they produced upon the foreign ministers. Not only was presented to those ministers the spectacle of the most unhappy discussions, but they insulted them at the diplomatic dinners, by drinking before their faces, to the extermination of all kings. The most vehement Jacobinism reigned at Milan. Brune and Lahoy set out for Paris, for the purpose of obtaining the support of Barras. But the directory, previously advised of all circumstances, was not shaken in its resolutions. Lahoy was ordered, at the very moment of his arrival, to leave Paris. As for Brune, he was ordered to return to Milan, and to concur in the changes which Trouvé was about to effect there.

After having accomplished the various necessary amendments in the constitution, Trouvé called together at his own house the most discreet deputies, and laid these amendments before them. They approved of them, but the public feeling was so strong, that they durst not take upon themselves to propose them to the two councils. Trouvé was therefore obliged to display the authority of France, and to exercise ostensibly a power he would have desired to conceal. After all, the mode employed was in point of fact of little consequence. It would have been absurd for Franco, who had created these new republics, and who kept them on foot by her support, not to make the most of her strength for the establishment of that mode of government she deemed the best. The vexatious part of the affair was, that she had not made it the best that could be made on the very first day and at once, so that she might not have occasion to re-enact these acts of her omnipotence. On the 30th of August (13th Fructidor, year VI.), Trouvé assembled the directory and the two councils of the Cisalpine. He presented them with the new constitution and all the administrative and financial laws, which Faypoult had prepared. The councils were reduced from two hundred and forty to one hundred and twenty members. The individuals to be retained in the councils and the government were nominated. A regular system of taxation was established. There were two species of taxes, the personal and the indirect; a system at that time proposed to be introduced into France, and was highly offensive to the patriots. All these alterations were approved of and adopted. Brune had been obliged to obtain the assistance of the French troops; so the rage of the Cisalpine patriots was impotent, and the revolution was effected without serious obstruction. It was decided, moreover, that a speedy convocation of the primary assemblies should take place, for confirming the alterations made in the constitution.

Trouvé's task was performed; but the French government, on witnessing the uproar that minister had excited, conceived that it would not be possible to leave him at Milan, that some other embassy should be given him, and that some one who was a stranger to the late disagreements should be sent to Milan. Unfortunately, the directory allowed to be thrust upon it a ci-devant member of the Jacobins, who had played the part of a base and truckling courtier to Barras, whom he had made his associate in the jobbings of the companies, and put into the way of receiving distinctions. This was Fouché, whose appointment Barras obtained unawares from his colleagues. Fouché set out to succeed Trouvé, and the latter had to repair to Stuttgart. But Brune, taking advantage of the opportunity of Trouvé's departure, took the liberty, with an audacity perfectly unaccountable, unless by the military licentiousness that prevailed at that time, to make the most important alterations in the work of the minister of France. He demanded the resignation of three of the directors nominated by Trouvé; he changed several of the ministers, and made various changes in the constitution. One of the three directors, whose resignation he demanded, Sopranci, having courageously refused to give it, he caused to be forcibly seized by his soldiers and dragged from the palace of government. He then hastened the convocation of the primary assemblies, in order to make them approve of Trouvé's work, amended as it had just been by himself. Fouché, who arrived during this interval, ought to have opposed this convention, and not have allowed alterations that the general had no authority for making; but he let Brune do just as he pleased. Trouvé's amendments, and the more recent amendments of Brune, were approved of by the primary assemblies, who were at once submissive to the military power and the violence of the patriots.

When the French directory obtained information of these particulars, it showed no hesitation. The directory vacated all that Brune had done, displaced him, and left it to Joubert to go and restore matters to the state in which Trouvé had left them. Fouché made objections; he alleged that the new constitution being approved of with the alterations that Brune had introduced, the consequences of recurring to those alterations would be pernicious. He spoke with reason, and he even gained over Joubert to his opinion. But the directory should not have put up with such liberties on the part of its generals, and above all, it did not become the directory to permit them to exercise such authority in the allied states. The directory recalled Fouché himself, (who thus passed no more than a few days in the Cisalpine,) and enjoined the re-establishment of the constitution in every part, such as Trouvé had formed it in the name of France. As for the individuals from whom Brune had wrung their resignation, they were prevailed upon to confirm it, in order to prevent further changes.

The Cisalpine therefore remained constituted as the directory had desired it should be, the few dismissals from office effected by Brune only excepted. But these continual changes, this sharp-shooting, these contests between our civil and military agents, produced the most deplorable effect, depressed the recently-emancipated people, lowered the mother republic in public esteem, and demonstrated the difficulty there was of keeping all these bodies within their proper sphere.

The events in the Cisalpine were urged as matter for severe reproof against the directory: for it is customary to turn every thing into a grievance against a government that is impugned, and to impute to it as subject of blame the very impediments it encounters in carrying out its designs. The double opposition, which began to appear in the councils, attacked in different ways the operations executed in Italy. The patriot opposition had a very simple charge to make: an outrage had been committed, it said, against the independence of an allied republic; nay, even an infraction of the French laws had been committed, for the Cisalpine constitution, which had just been altered, was guaranteed by a treaty of alliance, and that treaty, approved of by the councils, could not be infringed by the directory. As for the constitutional, or moderate opposition, it was natural to reckon upon its approval rather than its reproaches; because the changes made in the Cisalpine were directed against the exclusive patriots. But in this party of the opposition stood Lucien Bonaparte. He was seeking causes of quarrel with the government, and, besides, he considered that he ought to defend the work of his brother, now attacked by the directory. He cried out, like the patriots, that the independence of the allies was attacked, that the treaties were violated, &c.

The two oppositions declared themselves more and more boldly every day. They began to dispute with the directory certain prerogatives with which it was invested by the law of the 19th Fructidor, and which it had occasionally exercised. Thus this law gave it a right to close those clubs or suppress those newspapers whose acts seemed to have a pernicious tendency. The directory had closed some clubs which had become too violent, and suppressed some newspapers which had published false intelligence, evidently devised with a malicious intent. There was one newspaper, among the rest, which alleged that the directory was going to annex the Pays de Vand to France: the directory suppressed it. The patriots inveighed against this arbitrary power, and demanded the repeal of several of the clauses of the law of the 19th Fructidor. The councils decided that these clauses should remain in force until a law was enacted regulating the press; and a report was ordered preliminary to the preparation of that law.

The directory in like manner experienced great opposition in respect of financial matters. It was now occupied in closing the budget for the year VI. (1797-1798), and in bringing forwards the budget for the year VII (1798-1799). The budget for the year VI. had been fixed at six hundred and sixteen millions, but out of the six hundred and sixteen millions there was a deficit of sixty-two millions; and, besides this deficiency, a considerable arrear in the receipts. The creditors, notwithstanding the solemn promise to discharge the consolidated third, had not been paid in full. It was settled that they should receive bills (bons), which should be taken in payment of taxes. The budget for the year VII. had to be settled immediately, as the year was about to commence. The expenditure was fixed at six hundred millions, assuming there would be no new continental war. Some reduction had to be made in the land tax and the personal tax, which were far too high, and to raise the duties on stamp registration, customs, &c. Additional taxes were decreed for the local expenses, and duties payable (octrois) at the gates of towns for the maintenance of the hospitals and other institutions. Notwithstanding this increase, the minister Ramel asserted that the taxes would not produce more at the utmost than three-fourths, to judge from past years, and that it was a gross exaggeration to estimate the effective receipts at four hundred and fifty or five hundred millions. He, therefore, demanded fresh resources to really cover the expenditure of six hundred millions. He proposed a tax on doors and windows, and a tax on salt. With respect to this subject a heated contest ensued. The tax on doors and windows was decreed, and a report on the salt tax was prepared.

There was nothing in these oppositions inherently mischievous, but they afforded the indication of a secret animosity, which only required public calamities to bring it into open action. The directory, very well informed as to the state of Europe, clearly perceived that new dangers were in preparation, and that a revival of hostilities on the continent was about to take place. There was no doubt of this when the movements of the different cabinets were considered.

Cobentzel and Reprin had not been able to make Prussia renounce her neutrality, and had left that kingdom in extreme dissatisfaction. But Paul I., who had been completely gained over, had stipulated a treaty of alliance with Austria, and it was said that his troops were on the march. Austria was actively arming her population. The court of Naples had ordered the enrolment of the entire population. It would have been the height of imprudence not to make preparations, on observing such movements from the banks of the Vistula to the banks of the Volturno. Our armies were extraordinarily reduced by desertion. The directory resolved to provide for their being reunited by a grand institution, which had yet to be formed. The convention had twice drawn upon the population of France, but in an extraordinary manner, without being able to resort to a permanent law for the annual levy of soldiers. In March, 1793, the convention had ordered a levy of three hundred thousand men; in August, in the same year, she had adopted the great and glorious resolution of the levy en masse, generation after generation. Since that, the republic had existed by this measure alone, by compelling those who had taken arms at that period to keep to their flags. But war and disease had destroyed a great number, peace had sent many back to their homes. No more than twelve thousand furloughs had been granted, but there had been ten times as many desertions; and it was hard to be severe against men who had for six years defended their country, and made her triumphant over Europe at the expense of their blood. The squares of the regiments remained, and they were in good condition. It was necessary to fill them up by new levies, and to adopt not so much an extraordinary and temporary expedient, as a general and permanent measure; in short, make a law which should become, in some measure, a component part of the constitution. The conscription was devised.

General Jourdan was the reporter upon this great and useful law, which, like every thing else in this world, has been abused, but which for all that, has saved France, and raised her glory to its greatest elevation. By this law, every Frenchman was declared to be a soldier by right, during a certain period of his life. This period was from the age of twenty to twenty-five. The young men of that age were to be divided into five classes, year by year. The government was to call out these men as they were wanted, beginning with the first class, that is the twenty-year old class, and with the youngest of each class. The government could call out the five classes one after the other, in proportion and to the full extent of its requirements. In time of peace, the conscripts were to be obliged to serve till they were twenty-five years old. Thus the duration of a soldier's service would vary from one year to five, assuming that they were taken from twenty-five to twenty years. In time of war, this duration was to be unlimited; the government had the power of granting furloughs, when it conceived it could be done without inconvenience. There was to be no exemption of any kind, except in favour of those who had married before the passing of the law, or who had already paid their debt in the preceding wars. This law thus provided for ordinary occasions; but on extraordinary occasions when the country should be declared in danger, the government was to have a right, as in 1793, over the entire population, and in that case the levy en masse was to be revived.

This law was adopted without opposition, and considered as one of the most important creations of the revolution*. The directory immediately called for its being put in operation, and demanded a levy of two hundred thousand conscripts, to complete the armies and to put them on a respectable footing. This demand was granted by acclamation on the 2nd Vendémiaire, year VII. (September 23rd, 1798.) Even though the two oppositions frequently thwarted the directory, out of ill-temper or jealousy, still they wished that the republic should preserve its ascendancy in the eyes of the powers of Europe. A levy of men requires a levy of money. The directory demanded, over and above the budget, one hundred and twenty-five millions; ninety for the equipment of the two hundred thousand conscripts, and thirty-five to repair the recent naval disaster. The question was, from whence were they to be drawn. The minister, Ramel, proved that the bills (bons) for the payment of two-thirds of the debt had almost all of them been called in, and that there were yet left national estates to the amount of four hundred millions which were consequently unincumbered, and might be appropriated to the new wants of the republic. Consequently it was decreed that one hundred and twenty-five millions worth of national domains should be sold. One-twelfth part was to be paid in ready money, the remainder in obligations of the purchasers, negotiable at pleasure, and payable successively in the course of eighteen months. They were to bear interest at five per cent. This paper would be as good as ready money, from the readiness with which it could be taken by the companies. The national property was to be sold at eight times its annual income. This expedient met with no more opposition than the law for recruiting, from which it emanated.

* It was passed the 19th Fructidor, year VI. (5th September.)

The directory thus placed itself in a position to reply to the menaces of Europe, and sustain the dignity of the republic. Two events of inferior importance had occurred, the one in Ireland, the other at Ostend. Ireland was in a state of rebellion, and the directory had sent thither general Humbert, with fifteen hundred men*. Unfortunately a remittance of money which the treasury was to have made having been delayed, a second division of six thousand men, under the command of general Sarrazin, could not set sail, and Humbert had been left unsupported. He had stood out for a considerable time, and long enough to demonstrate that the arrival of the expected reinforcement would have entirely changed the aspect of things. But after a series of well-conducted attacks, he had been obliged to lay down his arms, with his whole army. A similar kind of check experienced by the English had just required this loss. The English came from time to time, and threw a few bombs into our sea-ports. They wanted to effect a landing at Ostend for the purpose of destroying the sluices; but vigorously pursued, and cut off from their ships, they were taken to the number of two thousand men.

Although Austria had contracted an alliance with Russia and England, and could now reckon upon a Russian army and an English subsidy, still she hesitated to involve herself in a fresh contest with the French republic. Spain, who beheld with regret the flames of war again kindled upon the continent, and who dreaded in an equal degree the progress of the republican system, as well as its destruction; for in the one case she would be revolutionized, and in the other punished on account of her alliance with France.—Spain had again interposed, in order to pacify the exasperated combatants; but her mediation, by provoking discussions, by suggesting some possibility of arrangement brought about further indecision at Vienna, or at least further delays. At Naples, so frantic was public enthusiasm, that the idea of any delay was spurned, some measure was to be contrived for opening the contest, so as to force Austria to draw the sword. The folly of this petty court was unparalleled. It was the fate of the Bourbons at this period, to be led by their wives into all their misconducts. Three of them had been observed at one time in this same predicament, namely, Louis XVI., Charles IV., and Ferdinand. The fate of the unfortunate Louis XVI. is well enough known. Charles IV. and Ferdinand were dragged along, although by different paths, under the same influence into inevitable destruction. The people of Naples had been made to wear the English cockade, Nelson was treated as a tutelary divinity. Orders had been issued for the levy of one-fifth of the population—a species of extravagance, for one-fiftieth, well armed, would have sufficed to give Naples rank among the powers. Each convent was to furnish a horse-soldier fully equipped; part of the possessions of the clergy had been sold; all the taxes had been doubled; lastly, that framer of unfortunate projects, all whose military plans had been so unsuccessful, and whom fate reserved for reverses of so extraordinary a kind—Mack, had solicited to be placed at the head of the Neapolitan army. They had decreed him a triumph before victory, and had bestowed on him the title of liberator of Italy, the very same that Bonaparte had borne. To all these grand means were added nones (neutaines) to all the saints*, prayers to St. Januarius, and persecutions against those who were suspected of participating in French opinions.

The petty court of Naples continued its intrigues in Piedmont and Tuscany. It was for exciting the Piedmontese to rise in the rear of the army that occupied the Cisalpine, and the Tuscans in the rear of that which protected Rome. The Neapolitans would have taken advantage of the opportunity to attack the army of Rome in front; the Austrians would also have taken the like advantages by attacking the Cisalpine army in front; and from all these combinations they drew the conclusion that not a single Frenchman would escape. The king of Sardinia, a religious prince, felt some scruples on account of the treaty of alliance which bound him to France; but he was told that promises pledged to oppressors were not binding, and that the Piedmontese had a right to kill all to the very last Frenchman. At any rate, scruples on this occasion were not so much the real stumbling-block, as the strict watch kept up by the directory. As for the archduke of Tuscany, he was entirely destitute of means. Naples, in order to decide

* He landed in Ireland the 5th Fructidor (22nd August), and was beaten and taken prisoner the 22nd (8th September), by general Cornwallis.

* The space of nine consecutive days, which were to be spent in performing acts of devotion to one particular saint, whose mediation was exclusively implored with the Almighty. Trans.

him, promised to send him an army by Nelson's fleet.

The directory, on its own part, was on its guard, and took its precautions accordingly. The Ligurian republic, always inveterate against the king of Sardinia, had at length declared war against that prince. To a strong dislike of each other's rule of conduct was added the mutual jealousy arising from their juxta-position, and those two petty states were determined, come what might, to fight it out. The directory interfered in the quarrel, signified to the Ligurian republic that it should lay down its arms, and declared to the king of Sardinia that it would take upon itself to maintain tranquillity in his dominions; but that, to effect this, the directory must occupy an important post therein. The directory consequently required of him to allow the occupation by its troops of the citadel of Turin. Such a design could only be justified by the apprehensions which the court of Piedmont excited. There was an antipathy between the old and new states, and they could not trust each other. The king of Sardinia strongly remonstrated; but he had not the means of resisting the demands of the directory. The French occupied the citadel, and immediately set about putting it in a condition of defence. The directory had separated the army of Rome from that of the Cisalpine, and had appointed to its command general Championnet, who had distinguished himself on the Rhine. The army was dispersed over the whole of the Roman states: there were in the Marches of Ancona four or five thousand men, commanded by general Casa Bianca; general Lemoine was, with two or three thousand men, on the opposite slope of the Apennines, towards Terni. Macdonald, with the left, nearly five thousand strong, was distributed over the country along the Tiber. There was a small reserve at Rome. The so-called army of Rome was therefore fifteen or sixteen thousand men at most. The necessity for keeping a close watch over the country, and the difficulty of drawing their subsistence from it, had forced us to scatter our troops; and if an active and well-supported enemy had known how to seize the opportunity, he might have made the French repent their severance from each other.

Great reliance was placed on this fact at Naples. The court flattered itself with the idea of surprising the French, and destroying them one after the other. How glorious would it be to take the initiative, to gain the first success, and at last to force Austria to enter upon the career after having opened it for her? Such reasons as these induced the court of Naples to take the initiative in hostilities. Naples hoped that the French would be easily beaten, and that Austria could no longer hesitate when once the sword should be drawn. M. de Gallo and prince Belmonte-Pignatelli, who knew a little more about Europe and her affairs, were opposed to this notion of taking the initiative; but their experienced counsels were disregarded. In order to decide this poor king, and to drag him from his innocent pursuits, a forged letter, as if from the emperor, was presented to him, as is said, which provoked the commencement of hostilities. Upon this marching orders were issued for the end of November. The whole Neapolitan army was set in motion. The king himself set out, with great pomp, to be present at these operations. There was no declaration of war, but merely a summons to the French, to evacuate the Roman states. They replied to this summons by preparing to fight, notwithstanding the disproportion in point of number.

In the respective situation of the two armies nothing was easier than to overwhelm the French, dispersed as they were in the Roman provinces, on the right and left of the Apennines. To effect this, a march should have been made straight upon their centre, and the mass of the Neapolitan forces brought to bear against the French between Rome and Terni. The left of the French, placed beyond the Apennines to guard the Marches, would have been cut off from their right, placed on this side to guard the banks of the Tiber. The Neapolitans thus would have prevented the French from effecting a junction, and would have been driven back in disorder to Upper Italy. The Peninsula, at least, would have been delivered; Tuscany, the Roman states, and the Marches, would have been placed under the dominion of Naples. The number of the Neapolitan troops would have rendered this plan easier of execution and more certain, but it was impossible that Mack should avail himself of so simple a manœuvre. As in his former plans, he proposed to surround the enemy by a multitude of detached corps. He had nearly sixty thousand men, forty thousand of whom formed the army in actual service, and twenty thousand the garrisons. Instead of directing this mass of forces upon the all-important point of Terni, he divided it into six columns. The first, moving on the back of the Apennines, along the Adriatic, was to proceed by the Ascoli road to the Marches. The second and third, moving on the other side of the Apennines, and keeping themselves in communication with the first, were to march, the one to Terni, the other to Magliano. The fourth, constituting the main body, was to make a movement upon Frascati and Rome. A fifth, proceeding along the coast of the Mediterranean, was to traverse the Pontine marshes, and to rejoin the main body on the via Appiana. The sixth, and last, put on board Nelson's squadron, was bound for Leghorn, to effect a rising in Tuscany, and cut off the retreat of the French. Thus every preparation was made for surrounding and destroying them all, though nothing was done for beating them first.

It was in this order that Mack marched with his forty thousand men. The quantity of his baggage, the want of discipline in his troops, and the bad state of the roads, rendered his movements extremely slow. The Neapolitan army formed a long train, without order and without unity. Championnet, duly apprized of the danger, detached two divisions, to watch the march of the enemy and to protect the separate bodies as they fell back. Having great doubts as to whether he should retain Rome, he resolved to take a position in rear of the city, on the banks of the Tiber, between Civita- Castellana and Civita-Ducale, and there concentrate his forces so as to resume the offensive.

While Championnet was prudently retreating from and evacuating Rome, leaving eight hundred men in the castle of St. Angelo, Mack was vauntingly advancing by all the roads, and seemed as if he was not to meet with opposition. He arrived at the gates of Rome on the 9th Frimaire, year VII. (November 29, 1798), and entered without trouble. A triumphal reception had been prepared for the king. That weak prince, treated as conqueror and liberator, was intoxicated with the kind of military glory which had been got up for him. At any rate he had been advised to make a noble use of his victory, and he invited the pope to come and resume possession of his dominions. Nevertheless his army, less generous than himself, committed atrocious acts of spoliation.* The Roman populace, with its usual fickleness, attacked the houses of those who were accused of being revolutionists, and destroyed them. The mortal remains of the unfortunate Duphot were exhumed, and treated with the grossest indignity.

While the Neapolitans were thus amusing themselves at Rome, Championnet was executing with extraordinary activity the able movement he had resolved on making. Aware that the most important point was at the centre, on the Upper Tiber, he made Macdonald take a strong position at Civita-Castellana, and reinforced him with all the troops he could afford. He transferred part of the forces that he had in the Marches to the other side of the Apennines, and left general Casa-Bianca no more than were absolutely necessary to obstruct on this side the march of the enemy in that quarter. He himself hurried to Ancona, to hasten the arrival of his artillery and ammunition. Not alarming himself unnecessarily as to what was in preparation on his rear in Tuscany, he despatched an officer with a small detachment to observe what was going on in that quarter.

The Neapolitans at length fell in with the French on the different roads which they were traversing. They were thrice as numerous, but they had to deal with the famous Italian bands, and they found they had a hard task. In the Marches the column advancing by Ascoli was driven back to a great distance by Casa-Bianca. On the Terni road, a Neapolitan colonel was taken, with his whole division, by general Lemoine. This first taste of war with the French was not calculated to encourage the Neapolitans. Mack nevertheless made his arrangements for carrying the position which he felt to be the most important, that of Civita-Castellana, where Macdonald was to be found with the main body of our troops. Civita-Castellana is the ancient Veii, it is seated on a ravine, in a very strong position. The French held several distant posts, which covered the approaches to it. On the 14th Frimaire (December 4), Mack caused Borghetto, Nepi, and Rignano to be attacked by a considerable force. He despatched an accessory column along the opposite bank of the Tiber, which was to take possession of Rignano. None of these attacks prove successful. One of the columns put to flight, lost all its artillery. A second being surrounded, lost three thousand prisoners. The others, dispirited, confined themselves to mere demonstrations of hostility. In short, no part of the Neapolitan troops could withstand the attack of the French. Mack, somewhat disconcerted, renounced the attempt to take the central position of the Civita-Castellana, and began to discover that it was not on this point he should have endeavoured to force the enemy's line. It was at Terni, a point, much nearer the Apennines, and not so well defended by the French, where he ought to have struck the principal blow. He then began to bethink himself how he could withdraw his troops, and bring them back from Civita-Castellana to Terni. But to conceal that movement it would have required that rapidity of execution impossible to be effected with undisciplined troops. It would have taken several days to get the main body of the army again over the Tiber; and Mack retarded still more by his own fault an operation already too slow. Macdonald, whom he hoped to detain by hostile demonstrations at Civita-Castellana, had already transferred himself from Civita-Castellana to the other side of the Tiber. Lemoine had been reinforced at Terni. Thus the Neapolitans had been anticipated at every one of the points which they purposed to surprise. The first movement of general Metsch, from Calvi on Otricoli, did nothing but harm. On the 19th Frimaire (December 9), that general, driven back from Otricoli upon Calvi, was surrounded and obliged to lay down his arms, with four thousand men before a body of three thousand five hundred. From that moment, Mack thought of nothing else than returning to Rome, and falling back from Rome to the foot of the mountains of Frascati and Albano, with a view to rally his army there, and to reinforce it with fresh battalions. This was but a poor expedient, for it was not the numerical force of his soldiers that required augmentation, but it was their habitude that he ought to have changed; and it was not by retiring a few leagues from the field of battle that he could gain time to endue them with discipline and bravery.

The king of Naples, when apprized of these unhappy events, surreptitiously left Rome, whither he had but a few days previously entered in triumph. The Neapolitans evacuated in disorder, to the great satisfaction of the Romans, who were already much more annoyed by their presence than they had been by that of the French. Championnet re-entered Rome seventeen days after his quitting it. He had truly deserved the honours of a triumph. Skillfully concentrating himself with fifteen or sixteen thousand men, he had managed to take the offensive against forty thousand men, and driven them in disorder before him. Championnet would not confine himself to the mere defence of the Roman States. He conceived the bold design of conquering the kingdom of Naples with his weak army. The enterprise was difficult, not so much on account of the force of the Neapolitan army, as the inclinations of the inhabitants, who might involve us in a long and very dangerous irregular warfare. Championnet nevertheless persisted in advancing. He left Rome to pursue Mack in his retreat. He took from him by the way a great number of prisoners, and put completely to rout the column that had landed in Tuscany, and of which there escaped no more than a thousand men.

Mack, in complete disorder, retreated rapidly into the kingdom of Naples, and did not stop till he was before Capua, on the line of the Volturno. He selected his best troops, placed them in front of Capua, and along the whole line of the river, which is very deep, and forms an almost insurmountable barrier. Meanwhile the king had reached Naples, and his sudden return had produced consternation there. The populace, enraged at the defeats sustained by the army, raised the cry of 1798 9.

Dec. Jan.
(Nivôse.)

Championnet advances to Naples, which is in a terrible state of anarchy—

THE DIRECTORY.

the terms of an armistice not being fulfilled, the French become masters of Naples.

807

treason, demanded arms, and threatened to murder the generals, the ministers, and all those to whom they attributed the disasters of the war. That odious court did not hesitate to give arms to the lazzaroni, although it was easy to foresee the use that would be made of them. No sooner had these little better than barbarians received the spoils of the arsenals, than they rose and made themselves masters of Naples. Still shouting treason, they seized a king's messenger and put him to death. Acton, the favourite, on whom the public calamities now began to be imputed, the queen, the king, the whole court, were in the utmost dismay. Naples no longer appeared a safe abode; the idea of taking shelter in Sicily was immediately conceived and adopted. On the 11th Nivôse (December 31), the most valuable moveables of the crown, all the treasures of the palaces of Caserta and Naples, and twenty millions in money, were put on board Nelson's squadron, which sailed for Sicily. Acton, the author of all the public calamities, would not stand the consequences of abiding at Naples, and embarked with the queen. All that could not be carried away was burned. It was amidst a storm, and by the light of the flames of the blazing dock-yards, that this cowardly and criminal court abandoned the kingdom it had sacrificed to its fears. It left orders, it is said, to put to death all the upper class of citizens accused of a revolutionary spirit. All were to be sacrificed down to the rank of notary. Prince Pignatelli remained at Naples, invested with the powers of royalty.

Championnet was, in the mean time, advancing towards Naples. He had, in his turn, committed the same fault as Mack. He had divided his force into several columns, which were to effect a general junction before Capua. Their junction, after traversing a difficult country, amidst a fanatic population, excited every where against the alleged enemies of God and St. Januarius, was hardly to be relied upon.

Championnet, having arrived with his most effective division on the banks of the Volturno, resolved to make an attempt on Capua. Repelled by a numerous artillery, he was obliged to relinquish the idea of taking it by an off-hand attack, and consequently to withdraw his troops, and wait for the arrival of the other columns. This attempt took place on the 14th Nivôse (January 3, 1799). The Neapolitan peasantry, who had every where risen, intercepted our couriers and our convoys. Championnet received no intelligence concerning his other columns, and his position might be considered as extremely critical. Mack seized this opportunity to make friendly overtures. Championnet, reckoning upon the fortune of the French, peremptorily rejected Mack's proposals. Fortunately, he was rejoined by his columns, and an armistice was then concluded on the following conditions. Mack was to abandon the line of the Volturno, to cede the city of Capua to the French, to retire behind the line of the Regi-Lagni on the Mediterranean side, and of the Ofanto on the Adriatic side, and thus to cede a great portion of the kingdom of Naples. Besides these concessions of territory, a levy of eight millions in money was stipulated. The armistice was signed on the 22nd Nivôse (January 11).

When the news of the armistice reached Naples, the people abandoned themselves to the dictates of their fury. They cried out more loudly than ever that they were betrayed by the officers of the crown. The appearance of the commissioner appointed to receive the levy of eight millions caused the mob to commit the greatest excesses; open rebellion took place, and prevented the execution of the armistice. The tumult was carried to such a height that prince Pignatelli quitted Naples in a fright. That fine capital was now abandoned to the lazzaroni. There was no longer any recognized authority, and the city was threatened with a terrible outbreak. At length, after three days' disturbance, a chief was chosen, who possessed the confidence of the lazzaroni, and who had some means of repressing their disorders. This was the prince of Moliterno. During this interval, the like fury burst forth in Mack's army. His soldiers, so far from laying their misfortunes to their own cowardice, broke out against their general as the cause, and would have massacred him. The pretended liberator of Italy, who a month before had received the honours of triumph, had no other asylum than the very camp of the French. He solicited permission of Championnet to seek an asylum in his camp. The generous republican, forgetting the undue language of Mack in his correspondence, afforded him an asylum, gave him a place at his table, and allowed him to retain his sword.

Championnet, who now felt authorized by the refusal given at Naples to execute the conditions of the armistice, advanced upon that capital, with the intention of capturing it. The undertaking was not easy of accomplishment, for an immense population, which in the open field a few squadrons of cavalry would have swept away, became extremely formidable behind the walls of a town. To get before the place cost him several battles, and there the lazzaroni displayed more courage than the Neapolitan army. The urgency of the danger had increased their fury. The prince of Moliterno, who strove to bring them to reason, shortly ceased to possess their confidence, and they had chosen for leaders two of their body, by name Paggio and "Mad" Michael. From that moment they abandoned themselves to the utmost excesses, and committed every species of violence against the citizens and nobles accused of Jacobinism. To such a height did these enormities proceed, that all classes concerned in the support of good order and government were anxious for the arrival of the French. The inhabitants wrote to apprise Mack that they would join him for the purpose of giving Naples into his hands. The prince of Moliterno himself promised to seize fort St. Elmo, and to give it up to the French. On the 4th Pluviôse (January 23rd), Championnet made the assault. The lazzaroni defended themselves courageously, but the citizens, having gained possession of fort St. Elmo, and different posts of the city, let in the French. However, the lazzaroni intrenched in the houses, were about to defend themselves, retreating from one street to another, and would perhaps have set fire to the town, but one of their leaders was made prisoner, he was treated with kindness and attention, he was promised St. Januarius should be respected, and at last he was prevailed on to get his followers to lay down their arms.

From that moment Championnet found himself master of Naples and of the whole kingdom. He lost no time in restoring order, and disarming the lazzaroni. In conformity with the intentions of the French government, he proclaimed the new republic. An ancient name was given to it, that of the Parthenopean republic. Such was the result of the follies and malignities of the court of Naples. Twenty thousand French and two months were sufficient to foil its vast designs, and convert its dominions into a republic. This short campaign of Championnet immediately procured him a brilliant reputation. The army of Rome thenceforth assumed the title of army of Naples, and was separated from the army of Italy. Championnet became independent of Joubert.

While these events were taking place in the Peninsula, the fall of the kingdom of Piedmont was at length consummated. Already, by reason of a precaution amply justified by the circumstances, had Joubert taken possession of the citadel of Turin, and furnished it with artillery taken from the Piedmontese arsenals. But this precaution was ineffective in the present state of affairs. Piedmont was continually in a disturbed state. The republicans were incessantly making new attempts, and they even had recently sustained a loss of six hundred men in trying to surprise Alexandria. A masquerade, sallying from the citadel of Turin, in which the whole court was represented, and which was the joint work of the Piedmontese as also of the French officers, whom the generals could not always keep within bounds, had well-nigh provoked a sanguinary conflict even in Turin. The court of Turin could not maintain amicable relations with us, and the correspondence of the Neapolitan minister with M. de Priocca, the president of the council of Piedmont, sufficiently demonstrated this. Under such circumstances, France, exposed to a new war, could not leave upon her communications with the Alps, two parties in actual war with one another, and a hostile government. France possessed as against the court of Piedmont the right that the defenders of a fortress have over all the buildings which confine it or endanger its defence. It was decided that the king should be compelled to abdicate. The republicans were supported, and they were assisted in gaining possession of Novara, Alexandria, Susa, and Chivasse. It was then intimated to the king that he could no longer reside in dominions in a state of rebellion, and which were soon to become the theatre of war; he was called upon to abdicate the sovereignty of Piedmont, retaining that of Sardinia. The abdication was signed on the 19th Frimaire (December 9, 1798). Thus the two most powerful princes of Italy, those of Naples and Piedmont, had no more of their dominions left them but two islands. Under the circumstances that were in agitation, there was no desire exhibited of taking the trouble to form a new republic; and until the war had produced some settled result, it was decided that Piedmont should be provisionally administered by France. There was nothing more in Italy left as a subject of invasion save Tuscany. A mere notification would have been all that was necessary for taking possession of it, but this notification was deferred, and till it should be made, we had to wait till Austria should have openly declared herself.

CHAPTER XV.

STATE OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE REPUBLIC AND THE ARMIES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF 1799.—PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.—LEVY OF TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND CONSCRIPTS.—RESOURCES AND PLANS OF THE DIRECTORY AND THE ALLIED POWERS.—DECLARATION OF WAR WITH AUSTRIA.—OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1799.—INVASION BY THE GRISSONS.—BATTLE OF STOKACH.—JOURDAN'S RETREAT.—BATTLE OF MAGNANO; SCHÉRER'S RETREAT.—ASSASSINATION OF THE FRENCH PLENIPOTENTIARIES AT RASTADT.—THE EFFECTS OF OUR FIRST REVERSES.—MULTIPLIED CLAMOURS AGAINST THE DIRECTORY.—ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR VII.—SIÈXÈS APPOINTED DIRECTOR IN ROOM OF REWELL.

SUCH was the state of things at the commencement of the year 1799. War, after the events we have been relating, was no longer doubtful. The intercepted correspondence, the demonstrations of resistance by the court of Naples, who would not have taken the initiative unless they had been sure of a powerful intervention, the immense preparations of Austria, and lastly, the arrival of a Russian division in Moravia, left no doubt whatever. It was now Nivôse (January, 1799), and it was evident that hostilities would commence before the expiration of two months. Thus, the antipathy of the two great systems which the revolution had arrayed against each other, was demonstrated by facts. France had begun the year 1798 with three republics by her side, the Batavian, the Cisalpine, and the Ligurian, and by the end of that year there existed six of them in consequence of the creation of the Helvetic, the Roman, and the Parthenopean republics. This extension did not so result from the spirit of conquest, as from the spirit of the system. France had been called upon to assist the oppressed Vaudois. She had been provoked at Rome to avenge the death of the unfortunate Duphot, sacrificed in desiring to separate the two parties: at Naples nothing more had been done than repel an aggression. Thus she had been absolutely forced to renew the struggle. Certain it is that the directory, though it had unbounded confidence in French power, was nevertheless desirous of peace for political and financial reasons; certain it is also, that the emperor desirous as he was of war, wanted to defer it some time longer. Both had, nevertheless, conducted themselves as though they had wished to renew the conflict immediately, so great had been the antipathy of the two systems.

The revolution had imparted to the French government extraordinary confidence and hardihood. The recent event in Naples, though inconsiderable in itself, had confirmed it in the persuasion, that every thing must give way before French bayonets. Indeed, this was no more than the general opinion of Europe. It required nothing short of the immense means combined against France, to endure her enemies with sufficient courage to attack her. But this confidence of the French government in its strength was overrated, and concealed from it part of the difficulties of its position. The event has proved that its resources were immense, but that at the period of which we are speaking these were not sufficiently strong to ensure victory. The directory, besides France, had to regulate Holland, Switzerland, and all Italy, divided into so many republics. To regulate them through the medium of their own government was, as we have seen, a more difficult task than if they had been under the immediate control of the directory. By reason of a defect in organization, there was no making them available as a resource, generally speaking, either in money or men. Notwithstanding this, they were from that time obliged to defend them, and consequently to fight upon a line extending without interruption from the Texel to the Adriatic, a line which, attacked in front by Russia and Austria, was taken aback by the English fleets, either in Holland or at Naples. The forces which such a military situation required, the directory had to draw from France alone. Now the armies were in a remarkably diminished state; forty thousand soldiers, the best, were in Egypt under our great captain. The armies left in France were reduced one-half by desertions, which is always one of the consequences of peace. The government paid for the same number of soldiers, but it had not perhaps one hundred thousand effective men. The administrations and the staffs made a job of the pay, and it became a profitless surcharge on the finances. These one hundred and fifty thousand effective men formed excellent squares, which might be filled up by the new levy of conscripts; but all this required time, and there had not been time enough since the establishment of the conscription. Lastly, the finances were still in the same sad state of confusion, owing to the vicious mode of their collection. There had been voted a budget of six hundred millions, and an extraordinary subsidy of one hundred and twenty-five millions taken out of the four hundred millions [frances] worth of national property remaining on hand; but the receipts came in slow, and the error in the estimate of certain taxes left a considerable deficit. Lastly, subordination, most necessary in so great a machine, began to disappear. It became extremely difficult to keep the military within bounds. This state of perpetual war made them sensible that there was no doing without them, and they grew imperious and encroaching. Posted in wealthy countries, they determined to make the most of it, and they were participators in every species of corruption. They also enforced assent to their opinions wherever they resided, and could hardly ever be brought to pay obedience to the civil authorities. We have already remarked an instance of this in the quarrel between Brune and Trouvé. Lastly, in the interior, the opposition, which has been observed as reviving since the 18th Fructidor, and assuming two characters, was demonstrating itself more and more. The patriots, suppressed at the last elections, were preparing to gain an ascendancy in the new elections. The moderatists criticised in temperate, but bitter, language, the measures of the government, and as all oppositions ever do, blamed it for the difficulties it had to overcome, and which were most part insurmountable. The government is power (force) itself; it ought to gain the ascendancy; so much the worse it fares if it does not. No one will listen to its excuses explaining why it has not succeeded.

Such was the situation of the directory at the moment when war again broke out in Europe. The directory made most energetic efforts to restore order in this great machine. Confusion still prevailed in Italy. The resources of that fine country were squandered, and to no purpose destroyed for the army; a few plunderers monopolized all the benefit derivable therefrom. The commission appointed to constitute and to administer the Roman republic had just performed its office, and thereupon immediately the influence of the staffs had manifested itself. The consuls, who were deemed too moderate, had been changed. The advantageous contracts made for the supply of the army had been repudiated. The commission, in which Faypout took the management of the finances, had contracted for the subsistence and the payment of the troops stationed in Rome, and for the carriage of all the works of art sent to France. This commission had assigned in payment national property taken from the clergy. The contract, besides being moderate in regard to price, gave an opportunity for disposing of the national property. This contract was repudiated and then given to Baudin and company, who were devouring Italy. This company was patronized by the staffs, to whom they allowed a profit of one per cent. Piedmont, which had been recently occupied, afforded a new prey to be devoured, and the integrity of Joubert, the commander-in-chief of the army of Italy, was no guarantee against the rapacity of the staffs and of the companies of contractors. Naples, in particular, was to be systematically pillaged. There were in the directory four men of probity, namely, Rowbell, Larévillière, Merlin, and Treilhard, who were highly indignant at all these irregularities. Larévillière in particular, the strictest of all, and the most perfectly acquainted with facts from his peculiar relations with Trouvé the ambassador, and with the members of the commission of Rome—Larévillière recommended that the greatest energy should be displayed. He proposed and obtained the adoption of a very judicious plan, namely, constituted in all the countries dependent on France, or in which our armies were stationed, commissioners who were to take charge of the civil and financial departments, and wholly independent of the staffs. At Milan, Turin, Rome, and Naples, the civil commissions were to receive the levies stipulated with the countries allied with France, to allow contracts and make all financial arrangements; in a word, to supply the wants of the armies, but not leave the management of any funds to the military commanders. The commissions were, nevertheless, ordered to pay the generals the funds they should require, without being compelled to state the application of such money, being accountable therefore to none other than the government. Thus great respect was shown to the military authority. The four directors procured the adoption of the measure, and orders were given to Schérer to carry it into immediate execution in the most strict manner. As he manifested some indulgence towards his comrades, it was notified to him that he should be held responsible for all irregularities that were not suppressed.

This measure, however just it might be, could not but give great offence to the staffs. In Italy, especially, they appeared as if they would openly mutiny. They alleged that the precautions that were adopted reflected dishonour on them, that it was making the generals entirely dependent, and depriving them of all authority. Championnet, at Naples, was already playing the legislator, and appointing commissions charged with the regulation of the conquered country. Foypout was despatched to Naples, to take the management of the entire financial department in that place. He issued the necessary orders for re-establishing the administration in his hands, and revoked certain very injudicious measures adopted by Championnet. The latter, with all the offensive pride of men of his profession, especially when they are victorious, considered himself insulted. He had the hardihood to issue an order, by which he enjoined Foypout and the other commissioners to quit Naples within twenty-four hours. Such conduct was not to be endured. To disobey the orders of the directory, and to drive from Naples the envoys invested with its powers, was an act which deserved the severest reprehension, unless it were intended to abdicate the supreme authority, and transfer it to the generals. The directory did not falter, and owing to the energy of the incorruptible members, who were determined to put an end to penulations, the directory displayed in this instance all its authority. Championnet was cashiered, and ordered to be tried by a military commission, notwithstanding his recent successes. Unfortunately, the insubordination did not stop there. The gallant Joubert suffered himself to be persuaded, that the honour of the military was affected by the ordinances of the directory; he would not retain the command on the new conditions prescribed to the generals, and tendered his resignation. The directory accepted it. Bernadotte refused to take Joubert's place from the same motives. However, the directory would not give way, and persisted in its ordinances.

The directory then turned its attention to the levy of the conscripts, which was going on but slowly. The first two classes not being able to furnish the two hundred thousand men, the directory authorized their being taken from all classes, till the number required should be complete. To save time, it was settled that the communes should take upon themselves the fitting out of the new recruits, and that this expense should be deducted from the amount of the land tax. These new conscripts, indifferently equipped, were to repair to the frontiers to be there formed into garrison battalions, to replace the old troops in the fortresses and the camps of reserve; and, when they should be sufficiently drilled, to go and join the armies in active service.

The directory had now to attend to the deficiency of revenue, the minister, Ramel, who had always managed our finances with intelligence and probity ever since the establishment of the directory, after he had correctly ascertained the produce of the taxes, certified that the deficiency would amount to sixty-five millions at least, without taking into the account the arrear arising from the delay in the receipts. A violent dispute took place respecting the individual amount of the deficiency. The opponents of the directory did not estimate it at more than fifteen millions. Ramel proved that it would be at least sixty-five, and perhaps even seventy-five. The tax on doors and windows had been devised, but that was not enough. A debate took place on the salt-tax. Then it was that great outcries were raised, the people it was alleged were oppressed; the public burdens bore most heavily upon a single class; however, the salt-tax was renewed. It was Lucien Bonaparte who was one of the speakers who urged these objections with the greatest pertinacity. The supporters of the government replied by asserting the necessity of the case. The tax was rejected by the council of the ancients. In order to make amends, the tax on doors and windows was doubled, and that on carriage-doors was even increased tenfold. The possessions of the protestant clergy were put up to sale, and it was decreed that salaries should be paid to those ministers by way of compensation for their property. The sums recoverable from owners of national property, who still remained indebted to the state, were placed at the disposal of the government.

Unfortunately all these resources were not sufficiently prompt. Besides the difficulty of raising the produce of the taxes as high as six hundred millions, there was another inconvenience in the tardiness of the receipts. The government was reduced in this instance as in the preceding years, to give orders to the contractors upon the produce not yet received. The government annuitants, to whom, since the paying off of the two-thirds, the utmost punctuality had been promised, were even paid with bills (bons) receivable in payment of the taxes. Thus the government was again reduced to expedients.

In providing soldiers, and funds for their support, we had by no means done all, we had to distribute them as occasion required, and appoint generals to command them. We had, as is already noticed, to protect Holland, the line of the Rhine, Switzerland, and all Italy, that is, to be actively employed from the gulf of Tarento to the Texel. Holland was protected on one side by the neutrality of Prussia, of which there appeared no doubt; but an Anglo-Russian fleet was to attempt a landing there, and no delay ought to take place in protecting her against that danger. The line of the Rhine was protected by the two fortresses, Mentz and Strasburg, and though it was by no means likely that Austria would endeavour to break through this line, it nevertheless became a matter of prudence to cover it by a corps of observation. Whether we acted on the offensive or defensive, it was in the neighbourhood of the Upper Danube, towards the Lake of Constance or in Switzerland, that we should have to encounter the Austrian armies. We therefore wanted an army in active operation, which, starting from Alsace or Switzerland, should advance into the plains of Bavaria. The next thing was to provide a corps of observation to protect Switzerland; and we had need of a strong army to cover Upper Italy against the Austrians, and Lower Italy against the united Neapolitans and English.

This field of battle was of enormous extent, and it was not known and appreciated as it since has been, after long wars and glorious campaigns. It was then considered that the key to the plain was in the mountains. Switzerland, situated amidst the immense line upon which the hostile armies would have to fight, appeared to be the key to the whole continent. France, in occupying Switzerland, seemed to have a decided advantage. In possessing the sources of the Rhine, the Danube, and the Po, she seemed to command the whole course of those rivers. This was an error. One may conceive that two armies, whose wing is supported immediately upon mountains, as was the case when the Austrians and the French fought in the environs of Verona, or in the environs of Rastadt, should attach importance to the possession of those mountains, because that one of the two which retains their possession can attack the enemy from the heights. But when they are fighting at the distance of fifty or one hundred leagues from mountains, they cease to possess the same importance. While they would be misapplying their forces to obtain possession of the St. Gothard, armies stationed on the Rhine or on the Lower Po would have time to decide the fate of Europe. But the lesser was compared with the greater: that inasmuch as heights are important on a field of battle of a few leagues, the conclusion was come to that the power obtaining possession of the Alps must, as a matter of consequence, be master of the continent. Switzerland has but one real advantage, that of opening direct roads by France to Austria, and by Austria to France. It may consequently be conceived that so far as the tranquillity of the two powers and of Europe were concerned, the closing of these routes is a great service. The more you can anticipate points of contact and means of invasion, the better it is, especially between two states who cannot come into collision without shaking the continent. It is in this sense that the neutrality of Switzerland is of concernment to all Europe, and therefore it is with very good reason, that upon the recognition of this principle the general safety may be said to depend.

France, by invading Switzerland, had gained the advantage of the direct routes to Austria and Italy; and, in this sense, the possession of Switzerland might be considered as important for her. But if a great number of routes is an advantage for the power that has to take the offensive, and which possesses the means of so doing, it becomes an annoyance to the power that is reduced to take the defensive, by reason of the inferiority of its forces. The latter must desire the number of the points of attack to be as limited as possible, so that it may be the better able to concentrate its forces. If it were beneficial for France, sufficiently prepared for the offensive, to be able to debouch in Bavaria by Switzerland, it would embarrass France, when reduced to the defensive, not to be able to rely on the Swiss neutrality; it would embarrass her to have to protect the entire space between Mentz and Genoa, instead of having it in her power, as she did in 1793, to concentrate her forces between Mentz and Strasburg on one side, and between Mont Blanc and Genoa on the other.

Thus the occupation of Switzerland might become pernicious to France, in case she had to act on the defensive. But she was far from anticipating such a contingency. The intention of the government was to take the offensive every where, and to proceed as formerly by blows that confounded the enemy by their force and rapidity. But the distribution of its forces was peculiarly unfortunate. One army of observation was stationed in Holland, and another army of observation on the Rhine. One army on active service was to start from Strasburg, to cross the Black Forest, and to invade Bavaria. Another army on active service was to fight in Switzerland for the possession of the mountains, and thus to support on the one hand that which was to act on the Danube, and on the other, that which was to act in Italy. Another great army was to set out from the Adige, to drive the Austrians completely beyond the Isonzo. Lastly, one more army of observation was to cover Lower Italy and protect Naples. It was intended that the army of Holland should amount to twenty thousand men, that of the Rhine to forty thousand, that of the Danube to eighty thousand, that of Switzerland to forty thousand, that of Italy to eighty thousand, and that of Naples to forty thousand; making a total of three hundred thousand men, exclusively of garrisons. With such forces, this mode of distribution would not have been so defective. But if by the levy of the conscripts our armies could be increased in time to that number, they were far from reaching that total at the present time. Scarcely more than ten thousand men could be left in Holland. On the Rhine no more than a few thousand men could be got together. The troops appointed to compose this army of observation were detained in the interior, either to keep an eye on La Vendée, which was still exposed, or to maintain the public tranquillity during the approaching elections. The army appointed to act on the Danube at the outside consisted of forty, that of Switzerland, thirty, that of Italy, fifty, that of Naples, thirty thousand men. Thus we were scarcely able to count one hundred and sixty, or one hundred and seventy thousand men. To strew them irregularly from the Texel to the Gulf of Tarento was the worst thing that could have been done.

Since the directory, hurried away by revolutionary daring, was determined to take the offensive, it became in that case more necessary than ever to choose the points of attack, to assemble in sufficient mass at those points, and not to scatter its forces for the purpose of fighting on all points at once. Thus in Italy, instead of dispersing its forces from Verona to Naples, it ought, after the example of Bonaparte, to collect the greater part of them on the Adige, and there make the most determined attack. By beating the Austrians on the Adige, it would be plain enough that Rome, Florence, and Naples, could be kept in awe. In the quarter of the Danube, instead of uselessly sacrificing thousands of brave men at the foot of Saint-Gothard, the army of Switzerland and of the Rhine should be diminished; the active army of the Danube augmented; and a decisive battle fought by the latter in Bavaria. It was even practicable to reduce the points of attack still further, to remain in observation on the Adige, not to act offensively save on the Danube, and there strike a more vigorous and decisive blow, by augmenting the mass that was making the attack. Napoleon and the archduke Charles have proved, the first by great examples, the second by profound reasoning, that between Austria and France the quarrel should be brought to a termination on the Danube. That is the shortest way for attaining such object. A victorious French army in Bavaria neutralises all the successes of a victorious Austrian army in Italy, because it is brought so much nearer to Vienna.

It must be urged as an excuse for the plans of the directory, that no one hitherto had learned to comprehend such extensive fields of battle, and that the only man who could do so was in Egypt. The directory therefore distributed here and there the one hundred and sixty thousand men or thereabouts, actually disposable, upon the immense line which we have described, and in the order we have already pointed out. Ten thousand were to observe Holland, a few thousand the Rhine, forty thousand formed the army of the Danube, thirty thousand that of Switzerland, fifty thousand that of Italy, thirty thousand that of Naples. The conscripts were soon to reinforce these masses, and to bring them up to the number fixed by the plans of the directory.

The appointment of the generals was scarcely more judicious than the conception of the plans. It is true that, since the death of Hoche and the departure of Bonaparte, Desaix, and Kléber for Egypt, the choice was much more limited. There yet remained one general, whose reputation stood deservedly high; this was Moreau. There possibly might be found men more daring, more enterprising, but not one more firm or more trusty. A state defended by such a man could not perish. Disgraced on account of his conduct in Pichegru's affair, he had modestly consented to become a mere inspector of infantry. He had been proposed to the directory to take the command in Italy. Ever since Bonaparte had drawn so much attention to that fine country, ever since it had been, as it were, the apple of discord between Austria and France, that command seemed to be the most important of any. This was why Moreau was thought of. Barras opposed it with all his might. He argued like a fiery patriot, and represented Moreau as a suspicious person, on account of his conduct on the 18th Fructidor. His colleagues had the weakness to give way to him. Moreau was thrown aside, and remained a mere general of division in that army of which he ought to have been the commander-in-chief. He nobly accepted this subaltern rank, so much beneath his talents. Joubert and Bernadotte had refused the command of the army of Italy, from motives unnecessary to repeat. The directory then thought of Schérer, the minister at war. This general, by his successes in Belgium, and by his admirable battle at Loano, had gained a high reputation. He was a man of great intelligence, but his body was worn out with age and infirmities: he was no longer capable of commanding young men, full of vigour and daring. Besides, he was on bad terms with most of his comrades by desiring to introduce some severity in the repression of the military licentiousness that prevailed. Barras proposed him for general of the army of Italy. It has been said, that this was done for no other purpose than to get him out of the ministry of war, wherein he was beginning to be disliked for his severity. However, the military men who were consulted, and especially Bernadotte and Joubert, having spoken of Schérer's capacity as it existed by common report in the army, that is to say, in terms of high commendation, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Italy. Schérer did all he could to decline this appointment, alleging his age, the state of his health, and, above all, his unpopularity, owing to the office he had held; but it was insisted on, and he was obliged to accept it.

Championnet, who had been tried by a military commission, was succeeded in the command of the army of Naples by Macdonald. The command of the army of Helvetia was entrusted to Masséna. These appointments were very judicious, and the republic could not but highly approve of them. The important army of the Danube was given to general Jourdan. Notwithstanding his ill-success in the campaign of 1798, the services he had rendered in 1793 and 1794 were not forgotten, and it was hoped that he would not fall short of his earlier exploits. Considering that this army had not been given to Moreau, it could not be in better hands. Unfortunately it was so inferior in point of number, that to have commanded it with confidence would have required the daring of the victor of Arcola and Rivoli. Bernadotte had the command of the army of the Rhine; Brune that of Holland.

Austria had made preparations far superior to ours. Not confiding, like us, in her successes, she had employed the two years which had elapsed since the armistice of Leoben, in levying, fitting out, and drilling fresh troops. She had provided them with every thing that was necessary, and had been careful to select the best generals. She could at this moment actually bring into line two hundred and twenty-five thousand effective men, exclusive of the recruits which were still in preparation. Russia was furnishing her with a contingent of sixty thousand men, whose fanatic bravery was extolled throughout all Europe, and who were commanded by the celebrated Suvarrow. Thus the new league was ready to operate on the front of our line with about three hundred thousand men; mention was also made of two other Russian contingents, partly formed of English troops, the one appointed for Holland, the other for Naples.

The plan of campaign adopted by the allied powers was not more judicious than ours. It was a pedantic conception of the Aulic council, strongly disapproved of by the archduke Charles, but thrust upon him and all the generals, without their being allowed to make any alteration in it. This plan, like that of the French, was founded on the principle, that mountains are the key to the plain. Thus considerable forces were accumulated to guard the Tyrol and the Grisons, and to wrest if possible the great chain of the Alps from the French. The second object the Aulic council seemed to have most at heart was Italy. Considerable forces were stationed behind the Adige. The most important theatre of war, that of the Danube, did not appear to be the one with which they most concerned themselves. The best thing that had been done in that quarter was to station the archduke Charles there. The Austrian forces were distributed as follows: The archduke was with fifty-four thousand infantry and twenty-four thousand cavalry in Bavaria. In the Vorarlberg, all along the Rhine, to its opening into the Lake of Constance, general Hotze commanded twenty-four thousand infantry and two thousand horse. Bellegarde was in the Tyrol, with forty-six thousand men, two thousand of whom were cavalry. Kray had on the Adige sixty-four thousand infantry and eleven thousand horse, forming a total of seventy-five thousand men. The Russian body was ordered to join Kray, in order to make a movement in Italy.

We see that Hotze's twenty-six thousand men and Bellegarde's forty-eight thousand were intended to be of service in the mountains. They had to gain the sources of the rivers, while the armies moving in the plain were to endeavour to cross over them. On the part of the French, the army of Helvetia had the same charge confided to them. Thus, on one side and the other, a host of brave men were about to destroy one another to no purpose among inaccessible rocks, the possession of which could scarcely be said to exercise any influence whatever over the event of the war*.

The French generals had not failed to inform the directory of the general deficiency of their means. Jourdan, who had been obliged to despatch several battalions into Belgium to suppress some disturbances in that quarter, as well as a demi-brigade to the army of Helvetia, in substitution of another demi-brigade despatched to Italy, could not reckon more than thirty-eight thousand effective men. Such forces were too disproportionate, compared with those of the archduke, to contend with him with any chance of success. Jourdan solicited the prompt formation of Bernadotte's army, which hitherto comprised no more than four or five thousand men, and especially the organization of the new field battalions. He would have desired permission to have either the army of the Rhine or the army of Helvetia joined to his own, in which he was right. Masséna on his part complained that he had neither magazines or the means of transport indispensably necessary to keep his army in barren and almost inaccessible countries.

The directory replied to these observations by saying that the conscripts were about to join and immediately form into field battalions, that the army of Helvetia should be immediately increased to forty thousand men, and that of the Danube to sixty thousand, that as soon as the elections were over, the old battalions retained in the interior, should go and form the nucleus of the army of the Rhine. Bernadotte and Masséna had orders to concur in Jourdan's operations, and to conform to his views. The directory still relying on the effect of the offensive, and relying as much as ever in its soldiers, was anxious that the generals, in spite of the disproportion of number, should lose no time in hazarding an attack, and disconcerting the Austrians by an impetuous charge. Orders were therefore issued accordingly.

The Grisons, divided into two factions, had long hesitated between the Austrian sovereignty and the Swiss power. They had at last called the Austrians into their valleys. The directory considering them as Swiss subjects, ordered Masséna to occupy their territory, at the same time giving the Austrians a previous summons to evacuate. In case of refusal, Masséna was immediately to begin the attack. At the same time, as the Russians continued advancing into Austria, the directory dictated two notes on this subject, the one to the congress at Rastadt, the other to the emperor. The directory thereby distinctly stated, that if in the space of eight days the march of the Russians were not counter-ordered, the directory should consider war as declared. Jourdan had orders to pass the Rhine immediately upon the expiration of this term.

The congress of Rastadt had made extraordinary progress in its labours. The questions of the line of the Rhine, the division of the islands, and the construction of bridges, were settled, all that it had to consider was the question of the debts. The greater part of the Germanic princes, the ecclesiastical princes excepted, required nothing else than a good mutual understanding, in order to avoid war; but the greater part being under the control of Austria, durst not declare their sentiments openly. The members of the deputation quitted congress one by one, and they were soon to find that they could no longer deliberate. The congress declared that it could not reply to the note of the directory, and referred its contents to the diet of Ratisbon. The note intended for the emperor was sent to Vienna and remained unanswered. War was ipso facto declared. Jourdan had orders to cross the Rhine, and to advance through the Black Forest to the sources of the Danube. He passed the Rhine on the 11th Ventôse, year VII. (March 1.) The archduke Charles crossed the Lech on the 13th Ventôse (March 3). Thus the limits which the two powers had prescribed for themselves were passed, and they were about to come once more to blows. However, while Jourdan was making a hostile march, he received orders to allow the enemy to be the first to fire, while waiting for approval by the legislative body of the proclamation of war.

During this period, Masséna was engaged in the Grisons. On the 16th Ventôse (March 6), he summoned the Austrians to evacuate them. The Grisons form the upper valley of the Rhine, and the upper valley of the Inn or Engadine. Masséna resolved to cross the Rhine near its entrance into the Lake of Constance, and thus to catch all the companies distributed over the upper valleys. Lecourbe, who formed his right wing, and who, from his extraordinary activity and daring, was the most accomplished general for mountain warfare, was to start from the environs of the Saint-Gothard, cross the Rhine near its head, and throw himself into the valley of the Inn. General Dessoles, with a division of the army of Italy, was to second him, by proceeding down the Valteline into the valley of the Upper Adige.

These skilful arrangements were made with great vigour. On the 16th Ventôse (March 6), the Rhine was boldly crossed at all points. The soldiers threw carts into the river, and passed over them as upon a bridge. In two days Masséna was master of the whole stream of the Rhine, from its head to its opening into the Lake of Constance, and had taken fifteen pieces of cannon and five thousand prisoners. Lecourbe, on his part, carried out with equal success the orders of his commander-in-chief. He crossed the Upper Rhine, passed from Dissentis to Tüsch in the valley of the Albula, and from this valley he boldly threw himself into that of the Inn, by crossing the loftiest mountains in Europe still covered with the snows of winter. A compulsory delay having prevented Dessoles from proceeding from the Valtelino towards the Upper Adige, Lecourbe found himself exposed to the attacks of all the Austrian forces cantoned in the Tyrol. While, in fact, he was boldly advancing into the valley of the Inn, and marching upon Martinsbrück, Laudohn rushed with a division upon his rear; but the intrepid Lecourbe, retracing his steps, attacked Laudohn, overthrew him, took a great number of prisoners, and resumed his march into the valley of the Inn.

* All these assertions are fully justified by the archduke Charles, general Jomini, and Napoleon.

These brilliant openings seemed to induce a belief that the French were enabled every where, in the Alps as at Naples, to face an enemy superior in number. These successes confirmed the directory in the opinion that it was right to persist in the offensive, and to compensate by hardihood for numerical inferiority.

The directory sent to Jourdan the declaration of war, which it had obtained from the councils*, with orders to enter immediately on the attack. Jourdan had debouched by the defiles of the Black Forest into the country between the Danube and the Lake of Constance. The angle formed by this river and the lake opens more and more as it advances into Germany. Jourdan, who wanted to support his left on the Danube and his right on the Lake of Constance, was therefore obliged as he proceeded to keep extending his line, and consequently to weaken it in a dangerous manner, especially in the face of an enemy very superior in number. He had at first got as far as Mengen on the one hand, and Marekdorf on the other. But, learning that the army of the Rhine would not be organized before the 10th Germinal (March 30), and fearing lest the enemy should get at his rear by the valley of the Neckar, he considered he should make a retrograde movement. The orders of his government and the success of Masséna decided him to march forward again. He chose a good position between the Lake of Constance and the Danube. Two swift mountain streams, the Ostrach and the Aach, rising at nearly the same point, and falling, the one into the Danube, and the other into the Lake of Constance, form one and the same right line, behind which Jourdan posted himself. Saint-Cyr, forming his left, was at Mengen; Souham, with the centre, was at Pfyllendorf; Ferino with the right was at Bärenndorf. D'Hautpoul was stationed with the reserve. Lefebvre, with the division of the advanced guard, was at Ostrach. This was the most accessible point of the line; situated at the rising of the two streams, it presented marshes which might be crossed by means of a long causeway. It was upon this point that the archduke Charles, who would not suffer himself to be anticipated, resolved to make his greatest effort. He directed two columns to the left and right of the French, against St. Cyr and Ferino. But his chief mass, nearly fifty thousand strong, was brought to bear upon the point of Ostrach, where there were nine thousand French at the utmost. The battle commenced in the morning of the 2nd Germinal (March 21), and was most obstinately contested. The French displayed, in this first collision, a bravery and perseverance which excited the admiration of prince Charles himself. Jourdan hurried on to this point, but the extent of his line and the nature of the country did not allow him by a rapid movement to transfer his forces from his wings to his centre. The passage was forced, and after an honourable defence, Jourdan found himself obliged to beat a retreat. He fell back between Singen and Tuttlingen.

A check at the opening of the campaign was provoking, it dissolved that illusion of hardihood and invincibility, by means of which the French were obliged to make up for numerical strength. However, their inferiority of force had rendered that check almost inevitable. Notwithstanding all this, Jourdan did not abandon his intention of taking the offensive. Knowing that Masséna was advancing on the other side of the Rhine, and fully relying upon the co-operation of the army of the Danube, he considered himself obliged to make a final effort to assist his colleague, and to support him by bearing on towards the Lake of Constance. He had another motive for again bringing himself in advance: this was the desire of occupying Stockach, where the roads from Switzerland and Swabia cross each other, a point which he had done wrong in quitting, on his retreat to between Singen and Tuttlingen. He fixed his movement for the 5th Germinal (March 25).

The archduke Charles had not yet decided what direction his movements should take. He knew not whether he ought to direct his march to Switzerland, so as to cut off Jourdan from Masséna, or towards the sources of the Danube, so as to cut off the former from his support of the Rhine. The movement towards Switzerland seemed to him to be more advantageous for both the armies, for the French had as strong an interest in connecting themselves with the army of Helvetia, as the Austrians had in cutting them off from it. But he was ignorant of Jourdan's plans, and resolved to examine the ground to know what they were. He had intended to make this examination on the 5th Germinal (March 25th), the very day on which Jourdan, on his part, intended to attack him.

The nature of the locality rendered the position of the two armies extremely complicated. The grand military point was Stockach, where the roads from Swabia and Switzerland cross each other. It was this point that Jourdan desired to retake, and the archduke wanted to keep. The Stockach, a small river, flows in a meandering stream in front of the town of the same name, and concludes its winding course by falling into the Lake of Constance. It was on this river that the archduke had posted himself. He had his left between Nenzingen and Wahlwies, on the heights, and behind one of the windings of the Stockach. His centre was placed on an elevated plain (plateau), called the Nellenberg, and in advance of the Stockach; and his right was on the extended space of this elevated plain, along the causeway which runs from Stockach to Liptingen. It was, like the centre, in advance of the Stockach. The extremity of this wing was protected by the thick woods which extend along the road to Liptingen. This position was very unskillfully taken. If the left had the Stockach in front, the centre and the right had the river behind, and might be precipitated therein by an effort of the enemy. Besides, all the positions of the army had but one and the same outlet towards the town of Stockach, and in case of a forced retreat, the left, the centre, and the right, would be pressed together on a single road, and might by meeting there occasion a most fatal confusion. But the archduke, in his desire to cover Stockach, could not take any other position; and necessity was his excuse. He had but two real faults to reproach himself with; the one, that of having omitted to throw up some works for the better protection of his centre and his right; and the other, of having carried too many troops to his left, which was sufficiently protected by the river. It was his extreme anxiety to retain the important point of Stockach which had induced him to distribute his troops in this manner. He had, in other respects, the advantage of an immense numerical superiority.

* This declaration of war was made the 22nd Ventôse, year VII. (12 March.)

Jourdan was unable to ascertain the arrangements of the archduke, for nothing is more difficult than examining of the ground, especially in a country so varied as that on which the two armies were in motion. He still occupied the opening of the angle formed by the Danube and the Lake of Constance, from Tuttlingen to Steusslingen. This line is of great length, and the nature of the country, which scarcely admitted of a rapid concentration, rendered this inconvenience still more serious. He ordered general Fério, who commanded his right towards Steusslingen, to march to Wahlwies; and Souham who commanded the centre towards Eigeltingen, to march to Nenzingen. These two generals were to combine their efforts to carry the archduke's left and centre, by crossing the Stockach and climbing the Nellenberg. Jourdan purposed then to set in motion his left, his advanced guard, and his reserve upon the point of Liptingen, in order to force a passage through the woods which covered the archduke's right, and to succeed in forcing it. These arrangements had the advantage of directing the greatest mass of forces upon the archduke's right wing, which was most jeopardized. Unfortunately, all the starting points of every column of the army were too remote. In order to act upon Liptingen, the advanced guard and the reserve had to start from Emmingen-ob-Ek, and the right from Tuttlingen, at the distance of a day's march. This complete separation was the more dangerous, because the French army, about thirty-six thousand strong, was inferior by at least one-third to the Austrian army.

On the 5th Germinal (March 25), in the morning, the two armies met. The French army marched to battle, the Austrians to make an examination of the ground (reconnaissance). The Austrians, who had put themselves in motion a little before us, surprised our advanced guards, but were soon driven back on all points by the mass of our divisions. Fério on the right, and Souham in the centre, arrived at Wahlwies, Orsingen, and Nenzingen, on the bank of the Stockach at the foot of the Nellenberg, brought the Austrians back to their previous position of the morning, and commenced a serious attack on that position. They had to cross the Stockach and to force the Nellenberg. A long cannonade took place along the whole line.

On our left, the success was more speedy and more complete. The advanced guard, at present commanded by Soult, for Lefebvre was wounded, repulsed the Austrians, who had advanced to Emmingen-ob-Ek, drove them away from Liptingen, put them to the rout in the plain, pursued them with extreme activity, and succeeded in taking the woods from them. These woods were the very same that covered the Austrian right; by following up their movements, the French might possibly throw the Austrian right into the ravine of the Stockach, and cause a fatal loss. But it was clear that this wing had been just reinforced at the expense of the centre and the left, and that a great mass of force would be required to make any effect upon it. It was necessary, therefore, as in the original plan, to make the advanced guard, the reserve, and the left, converge upon this same point. Unfortunately, general Jourdan, too confident upon the too easy success which he had so recently gained, desired the attainment of too remote an object, and, instead of bringing Saint-Cyr to him, he ordered that general to make a long circuit, for the purpose of turning the Austrians and cutting off their retreat. This was being in a hurry to reap the fruits of victory, when the victory itself had not been gained. General Jourdan kept no more at the decisive point than the division of the advanced guard, and the reserve entrusted to d'Hautpoul.

In the mean time the right of the Austrians, seeing the woods which covered them forced by the enemy, faced about, and disputed with extreme firmness the causeway from Liptingen to Stockach, which runs through those woods. They were fighting furiously, when the archduke came up in the utmost haste. Forming at a single glance a correct notion of the danger, he withdrew the grenadiers and the cuirassiers from the centre and the left, and transferred them to his right. Feeling no alarm about the movement of Saint-Cyr on his rear, he felt sensible that if Jourdan were repulsed, Saint-Cyr could but be further jeopardised, and therefore resolved to confine himself to a decisive effort in the direction of the point actually threatened.

The woods were disputed with an extraordinary fury. The French, very inferior in number, made an heroic defence, which the archduke termed admirable; but the prince charged in person, with some battalions on the causeway of Liptingen, and made the French loose their hold. The latter lost the woods, and at length found themselves in the open plain of Liptingen, from which they had started. Jourdan sent to demand succours of Saint-Cyr; but it was too late. His reserve remained, and he determined to order a charge of cavalry, with a view to regain the advantages that he had lost. He sent off four regiments of cavalry at once. This charge, met by another charge, which the archduke's cuirassiers made in good time, did not answer its object. A terrible confusion ensued in the plain of Liptingen. The French after performing prodigies of valour dispersed. General Jourdan made heroic efforts to stop the fugitives; he was himself hurried along with them. The Austrians, however, exhausted by this long combat, did not venture to pursue us.

The battle was then over. Fério and Souham had kept their ground, but they had not forced either the centre or the left of the Austrians. Saint-Cyr was not far behind upon their rear. It could not be said that the battle was lost: the French, inferior in number by one-third, had every where kept the field of battle, and displayed remarkable bravery; but inferior in number, and separated as their different divisions were, not to have conquered was in fact to be beaten. It was necessary immediately to call back Saint-Cyr, who was very much exposed, to rally the advanced guard and the reserve, which had suffered severely, and to bring back the centre and the right. Jourdan immediately issued the necessary orders in consequence, and directed Saint-Cyr to fall back as speedily as possible. The position of the latter had become extremely dangerous, but he effected his retreat with the steadiness that has always distinguished him, and regained the Danube without accident. The loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners was much about the same on both sides. It amounted to about four or five thousand men.

After this unfortunate battle the French were unable to keep the field, and it became necessary for them to shelter themselves behind some strong protecting line. Should they retreat to Switzerland or the Rhine? It was evident that in retreating into Switzerland they might combine their efforts with Masséna's army, and be enabled by that junction to resume an imposing attitude. Unhappily, general Jourdan did not consider that he should make this movement; his fears were for the line of the Rhine, on which Bernadotte had not yet collected more than seven or eight thousand men, and he resolved to fall back to the entrance of the defiles of the Black Forest. He there took a position which he conceived to be strong, and leaving the command to Ernoult, the chief of his staff, he set out for Paris, to make complaints of the inferior state in which his army had been left. The results spoke much more loudly than all the complaints in the world could have done, and it would have been far better that he should have remained with his army than to go to Paris to make complaints.

Most fortunately, the orders of the Aulic council to the archduke Charles involved a serious error, which partly made amends for ours. If the archduke, pushing his advantages, had closely pursued our vanquished army, he might have thrown it into complete disorder, and perhaps even destroyed it. There would then have been time to return towards Switzerland to attack Masséna, at that time destitute of assistance, reduced to his thirty thousand men, and embarrassed in the upper valleys of the Alps. It would have been by no means impossible to have cut him off from the road to France. But the Aulic council forbade the archduke to push on for the Rhine, before Switzerland was evacuated; this was one of the deductions from the principle, that the key to the theatre of the war was in the mountains.

While these occurrences were taking place in Swabia, the war was being carried on in the Upper Alps. Masséna was making his movements in the direction of the source of the Rhine, Lecourbe towards the sources of the Inn, and Dessoles towards the sources of the Adige, with tolerably even success. There was, on the other side of the Rhine, a little above the point where it falls into the Lake of Constance, a position which it was necessary to carry—that of Feldkirch. Masséna had done all that his energy could suggest to gain that post, but he had lost two thousand men without gaining any thing. Lecourbe at Taussers, and Dessoles at Nauders, had fought brilliant actions which had brought them three or four thousand prisoners, and well made up for the check at Feldkirch. Thus the French, by their spirit and hardihood, kept the upper hand in the Alps.

Operations commenced in Italy the very day after the battle of Stockach. The French had received about thirty thousand conscripts, which brought the mass of their forces in Italy to amount to very nearly one hundred and sixteen thousand men. They were distributed as follows: Thirty thousand old troops under Macdonald guarded Rome and Naples. The thirty thousand young soldiers were in the fortresses. There remained fifty-six thousand men under Schérer. Of these fifty-six thousand men, he had detached five thousand men under general Gauthier to occupy Tuscany, and five thousand under general Dessoles to make a movement in the Valtelline. Thus Schérer had forty-six thousand left to fight with upon the Adige, an essential point, whither the whole mass of our forces should have been brought to bear. Besides the disadvantage of the small number of men on this decisive point, there was another which was not less fatal to the French. The general commanded no confidence. He was far too old, as we have observed; he had besides lost all popularity during his ministry. He was himself aware of this, and it was with great reluctance that he had accepted the command. He went about at night to listen to the conversation of the soldiers in their tents, and to collect with his own ears the evidence of his unpopularity. These were most unfavourable circumstances at the opening of a great and difficult campaign.

The Austrians were to be commanded by Mélas and Suwarrow. During the previous interval they were under the command of baron de Kraus, one of the emperor's best generals. Even before the arrival of the Russians, they amounted to eighty-five thousand men in Upper Italy. Nearly sixty thousand were already on the Adige. In both armies orders had been given to act on the offensive. The Austrians were to debouch from Verona, to skirt the foot of the mountains, and to advance on the other side of the river, keeping the fortresses out of view. The object of this movement was to support a similar movement of the army of the Tyrol in the mountains.

Schérer had received no other injunction than to cross the Adige. The order was a difficult one to execute, and the Austrians had all the advantage of that line. It ought to have been sufficiently known by the events of 1796. Verona and Legnago, which command it, belonged to the Austrians. The attempt to throw a bridge at any point whatever would have been a dangerous experiment; for the Austrians possessing Verona and Legnago, would have had it in their power to debouch on the flank of the army while occupied in attempting a passage over. The safest course, if the order had not been to act on the offensive, would have been to allow the enemy to debouch beyond Verona, to wait for him on a ground which we should have chosen at our leisure, to give him battle, and to make the most of the victory in order to cross the Adige close behind him.

Schérer, being obliged to begin, hesitated as to the best course to pursue, but at length decided upon an attack towards his left. The reader recollects, no doubt, the position of Rivoli in the mountains, at the entrance of the Tyrol, and very far above Verona. The Austrians had made out-works to protect every approach, and formed a camp at Pastrengo. Schérer resolved, in the first place, to carry this camp, and to throw the Austrians back on this side beyond the Adige. The three divisions of Serrurier, Delmas, and Grenier, had to do this. Moreau, who had become merely a general of division under Schérer, was, with Hatry's and Victor's divisions, to annoy Verona. General Montrichard, with one division, was to make a hostile demonstration upon Legnago. This distribution of force sufficiently demonstrated the hesitation and uncertainty of the commander-in-chief.

The attack took place on the 6th Germinal (March 26), the day after the battle of Stockach. The three divisions directed to assault the camp of Pastrengo on several points, carried it with an intrepidity worthy the old army of Italy, and made themselves masters of Rivoli. They took fifteen hundred prisoners and a considerable quantity of cannon from the Austrians. The latter recrossed the Adige at full speed by a bridge they had thrown across at Polo, and which they had time to destroy. At the centre, near Verona, there was hard fighting for the villages situated in front of that city. Kain exercised his energies to no purpose in defending and recovering them. The village of San Massimo was seven times taken and retaken. Moreau, not less firm than his antagonist, did not allow him to acquire any advantage, and kept him penned up in Verona. Montrichard, in making an imaginary demonstration on Legnago, ran into real danger. Kray, deceived by false intelligence, conceived that the French would direct their principal effort upon the Lower Adige. He had sent thither great part of his forces, and in debouching from Legnago he placed Montrichard in the most imminent peril. The latter was fortunately protected by the inequality of the ground, and prudently fell back upon Moreau.

The action had been bloody, and the French had the best of it on the left and at the centre. Their loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, might be estimated at four thousand at least. However, in spite of the advantage acquired by the French, they had obtained but very unimportant results: all they had done at Verona was to confine the Austrians; true it is that above Verona they had driven them across the Adige, and had gained the means of passing close after them by repairing the bridge of Polo; but unfortunately it was perfectly unimportant to cross the Adige at that point. It should be recollected that the road which runs outside that river goes through Verona, and that there is no other outlet for debouching into the plain. They were far from doing all they had to do when they crossed the Adige at Polo; after we had crossed it we found ourselves in front of Verona, in the same position as Moreau at the centre, and we should have to take the fortress. If, on the same day, advantage had been taken of the disorder into which the attack on the camp of Pastrengo had thrown the Austrians, and if no time had been lost in restoring the bridge of Polo, perhaps the French might have entered the place close upon the fugitives, especially considering the obstinate battle which Moreau on the other side of the Adige was fighting with general Kain.

Unfortunately, nothing of the sort was done. However, all this might have been put to rights by making a brisk movement on the following day, and by transferring the mass of the forces before and above Verona towards the bridge of Polo. But Schérer was for three successive days in uncertainty as to what course he should pursue. He made enquiry for a road on the other side of the Adige, which would allow him to avoid Verona. The army was indignant at this hesitation, and loudly complained that the advantages gained in the action of the 6th (March 26) were not followed up. At length, on the 9th Germinal (March 29), a council of war was held, and Schérer decided on making a movement. He formed the singular plan of throwing Serrurier's division across the Adige by the bridge of Polo, and of directing the mass of his army between Verona and Legnago, for the purpose of attempting the passage of the river there. To effect the removal of his forces, he took two divisions from his left to his right, made them pass behind his centre, and exposed them to useless fatigues, upon bad roads, rendered utterly impassable by late rains.

On the 10th Germinal (March 30), the new plan was put in execution. Serrurier, with his division, six thousand strong, crossed the Adige alone at Polo, while the bulk of the army was getting lower down between Verona and Legnago. It was easy to divine what would befall Serrurier's division. Embarrassed, after crossing the Adige, along a road which was closed by Verona, and which thus formed a kind of *cul-de-sac, he ran great risks. Kray, who knowing pretty well how Serrurier's army must be circumstanced, despatched against it a mass of forces three times superior, and briskly made it fall back upon the bridge of Polo. The ranks were thrown into utter confusion, and the second passage of the river was not effected without great disorder. Detachments were obliged to cut their way through, and fifteen hundred prisoners remained in the hands of the Austrians. Schérer, when apprised of this check, which could not have been avoided, contented himself with bringing up the beaten division, and getting nearer to the Lower Adige, where he had now concentrated the greater part of his forces.

Several more days were passed by both parties in feeling their way. At length Kray took a determination, and resolved, while Schérer was getting down upon the Lower Adige, to debouch en masse from Verona, to bear down upon Schérer's flank, and to drive him into a corner between the Lower Adige and the sea. The notion was good, but fortunately an intercepted order made Moreau acquainted with Kray's design; Moreau immediately communicated it to the commander-in-chief, and pressed him to make his divisions go up the river once more, in order to make head towards Verona, the place where the enemy was about to debouch.

* A way or road, the termination of which presents no outlet. Trans.

It was while executing this movement that the two armies met on the 16th Germinal (April 5), in the environs of Magnano. Victor's and Grenier's divisions, forming the right, towards the Adige, were making their way up the river by San Giovanni and Tomba, so as to get to Verona. They overwhelmed Mercantin's division, which was opposed to them, and utterly destroyed Wartensleben's regiment; these two divisions thus arrived nearly opposite to Verona, and were enabled to accomplish their object, which was to cut off from that city all the troops that Kray might have drawn from it. Delmas's division, which was to move to the centre, towards Butta-Preda and Magnano was behindhand, and afforded the Austrian division of Kaim occasion to advance as far as Butta-Preda, and thus to form a salient point towards the middle of our line. But Moreau, on the left, with the divisions of Serrurier, Hatry, and Montrichard, advanced without opposition. He had ordered Montrichard's division to shift its front, in order to face Butta-Preda, towards the point where the enemy had formed a point, and was marching with his two other divisions towards Dazano. Delmas at length arrived at Butta-Preda, covered our centre; and at this moment fortune seemed to declare in our favour, for our right, completely victorious in the quarter of the Adige, was about to cut off the retreat of the Austrians to Verona.

But Kray, considering that the essential point was on our right, and that he ought to abandon all ideas of success on all the other points for the purpose of gaining the victory on that, sent on that quarter the greatest mass of his forces. He had one advantage over Scherer, namely, the proximity of his divisions, which permitted him more readily to shift them. The French divisions, on the contrary, were at a great distance from one another, and fought on ground intersected by numerous enclosures. Kray fell unawares, with his whole reserve, upon Grenier's division. Victor was proceeding to the relief of the latter, when he was himself charged by the Nadasty and Reisky regiments. Kray was not content with this first advantage. He had caused Mercantin's division, beaten in the morning, to be rallied in the rear; he sent it forth again against Grenier's and Victor's divisions, and thus decided their defeat. Those two divisions, notwithstanding they made a warm resistance, were obliged to abandon the field of battle. The right being put to the rout, our centre found itself much exposed. Kray did not fail to press hard against it, but Moreau was there, and he prevented Kray from following up his advantages.

The battle was evidently lost, and it was necessary to think of retreating. The loss had been great on both sides. The Austrians had three thousand killed and wounded, and two thousand of them were prisoners. The French had an equal number killed and wounded, but they had lost four thousand prisoners. It was in this battle that general Pigeon was mortally wounded; the same who, during the first campaign in Italy, had displayed so much talent and daring in the advanced guards.

Moreau recommended the passing the night upon the field of battle, to avoid the confusion of a retreat at night; but Scherer resolved to retreat that same evening. Next day, he retired behind the Molinella, and the next day but one, the 18th Germinal (April 7), to the Mincio. Supported upon Peschiera on the one side, and Mantua on the other, he could make a vigorous resistance, recall Macdonald from the further extremity of the peninsula, and by this concentration of his forces recover the superiority he had lost by the battle of Magnano. But the unfortunate Scherer had entirely lost his presence of mind. He was quite as unpopular with his soldiers as ever. Masters for three years of Italy, they were indignant at seeing that conquest torn from them, and they imputed their reverses to the unskilfulness of their general. It is certain that, so far as they were concerned, they had done their duty as well as in the brightest days of their glory. The censures of his army had affected Scherer quite as much as his defeat. Conceiving that he could not maintain his ground on the Mincio, he retreated to the Oglio, and subsequently to the Adda, which he reached on the 12th of April. No one knew where this retrograde movement was to stop.

The campaign had been opened scarcely six weeks, and already we were on our retreat at every point. Ernoult, chief of the staff, whom Jourdan had left with the army of the Danube at the entrance of the defiles of the Black Forest, had become alarmed at receiving intelligence of an incursion of a few light troops on his flanks, and made a disorderly retreat towards the Rhine. Thus, both in Germany and in Italy, our armies, who had shown as much bravery as ever, nevertheless lost their acquisitions, and retreated beaten towards the frontier. Switzerland was the only place where we had retained the superiority. There Masséna kept his ground with all the tenacity of his character, and, with the exception of the fruitless attempt on Feldkirch, had constantly come off victorious. But, stationed on the salient angle that Switzerland forms between Germany and Italy, he was posted between two victorious armies, and he could not do otherwise than retreat. In fact, he had just given such orders to Lecourbe, and fell back into the interior of Switzerland, but in good order, and still retaining the most imposing attitude.

Our military reputation was humbled, and our ministers abroad were now to be sacrificed as victims of the most disgraceful and atrocious outrage. War being declared against the emperor, and not against the Germanic empire, the congress of Rastadt had continued assembled. The last difficulty, that of the debts, had been nearly cleared up; but two-thirds of the states had already recalled their deputies. This was in consequence of the influence exerted by Austria, who did not desire that a peace should be concluded. All who remained at congress were some few deputies of Germany, and the retreat of the army of the Danube having opened the country, the conferences took place in the midst of Austrian troops. The cabinet of Vienna then conceived an infamous plan, which has cast a deep shade of dishonour upon its policy. The cabinet had much to complain of in the haughtiness and energy which our ministers had displayed at Rastadt. It imputed to them a disclosure which had deeply compromised the cabinet in the estimation of the Germanic body, namely, the secret articles arranged with Bonaparte for the occupation of Mentz. These secret articles proved that, in order to obtain Palma Nova in the Friuli, the Austrian cabinet had ceded Mentz, and betrayed in the most unworthy manner the interests of the empire. That cabinet was highly incensed, and resolved to take vengeance upon our ministers. It wished, moreover, to seize their papers, in order to ascertain those German princes who were at that time treating individually with the French republic. It therefore conceived the criminal idea of securing the persons of our ministers on their return to France, of robbing, ill-using, and perhaps even murdering them. However, it has never been brought to light whether positive orders had been given for their assassination.

Already had our ministers felt some distrust, and without apprehending any outrage upon their persons, they, nevertheless, were alarmed for their correspondence, which was in point of fact interrupted on the 30th Germinal by the removal of the bridge-masters, who were employed to take it across. Our ministers remonstrated; the deputation of the empire also remonstrated, and asked if the congress could consider itself in a state of safety. The Austrian officer, to whom the deputation addressed itself, did not return an answer calculated to set these apprehensions at rest. Our ministers then declared that they would set out in three days, that is to say, on the 9th Floréal (April 29), for Strasburg, and they added, that they should stay in that city, ready to renew the negotiations so soon as any desire for that purpose should be expressed. On the 7th Floréal a courier of the legation was arrested. Fresh remonstrances were made by the whole congress, and it was expressly asked, whether the French ministers might be said to be safe. The Austrian colonel commanding the Szekler hussars, in cantonments near Rastadt, replied that all the French ministers had to do was to set out within twenty-four hours. He was requested to allow them an escort, but he refused it, and gave an assurance that their persons would be respected. Our three ministers, Jean Debry, Bonnier, and Robespierre set out at nine in the evening of the 9th Floréal (April 29). They occupied three carriages with their families. After them came the Ligurian legation and the secretaries of embassy. At first some difficulties were raised as to their being allowed to leave Rastadt; but at length all impediments were removed, and they left the town. They had hardly got fifty paces from Rastadt, when a troop of Szekler hussars rushed upon them with drawn swords, and stopped the carriages. That of Jean Debry was the first. The hussars violently opened the door, and asked, in a semi-barbarous dialect, if he was Jean Debry. On his reply in the affirmative, they seized him by the throat, dragged him out of the carriage, and in presence of his wife and children inflicted upon him several sabre wounds. Believing him to be dead, they went on to the other carriages, and murdered Robespierre and Bonnier, in the arms of their families. The members of the Ligurian legation and the secretaries of embassy had time to escape. The ruffians hired to perform this murderous act next plundered the carriages, and carried off all the papers.

Jean Debry's wounds were not mortal. The cold night air recovered him, and he crawled, covered with blood, to Rastadt. When this outrage was known, it excited the indignation of the inhabitants and of the members of the congress. German faith was shocked at a violation of the law of nations unheard of among civilized people, and which was only conceivable of a semi-barbarian cabinet. The members of the deputation left at the congress, lavished on Jean Debry and the families of the murdered ministers the most marked and assiduous attention. They afterwards assembled, and drew up a declaration, in which they denounced to the whole world the outrage that had just been committed, and repelled all suspicion of being concerned with Austria as participators therein. This crime, which was immediately published throughout all Europe, excited universal indignation. The archduke Charles wrote a letter to Masséna, intimating that he should direct proceedings to be instituted against the colonel of the Szekler hussars; but this cold and constrained letter, which demonstrated how embarrassed the prince felt, was not worthy either of himself or his character. Austria did not, and could not, make any reply to the accusations directed against her.

Thus the war between the two systems that divided the world was implacable. The republican ministers, ill received at first, then insulted during a year of peace, at last came to be most atrociously murdered, and with a degree of ferocity which none but barbarians could have exhibited. The law of nations, held sacred between the most inveterate enemies, was violated only in regard to them.

The very unexpected reverses which marked the opening of the campaign, and the outrage at Rastadt, produced an impression most fatally prejudicial to the directory. From the very moment war was declared, the two parties in opposition began to lose all self-restraint; they no longer contained themselves when they saw our armies beaten, and our ministers assassinated. The patriots excluded by the separations (scissions), and whose licentiousness the government had attempted to repress, the royalists, concealing themselves behind the disaffected of different classes, all at once made a handle of the late events for accusing the directory, against whom they made the most unjust and the most multifarious imputations. The armies, they alleged, had been utterly neglected. The directory had suffered their ranks to be thinned by desertion, and had not used any activity in recruiting them by means of the new conscription. The directory had retained in the interior a great number of old battalions, which instead of being sent to the frontiers, were employed in repressing the freedom of the elections; and to armies thus reduced to a force so disproportionate to that of the enemy, the directory had neither supplied stores, provisions, accoutrements, means of transport, or horses to replace those that were lost. The directory, said its accusers, had abandoned them to the rapacity of the administrations, which had consumed a revenue of six hundred millions without showing any thing for it. Lastly, the directory had made the very worst choice of generals to command the armies. Championnet, the conqueror of Naples, was in confinement for having desired to repress the rapacity of the government agents. Moreau was reduced to the situation of a mere general of division. Joubert, the conqueror of the Tyrol, and Augereau, one of the heroes of Italy, were without command. Schérer, on the contrary, who by his administration had done those acts that contributed to all our defeats, was put in command of the army of Italy, because he was a countryman and friend of Rowbell. But they did not confine themselves to this. There were other persons whose names were injuriously brought forward. The illustrious Bonaparte, his illustrious lieutenants, Kleber and Dessaix, and their forty thousand companions in arms, the conquerors of Austria, where are they?—In Egypt, in a distant land, where they are about to perish from the imprudence of the government, perhaps from its malignity. As to this expedition, lately so much bewailed, it began to be said that the directory had thus contrived to get rid of a celebrated warrior of whom it had conceived a distrust.

They went still further back into the causes of things : the government was blamed in respect of the very war itself ; the imputation against the directory was, that it had causelessly provoked the war by its imprudent disregard to the interests of foreign powers. The directory had invaded Switzerland, overthrown the pope and the court of Naples, driven Austria to extremities, and all without being prepared to enter upon the conflict. By invading Egypt, it had decided the Porte in coming to a rupture. By thus deciding the Porte, the directory had freed Russia from all apprehension for her rear, and permitted her to send sixty thousand men into Germany. In short, so great was the popular feeling, that they went so far as to say the directory was the secret author of the murders at Rastadt. It was, they alleged, an expedient for inflaming the public mind against the enemies of France, and demanding fresh resources from the legislative body.

These imputations found their echo in the tribune, in the newspapers, and in places of public resort. Jourdan had hastened to Paris, to complain of the government, and to charge all the reverses he had suffered to its mismanagement. Those generals who had not come had written for the purpose of laying a statement of their grievances. This was an universal explosion, which in itself would be incomprehensible, if we were not acquainted with the violence, and especially the antipathies of the predominant parties.

It required no very close recollection of the facts to enable us to disprove all these imputations. The directory had not suffered the ranks of the armies to be thinned, for it had granted more than twelve thousand leaves of absence ; as to preventing desertion in time of peace, that would have been impracticable. There is not a government in the world that could have succeeded in preventing this. The directory would even have laid itself open to the charge of tyranny by taking measures to oblige many soldiers to rejoin the armies. In point of fact, the bringing back to their colours men who had been spilling their blood for the last six years, would have appeared too severe a measure. The conscription had not been settled upon more than six months, and the government had not had the means, in so short a time, to organize that system of recruiting, and above all, to fit and drill the conscripts, to form them into field battalions, and to send them to Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. The directory had retained some old battalions, because they were indispensable in maintaining the public peace during the elections, and because this duty could not be committed to young soldiers, whose tone of feeling was not formed, and whose attachment to the republic was not sufficiently settled. Another important consideration had justified this precaution, namely, La Vendée again excited by foreign emissaries, and Holland threatened by the Anglo-Russian fleets.

So far as concerned the disorders in the administration, the directory was not a whit more to blame. There certainly had been great abuses in the expenditure, but in almost every case the very persons who most loudly complained of them were the parties benefited by them, and this in spite of the most strenuous efforts of the directory. There had been great profusion committed in three particulars, by plundering the conquered countries, by charging the state with the pay of the soldiers who had deserted, and lastly, by making improvident bargains with the companies of contractors. Now, it was the generals and the staffs who had committed and made their market of all these irregularities. It was they who had plundered the conquered countries, made a gainful job of the pay, and shared the profits with the companies of contractors. We have already observed, that the latter sometimes allowed as much as forty per cent. out of their profits, as a means of securing the patronage of the staffs. Schérer, towards the end of his ministry, had embroiled himself with his companions in arms for having attempted to interpose a remedy for these irregularities. The directory had been compelled, in order to put a stop to these abuses, to appoint commissions who were independent of the staffs ; and we have seen how Championnet had treated them at Naples. The losing bargains made with the companies arose from another cause, the state of the finances. The contractors received nothing but promises, and these, in their turn, indemnified themselves by the price they charged for the uncertainty of the payment. The credits opened this year amounted to six hundred millions of ordinary, and to one hundred and twenty-five millions of extraordinary. Out of this sum, the minister had already signed the order for four hundred millions for expenses actually absorbed. Not two hundred and ten had yet been received ; orders of assignment had been delivered out for the remaining one hundred and ninety.

Thus nothing could be laid to the charge of the directory, so far as recklessness of expenditure was concerned. There was nothing to say against the selection of generals, except in one solitary instance. Championnet, after his conduct towards the commissioners sent to Naples, could not retain the command. MacDonald was at least his equal, and was distinguished by his strict integrity. Joubert and Bernadotte had no desire to accept the command of the army of Italy. They themselves had named Schérer. It was Barras who rejected Moreau ; he was the only person who had put Schérer in nomination. As for Augereau, his democratic turbulence was a well-grounded reason for refusing him a command; and at any rate, notwithstanding his indisputable qualifications, he was far from being able to take the command-in-chief. With respect to the expedition to Egypt, we have seen whether the directory should be blamed for that, and whether it is true that it was anxious to get Bonaparte, Kléber, Dessaix, and their forty thousand companions in arms out of the way. Larévellière-Lépeaux had a disagreement with the hero of Italy, for the firmness with which he opposed the expedition.

The war no more emanated from the acts of the directory than the other miscarriages. It must have been plainly perceptible that the conflict of the passions then raging in Europe, had alone been the cause of the war. In this respect no body was to blame; but, at all events, certainly not the patriots, or military men, who had a right to accuse the directory. What would the patriots have said if the Vaudois had not been suppressed, the Papal government punished, the king of Naples overthrown, and the sovereign of Piedmont compelled to abdicate. Was it not the military men, who in the army of Italy had always been urging the directory to seize upon new countries? They were all delighted to hear news of the wars that were going on. Was it not, moreover, Bernadotte at Vienna, and a brother of Bonaparte at Rome, who had committed imprudences, if any had been committed? It was not the determination of the Porte that had influenced that of Russia; but had the fact been so, it was the originator of the Egypt expedition with whom the blame ought solely to rest. Nothing then could be more absurd than the mass of the accusations heaped upon the directory. It could only be said to lay open to one imputation, that of having participated in the excessive confidence placed by the patriots and the military men in the power of the republic. It had participated in the revolutionary passions, and resigned itself to their influence. The directory had conceived that one hundred and seventy thousand men would be enough for the preliminary purposes of the war; that taking the offensive would decide every thing, &c. As for its plans, they were defective, but not more so than Carnot's in 1796, or worse than those of the Aulic council, and sketched out moreover, in part, on a plan of general Jourdan. There was but one man who could have draughted more perfect designs, as we have already said, and it was no fault of the directory if this man was not in Europe.

At any rate, history should, in common justice, note the injustice of these accusations; but woe to a government when every thing is imputed to it as a crime. One of the most indispensable qualities of a government is to possess that high character that raises it above the bare suspicion of injustice. When it has lost this, and the injuries of others, nay, even those of fortune, are indiscriminately laid to its charge, it has no longer the power to govern, and this impotence calls for its secession. How many governments were worn out since the commencement of the revolution! The action of France against Europe was so violent, that it could not but speedily destroy all its springs of action. The directory was worn out, as the committee of public welfare had already been, and as Napoleon himself has since been. All the accusations of which the directory was made the object were no evidence of its unreasonable conduct, but rather demonstrated its infirmity of age.

However, it is not surprising that five civil magistrates, elected to power, not on account of their hereditary greatness or their personal reputation, but because they had deserved somewhat more esteem than their fellow-citizens, that five magistrates, armed with the sole power of the laws, for the purpose of opposing outrageous factions, reducing to obedience numerous armies and generals covered with glory and with a full sense of their claims on public attention, and finally, for laying down the law to one-half of Europe, it is not surprising that they should soon appear incompetent, amid the terrible struggle now recently revived. It required but a single reverse to show this incompetence in a strong light. The factions alternately destroyed, the military men several times checked, called the directory contemptuously the lawyers, and said that France could no longer be governed by them.

From a very strange singularity, but which is not unfrequently observed in the conflict of revolutions, public opinion seemed to favour only that one of the five directors who was least deserving of all. Barras indisputably deserved to have objected against his own person all that could be said against the directory. In the first place, he had never occupied himself with the duties of his office, and had left the burden of public affairs to his colleagues. Excepting in critical periods, when he made his voice, which was stronger than his courage, heard, he paid no attention to business. All he did was to look to the government appointments, which better suited his intriguing disposition. He had shared in all the profits of the companies, and was the only one who defended them from the charge of corrupt expenditure. He had always been the defender of firebrands and rascals; it was he who had upheld Brune, and sent Fouché into Italy. He was the cause of the improper selection that had been made of the generals, for he had opposed the appointment of Moreau, and had strongly insisted on that of Schérer. In spite of all these very serious charges, he alone was exempt from animadversion. In the first place, he was not considered, like his four colleagues, as a lawyer; for his indolence, his dissolute habits, his soldier-like manners, his connexion with the Jacobins, and the recollection of the 18th Fructidor, which was attributed exclusively to him, made him look more of a practical man than his colleagues. The patriots found him not dissimilar to themselves in more than one point, and believed that he was devoted to them. The royalists received from him secret hopes. The staffs, whom he flattered, and whom he screened from the just severity of his colleagues, also regarded him highly; the contractors lauded him to the skies; and in this manner he escaped the general discredit. He was even perfidious towards his colleagues; for all the reproaches which he had deserved he had the art to throw solely upon them. Such a part cannot long be successful; it may certainly succeed for the moment: and it did succeed on the present occasion.

We have already adverted to the enmity Barras bore against Rewbell. The latter, a really able functionary, had offended by his ill temper and his hautour all those with whom he had to deal. He had been very severe upon the jobbers; upon all those for whom Barras had interested himself, and particularly the military men. Hence he had become an object of universal odium. He was a man of integrity, though somewhat avaricious. Barras had the art amongst his connexions, which were numerous, to subject him to the most odious suspicions. An unlucky circumstance seemed to warrant these suspicions. Rapinat, the agent of the directory in Switzerland, was Rewbell's brother-in-law. He had practised in Switzerland those exactions to which all countries in a state of subjection are exposed, but not in so great a degree as was done elsewhere. But the reiterated complaints of that petty avaricious people had produced an extraordinary sensation. Rapinat had been charged with the unfortunate commission of putting seals upon the coffers and treasures of Berne, and he had treated the Helvetic government with an offensive pride; these circumstances, and his name, which of itself was pregnant with disagreeable associations*, had made him pass for the Vorres† of Switzerland, and as the originator of those peculations in which he took no share, for he had even quitted Switzerland before the period of her greatest suffering. Barras' friends made wretched puns upon Rapinat's name, and the entire odium fell on Rewbell, who was his brother-in-law. Thus Rewbell's integrity was assailed by every species of detraction.

Larévellière, by reason of his inflexible severity and his influence in the political affairs of Italy, was not less odious than Rewbell. However, his mode of life was so simple and so retiring, that to impeach his integrity was quite out of the question. Barras' friends ridiculed him. They affected to deride his personal appearance, and his pretensions to a new papacy. They said that he had wanted to be the founder of the religion of Theophilanthropy, of which, by the bye, he was not the originator. Merlin and Treillard, although more recently installed in their authority, and not such prominent characters as Rewbell and Larévellière, were, nevertheless, involved in the same unpopularity.

While public opinion was in this state, the elections of the year VII. took place, and these were the last. The furious patriots resolved not to be excluded this year, as in the preceding, from the legislative body. They had inveighed against the system of separations (scissions), and did all they could to bring it into disrepute beforehand. In this they were so far successful, that there was no venturing to resort to it again. In this state of agitation, when men impute to their adversaries the very designs they most dread, it was said that the directory, availing itself, as on the 18th Fructidor, of extraordinary means, was about to continue for five years the powers of the existing deputies, and to suspend during that interval the exercise of the electoral franchises. They said that some Swiss were going to be brought to Paris, merely because the directory was engaged in organizing the Helvetic contingent. They made a great noise about a circular to the electors, issued by the commissioner of the government (the prefect) in the department of the Sarthe. It was not a circular, as we have since discovered, but an exhortation. The directory was compelled to express its disapproval thereof by a message. The elections which took place under these circumstances, brought a considerable number of patriots into the legislative body. There was no thought taken this year to exclude them from the legislative body, and their election was confirmed. General Jourdan, who had good reason to impute his reverses to the numerical inferiority of his army, but who did not act with his usual discretion in charging the government with an intention to destroy him, was again returned to the legislative body, his heart swelling with resentment. Augereau was also returned with an increased addition to his former ill temper and turbulence.

* As apparently derived from Rapine. Trans.

† A Roman prætor, in Sicily, accused by Cicero, and condemned for his extortions. Trans.

A new director had now to be chosen. Fortune in this instance did not assist the republic, for instead of Barras, the lot fell upon Rewbell, the ablest of the five directors, who was thus declared the retiring member. This was a grand subject of satisfaction to all the enemies of that director, and furnished them with a new opportunity of slandering him with greater impunity. As, however, he had been elected to the council of the ancients, he took an opportunity of replying to his accusers, which he did in the most triumphant manner.

On Rewbell's going out, the only infraction of the strict rule of right with which the directory can be charged was committed. The first five directors, appointed at the time of the institution of the directory, had made an agreement among themselves, by which they were to take ten thousand francs in advance of their salary, in order to give them to the retiring member. The aim of this noble sacrifice was to better provide the members of the directory for the transition from supreme power to private life, especially with respect to those who had no great income. There was even a lofty feeling displayed in doing thus; for it operated strongly against the respect due to the government, to find in indigence that man who had been seen the day before in the enjoyment of supreme power. This was the chief reason that induced the directors to provide in a more suitable manner for the future situation in life of their colleagues. Their salaries were already so moderate, that an advance of ten thousand francs appeared very disproportionate. They resolved to allow the sum of one hundred thousand francs to each director on retiring. This would be an additional expense to the state of one hundred thousand francs. This sum was to be applied for from the minister of the finances, who might take it out of one of the thousand surplus incomes which it was so easy to make in budgets of six or eight hundred millions. It was moreover settled that each director should retain his carriage and horses. As the legislative body made an annual allowance for furniture, this expense was to be declared, and would thenceforward become an item strictly legitimate. The directors, moreover, agreed that whatever was not disbursed in the article of furniture should be divided among them. This was assuredly a very slight pull upon the public purse, if it could be deemed so; and while generals and companies were making such enormous profits, one hundred thousand francs per annum, devoted to the subsistence of a man who had been recently at

1799,
May (Prairie.)

Continuation of the campaign of 1799.—Masséna consolidates the commandship of the

THE DIRECTORY.

armies of Helvetia and the Danube, and occupies the line of the Limmat.

823

the head of the government was no misappropriation at all of the revenue. The reasons and the mode in which the measure was to be carried out in some sort justified it. Larévillière, to whom it was communicated, never would consent to this. He declared to his colleagues that he never would accept his share. Rewbell received his. The one hundred thousand francs given to him were taken from the two millions of secret service money, for which the directory was not obliged to account. Such was the only impropriety with which the directory collectively can be charged. No more than one of its members, out of the twelve who succeeded one another, was accused of having made private gains. Can the same be said of any other government in the world?

Some one was to be found to succeed to Rewbell. A desire was manifested of selecting some person of high reputation, who would reflect some degree of honour upon the directory, and public attention was turned to Sieyès, whose name, next to that of Bonaparte, was the greatest of that period. The embassy to Prussia had added to his reputation. He was already regarded, and very justly, as a deep thinker; but since he had been in Berlin, the continuance of the Prussian neutrality was attributed to him; though it was owing, in fact, much less to his intervention than the situation of that power. Thus he was deemed quite as capable to rule the government, as to devise a constitution. He was chosen director. Many persons conceived that in this selection they discerned the confirmation of a rumour generally gaining ground, that very speedy reforms were about to be made in the constitution. They said that Sieyès was called to the directory for no other purpose than to assist in these reforms. So little did they imagine that the existing state of things could be upheld, that they perceived in all these facts certain indications of a change.

CHAPTER XVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1799; MASSÉNA CONSOLIDATES THE COMMANDSHIP OF THE HELVETIC AND DANUBIAN ARMIES, AND OCCUPIES THE LINE OF THE LIMMAT.—ARRIVAL OF SUWARROW.—SCHILLER TRANSFERS THE COMMANDSHIP-IN-CHIEF TO MOREAU.—BATTLE OF CASSANO.—RETHREAT OF MOREAU TO THE OTHER SIDE OF THE PO AND THE APENNINES.—THE ENDEAVOUR TO EFFECT A JUNCTION WITH THE ARMY OF NAPLES; BATTLE OF TREBBIA.—ALL THE PARTIES COALESCE IN OPPOSITION TO THE DIRECTORY.—REVOLUTION OF THE 30TH PRAIRIAL.—LARÉVILLIÈRE AND MERLIN RETIRE FROM THE DIRECTORY.

In the interval which was occupied by the reforms in the government we have just related, the directory had been constantly making the greatest exertions to repair the reverses which had so recently marked the opening of the campaign.

Jourdan had lost the command of the army of the Danube, and Masséna had received the commandship-in-chief of all the troops in cantonnements between Dusseldorf and the Saint-Gothard. This judicious appointment was of itself sufficient to save France. Schérer, impatient to quit an army whose confidence he had lost, had obtained license to transfer the command to Moreau. MacDonald had received pressing orders to evacuate the kingdom of Naples and the Roman States, and to come and effect his junction with the army of Upper Italy. All the old battalions retained in the interior were on their march for the frontiers; the equipment and the organization of the conscripts had been accelerated, and reinforcements began to come in from all quarters.

No sooner was Masséna appointed commander-in-chief of the armies of the Rhine and Switzerland, than he began to consider respecting the most suitable disposal of the forces committed to his charge. He could not have taken the command under more critical circumstances. He had at most thirty thousand men, dispersed over Switzerland, from the valley of the Inn to Bâle; he had opposed to him thirty thousand men under Bellegarde in the Tyrol, twenty-eight thousand under Hotze in the Vorarlberg, and forty thousand under the archduke Charles, between the Lake of Constance and the Danube. This mass of nearly one hundred thousand men, was capable of surrounding and destroying Masséna's army. If the archduke had not been thwarted by the Aulic council, and incapacitated by illness, and had crossed the Rhine between the Lake of Constance and the Aar, he might have cut off Masséna's retreat into France, surrounded, and destroyed his army. Fortunately, he was not his own master; still more fortunately also, Bellegarde and Hotze had not been placed immediately under his command. Between these three generals there was a continual wrangling, and this prevented their engaging themselves to effect any one decisive operation.

These circumstances favoured Masséna, and enabled him to take a firm position and to distribute the troops placed at his disposal in a suitable manner. Every thing proved that the archduke had no other intention than to observe the line of the Rhine in the neighbourhood of Alsace; and that he purposed to commence his operations in Switzerland, between Schaffhausen and the Aar. Consequently Masséna moved back into Switzerland the greater part of the army of the Danube, and assigned to it the positions it ought to have taken from the first, that is to say, immediately after the battle of Stoclach. He had been wrong in leaving Lecombe too long embarrassed in the Engadine. The latter was compelled to make his retreat from that place, after having fought brilliant actions, in which he displayed admirable intrepidity and presence of mind. The Grisons were evacuated. Masséna then distributed his army from the great chain of the Alps to the confluence of the Aar and Rhine, choosing the line that to him seemed the best.

Switzerland presents several lines of water, which commencing at the High Alps, pass quite through the country in their way towards the Rhine. The most extended and greatest is that of the Rhine itself, which taking its source not far from the Saint-Gothard, first runs northward, then spreads out into a spacious lake*, whence it issues near to Stein, and runs westward towards Bâle, thence it again begins to run northward, and forming the frontier line of Alsace. This line is the most extensive, and takes in all Switzerland. There is a second line, that of Zurich, delineated within the preceding: this is the line of the Linth, which river taking its rise in the smaller cantons, stops and forms the Lake of Zurich, issues from it by the name of the Limmat, and finishes its course in the Aar, not far from the place where this latter river falls into the Rhine. This line, which surrounds no more than a part of Switzerland, is much less extensive than the former. There is lastly a third, the line of the Reuss, also delineated within the second line, which from the bed of the Reuss flows into the Lake of Lucerne, and from the Lucerne runs on and joins the Aar near the point where it falls into the latter. These lines, commencing on the right against prodigious mountains, terminating on the left in great rivers, consisting sometimes of rivers, at other of lakes, present numerous advantages for the defensive. Masséna could not hope to retain the longest, that of the Rhine, and to extend himself from the Saint-Gothard to the mouth of the Aar. He was obliged to fall back upon the line of the Limmat, where he posted himself in the strongest manner. He placed his right wing, formed by the division of Lecourbe, Menard, and Lorge, from the Alps to the Lake of Zurich under the command of Férin. He posted his centre on the Limmat, and composed it of the four divisions of Oudinot, Vandamme, Thureau, and Soult. His left guarded the Rhine towards Bâle and Strasburg.

Before he confined himself in this position, he tried to prevent by battle the junction of the archduke with his lieutenant, Hotze. These two generals, posted on the Rhine, one of them at the place where the river falls into the Lake of Constance, the other of them at the point where the river issues from the lake, had the whole extent of the lake between them. In crossing over this line, so as to gain a firm footing for themselves in front of the line of Zurich and the Limmat where Masséna had posted himself, they would have to start from the two extremities of the lake, in order to effect their junction on the other side. Masséna had the power of fixing upon the moment when Hotze had not yet advanced to fall upon the archduke, to drive him beyond the Rhine, then to turn short round upon Hotze and repulse him in his turn. It has been calculated that he would have had time for executing this divided operation, and for beating separately both the Austrian generals. Unfortunately, he did not think of attacking them until the very moment they were near joining each other, and when they were in a situation to mutually support each other. He fought them on several points on the 5th Prairial (May 24), at Aldenfingen and at Frauenfeld, and though he had every where the advantage, owing to that vigour which he infused into all his movements, still he could not prevent the junction, and was obliged to fall back on the line of the Limmat and Zurich, where he made himself ready to give the archduke a warm reception, if the latter should decide upon attacking him.

Things were far from turning out well in Italy. There one disaster followed close on the heels of another. Suwarrow had rejoined the Austrian army, with a division of twenty-eight or thirty thousand Russians. Mélas had assumed the command of the Austrian army. Suwarrow was commander-in-chief of both armies, amounting at the least to ninety thousand men. He was called the Invincible. He was celebrated for his campaigns against the Turks, and by his cruelties in Poland. He possessed great energy of character, with an affectation of eccentricity which verged upon madness, but he was destitute of all talent for combination. He was a genuine barbarian, fortunately incapable of duly appreciating the extent of his forces, otherwise the republic might not have been able to resist him. His army closely resembled himself. It possessed a most extraordinary courage that bordered on fanaticism, but without intelligence. The artillery, the cavalry, and the engineers belonging to it, were reduced to mere automata. All in which they could be said to be tolerably expert, was the use of the bayonet, and they used this weapon as the French had done during the revolution. Suwarrow, extremely insolent to his allies, sent Russian officers to the Austrians to teach them the use of the bayonet. He employed the most haughty language; he said, that the women, the dandies, and the idlers ought to quit the army; that the babblers who presumed to criticise the imperial service should be treated as egotists and lose their rank; and that every one ought to sacrifice himself to effect the deliverance of Italy from the French and the atheists. Such was the style of his addresses. Fortunately, after causing us much damage, this brutal energy was about to be met by the vigorous exertion of science and skill, and to succumb before it.

Schérer, who had entirely lost his wits, had rapidly retreated to the Adda, amidst indignant outcries from his soldiers. Out of his army of forty-six thousand men, he had lost ten thousand, either slain or prisoners. He was obliged to leave eight thousand more at Peschiera or Mantua, so that there were no more than twenty-eight thousand remaining. Nevertheless, if with this handful of men he had known how to make a few skilful movements, he might have given Macdonald time to join him, and might well have avoided many disasters. But he posted himself on the Adda, in the most unhappy manner. He divided his army into three divisions. Serrurier's division was at Lecco, at the issue of the Adda from the Lake of Lecco. Grenier's division was at Cassano, and Victor's division was at Lodi. He had placed Montrichard, with a few light troops, towards the Modenese and the mountains of Genoa, to support the communications with Tuscany, by which Macdonald had to debouch. His twenty-eight thousand men thus spread over a line of twenty-four leagues could not make an effectual resistance at any given point, and could not but be broken wherever the enemy should present himself in any great strength.

* The Lake of Constance.

1799.
April 28.
(2 Floréal.)

Battle of Cassano, in which the republican army suffered severely.

THE DIRECTORY.

Battle of Cassano, in which the republican army suffered severely.

825

On the evening of the 8th Floréal (April 27), at the very moment when the line of the Adda was broken through, Schérer transferred the command of the army to Moreau. That brave general had some right to decline the command. He whom they had degraded to the part of a mere subaltern, now, when the campaign was lost, and when nothing but disasters were to be met with, was to have the command given to him. However, with a patriotic devotedness which history cannot too highly commend, he made up his mind to suffer a defeat by accepting the command the very same evening that the Adda was forced. It is from this period that the least extolled but the most glorious portion of his life may be said to commence.

Suvarrow had approached the Adda at several points. When the first Russian regiment appeared in sight of the bridge of Lecco, the carabineers of the brave 18th light infantry quitted the intrenchments, and ran to meet those soldiers who had been depicted as terrible and invincible giants. They rushed upon them with fixed bayonets, and made a great carnage among them. The Russians were repulsed. A glorious excitement had been raised in the bosoms of our brave fellows; they were determined to make these insolent barbarians, who came to meddle with a quarrel in which they had no concern, repent of their expedition. The appointment of Moreau raised their ardour to a higher pitch, and imparted every confidence to the army. Unfortunately, the position was no longer tenable. Suvarrow, repulsed at Lecco, had sent troops across the Adda at two points, at Brivio and at Trezzo, above and below Serrurier's division, which formed the left. That division was thus cut off from the rest of the army. Moreau, with Grenier's division, fought a furious battle at Trezzo, for the purpose of driving the enemy back beyond the Adda, and again putting himself in communication with Serrurier's division. With eight or nine thousand men, he fought with a division of more than twenty thousand. His soldiers, animated by his presence, performed prodigies of valour, but could not drive back the enemy beyond the Adda. Unfortunately, Serrurier, to whom orders could now no longer be despatched, did not conceive the idea of bringing himself back upon this same point of Trezzo, where Moreau was fighting so desperately, in order to place himself again in communication with him. He was obliged to desist, and to leave Serrurier's division to its fate. This division was surrounded by the entire hostile army, and fought with the most determined bravery. Surrounded at length on all sides, it was compelled to lay down its arms. Part of this division, thanks to the hardihood and presence of mind of an officer, got away safe over the mountains to Piedmont. During this terrible action, Victor had luckily retired with his division unhurt. Such was the fatal battle called the battle of Cassano, on the 9th Floréal (April 28), which reduced the army to about twenty-eight thousand men.

It was with this handful of brave fellows that Moreau undertook to retreat. That extraordinary man lost not a moment that presence of mind which naturally belonged to him. Reduced to twenty thousand men, opposed to an army that could have been made to amount to ninety thousand, if it had been brought up in a mass, he was never for a moment shaken. This imperturbability was infinitely more meritorious than that which he displayed when he returned from Germany with an army of sixty thousand victorious men, and yet it has been far less eulogized! So much do the casual influences of popular prejudice affect contemporary opinions.

His first care was to protect Milan, to afford means for sending off the artillery and the baggage, and to allow time to the members of the Cisalpine government, and all the Milanese who were compromised, to retire to the rear. Nothing is more dangerous for an army than these families of fugitives which it is obliged to receive into its ranks. They embarrass its march, retard its movements, and may even sometimes jeopardize its safety. Moreau, after having stayed two days in Milan, took up his march to recross the Po. From the conduct of Suvarrow, he had reason to think that he should have time to take a firm position. He had two objects to attain; namely, to protect his communications with France and also with Tuscany, by which the army of Naples was advancing. To compass this desirable purpose, the best course that suggested itself to him was to occupy the slope of the mountains of Genoa; this was the most favourable point. He marched in two columns, the one escorting the artillery, the baggage, and the whole equipage of the army, took the high road from Milan to Turin; the other took the road in the direction of Alexandria, to occupy the roads to the Riviera of Genoa. He performed this march without being too hard pressed by the enemy. Suvarrow, instead of rushing with his victorious army on our feeble army, and completely destroying it, procured himself to be decreed the honours of triumph at Milan by the priests, the monks, the nobles, and all the creatures of Austria, who had returned in shoals in the train of the allied armies.

Moreau had time to get to Turin, and to send off all the superfluous accompaniments of the war towards France. He fortified the citadel, strove to excite the zeal of the partisans of the republic, and then went to join the column which he had despatched towards Alexandria. He there chose a position which fully proved the correctness of his observation. The Tanaro, as it falls from the Apennines, flows onwards to fall into the Po below Alexandria. Moreau placed himself at the confluence of these two rivers. Protected at the same time by both, he was not afraid of an attack by storm; he guarded at the same time all the roads to Genoa, and was enabled to await the arrival of Macdonald. This position could not have been more advantageously chosen. He occupied Casale, Valenza, and Alexandria; he had a chain of posts on the Po and the Tanaro; and his masses were disposed in such a manner that they could hasten in a few hours to the very first point that might be attacked. There it was that he posted himself with twenty thousand men, and awaited with imperturbable composure the movements of his formidable enemy.

Suvarrow had fortunately allowed himself plenty of time to make further progress. He had required at the hands of the Aulic council that the Austrian corps of Bellegarde, appointed for the Tyrol, should be placed at his disposal. This corps had just then descended into Italy, and increased the combined army to considerably more than one hundred thousand men. But Suwarrow, having orders to besiege Peschiera, Mantua, and Pizzighitona all at once, wishing at the same time to protect himself on the side towards Switzerland, but after all, unskilled in the art of distributing masses, had not more than forty thousand immediately available, a force at any rate quite adequate to overwhelm Moreau, had Suwarrow known how to make the proper use of it.

Suwarrow followed the course of the Po and Tanaro, so as to post himself opposite to Moreau. He stationed himself at Tortona, and made that place his head-quarters. After a few days of inaction, he at length resolved to make an attempt on Moreau's left wing, that is to say, on the side next to the Po. A little above the confluence of the Po and the Tanaro, opposite to Mugarone, are some woody islands, and under favour of these the Russians resolved to attempt a passage. In the night between the 22nd and the 23rd Floreal (May 11 and 12), they crossed over to the number of nearly two thousand, to one of these islands, and thus found themselves beyond the principal arm of the river. That branch of the river they had yet to pass was inconsiderable, and might even be crossed by a swimmer. They boldly crossed it, and were then on the right bank of the Po. The French, forewarned of the danger, hastened to the point that was threatened. Moreau, who was informed of other demonstrations made in the direction of the Tanaro, waited till the real point of danger should be well determined, so that he might bring his forces to support it: so soon as he became certain of the fact, he marched thither with his reserve, and drove into the Po the Russians who had had the hardihood to cross over. There were two thousand five hundred of them killed, drowned, or made prisoners.

This vigorous act completely secured Moreau's position, in the singular triangle in which he had posted himself. But the inaction of the enemy gave him uneasiness. He was fearful lest Suwarrow had left but a mere detachment before Alexandria, and that he might have ascended the Po with the mass of his forces, with the intention of proceeding to Turin and carrying the position of the French in the rear, or that he might perhaps have marched so as to meet Macdonald. In the uncertainty in which he was left by the inactivity of Suwarrow, he resolved to make a movement himself in order to ascertain the real state of things. He thought of debouching the other side of Alexandria, and making a very careful survey (reconnaissance) of the ground. If the enemy should have left nothing save a detached corps in his front, Moreau's plan was to convert this survey of the ground into a serious attack, to overwhelm this detached corps, and then quietly retire by the high road of the Bochetta towards the mountains of Genoa, and there wait for Macdonald. If, on the contrary, he should light upon the principal mass, his plan was to immediately withdraw, and regain in all haste the Riviera of Genoa by all the accessible communications that would be left for him. One reason which particularly induced him to adopt this decisive course was the insurrection in Piedmont on his rear. It was incumbent on him to get as near to his main position as soon as he could.

While Moreau was projecting this extremely cautious measure, Suwarrow was framing another plan, which had not even common sense to recommend it. His position at Tortona was certainly the best he could have taken, since it placed him between the two French armies, those of the Cisalpine and Naples. He ought not to have left Naples upon any consideration whatever. Nevertheless, his notion was, to bring along with him part of his force to the other side of the Po, to follow its course up to Turin, to seize upon that capital, to organize the Piedmontese royalists there, and to make himself master of Moreau's position. Nothing could be worse contrived than such a manoeuvre; for to deprive Moreau of his position, he ought to make the attempt by a definite and vigorous attack, but above all, never to have quitted the intermediate position between the two armies, who were anxious to effect their junction.

While Suwarrow, by dividing his forces, was leaving part of them in the environs of Tortona, along the Tanaro, and was proceeding with the other beyond the Po, to march to Turin, Moreau was making his intended survey of the ground. He had sent forward Victor's division, to make a vigorous attack upon the Russian corps that he had before him. He kept himself with his reserve somewhat in the rear, ready to convert this survey of the ground into a serious attack, if he should consider that the Russian corps could be overwhelmed. After a very warm action, in which Victor's troops displayed extraordinary intrepidity, Moreau believed that the whole Russian army was before him: he durst not make an attack outright for fear of having a too superior enemy upon his hands. In consequence, between the two courses which he had purposed to adopt, he preferred the second as the safest. He resolved, therefore, to retire towards the mountains of Genoa. His position was most critical. All Piedmont was in open insurrection on his rear. A body of insurgents had gained possession of Ceva, which commands the principal road, the only one that could be approached by artillery. The great convoy for the objects of art collected in Italy, was subjected to the danger of falling into the hands of the enemy. These circumstances were most vexatious. By taking the roads more to the rear, and terminating at the Riviera di Ponente, Moreau feared that he should be too far from the communications with Tuscany, and that he should leave them in the hands of the enemy, whom he supposed to be collected in mass about Tortona. In this perplexity he immediately made up his mind, and made the following arrangements. He detached Victor's division without artillery or baggage, and sent it by byways, passable for none but infantry, towards the mountains of Genoa. This division had to make all haste to occupy every one of the passes of the Apennines, for the purpose of joining the army coming from Naples, and reinforcing it in case it should be attacked by Suwarrow. Moreau, keeping no more than eight thousand men at the utmost, came up with his artillery, cavalry, and all that could not follow the mountain tracts, to gain one of the high roads in rear of Ceva, and which terminate at the Riviera di Ponente. In deciding upon this eccentric retreat, he made another calculation, namely, that he should draw upon himself the enemy's army, and divert it from its pursuit of Victor and falling upon Macdonald.

Victor made a good retreat by Acqui, Spigno, and Dego, and then occupied the crests of the Apennines. Moreau, on his part, retreated with extraordinary celerity upon Asti. The capture of Ceva, which cut off his principal communication, threw him into extreme embarrassment. He sent off the greater part of his artillery by the pass of Fenestrella, and kept no more of the field artillery than what was absolutely necessary, and resolved to open a road for himself across the Apennines, which his own soldiers were to make. After four days spent in incredible exertions, the road was rendered passable for artillery, and Moreau arrived in the Riviera of Genoa without having retrograded to the pass of the Tenda, which would have kept him too far off from Victor's troops detached towards Genoa.

Suvarrow, on receiving intelligence of Moreau's retreat, lost no time in pursuing him; but he knew not how to guess or anticipate his skilful combinations. Thus, owing to his coolness and his dexterity, Moreau had brought off his twenty thousand men without suffering them to be once broken, and on the other hand had kept off the Russians wherever he had met them. He had left a garrison of three thousand men in Alexandria, and was with nearly eighteen thousand in the environs of Genoa. He took up his position on the crest of the Apennines, awaiting the arrival of Macdonald. He had sent Lapoyvo's division, Montrieux's light corps, and Victor's division, to the Upper Trebbia, to join Macdonald; as for himself, he kept in the environs of Novi, with the remainder of his entire army. His plan of junction was marked by profound caution. He was able to get the army of Naples over to him by the shores of the Mediterranean, collect it at Genoa, and with it effect a debouchment from the Bochetta; or, if he chose, make it debouch from Tuscany into the plains of Placentia and on the banks of the Po. The former course would ensure the junction, because it would be effected under shelter of the Apennines; but it would be necessary to cross the Apennines once more, and to make head against the enemy to carry the plain. On the other hand, by debouching in front of Placentia, the mastery would be obtained of the plain as far as the Po, he could then take up his field of battle on the very banks of that river, and, if victorious, drive the enemy into the river. Moreau was desirous that Macdonald should always keep his left close to the mountains, so as to keep up his communication with Victor, who was at Bobbio. For his own part, he watched Suvarrow, ready to fall upon his flanks the instant he should attempt to march to meet Macdonald. In this situation the junction appeared quite as certain of being effected as if made at the back of the Apennines, and would be on a far preferable ground.

The Directory had been getting at this very time together a considerable naval force in the Mediterranean. Bruix, the minister of the naval department, had put himself at the head of the Brest fleet, had raised the blockade of the Spanish fleet, and was cruising with fifty sail in the Mediterranean, with a view to clear it of the English, and to re-open communications with the army of Egypt.

This most desirable junction was at length effected, and might enable us to restore our preponderance in the Levant. Bruix was at this moment before Genoa. His presence had singularly excited the courage of the army. It was said that he was bringing provisions, ammunition, and reinforcements. There was nothing of the kind, but Moreau made the most of this rumour, and endeavoured to make it so believed. He caused a report to be circulated, that the fleet had just landed twenty thousand men and considerable supplies. This report encouraged his army, and greatly diminished the confidence of the enemy.

It was now the middle of Prairial (the early part of June), a new event had very recently taken place in Switzerland. We have seen that Masséna had occupied the line of the Limmat or of Zurich, and that the archduke, debouching in two masses from the two extremities of the Lake of Constance, had come and ranged his troops all along, and the full length of this line. He resolved to attack it between Zurich and Brugg, that is, between the Lake of Zurich and the Aar, all along the Limmat. Masséna had taken up his position not on the Limmat itself, but on a series of heights in advance of the Limmat, and which at the same time cover the river as well as the lake. He had intrenched these heights in the most formidable manner, and rendered them almost impregnable. Although this part of our line between Zurich and the Aar was the strongest, the archduke had resolved to attack it, because there would have been considerable danger in making a wide circuit for the purpose of attempting an attack above the lake, along the Linth. Masséna might have taken advantage of this moment to crush the corps left in front of him, and thus to gain a decisive advantage.

The projected attack was executed on the 4th of June (16th Prairial). It took place upon the whole extent of the Limmat, and was every where victoriously repulsed, notwithstanding the obstinate perseverance of the Austrians. Next day the archduke, thinking that such attempts ought to be followed up for the purpose of providing against useless losses, renewed the attack with the same obstinacy as before. Masséna, considering that his line might be broken, and that his retreat would then become difficult, that the line which he should abandon would be next to one still stronger—the chain of the Albis, which takes the rear of the Limmat and the Lake of Zurich, resolved to retire voluntarily. All that he should lose by this retreat, would be the city of Zurich, which he considered as of slight importance. The chain of the Albis mountains, running along the Lake of Zurich and the Limmat to the Aar, presenting, moreover, a continuous steep declivity, was almost unassailable. By occupying this post, all he could lose would be a little ground, for he should fall back no farther than the width of the lake and the Limmat. Consequently, he retired thither voluntarily and without loss, and posted himself there in such a manner as made the archduke extremely disinclined to attack him.

Our position, therefore, was always much about the same in Switzerland: the Aar, the Limmat, the Lake of Zurich, the Linth, and the Reuss, as far as the Saint-Gothard, formed our defensive line against the Austrians.

In the Italian quarter, Macdonald was at last advancing towards Tuscany. In conformity with his instructions, he had left garrisons in fort Saint Elmo, Capua, and Gaëta. This was uselessly exposing troops who were not capable of upholding the republican party, and who left a void in those troops composing the army in actual service. The French army, on withdrawing, had left the city of Naples a victim to a royalist reaction, which equalled the most terrible scenes of our own revolution. Macdonald had rallied at Rome some thousand men of Garnier's division; he had picked up Gauthier's division in Tuscany, and Montrichard's light corps in the Modenese. He had thus formed a body of twenty-eight thousand men. He was at Florence on the 6th Prairial (May 25). His retreat was effected with great rapidity and remarkable order. He unfortunately lost considerable time in Tuscany, and did not debouch beyond the Apennines into the plains of Placentia till towards the end of Prairial (the middle of June).

Had he debouched on the plains of Placentia sooner than he did, he would have surprised the allies so dispersed that he might have overwhelmed them one after the other, and driven them beyond the Po. Suwarrow was at Turin, of which he had recently got possession, and where he had found immense supplies. Bellegarde was watching the outlets from Genoa; Kray was besieging Mantua, the citadel of Milan, and the fortresses. In no single spot were there so many as thirty thousand Austrians or Russians collected together. Macdonald and Moreau debouching with an united force of fifty thousand men, might have altered the whole course of the campaign. But Macdonald thought it right to spend a few days in resting his army, and reorganizing the divisions which he had successively picked up. He thus threw away very valuable time, and afforded Suwarrow the opportunity of repairing his omissions. The Russian general, being informed of the march of Macdonald, lost no time in quitting Turin, and proceeding with a reinforcement of twenty thousand men, for the purpose of posting himself between the two French generals, and resuming the position he ought never to have abandoned. He gave orders to general Ott, who was in observation on the Trebbia in the environs of Placentia, to retreat upon him if he were attacked; he ordered Kray to send to him from Mantua all the troops that he could well spare; he left to Bellegarde the charge of watching Novi, from whence Moreau was to debouch; and he set himself in order, to march into the plains of Placentia, to encounter Macdonald.

These are the only arrangements which, during the whole of this campaign, have earned Suwarrow the approval of military men. The two French generals still occupied the positions we have pointed out. Posted, both of them, on the Apennines, they would have to descend for the purpose of uniting in the plains of Placentia. Moreau was to debouch from Novi, Macdonald from Pontremoli. Moreau had sent on Victor's division to reinforce Macdonald. He had stationed general Lapoye with some battalions at Bobbio on the slope of the mountains to protect the junction; and his scheme was to seize the moment when Suwarrow should march in front against Macdonald to fall upon his flank. But before this could be done, Macdonald should continue to keep himself supported upon the mountains, and not suffer himself to engage too far down in the plain.

Macdonald put himself in motion about the end of Prairial (the middle of June). Hohenzollern's division, posted in the environs of Modena, was guarding the Lower Po; it was overwhelmed by superior forces, lost fifteen hundred men, and was nearly being all taken prisoners. This opening success encouraged Macdonald, and made him hasten his march. Victor's division, which had just joined him, and made his army amount to nearly thirty-two thousand men, formed his advanced guard. The Polish division, commanded by Dombrowsky, marched on the left of Victor's division; Rusca's division supported them both. Although the main body of the army, composed of the divisions under Montrichard, Olivier, and Watrin, was still behind, Macdonald induced by the advantage which he had so recently obtained over Hohenzollern, was for overwhelming Ott, who was in observation on the Tidone, and ordered Victor, Dombrowsky, and Rusca, to march against him without losing a moment's time.

Three rapid streams, running parallel from the Apennines to the Po, formed the field of battle. These were the Nura, the Trebbia, and the Tidone. The main body of the French army was still on the Nura. The divisions of Victor, Dombrowsky, and Rusca, advanced towards the Trebbia, and had orders to cross over and proceed to the Tidone, so as to overwhelm Ott, whom Macdonald believed to be unsupported. They marched on the 29th of Prairial (June 17). They at first repulsed the advanced guard of general Ott from the banks of the Tidone, and compelled it to take a position farther back, in the direction of the village of Sermot. Ott was all but overwhelmed; but at that moment Suwarrow came to his relief with his whole force. He stationed general Bagration in a position to meet Victor, who was marching along the Po; he drew off Ott to the centre, against Dombrowsky, and ordered Mélas to the right upon Rusca's division. Bagration did not at first make much way against Victor, and was forced to make a retrograde movement, but at the centre. Suwarrow ordered Dombrowsky's division to charge with the Russian infantry, threw two regiments of cavalry upon his flank, and broke his division. From this moment Victor, who advanced towards the Po, found himself exposed to a greater front of line than his own, and in jeopardy. Bagration, reinforced by the grenadiers, resumed the offensive. The Russian cavalry, who had broken the Poles in the centre, and had thus attacked Victor, charged him in flank, and obliged him to retire. Rusca on the right was then forced to give ground to Mélas. Our three divisions recrossed the Tidone, and made a retrograde movement to the Trebbia.

This first battle, in which one-third of the army at most had been engaged with the whole of the enemy's army, had not been successful. Macdonald, who did not know that Suwarrow had come up, had been in too great a hurry. He resolved to encamp himself behind the Trebbia, to collect all his divisions at that place, and to revenge himself for the check he had so recently experienced. Unluckily, the divisions commanded by Olivier, Montrichard, and Watrin's, were still behind on the Nura, and he resolved to wait till the day after the next, that is, till the 1st Messidor (June 19), to give battle.

But Suwarrow did not give him time to get his forces together, and prepared to attack on the very next day, namely, the 30th Prairial (June 18). The two armies were about to join each other, the Trebbia supporting their wings on the Po and the Apennines. Suwarrow, judging wisely that the essential point was in the mountains, by which the two French armies would be able to communicate, took thither his best infantry and his best cavalry. He despatched Bagration's division, which was at first on his left, along the Po to his right against the mountains. He posted them, together with Schweikofsky's division, under the command of Rosenberg, and ordered them both to cross the Trebbia, near Rivalta, in the upper part of its course, in order to get the French away from the mountains. It was near this point that the divisions of Dombrowsky, Rusca, and Victor were posted, to the left of the French line. The divisions commanded by Olivier and Montrichard were to come and place themselves in the centre along the Trebbia. Watrin's division was to occupy the right near the Po and Placentia.

On the morning of the 29th Prairial (June 17), the Russian advanced guards attacked the advanced guards of the French, which were beyond the Trebbia, at Casaliggio and Grignagno, and repulsed them. Macdonald, who did not expect to be attacked, was engaged in bringing his centre divisions into line. Victor, who commanded on our left, immediately took all the French infantry the other side the Trebbia, and for a moment put Suwarrow in peril. But Rosenberg coming up with Schweikofsky's division regained the advantage, and after a furious action, in which the loss was enormous on both sides, compelled the French to return behind the Trebbia. In the mean time the divisions of Olivier and Montrichard came up at the centre, and Watrin's division on the right, and a regular cannonade took place along the whole line. After exchanging some cannon balls they halted on the banks of the Trebbia, which separated the two armies.

Such was the second action. It had consisted in a battle on our left, a terrible battle, but without result; Macdonald after this, putting his entire force in order, was determined that the third conflict should be decisive. His plan was to cross the Trebbia at all points, and to fall upon both wings of the enemy. With this view, Dombrowsky's division was to ascend the river to Rivalta, and to cross it above the Russians. Watrin's division was to cross it nearly at its influx into the Po, and to gain Suwarrow's extreme left. He calculated at the same time that Moreau, whose co-operation he had been expecting for two days past, would come into action on that day at the latest. Such was the plan for the 1st Messidor (June 19). But a tremendous and unexpected encounter occurred in the night. A French detachment having crossed the bed of Trebbia to take its position, the Russians conceived they were attacked, and ran to arms. The French, on their part, did the same. The two armies were intermingled, and a nocturnal conflict ensued, in which both sides were bent on slaughter, without distinguishing friend from foe. After a useless carnage, the generals at length succeeded in bringing back their men to the bivouac. On the following day, the armies were so fatigued by three days' fighting, and by the confusion of the night, that they did not get into action till about ten in the morning.

The battle commenced on our left on the Upper Trebbia. Dombrowsky crossed the Trebbia at Rivalta in spite of the Russians. Suwarrow detached thither prince Bagration. This movement left Rosenberg's flanks uncovered. Victor and Rusca immediately took advantage of this circumstance to fall upon him after crossing the Trebbia. They advanced successfully, and enveloped Schweikofsky's division, where Suwarrow was, on all sides. They placed it in the greatest peril, but it faced about every where, and defended itself valiantly. Bagration, perceiving the danger, turned right about to the threatened point, and obliged Victor and Rusca to desist from their attempt. Had Dombrowsky seized the opportunity to fall, on his part, upon Bagration, the advantage would have remained ours at this point, which was the most important, since it was contiguous to the mountains. Unluckily, he continued inactive, and Victor and Rusca were obliged to fall back to the Trebbia. At the centre Montrichard had crossed the Trebbia near Grignagno, and Olivier in the direction of San Nicolo. Montrichard was marching upon Forster's corps, when the Austrian reserves, for which Suwarrow had applied to Mèlas, and which were filing past the rear of the field of battle, fell unawares upon the flanks of his division. It was surprised, and the fifth light infantry, which had performed prodigies in a hundred battles, fled in disorder. Montrichard found himself obliged to recross the Trebbia. Olivier, who had advanced with success towards San Nicolo, and vigorously repulsed Ott and Mèlas, found himself exposed by the retreat of Montrichard. Then Mèlas sending counter-orders to the Austrian reserves, whose appearance had alarmed Montrichard's division, directed them against Olivier's division, which was likewise forced to cross the Trebbia. Meanwhile, Watrin's division brought to no purpose to the extreme right, where it had nothing to do, was advancing along the Po, without being of any assistance to the army. It was even obliged to recross the Trebbia in order to follow the general retreating army. Suwarrow, still apprehensive of seeing Moreau debouch on his rear, made great efforts during the rest of the day to pass the Trebbia, but without success. The French opposed his progress with unshaken resolution on the whole line, and that stream which had witnessed so obstinate a conflict, still separated for the third time the two hostile armies.

Such was the third act of that sanguinary engagement. The two armies were disorganized. They had each lost about twelve thousand men, most of the generals were wounded, and entire regiments were destroyed. But their relative situation was far different. Suwarrow was daily receiving reinforcements, and could not but gain by the prolongation of the struggle. Macdonald on the other hand had exhausted all his resources, and might, if he persisted in fighting, be driven in disorder into Tuscany. He therefore thought of retreating to the Nura with a view to regain Genoa by the back of the Apennines. He quitted the Trebbia on the morning of the 2nd Messidor (June 20). A despatch, in which he described to Moreau his desperate situation, having fallen into the hands of Suwarrow, the latter was overjoyed, and hastened to pursue him as closely as possible. The retreat, however, was effected in tolerable order to the banks of the Nura. Unfortunately Victor's division, which had been incessantly engaged for four days, was at length broken, and lost many prisoners. Macdonald, nevertheless, had time to collect his army beyond the Apennines, after a loss of fourteen or fifteen thousand men, killed, wounded and prisoners.

Very luckily, Suwarrow, hearing Moreau's cannon on his rear, suffered himself to be diverted from the pursuit of Macdonald. Moreau, whom insurmountable obstacles had prevented from moving before the 30th Prairial (June 18), had at length debouched from Novi, so as to fall upon Bellegarde, put him to the rout, and had taken from him nearly three thousand prisoners. But this too late advantage was of no service, and had no other result than to call off Suwarrow, and to suspend his hot pursuit of Macdonald.

That junction, from which such important results were expected, had thus brought about a bloody defeat; it gave rise also to disputes between the French generals, which have never been well cleared up. Military men have censured Macdonald for taking up his quarters for such a length of time in Tuscany, for having made his divisions march at too great a distance from one another, in such a manner that the divisions commanded by Victor, Rusea, and Dombrowsky, were beaten two successive days, before the divisions of Montrieux, Olivier, and Watrin were in line; for having endeavoured on the day of battle to fall upon the two wings of the enemy, instead of directing his utmost exertions on his left towards the Upper Trebbia; with having kept himself too far off from the mountains, so as not to permit Lapoye, who was at Bobbio, to come to his relief; lastly, for having, above all, been in too great haste to give battle, as if he had wished to have the honour of the victory entirely to himself. Military men, in approving the scientific combinations of Moreau, have censured him for only one thing, namely, for not having put all complaisance towards an old comrade out of the question, for not having taken the immediate command of the two armies, and especially with not having commanded in person at the Trebbia. Whatever may be the justice of these animadversions, thus much is certain, that Moreau's plan, executed according to its conception, would have saved Italy. It was entirely lost by the battle of Trebbia. Luckily Moreau was still there to keep together the wreck of our host, and to prevent Suwarrow from making the most of his immense superiority. The campaign had not been opened more than three months, and excepting in Switzerland, we had experienced nothing but misfortunes. The battle of Stockach made us lose Germany; the battles of Magnano and the Trebbia lost us Italy. Masséna alone, firm as a rock, still occupied Switzerland, along the chain of the Alps. It must not be forgotten, however, that amid these cruel reverses, the courage of our soldiers had been as firm and as admirable as in the most glorious days of our victories; that Moreau had proved himself at once the great citizen and the great captain, and had prevented Suwarrow from destroying our armies in Italy by a single blow.

These last miscarriages afforded the enemies of the directory fresh opportunities, and subjected it to renewed popular censures. The fear of an invasion began to seize upon the public mind. The departments of the south and of the Alps, the first to be exposed to the incursions of the Austro-Russians, were in the utmost excitation. The cities of Chambéry, Grenoble, and Orange, sent to the legislative body addresses which created the greatest sensation. These addresses were an echo of the malevolent censures that had been in every body's mouth for two months past; they alluded to the pillage of the conquered countries, the peculations of the companies, the destitution of the armies, the ministry of Schérer, his conduct as general, the injustice done to Moreau, the arrest of Championnet, &c. "How is it," said they, "that the faithful conscripts have found themselves compelled to return to their homes by the destitution to which they were exposed? How is it that the innumerable peculations that have been committed have remained unpunished? How was it that the incompetent Schérer, whom Hoche declared a traitor, so long remained minister of war? How is it that he has been enabled, in his character of general, finally to accomplish those evils for which he had paved the way as minister? Why have names cherished by victory been superseded by names that are unknown? Why is the conqueror of Rome and Naples under impeachment?"

We have already been enabled to estimate these censures at their true value. The addresses containing them had the honour of being ordered to be printed, were well received, and sent to the directory. This mode of reception sufficiently demonstrated the inclinations of the two councils. They could not be more unfavourable. The constitutional opposition had joined the patriot opposition. The one, composed of ambitious men, who wished for a new government, and vain self-sufficient persons, who complained that their representatives had not been properly received; the other, consisting of patriots excluded by the separation (scissions) of the legislative body, or reduced to silence by the law of the 19th Fructidor,—both oppositions were equally desirous of the ruin of the existing government. They said that the directory had at one and the same time misgoverned and badly defended France; that the directory had violated the freedom of public opinion, and persecuted the liberty of the press and of the popular societies. The directory was declared to be at once weak and violent; they even went so far as to allude in express terms to the 18th Fructidor, and to say that, not having regarded the laws made on that event, the directory had no right to appeal to them for protection.

The nomination of Sieyès to the directory had been one of the acts which led to these demonstrations. To call to the directorship a man who had never ceased to regard the directorial constitution but as most defective, and who had already for that very reason refused to be a director, was after a manner to publicly express a desire for a revolution. The acceptance of Sieyès, concerning which some distrust existed on account of his previous refusals, only served to confirm these conjectures.

The discontented of all descriptions who desired a change clustered around Sieyès. Sieyès was by no means an able party leader; he did not possess the accommodating and bold spirit, nor yet the ambition indispensable to such a character; but he rallied about him a great number by his reputation. It was well known that he deemed the constitution and the government entirely defective; and every one pressed round him, as if to invite him to effect an entire change. Barras, who had somehow made the directory overlook his former conduct by his connexions and his intrigues with all the parties, had gained the confidence of Sieyès, and had contrived to attach him to himself, by basely abandoning his colleagues. It was around these two directors that all the enemies of the directory rallied. This party had taken care to provide themselves with the support of a young general, who possessed reputation, and was considered like many others, as a victim of the government. The position of Joubert, on whom great expectations were founded, and who had been unemployed since his dismissal, was the cause of his selection. By his marriage with a Mademoiselle de Montholon, he had recently allied himself with M. de Sémonville. He had gained the confidence of Sieyès; he got appointed general of the 17th military division of Paris, and every thing that could be done was effected to make him the head of the new coalition.

No one as yet thought of making any changes; the first thing was to gain possession of the government, then to save France from invasion; and the consideration of all constitutional projects was postponed till after the danger was over. The first thing to be obtained was the removal of the members of the old directory. Sieyès had been in office no longer than a fortnight. He had entered it on the 1st Prairial as successor to Rewbell. Barras had, as we have seen, sheltered himself from the storm. Public odium was entirely turned against Luxeuville, Merlin, and Tréilhard, all three of them being wholly guiltless of what was laid to the charge of the government.

They had the majority, because there were three of them, but what was wanted was to render the exercise of authority on their part a matter of impossibility. They had resolved to entertain the utmost respect for Sieyès, and to forgive even his ill-temper, that they might not add to the difficulties of their position those which personal dissensions might still produce. But Sieyès was intractable; he found fault with every thing, and in this he was sincere; but he expressed himself in such a manner, as to prove that he did not care to apply himself in conjunction with his colleagues to remedy the evil; somewhat infatuated with what he had seen in the country from which he had just come, he was constantly saying to them, "This is not the way in which they do these things in Prussia." "Let us know then," replied his colleagues, "how they do manage these things in Prussia: enlighten us with your advice; assist us to do what is right." "You would not understand me," replied Sieyès; "it is useless to talk to you; go on in your old fashion."

While this mutual repugnance between the minority and the majority was demonstrating itself in the interior of the directory, the most animated attacks were constantly being made against it from without by the councils. There had already been an open quarrel upon the subject of finance. The distress had, we have observed, arose from two causes—the tardiness of the receipts, and the deficiency in the estimated revenue. Out of four hundred millions, for which orders had already been given on account of expenses disbursed, two hundred and ten millions had with difficulty been got in. The deficiency in the estimate of the revenue amounted, according to Ramal, to sixty-seven or even to seventy-five millions. As the component parts of the deficiency, as stated by him, were always a matter of dispute, he gave in the Moniteur a formal contradiction to the deputy Genissieux, and proved what he advanced. But of what service are proofs at certain times. The minister and the government were not the less subjected to abuse; it was incessantly repeated that they were ruining the state, and continually demanding new funds to form a subject for fresh peculations. Nevertheless, the force of evidence compelled the grant of an additional revenue. The tax on salt had been refused; as a compensation one decime per franc was added to all the taxes, and the tax on doors and windows was doubled. But creating taxes was not doing much, some course was to be taken to ensure them their assessment and collection. These laws were not passed. The minister was urgent for their being discussed, they were continually adjourned, and the answer to his pressing applications were cries of "treason, robbery," &c.

Besides the subject of the finances, another cause of dissension had arisen. Remonstrances had already been made against certain articles of the law of the 19th Fructidor, allowing the directory to close the clubs, and to suppress newspapers by a mere ordinance. A bill (projet de loi) relative to the press and the popular societies had been ordered to be brought in for the purpose of amending the law of the 19th Fructidor, and depriving the directory of the arbitrary power with which it was invested; a great outcry had been made against the power which that law conferred on the directory, to banish at pleasure suspected priests, and to erase the names of emigrants from the list. The patriots themselves seemed inclined to deprive it of this dictatorship, fatal as were its operations against their opponents. The debate began with a discussion relative to the press and the popular societies. The bill brought forward was draughted by Berlier. The debate commenced towards the end of Prairial (the middle of June). The partisans of the directory, amongst whom Chénier, Bailleul, Creuzé-Latouche, and Lecointe-Puyraveau, were most prominent, maintained that this dictatorship granted to the directory by the law of the 19th Fructidor, although very formidable in ordinary times, was of the most indispensable necessity in the present state of things. It was not, said they, in such perilous times as these, that the strength of the government ought to be diminished. The dictatorship that had been conferred upon government on the morrow of the 18th Fructidor, had become indispensable, not so much against the royalist faction, as against the faction of the anarchists which was not less formidable than the other, and in secret alliance with it. The disciples of Babeuf, they added, were showing themselves again in all parts, and threatening the republic with a new irruption.

The patriots, who swarmed in the five hundred, replied with their usual vehemence to the speeches of the partisans of the directory. It was necessary, they said, to give France a violent shock, and thus impart to her that energy of 1793, which the directory had utterly stifled by subjecting her to overwhelming restrictions. All patriotism would be extinguished unless the clubs were opened and the patriotic papers were allowed freedom of discussion. "It is stuff," they added, "accusing the patriots; it is all folly feigning apprehensions of an attack from them. What have these patriots done who are so grievously accused? For three years past they have been slaughtered, proscribed, and expatriated, from that very republic which they so powerfully assisted to create and have defended. What crimes have you to lay to their charge? Have they reacted against the reactionists? No. They are an exaggerating, turbulent set of men; be it so. But are these crimes? They speak, nay, they shout, if they will; but they are not assassins, although every day they are assassinated. Such was the language of Briot (of the Doubs), of Aréna the Corsican, and a host of others.

The members of the constitutional opposition expressed themselves in a far different manner. They were naturally moderate. They used a measured, but yet bitter and dogmatic, tone. Recourse must be had, said they, to principles little understood, and liberty must be restored to the press and to the popular societies. The perils of Fructidor had certainly made the grant of a temporary dictatorship to the directory necessary, but what use had been made of this dictatorship, created under feeling of confidence? You have only to ask the parties, said Boulay (of La Meurthe). Although they all entertained different views, yet royalists, patriots and constitutionalists, were unanimous in declaring that the directory had made a bad use of its omnipotence. Such unanimity among men so opposed to each other in sentiments and views, could not leave the slightest doubt, and the directory was condemned. Thus the irritated patriots complained of oppression, and the constitutionalists, full of pretensions, complained of misgovernment. All parties coalesced and effected the repeal of the articles of the 19th Fructidor, relative to the journals and the popular societies. This was an important victory, which was to bring about an unrestrained licentiousness of periodical publications, and a gathering of all the Jacobins. The agitation went on increasing towards the end of Prairial. Rumours of the most sinister import were circulated in all quarters. The new coalition resolved to resort to the usual base inventions, which are commonly resorted to by the opposition party in representative governments, to compel a ministry to resign. Embarrassing and oft repeated questions, and threats of impeachment, were employed. These arts are so natural, that even were they not resorted to in representative governments, the instinct of parties is of itself sufficient to discover them.

The commissions of disburse, of funds, and of war, appointed from the council of five hundred for managing those different subjects, assembled, and proposed the form of a message to be sent to the directory. Boulay (of La Meurthe) was entrusted with the draught of the report, and presented it on the 15th Prairial. On his motion, the council of five hundred addressed a message to the directory, in which it desired to be informed of the causes of the internal and external dangers which threatened the republic, and of the means that existed for providing against them. Applications of this nature produce scarcely any other effect than to extort avowals of distress, and to still further compromise the government from whom they are wrung. A government, we repeat, ought to be able to carry its measures: to compel it to admit that it has not been able so to do, is to force from it the most conclusive of all confessions. To this message were joined a host of special notices of motions, all of them for much the same purpose. They bore upon the questions respecting the right to form popular societies, the liberty of individuals, the responsibility of ministers, and the publicity of accounts, &c.

The directory, on receiving the message in question, resolved to give a specific answer, wherein it should give a full description of all the events that had taken place, and fully detail the means it had employed, and those which it yet purposed to use, in order to disengage France from the crisis in which she then was. An answer of this nature demanded the concurrence of all the ministers, in order that each of them should be enabled to make his report. It would take at least several days to prepare the report, but this did not suit the leaders of the councils. They did not want an accurate and faithful survey of the present state of France, but hasty and embarrassing avowals. Accordingly, after waiting some days, the three commissions who had proposed the message made a new proposition to the council of five hundred, by the deputy Poulain Grand-Pré. This was on the 28th Prairial (16th June). The reporter proposed to the five hundred to declare themselves in permanence till the directory should have replied to the message of the 15th. The motion was carried. This was nothing else than raising a cry of alarm and proclaiming an approaching event. The five hundred communicated their determination to the ancients, by engaging them to follow their example. The example, in point of fact, was followed, and the ancients likewise sat in permanence. The three commissions of disburse, ways and means, and war being too numerous, were converted into a single commission, composed of eleven members, whose business it was to submit to government such measures as circumstances should require.

The directory replied, on its own part, that it was going to constitute its sitting permanent, in order to hasten the report that was required from it. One may well conceive the ferment that must have resulted from such a determination. As was always the case in these instances, the most alarming reports were scudulously spread abroad. The adversaries of the directory alleged that it was meditating some unheard of and sudden act of violence, and that it meant to dissolve the councils. Its partisans replied, on the contrary, that a coalition had been formed between all the parties, in order that the constitution should be violently destroyed. No-

1799.
June 29.
(30 Prairial.)

Events immediately preceding the 30th Prairial.

THE DIRECTORY.

Revolution of the 30th Prairial, by which the old members of the directory go out and thing of the sort was contemplated on one side, or the other. The coalition of the two oppositions wanted nothing else save the removal of the three former directors. A preliminary expedient was devised for bringing this about. The constitution required that the director entering on office should have quitted the legislature for one whole year. The discovery was made that Treilhard, who had sat for thirteen months in the directory, had quitted the legislature on the 30th Floréal, year V., and that he had been nominated to the directory on the 26th Floréal, year VI. Consequently there wanted four days of the prescribed term. This was nothing else than a mere chicanery, for this irregularity was waived from its not being noticed for two sessions; and what was more, Sieyès himself was in the same predicament. The commission of the eleven immediately proposed to annul the nomination of Treilhard. This annulling took place the very same day, the 28th, and was certified to the directory.

833

Treilhard was a man of blunt and rough demeanour, but did not possess a firmness equal to the harshness of his manners. He was disposed to give way. Larévellière was of a totally different turn of mind. This honest and disinterested man, whose functions were a burden to him, and who had accepted office merely from a sense of duty, and who heartily wished every year that the lot would restore him to privacy, was no longer desirous to surrender his office from the moment the coalesced factions appeared to demand it. He imagined that there could be no other object in expelling the former directors than the abolition of the constitution of the year III.; that Sieyès, Barras, and the Bonaparte family concurred in the same object with different views, but all equally fatal to the republic. Being fully persuaded of this, he was not desirous that the old directors should abandon their post. The consequence was, he lost no time in going to Treilhard, and persuaded him to hold out. "With Merlin and myself," said he, "you will form a majority, and we will refuse to execute this determination of the legislative body, as illegal, seditious, and extorted from it by a faction. Treilhard had not courage sufficient to follow this advice, and immediately sent his resignation to the five hundred.

Larévellière seeing the majority lost, did not for all that the less adhere to his resolution not to resign, if he were required so to do. The managers of the five hundred resolved to appoint a successor to Treilhard forthwith. Sieyès would have been pleased to have obtained the nomination of a man entirely at his service; but Sieyès's influence had no weight in this instance. The person appointed was an advocate of some standing at Rennes, and at that time president of the court of appeal (cassation), known to belong rather to the patriotic than to the constitutional opposition. This person was Gohier. He was an upright citizen, and devoted to the republic, but of no great capacity, and unacquainted with men or business. He was nominated on the 29th Prairial, and was to be installed on the very next day.

But matters did not end with excluding Treilhard from the directory. Larévellière and Merlin must also be turned out. The patriots in particular were furious against Larévellière. They recollected that although a regicide, he had never been a mountaineer; that he had frequently stood against their party since the 9th Thermidor, and that in the preceding year, he had encouraged the system of the separations (scissions). They consequently threatened to impeach both him and Merlin, unless they handed in their resignation. Sieyès was commissioned to make a preliminary overture, in order that they might be induced to yield voluntarily to the storm.

On the evening of the 29th, Sieyès proposed a private meeting of the four directors at Merlin's. They repaired thither. Barras, as if they considered themselves in danger, went with his sword by his side, and never opened his lips. Sieyès opened the cause of their meeting with considerable embarrassment, made a long digression on the irregularities of the government, and stammered a long time before he came to the real object of the meeting. At length, Larévellière called on him to explain himself; "Your friends," replied Sieyès, "as well as Merlin's, strongly recommend you both to send in your resignation." Larévellière asked who those friends were. Sieyès could not name one who merited the least confidence. Larévellière then spoke with the tone of a man indignant at seeing the directory betrayed by its own members, and delivered up by them to the conspiracies of the factions. He proved that up to the present time his conduct and that of his colleagues had been unimpeachable, and that the censures thrown upon them were nought else than a tissue of calumnies, he next pointedly attacked Sieyès on the subject of his secret designs, and threw him into the greatest confusion by his vehement apostrophes. During all this time, Barras maintained a sullen silence. His position was an awkward one, for he alone had deserved all the reproaches which were heaped upon his colleagues. To demand their resignation for improprieties they had not committed, and which were entirely confined to himself, would have been too bad. He therefore held his peace. They left without doing any thing. Merlin, who durst not follow any course with regard to himself, had declared that he would do whatsoever Larévellière should do.

Barras now thought of employing some go-between, in order to obtain the resignation of his two colleagues. For this purpose he made use of Bergoeng, an old Girondist, whose fondness for pleasure had drawn him into his society. He commissioned him to go and see Larévellière, and get him to resign. Bergoeng accordingly went to him on the night of the 29th and 30th, conjured Larévellière by the longstanding friendship that bound them, and did all he could to move him. He assured him that Barras loved and honoured him, that he considered his removal as iniquitous, but he earnestly entreated him to make the concession, that he might not expose himself to the tempest. Larévellière's resolution could not be shaken. He replied that Barras was the dupe of Sieyès, and Sieyès of Barras, and that both would be duped by the Bonapartes; that the ruin of the republic was the object in view, but that he would stand out to his last gasp.

On the following day, the 30th, Gohier was to be installed. The four directors were assembled. All the ministers were present. The installation was scarcely over, and the speeches of the president and the new director delivered, when the subject of the meeting of the preceding evening was resumed. Barras desired to speak in private with Larévellière; both of them went into an adjoining room. Barras again applied the same entreaties and the same expressions of friendship with his colleague as before, and found that his mind was as fully made up as ever. He returned much mortified at being foiled, and still apprehensive of any discussion as to the acts of the old directory, which could not redound to his credit. He then began to use violent language, and not daring to attack Larévellière, he launched forth against Merlin, whom he detested, depicted him in the most ridiculous and the falsest colours, and represented him as a bohadi (far-d-brus) meditating, with a band of cut-throats, some sudden act of violence against his colleagues and the councils. Larévellière, coming to Merlin's assistance immediately rejoined, and demonstrated the absurdity of such imputations. There was in point of fact no similarity between Merlin the lawyer, and the character Barras had represented. Larévellière then recapitulated the history of the whole administration of the directory, and entered into particulars for the purpose of enlightening the ministers and the new director. Barras felt himself in a most awkward position; at last he got up saying, "Well, it can't be helped, swords are drawn!"—"Wretch!" replied Larévellière with firmness, "why talkest thou of swords? There is nought in this but knives, and they are pointed against irreproachable men whom you want to murder, as you are unable to intimidate them."

Gohier now was desirous of reconciling matters, but he could not succeed. At this moment, several members of the five hundred and of the ancients having met, came to beseech the two directors to give in with a good grace, promising that no impeachment should be levelled against them. Larévellière replied with scorn that he looked for no favour at their hands, that they might accuse him if they pleased, and he would answer for himself. The deputies to whom this mission had been delegated, returned to the two councils, and caused a fresh disturbance there by reporting what had passed. Boulay (of La Meurthe) denounced Larévellière, admitted his integrity, but very unreasonably attributed to him the scheme of a new religion, and complained bitterly of his opinionated notions, which he said would certainly effect the ruin of the republic. The language of the patriots was more unrestrained than ever, and they said that, inasmuch as they were pertinacious, no favour should be shown the directors.

The agitation was at its height, and the contest having commenced, there was no knowing to what lengths it would be carried. A great number of the moderate members of both councils assembled, and said that to prevent calamities, they ought to go and conjure Larévellière to yield to the storm. They accordingly went to him on the night of the 30th, and implored him, for the sake of the dangers that might befall the republic, to send in his resignation. They told him that they were all of them exposed to the greatest perils, and that if he persisted in refusing, they knew not what extremes the rage of the parties would go. "But do you not see," replied Larévellière, "the far greater dangers that threaten the republic? Do you not see that it is not ourselves who are the object of attack, but the constitution; that in giving way to-day, concessions will have to be made to-morrow, and for ever, and that the republic will be undone by our weakness? My office," he added, "is a burden to me. If I at this time persist in keeping it, it is because I deem it my duty to oppose an insurmountable barrier to the plots of the factions. However, if you consider that my holding out exposes you to dangers, I am ready to yield; but I declare to you that the republic is undone. A single individual cannot save it; I yield then, because I remain alone; and I will send you my resignation."

He gave it that night. He wrote a simple and appropriate letter to enunciate his motives. Merlin begged leave to copy it, and the two resignations were sent together. Thus the old directory was dissolved. All the factions it had endeavoured to reduce, had entered into a combination to overthrow it, and had made common cause against it. It was guilty but of one fault, that of being weaker than the factions; a great fault it is true, and amply sufficient to justify the destruction of a government.

Notwithstanding the general prejudice against him, Larévellière carried with him the esteem of the most respectable citizens. He refused on quitting the directory to accept the one hundred thousand francs which his colleagues had agreed to give to the members going out; he did not even accept the apportionment to which he was entitled of his salary, nor did he take with him the carriage which the director going out was allowed to keep. He retired to a small house which he possessed at Andilly, where he was visited by every person of reputation who was unaffected by the rage of party feeling. Talleyrand the minister was one of those who came to visit him in his retirement.

CHAPTER XVII.

FORMATION OF A NEW DIRECTORY.—MOULINS AND ROGER-DUCOS SUCCEED LARÉVELLIÈRE AND MERLIN.—MINIS-TERIAL CHANGES.—LEVY FROM EVERY CLASS OF CONSCRIPTS.—FORCED LOAN OF ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS.—
LAW CONCERNING HOSTAGES.—NEW MILITARY DESIGNS.—OPERATIONS RESUMED IN ITALY; JOUBERT COM-MANDER-IN-CHIEF; BATTLE OF NOVI, AND JOUBERT'S DEATH.—THE ANGLO-RUSSIANS MAKE A LANDING IN HOLLAND.—FRESH DISTURBANCES AT HOME; FURIOUS PROCEEDINGS OF THE PATRIOTS; ARREST OF ELEVEN NEWSPAPER EDITORS, BERNADOTTE DISMISSED; PROPOSAL TO DECLARE THE COUNTRY IN DANGER.

Time wears out popular factions (les partis), but many years must elapse before they are utterly exhausted. Strong party prejudices (les passions), never expire but with the bosoms that give them birth. An entire generation must pass away, and then there remains nothing of the claims of such factions but what they may rightfully require, and time can then also effect in regard of such claims a reconciliation of conflicting interests, in perfect conformity with nature and reason; but long before this change can be wrought, popular factions become inaccessible to the warnings of reason: the government that would address itself to them in the language of justice and law soon becomes unendurable, and by how much the more such a government is inclined to temperate measures, so much the more is it holden in contempt as being weak and impotent. Should a government so inclined seek to employ compulsory measures against those who reject its admonitions, it is then accused of tyrannical conduct, and of being malignant in the exact proportion of its weakness. Until the effluxion of time has concurred in effecting these results, nothing short of a most absolute despotism can control popular factions when once highly excited. The directory, then, was this same legal and moderate government, that required the popular factions (partis) which the revolution had created, to submit themselves to the law, and which five years of contest and reaction had not yet exhausted. They all combined, as we have just observed, on the 30th Prairial, to effect its downfall. The common enemy being overthrown, they stood face to face one against the other, without any hand to restrain them. We shall see how they conducted themselves.

The constitution, although little else than a mere illusion, was not abolished; an illusion of a different character was now required to replace the fallen directory. Gohier had succeeded Treillard; successors had to be found for Larévellière and Merlin. Roger-Ducos and Moulins were elected. Roger-Ducos was an old Girondist, an honest man of mean capacity, and entirely devoted to Sieyès. His nomination in the ancients was through the influence of Sieyès. Moulins was an obscure general, formerly employed in La Vendée, a warm and upright republican, nominated, like Gohier, through the influence of the patriot party. Other distinguished persons, either civil or military, had been proposed for filling up the directory, but they had been rejected. It was clear enough from such selections as these, that the parties had no intention to give themselves masters: they had called up to the directory only such mediocre talents as are usually selected to fill up a temporary vacancy.

The present directory, composed, like the councils, from opposite parties, was still weaker and less consistent with itself than the preceding. Sieyès, the only superior man among the five directors, indulged, we have observed, in a day dream of a new political organization. He was the head of the party calling itself moderate or constitutional, all the members of which, nevertheless, wished for a new constitution. He had but one devoted colleague, and he was Roger-Ducos. Moulins and Gohier, both heated patriots, incapable of conceiving any thing but what was before their eyes, were well pleased with the present constitution, but wished to execute and to interpret it in the spirit of the patriots. As for Barras, called naturally to give the casting vote between them, who could rely upon him? He was himself the living emblem of that chaos of inconsistent vices, passions, interests, and ideas, exhibited by the dying republic. The majority depending on his casting vote, would therefore depend upon mere chance.

Sieyès told his new colleagues distinctly enough that they were taking the direction of a government threatened with a speedy extinction, but that they must save the republic if they could not save the constitution. This language was highly displeasing to Gohier and Moulins, and was very unfavourably received by them. Consequently, from the very first day, the sentiments of the directors appeared to be far from unanimous. Sieyès held the same language to Joubert, the general who was sought to be engaged with the reorganizing party. But Joubert, an old soldier of the army of Italy, entertained its sentiments: he was a staunch patriot, and he entertained a distrust of Sieyès' intentions. He secretly imparted his feelings on this subject to Gohier and Moulins, and seemed to attach himself wholly to them. However, these were questions that could not arise as a subject of discussion at a future period. What pressed most was the government and defence of the threatened republic. The tidings of the battle of Trebbia, made public in every quarter, caused a general feeling of alarm. Extraordinary measures must now be adopted for the preservation of the public welfare.

The first thing a government takes upon itself to do is to act precisely contrary to that which preceded it, were it only in obedience with the feelings which have obtained it the ascendancy. Championnet, the so much vaunted hero of Naples, Joubert, and Bernadotte, were now to emerge from imprisonment or obloquy, in order to fill the highest offices. Championnet was immediately set at large, and appointed commander of a new army, which it was proposed to form along the Upper Alps. The ministry of war was confided to Bernadotte. Joubert was called to the command of the army of Italy. His triumphs in the Tyrol, his youth, and his heroic character, gave rise to the most florid expectations. The reorganizers wished him sufficient success and glory to enable him to support their designs. The selection of Joubert was, to be sure, excellent in itself, but it was an additional act of injustice to Moreau, who had so generously accepted the command of a beaten army, and who had so ably saved it from destruction. But Moreau was rather distasteful to the hot-headed patriots, who at that time were in the ascendancy. The command of an intended army of the Rhine (for it was not then in existence) was conferred on him.

Besides all this, various changes also took place in the ministry. Ramel, minister of the finances, who had rendered such important services since the installation of the directory, and who had been in office during that very difficult transition from paper-money to specie,—Ramel had shared the odium cast upon the old directory. He was so virulently attacked, that the new directors, in spite of the esteem which they entertained for him, were obliged to accept his resignation. A man dear to the patriots and respected by all the parties was appointed his successor, this was Robert Lindet, formerly a member of the committee of public welfare, and so indecently attacked during the reaction. He for a long time excused himself from taking a portfolio. His experience of the injustice of the parties was not likely to induce him to accept office again. However, he at last consented, out of devotion to the republic.

The diplomacy of the directory had not been less censured than its financial administration. It was charged with having again engaged the republic in war with all Europe, but this imputation was very unjust, especially if we consider who were the accusers. These accusers were, in fact, the patriots themselves, whose strong party prejudices had again involved the republic in war. The directory was more particularly censured in regard to the Egypt expedition, not long before so greatly lauded, and it was assumed that this expedition had brought about a rupture with the Porte and Russia. The minister Talleyrand, already disagreeable to the patriots as an old emigrant, had incurred all the responsibility of this diplomacy, and he was so vehemently attacked, that it was necessary to deal with him as with Ramel, and to accept his resignation. The person appointed to succeed him was a native of Wirtemberg, who, under the appearance of German kindness of heart, disguised extraordinary shrewdness, and whom M. de Talleyrand had recommended as best qualified to be his successor. This was M. Reinhard. It had been asserted that this appointment was only a temporary one, and that M. Reinhard merely accepted the post till the moment when M. de Talleyrand could be recalled. The ministry of justice had been taken away from Lambrechts, on account of the state of his health, and given to Cambacérés. Bourguignon, formerly a magistrate, a sincere and honest patriot, was placed at the head of the police department. Fouché, that accommodating and insinuating ex-Jacobin, whom Barras had engaged in the jobbery of the companies, and afterwards provided for by the embassy to Milan,—thus Fouché, turned out of office by reason of his conduct in Italy, now passed for a victim of the old directory. He was therefore to participate in the triumph decreed to all the victims; he was appointed to the Hague.

Such were the principal changes introduced with regard to the government and army appointments. The object in view was not merely a change of persons; they had to be supplied with new appliances for performing the task under which their predecessors had succumbed. The patriots reverting, according to their manner, to revolutionary means, maintained that great ills required strong remedies. They proposed the urgent measures of 1793. After having refused every thing to the preceding directory, they were now willing to concede every thing to the new. They wanted to put extraordinary means into its hands, and even to compel it to use them. The commission of eleven, formed of the three commissions of disburse, of ways and means, and of war, and to whom was confided, during the crisis of Prairial, the office of devising measures for saving the republic, conferred with the members of the directory, and settled with them various measures which took their complexion from the bias of the moment. Instead of two hundred thousand men to be taken from the five classes of conscripts, the directory was empowered to call out all the classes. Instead of the taxes proposed by the late directory, and rejected with such strong feeling by the two oppositions, the idea of a new forced loan was once more entertained. In conformity with the patriot system, it was to be progressive; that is, instead of making each individual pay according to the amount of his assessed taxes, which would have made the returns of land-tax and assessed taxes the basis of the assessment, every individual was required to contribute according to his income. Hence, it became necessary to have recourse to a jury of assessment, in plain language, to punish the wealthy by means of a commission. The middle party opposed this plan, and said that it was a re-enactment of the system of terror, and that the difficulty of the assessment would moreover render this measure inefficacious and inoperative, like all the previous forced loans. The patriots replied, that the charges of the war must not be borne by every class of society, but solely by the wealthy. The same party prejudices still used, as we see, the same reasons. The forced and progressive loan was decreed. It was fixed at one hundred millions, and was charged upon the credit of the national estates.

Besides these measures of recruiting and finance, some police measure had to be employed against the renewed outbreak of chouannerie in the south and in the west, the theatres of the former civil war. Renewed enormities were committed; purchasers of the national estates, reputed patriots, public functionaries, were murdered; and in particular, the diligences were stopped and robbed. Among the perpetrators of these outrages were to be found a great number of the Vendéans and Chouans, whom we have before noticed, a great number of the notorious companies of the sun, as well as many mutinous conscripts. Although these brigands, whose presence indicated a sort of social dissolution, had but one object, namely, plunder, it was evident, from the selection of their victims, that they had a political origin. A commission was appointed to devise their extermination. This commission proposed a law which was called the "hostages act," and has ever since been known by that appellation. Inasmuch as most of these atrocities were laid to the charge of the relatives of emigrants, or to ci-devant nobles, it was consequently proposed that they should be compelled to give hostages. Whenever a commune was declared to be in a notorious state of disorder, the relatives of emigrants, the ci-devant nobles, the heads of families of the individuals known to belong to these associations, were considered as hostages, and as such, being civilly and personally responsible for the outrages committed. The central administrations were to point out the persons selected for hostages, and to imprison them in houses appropriated to that purpose. There they were to live at their own charges, and in what manner they pleased, and to be closely confined while the country was in a disturbed state. When the disturbed state of the country went so far as to produce murder, four of them were to be transported for every murder committed. It is easy to conceive all that could be urged both for and against this law. It was, said its advocates, the only way there was of reaching the originators of those disturbances, and it was a mild and humane mode. Its opponents replied, that it was a new loi des suspects†; a revolutionary law, which, utterly inefficient as it was to reach the truly guilty, punished the many for the fault of the few, and committed all the injustice incident to laws of this nature. In one word, all was said pro and con on this measure that we have seen so often repeated in this history with respect to revolutionary laws. But there was one objection, stronger than all the rest, to be made against this measure: as these brigands proceeded solely from an absolute dissolution of social ties, the only remedy lay in a vigorous reorganization of the state, not in measures in every respect worthless, and which were not capable of restoring any energy to the springs of the government.

* The meaning of this term will be explained to the reader by a reference to p. 567, col. 1. Trans.

The law was passed after a very warm discussion, wherein the popular parties, who had the moment before concurred in order to overthrow the late directory, now openly took different sides. To these important measures, which were intended to arm the government with revolutionary means, were added some which, in other respects, restricted its might. These accessory measures were the consequence of the imputations made against the former directory. To prevent separations (scissions) for the future, it was decided that the choice of any electoral faction should be void; that any agent of the government attempting to influence the elections should be punished as for an outrage committed against the sovereignty of the people; that the directory should no longer have authority to bring troops within the constitutional radius without being expressly empowered so to do; that no military officer should be liable to be deprived of his rank, unless by the decision of a council of war; that the directory should have no longer the power to delegate to agents the right granted to it of issuing warrants of arrest; that no one in service of the government, nor any official whatsoever, should be permitted to be a contractor, or even to be concerned in contracts, for supplies; and that a club could not be closed without a decision of the municipal and central administrations. On the subject of a law for regulating the press, the parties could not agree; but the article of the 19th Fructidor, which gave the directory the right of suppression in regard to the journals, continued nevertheless abolished; so that, until some new plan should be brought forward, the press remained irresponsibly free.

Such were the measures passed, in consequence of the 30th Prairial, either for correcting alleged abuses, or to restore to the government an energy which it did not possess. Those measures which are adopted in critical moments, after a change of system, are devised for the purpose of saving a state, but do rarely come in time to save it, for every thing is frequently settled before such measures can be carried into execution. They furnish, at most, resources for the future. The loan of one hundred millions and the new levies could not be executed for at least some months. However, the effect of a crisis is to give a new impulse to all the springs, and to impart to them a certain degree of energy. Bernadotte lost no time in writing pressing circulars, and in this manner contrived to accelerate the organization of the battalions of conscripts already commenced. Robert Lindet, to whom the forced loan of one hundred millions afforded no present assistance, called together the principal bankers and merchants of the capital, and urged them to assist the state with their credit. They acquiesced in this, and lent their signature to the ministry of the finances. They formed a syndicate, and till the taxes should be collected, signed bills which were to be repaid as fast as the receipts came in. Thus was a sort of temporary bank established to supply the necessity of the moment.

The next thing to be considered was, how were the next campaigns to be conducted. Bernadotte was asked to suggest a draught of a new campaign, and he lost no time in presenting a truly singular scheme, but which, luckily, was not carried out. Nothing could be more subject to multiplied combinations than a field of battle so extensive as that on which operations were to be conducted. It was calculated to impart different ideas to every one who surveyed it; and if every individual could propose his own scheme, and obtain its adoption, there was no reason why the draught of the scheme should not be continually altered. Although a variety of opinions may be useful in discussing a measure, it is a sad thing to have a difference of opinion, when a measure is to be put in execution. At first, it was conceived that we ought to act at one and the same time on the Danube and in Switzerland. After the battle of Stockach, there was no inclination for further operations other than in Switzerland, and the army of the Danube was disposed of. At this present juncture, Bernadotte was of a different opinion. His argument was, that the cause of the success of the allies lay in the facility with which they could keep up a communication across the Alps between Germany and Italy. To deprive them of these means of communication, he wanted to take from them the Saint-Gothard and the Grisons, at the right wing of the army of Switzerland, and that a fresh army of the Danube should be formed, which should again make Germany the seat of war. In order to form this army of the Danube, he proposed to speedily organize the army of the Rhine, and reinforce it with twenty thousand men taken from Masséna. This would be compromising the latter, who would have to face the whole force of the archduke, and who was liable to be overwhelmed while this turning about was taking place. True it is that it would have been better to again make the Danube the seat of war, but it would have been enough had Masséna been supplied with the means of taking the offensive, so that his army could itself have become the army of the Danube. Then so far from weakening him, every thing ought to have been placed at his disposal. According to Bernadotte's plan, an army was to be formed on the High Alps to protect the frontiers against the Austro-Russians in the quarter of Piedmont. Joubert, collecting the remains of all the armies of Italy, and reinforced by the disposable troops in the interior, was to debouch from the Apennines, and to attack Suwarrow by main force.

* These associations, which were also known as Compagnies de Jésus, originated with the royalists in the south of France, who after the 12th Germinal, year III. (1st April, 1795,) made dreadful reprisals upon the patriots in the south of France. Ante, p. 548, col. 2. Trans.

† The reader will recollect that the loi des suspects was passed the 17th of September, 1793. Its operation was the imprisonment of all persons obnoxious to the dominant party of that period. Ante, p. 340, col. 2. Trans.

This plan, strongly approved of by Moulins, was sent to the generals. Masséna, weary of all these extravagant schemes, tendered his resignation. It was not accepted, and the plan was not carried into execution. Masséna retained the command of all the troops from Basle to the Saint-Gothard. The intention of assembling an army on the Rhine, to cover that line, was persevered in. A nucleus for an army was formed on the Alps under the command of Championnet. This nucleus consisted of about fifteen thousand men. All the disposable reinforcements were sent to Joubert, who was to debouch from the Apennines. It was now the middle of the season, in Messidor (July). The reinforcements were now coming up. A certain number of old battalions, retained in the interior, had repaired to the frontiers. The conscripts were draughted into regiments, and went to take the place of the veteran troops in the garrisons. Lastly, as there were not squares sufficient to receive the great quantity of conscripts, it was resolved to increase the number of battalions in the demi-brigades or regiments, and this would allow new levies to be incorporated with the old divisions.

It was known that a reinforcement of thirty thousand Russians, under the command of general Korsakow, was entering Germany. Masséna was urged to quit his positions, and attack those of the archduke, so as to do his utmost to beat him before his junction with the Russians. The government had been well advised in this respect; for no delay ought now to take place in making an attempt before the junctions of so imposing a mass of forces. Nevertheless Masséna refused to take the offensive; whether it were that he on the present occasion was deficient in his accustomed hardihood, or whether it were that he was waiting for the resumption of offensive operations in Italy. Military men have unanimously censured his inactivity, which, after all, was a fortunate course as things turned out, through the blunders of the enemy, and was redeemed by glorious services. However, to testify his obedience to the pressing solicitations of the government, and in execution of part of Bernadotte's plan, which consisted in preventing the Austro-Russians from keeping up a communication between Germany and Italy, Masséna ordered Lecourbe to draw out his right to the Saint-Gothard, to possess himself of that important point, and to retake the Grisons. By this operation the French would again become masters of the High Alps, and the enemy's armies operating in Germany would find themselves cut off from all communication with those operating in Italy. Lecourbe executed this enterprise with that boldness and intrepidity which distinguished him in mountain warfare, and once more became master of the Saint-Gothard.

In the mean time, a fresh series of events were preparing in Italy. Suwarrow, being obliged by the court of Vienna to finish the siege of all the fortresses before he pushed his advantages, had in no wise pursued the advantages the victory of the Trebbia might have afforded him. He might even in perfect consistency with his instructions, have reserved an adequate force for entirely dispersing the remains of our armies; but he had not sufficient genius for military operations to adopt that course. He therefore wasted his time in his sieges. Peschiera, Pizzighitona, and the citadel of Milan, had fallen. The citadel of Turin had met with the same fate. The two celebrated fortresses of Mantua and Alexandria still held out, and appeared likely to make a long resistance. Kray was besieging Mantua, and Bellegarde Alexandria. Unfortunately, all our fortresses had been consigned to commandants destitute of energy and skill. Their artillery was ill served, because none but worn out divisions had been sent into the fortresses; and the absence of our active armies, who had retreated to the Apennines, was exceedingly discouraging. Mantua, the principal of these fortresses, did not deserve the reputation which Bonaparte's campaigns had afforded it. It was not its strength, but the combination of events, that had prolonged its defence. In fact, Bonaparte, with about ten thousand men, had compelled fourteen thousand men to perish there by fever and famine. General Latour-Foissac was at this time commandant. He was a skilful officer of engineers; but he did not possess the energy necessary for this kind of defence. Discouraged by the irregularity of the place and the bad state of the fortifications, he never considered that deficiencies of fortification might be compensated by boldness of action. Besides all this, his garrison was not strong enough; and after the first assaults he appeared disposed to surrender. General Gardanne commanded at Alexandria. He was a resolute man, but not well educated in his profession. A first assault was vigorously repulsed by him; but he had not the sagacity to discover in the place the resources that it still presented.

It was now Thermidor (the middle of July), more than a month had elapsed between the revolution of the 30th Prairial, and the appointment of Joubert. Moreau felt the importance of taking the offensive before the fortresses were reduced, and of debouching, with a reorganized and reinforced army, upon the dispersed Austro-Russians. Unfortunately, he was shackled by the orders of the government, which had enjoined him to wait for Joubert. Thus, in this disastrous campaign, there was a series of unseasonable orders that always induced our reverses. A change of ideas and plans, in matters of execution, and more particularly so in war, is always fatal. Had Moreau, to whom the command ought to have been given at the very first, received the command after the battle of Cassano, and had held it independent, all would have been saved; but then associated with Macdonald, and then again with Joubert, he was prevented, for the second and third time, from repairing our misfortunes, and recovering our military credit.

Joubert, whom every effort had been made to attach, by his wife's connexions, and by great marks of attention, to the party that was contemplating a reorganization, lost the whole month of Messidor (June and July) in keeping up his wedding festivities, and thus missed the critical moment. Joubert was not sincerely attached to that party whose support he was thus attempted to be made (for he continued devoted to the patriots), and so they caused him a waste of valuable time. He set out, observing to his young wife, "You will see me again, either dead or victorious." In fact, he had brought his mind to the heroic resolution, to conquer or die. This noble-minded young man, on joining the army in the middle of Thermidor (early in August), testified the greatest possible deference for the consummate master whom he was called upon to succeed. He begged him to remain with him, to give him his advice. Moreau, quite as generous as the young general, very freely consented to be present at his first battle, and to assist him with his counsels: a noble and touching instance of professional friendship, which adorns the virtues of our republican generals, and belongs to a time when patriotic zeal still held greater empire over the hearts of our warriors than even ambition itself.

The French army, composed of the remains of the armies of Upper Italy and Naples, and of reinforcements drawn from the interior, amounted to forty thousand men, well drilled, and impatient to measure themselves against the enemy. Nothing could equal the patriotism of these soldiers, who, always beaten, were never disheartened, and always desired to turn again upon the enemy. No republican army deserved better of France, for none so thoroughly repplied to the unjust imputation thrown upon the French, namely, that they are incapable of bearing adverse fortune. It is true, that part of its firmness was owing to the brave and unobtrusive general in whom it had placed its entire confidence, and who was constantly being removed at the very time he was once again leading it to victory.

These forty thousand men were independent of the fifteen thousand who were to serve under Championnet, as forming the nucleus of the army of the High Alps. They had debouched by the Bormida upon Acqui, and by the Boccetta upon Gavi, and were now in battle array in advance of Novi. These forty thousand men debouching in good time, before the junction of the divisions engaged in the sieges, might have obtained decisive advantages. But Alexandria had just opened her gates on the 4th Thermidor (July 22). An indistinct rumour also gained ground, that Mantua had also recently opened her gates. This melancholy intelligence was soon confirmed, and news arrived that the capitulation was signed on the 12th Thermidor (July 30). Kray had just rejoined Suwarrow, with twenty thousand men; the force of the Austro-Russians now in motion amounted at this present time to sixty and some odd thousand. It was therefore no longer possible for Joubert to struggle with any thing like a chance against so superior an enemy. He called a council of war; they were unanimously for returning to the Apennines, and confining themselves to the defensive, while waiting for the arrival of a reinforcement.

Joubert was about to execute his resolution, when he was prevented by Suwarrow, and obliged to accept battle. The French army was formed in a semicircle on the slopes of the Monte Rotondo, which commands the whole plain of Novi. The left, composed of Grouchy's and Lemoine's divisions, extended, in a circular position, in advance of Pasturana. It had at its back the ravine of the Riasco, and this rendered its rear accessible to an enemy who should venture to commence an attack in that ravine. The cavalry reserve, commanded by Richepanse, was in the rear of this wing. In the centre, Laboisserie's division covered the heights to the right and left of the city of Novi. Watrin's division, at the right wing, defended the approaches to the Monte Rotondo, in the direction of the road to Tortona. Dombrowsky, with one division, was blockading Scravalle. General Pérignon commanded our left wing; Saint-Cyr, our centre and our right. The position was strong, well occupied on every point, and difficult to carry. However, there was no comparison in point of advantage in favour of forty thousand men against more than sixty thousand. Suwarrow resolved to attack the position with his customary violence. He sent Kray towards our left, with the divisions under the command of Ott and Bellegarde. The Russian division under the command of Derfelden, Bagration's advanced guard at its head, was to attack our centre, near Novi. Mélas, staying a little behind with the rest of the army, was to assail our right. From a singular combination, or rather from the want of combination, the attacks were to be successive and not simultaneous.

On the 28th Thermidor (August 15, 1799), Kray commenced the attack at five in the morning. Bellegarde attacked Grouchy's division on the extreme left; and Ott, Lemoine's division. These two divisions being not yet formed, suffered a narrow chance of being surprised and broken. The obstinate resistance of one of the demi-brigades obliged Kray to throw himself upon the twentieth light, which he overwhelmed by directing his best exertions against it. His troops had already reached the elevated plain, when Joubert galloped up to the point of danger. It was too late to think of retreating, and every thing had to be dared for the purpose of driving the enemy from off this elevated plain (plateau). Advancing amidst the riflemen to encourage them, he received a ball, which entered near the heart, and stretched him on the earth. At the point of death the young hero cried to his soldiers, "On, my friends, on!" This event might have produced confusion in the army, but, luckily, Moreau had accompanied Joubert to this point. He immediately assumed that command which was accorded to him by the general confidence, rallied the soldiers boiling with resentment, and led them back against the Austrians. The grenadiers of the 34th drove them with the bayonet, and threw them down the hill. Unluckily, the French had not yet their artillery in battery, and the Austrians, on the contrary, were cutting up their ranks by showers of howitzer-shot and balls. During this action Bellegarde used great exertions to turn the extreme left by the ravine of the Riasco, which has already been described as affording access to our rear. He had already pushed some way in, when Pérignon, seasonably bringing up against him the reserve commanded by general Clausel, stopped him in his career. Pérignon achieved his destruction in the plain, by charging him with Partonneux's grenadiers and Richepanse's cavalry. This vigorous effort disengaged the left wing.

Owing to the singular combination of Suwarrow, whose design was to make a series of his attacks, our centre had not yet been attacked. Saint-Cyr got time to make his arrangements, and to bring Watrin's division, forming his extreme right near Novi. At the urgent solicitation of Kray, who required to be supported by an attack on the centre, Bagration had at length determined to assail it with his advanced guard. Laboissière's division, which was on the left of Novi, suffering Bagration's Russians to approach within half musket-shot, received them with a tremendous fire of musketry and grape-shot, and covered the plain with dead. Bagration, without evincing any confusion, then directed some batteries to get at the rear of Novi by our right; but being encountered by Watrin's division, which was approaching Novi, they were thrown back into the plain.

Half the day was now spent, and our line was not yet broken. Suwarrow had just come up with the Russian corps of Derfelden. He ordered a new general attack to be made on the whole line. Kray was again to assail the left. Derfelden and Bagration the centre. Mélas was directed to accelerate his pace, in order to overwhelm our right. All being settled, the enemy set himself in motion against our entire line. Kray, who was most inveterate against our left, tried once more to assail it in front by Ott; but Clausel's reserve repulsed Bellegarde's troops, and Lemoine's division threw Ott down the slopes of the hills. In the centre, Suwarrow caused a furious attack to be made to the right and left of Novi. A fresh attempt to get to the rear of the town was foiled, as it had been in the morning, by Watrin's division. Unluckily, our soldiers, hurried away by their ardour, occupied themselves too closely in pursuit of the enemy, ventured into the plain, and were brought back to their position. At one o'clock the fire slackened again, in consequence of the general fatigue; but it soon returned with violence, and for four hours the French, immovable as walls, resisted with admirable coolness the utmost fury of the Russians. So far they had sustained no very great loss. The Austro-Russians, on the other hand, had been severely handled. The plain was strewed with their dead and wounded. Unfortunately, the rest of the Austro-Russian army, under the command of Mélas, arrived from Rivolta. This fresh irruption was about to be directed against our right, Saint-Cyr, on perceiving this, brought back Watrin's division, which had advanced too far into the plain, and sent it towards an elevated plain to the right of Novi. But while this movement was in operation, Watrin's division found itself surrounded on all sides by the numerous regiments of Mélas.

Horror-stricken on perceiving this, it dispersed in disorder, and reached the elevated plain in confusion. However, towards the rear this division rallied. In the mean time, Suwarrow, increasing his exertions, at the centre, near Novi, at length drove the French into the town, and made himself master of the heights which commanded it on the right and left. From that moment, Moreau, seeing that we had nothing left for it but retreat, gave the necessary orders before the further progress of the enemy should cut off the communication with Gavi. On the right, Watrin's division was obliged to cut its way through, in order to regain the road to Gavi, which was already closed. Laboissière's division retired from Novi; Lemoine's and Grouchy's divisions fell back on Pasturana, on experiencing the furious charges of Kray. Unfortunately, a battalion found its way into the ravine of Riasco, which runs behind Pasturana. The fire of this battalion threw our columns into confusion. Artillery and cavalry all were in disorder. Lemoine's division, closely pressed by the enemy, dispersed and threw itself into the ravine. Our soldiers were driven along like dust before the wind. Pérignon and Grouchy rallied a few brave fellows to check the enemy's progress, and to save the artillery; but they were cut to pieces and made prisoners. Pérignon had received seven sabre wounds, and Grouchy six. Brave Colli, the Piedmontese general, who had distinguished himself in the first campaigns against us, and who had afterwards entered into our service, formed himself into a square with some battalions, resisted till it was broken, and fell dreadfully mangled into the hands of the Russians.

After this first moment of confusion, the army rallied in advance of Gavi. The Austro-Russians were too much fatigued to follow the pursuit. Our army could therefore march without being harassed. The loss on both sides was equal; it amounted to about ten thousand men for each army. But the killed and wounded were much more numerous on the Austro-Russian side. The French had lost a far greater number of prisoners. They had lost also their commander-in-chief, four generals of division, thirty-seven pieces of cannon, and four pairs of colours. Never had they displayed greater coolness and intrepidity. They were inferior to the enemy by at least one-third. The Russians had exhibited their fanatic bravery, but their advantage was entirely owing to their number, and not to the manoeuvres of the general, who had demonstrated on this occasion the grossest ignorance. He had, in point of fact, exposed his columns to the risk of being destroyed by grape-shot, one after another, and had not sufficiently supported himself on our right, the point which he ought to have overwhelmed. This wretched battle completely closed Italy against us, and rendered us unable to keep the field any longer. We were obliged to enclose ourselves in the Apennines, considering ourselves fortunate in being still able to retain them. The loss of the battle could not be imputed to Moreau, but to the unlucky circumstance of Kray's junction with Suwarrow. This last disastrous termination was entirely attributable to Joubert's delay.

All our misfortunes were not confined to the battle of Novi. The long announced expedition against Holland was at length executed by the co-operation of the English with the Russians. Paul I. had entered into a treaty with Pitt, whereby he engaged himself to furnish seventeen thousand Russians, who were to receive English pay for service in Holland. After many difficulties had been surmounted, the expedition had been got ready for the beginning of Fructidor (the end of August). Thirty thousand English were to join the seventeen thousand Russians, and if the landing met with no impediment, it might be fairly expected that Holland would be taken from the French. This was a matter of great concern for England; and had she only succeeded in destroying the fleets and arsenals of Holland, she would even then have considered herself well compensated for the expenses of the expedition. A considerable squadron was sent to the Baltic to go and get the Russians. A preliminary squadron set sail under the command of general Abercromby, to secure a landing. All the troops of the expedition, when once got together, were to be under the chief command of the duke of York.

The most advantageous point for landing in Holland was the mouth of the Meuse. Thus the French line of retreat would be exposed, and the English get very near the Hague, where the stadtholder's party was the strongest. A more convenient situation of coast made the English prefer the northern part of Holland. Abercromby steered for the Helder, where he arrived towards the end of August. After surmounting various impediments, he landed near the Helder, in the environs of Groot-Keeten, on the 10th Fructidor (August 27). The enormous preparations this expedition had required, with the presence of all the English squadrons on the coast, had afforded sufficient notice to the French, so as to put them on their guard. Brune took the solo command of both the Batavian and the French army. He could hardly be said to have under his command more than seven thousand French and ten thousand Dutch, commanded by Daendels. He had sent the Batavian division to the environs of the Helder, and posted the French division about the environs of Haarlem. Abercromby, on landing, fell in with the Dutch at Groot-Keeten, repulsed them, and thus contrived to secure the disembarkation of his troops. The Dutch showed no want of bravery on this occasion, but were not commanded with sufficient ability by general Daendels, and were obliged to retreat. Brune got them together again, and made his arrangements for promptly attacking the troops that had landed, before they could obtain a firm position, and could be reinforced by the English and Russian divisions who were to join them.

The Dutch demonstrated the most favourable inclinations. The national guards had offered to garrison the fortresses, and it was this that had enabled Brune to bring these reinforcements into active service. He had summoned to his assistance Dumonceau's division, six thousand strong, and he resolved to attack, very early in September, the camp in which the English had seated themselves. This camp was well fortified; this camp was Zyp, formerly a morass, drained by Dutch industry, forming an extensive territory, intersected by dikes and canals, and covered with dwellings. Seventeen thousand English had there fortified themselves in the best possible manner. Brune had at most but twenty thousand men to storm this intrenchment, a number far from sufficient for this purpose when the nature of the ground was taken into consideration. He made an attack on this camp on the 22nd Fructidor (September 8), and after an obstinate conflict was obliged to beat a retreat, and fall back upon Amsterdam. From that moment he lost all power of preventing the junction of all the Anglo-Russian forces, and was obliged to wait till a French army could be got together to fight them. This advantageous position of the English in the north of Holland induced the event that was most to be apprehended, namely, the defection of the great Dutch fleet. The Texel had not been closed, and the English admiral, Mitchell, was enabled to enter it with his entire fleet. For some considerable time previous, the emissaries of the prince of Orange had been endeavouring to alienate the Dutch seamen. On the first summons of admiral Mitchell, they rose in mutiny, and forced their admiral, Story, to surrender. The whole Dutch navy thus fell into the hands of the English, a circumstance of itself of the greatest possible advantage to them.

As these tidings reached Paris, post after post, they produced the very effect that might naturally be expected from them. They increased the fermentation of the parties, and especially the inveteracy of the patriots, who demanded with greater warmth than ever the adoption of the grand revolutionary measures. The license accorded to the newspapers and the clubs had caused the revival of a great number. The remnant of the Jacobin party had met in the Old Ride, where our earliest assemblies had sate. Although the law prohibited popular societies from assuming the character of deliberative assemblies, the club at the Ride had nevertheless arrogated to itself a president, secretaries, &c., under different titles. Here it was that the ex-minister, Bouchotte, Drouet, Felix Lepelletier, and Aréna, all of them disciples or accomplices of Babouf, made themselves notorious. Here were invoked the manes of Goujon, Soubrany, and the victims of Grenelle. Here were demanded, in the style of 1793, the punishment of all the bloodsuckers of the people, the disarming of the royalists, the levy en masse, the establishment of manufactories of arms in places of public resort, the restitution of their cannon and pikes to the national guards, &c. Here also was a demand made for the impeachment of the first set of directors, to whom the recent disasters, as to make an attack on the government. In this situation, which had lasted from the 30th of Prairial, that is, for nearly three months, the notion so common on the eve of decisive events—that of a reconciliation, got afloat. Numerous deputies on all sides proposed an interview with the members of the directory, to enable them to explain and come to a good understanding in respect of their mutual grievances. "We are all lovers of liberty," said they, "and are all of us desirous of saving her from the perils to which she is exposed by the defeats of our armies; let us endeavour then to agree together upon the choice of the means, since it is to that selection we impute the only cause of our disunion." The interview took place at the residence of Barras. There is not, and there never can be, any permanent reconciliation between parties, for then they would have to disclaim their object, a thing that never can be effected by a mere conversation. The patriot deputies complained that plots were daily talked of, inasmuch as the president of the directory had himself pointed to a class of dangerous men, and who were meditating the ruin of the republic. They asked to be informed who those men were, in order that they might not be confounded with the patriots. Sieyès, to whom this appeal was addressed, replied by adverting to the conduct of the popular societies and of the journals, and by calling attention to the dangers that would ensue from another anarchy. He was then asked to name the real anarchists, that they might unite against and attack them. "But how can we unite against them," said Sieyès, "when not a day passes but members of the legislative body ascend the tribune to support their doctrines!" "It is us, then, whom you attack," rejoined the deputies, to whom Sieyès had been giving this answer, "When we wish to come to an explanation with you, you abuse and repulse us." They all lost their temper, and left immediately, speaking to one another in much more threatening than conciliatory tones.

Immediately after this interview, Jourdan conceived the idea of an important motion, that of declaring the country in danger. This declaration of course would draw to it the levy en masse, and several other grand revolutionary measures. The motion was submitted to the five hundred on the 27th Fructidor (September 13). The moderate party strongly opposed it, alleging that this measure, so far from strengthening, could only weaken the government by exciting exaggerated fears and dangerous agitations. The patriots insisted that some great commotion was required to rouse the public spirit, and save the revolution. This expedient, which was excellent in 1793, could not succeed at the present day, and would have been nothing else than an erroneous application of the past. Lucien Bonaparte, Boulay (of La Meurthe), and Chenier, warmly opposed it, and obtained the adjournment of the question till the following day. The patriots of the clubs had tumultuously surrounded the palace of the five hundred, and insulted several of the deputies. It was reported that Bernadotte, urged on by them, was about to get on horseback, and to put himself at their head, for the purpose of exciting an insurrection. It is certain that several of the firebrands of the party had strongly pressed him to do so. There was reason to fear that he would suffer himself to be drawn into their schemes. Barras and Fouché saw him, and endeavoured to come to an explanation with him. They found him full of resentment against the plans which had been formed, he said, with Joubert. Barras and Fouché assured him that there was nothing of the kind, and got him to keep quiet.

They returned to Sieyès, and agreed to get Bernadotte's resignation from him, so that they should not have to dismiss him themselves! Sieyès in a conversation he had the same day with Bernadotte, induced him to say that he wished soon to return to active service, and that he should consider the command of an army as the most pleasing recompense for his ministry. Instantly interpreting this reply as an application for his removal, Sieyès, Barras, and Roger-Ducos, resolved to write to Bernadotte that his resignation was accepted. They had seized the opportunity while Gohier and Moulins were absent to adopt this determination. On the very next day, the letter to Bernadotte was written. The latter was astounded, and replied to the directory in a very bitter letter, in which he said that they accepted a resignation that he had never sent in, and demanded his superannuation allowance. The intelligence of this falsified resignation reached the five hundred at the moment when that assembly was about to vote on the country being in danger. It caused a very strong sensation. "Some violent state schemes are in preparation," exclaimed the patriots. "Let us swear," said Jourdan, "to die in our curule chairs." "My head shall fall," cried Augereau, "before any outrage shall be committed upon the national representation." At length, after great disturbance, the question was put. Jourdan's motion was negated by a majority of two hundred and forty-five votes against one hundred and seventy-seven, and the country was not declared in danger.

When the two directors, Gohier and Moulins, were apprized of Bernadotte's dismissal, thus settled without their concurrence, they complained to their colleagues, saying that such a measure ought not to have been adopted without the assent of the five directors. "We formed the majority," replied Sieyès, "and we had a right to do what we have done." Gohier and Moulins immediately paid an official visit to Bernadotte, and they took care to do it in as public a manner as they could.

The administration of the department of the Seine also excited some distrust in the directorial majority, it was changed; Dubois de Crancé succeeded Bernadotte in the war department.

The disorganization of the government was in every respect completed; beaten in their external relations by the allied powers, and nearly turned upside down in their domestic relations by the popular parties, the republic threatened a speedy fall. What was wanted was some controlling power that should arise from some one side or other, either to quell the factions or to withstand the foreign enemy. This controlling and superior power it was in vain to expect from a victorious party, for they were all alike worn out, and in disrepute. Such a power could only derive its birth from the armies, in which absolute power, that power which is silent, regular, and glorious in its operation, truly exists, such indeed as a nation, weary of the agitation of dissensions and the conflict of opinions may be said to require. Amidst this great dissolution, all eyes were fixed upon those men who had distinguished themselves during the revolution, and seemed to look for some ruling hand; "We want no more babblers," Sieyès had once observed, "we must have a head and a sword." The head found for it was in the directory. The sword was the thing wanted. Hoche was dead. Joubert, whose youth, excellent disposition, and heroism, recommended him to all the friends of the republic, had just expired at Novi. Moreau, who was deemed the greatest captain among the generals left in Europe, had left on the public mind the impression of a cold indecisive character, without enterprise, and by no means desirous of involving himself in any great responsibility. Masséna, one of our greatest generals, had not yet earned the glory of being our deliverer. Besides, he was looked upon as a soldier and nothing more. Jourdan had just been vanquished. Augereau was a turbulent spirit, Bernadotte of an unsettled disposition, and neither of them had acquired sufficient distinction. There was one very great personage, who exhibited in his own person glory of every description, who to a hundred victories had procured us an advantageous peace, who had raised France to the pinnacle of greatness at Campo-Formio, and who at his departure seemed to have carried his good fortune away with him—this man was Bonaparte; but he was in foreign climes; his name was swelling the echoes of the east. He alone had remained victorious, and caused the banks of the Nile and the Jordan to resound with the war of those thunders with which he had formerly affrighted Europe on the Adige. It was not enough to find him glorious, he must also excite a stronger interest; he was spoken of as exiled by a distrustful and jealous authority. While in the character of an adventurer, he was seeking a career vast as his own imagination, he was considered as an obedient citizen, recompensing by victories the state of exile to which he was condemned, "Where is Bonaparte?" said one to another, "His waning existence is ebbing fast in an unhealthy climate! Ah, were he but among us, the republic would not be threatened with speedy destruction. Europe and the factions would both have to respect it." Indistinct reports gained ground with reference to Bonaparte. Sometimes it was said that victory, faithless to all the French generals, had in her turn abandoned him, in his distant expedition. But no credit attached to such rumours as these. "He is invincible," was the reply; "so far from having experienced reverses, he is marching to the conquest of all the east." Gigantic projects were attributed to him. Some went so far as to assert that he had traversed Syria, and crossed the Euphrates and the Indus; others went so far as to say that he had marched to Constantinople, and that after overthrowing the Ottoman empire, he would turn short round upon Europe. The newspapers were full of these conjectures, which testify how strong a hold this young man had taken on their imagination.

The directory had sent him orders to return, and had got together in the Mediterranean an immense fleet composed of French and Spanish ships to bring the army home*. The general's brothers, who had remained in Paris, and were instructed to convey him intelligence of the state of things, had sent him despatch after despatch to apprise him of the confusion into which the republic had fallen, and to urge his return. But these letters had to cross the seas, and to pass through the English squadrons, and nobody knew whether the hero would be apprised of passing events, and return before the destruction of the republic was effected.

* We must say that this order is a disputed fact. We are aware of a minute of the directory, signed by Treillard, Barras, and Laréveillière, and dated the 7th Fructid., which recalled Bonaparte into Europe. Laréveillière, in his memoirs, declares that he possesses no recollection of having given this signature, and treats it as supposititious. Till this is cleared up, the maritime expedition of Bruix will remain unexplained. At any rate, it is certain that the directory at this period were anxious to have Bonaparte, and entertained less apprehensions of his ambition, than of Suwarrow's ferocity. If the order be not authentic, it is in accordance with the fact; and besides all this, it is of no great importance, for Bonaparte was empowered to return whenever he might deem it expedient.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONTINUATION OF BONAPARTE'S OPERATIONS IN EGYPT.—CONQUEST OF UPPER EGYPT BY DESAIX; BATTLE OF SEDIMAN.—THE SYRIAN EXPEDITION; CAPTURE OF THE PORT OF EL-ARISCH AND JAIFA; BATTLE OF MOUNT TABOR; SIEGE OF SAINT-JEAN-D'ACRE.—RETURN TO EGYPT, BATTLE OF ABOUKIR.—BONAPARTE LEAVES EGYPT FOR FRANCE.—MILITARY OPERATIONS IN EUROPE.—MARCH OF THE ARCHDUKE CHARLES TO THE RHINE, AND OF SUWARROW INTO SWITZERLAND; MOVEMENT BY MASSÉNA; MEMORABLE VICTORY OF ZURICH; SUWARROW'S DANGEROUS SITUATION; HIS DISASTROUS RETREAT; FRANCE SAVED.—EVENTS IN HOLLAND; DEFEAT AND CAPITULATION OF THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN ARMY; HOLLAND EVACUATED.—TERMINATION OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1799.

BONAPARTE, after the battle of the Pyramids, had found himself master of Egypt. He had begun to fortify himself there, and sent his generals into the provinces to complete their conquest. Desaix, placed at the entrance of Upper Egypt, with a division of about three thousand men, was directed to deliver that province from the remains of Murad Bey's forces. It was in Vendémiaire and Brumaire in the preceding year (October, 1798), at the moment the overflowing of the Nile had ceased, that Desaix had set out on his expedition. The enemy had retired before him, and awaited him at Sédiman; it was at that place, on the 16th Vendémiaire, year VII. (October 7, 1798.)

consequences of their administration, were imputed. When the results of the battle of Novi and the events in Holland became known, the violence of these men overstepped all bounds. The generals were loaded with abuse. Moreau was treated as a stupid old fellow. Joubert himself, notwithstanding his heroic death, was accused of having lost the army by his joining it so late as he did. His young wife, and Messrs. de Semonville, Sainte-Foy, and Talleyrand, to whom his marriage was attributed, were mercilessly insulted. The Dutch government was charged with treason; it was said to be composed of aristocrats, stathoudereurs, and enemies to France and liberty. The Freeman's Journal (Journal des Hommes Libres), the organ of the party that met at the Ride, repeated all these declamations, and added to the scandal of the words that of their publication.

This unrestrained license of popular fury was the occasion of many persons suffering from a "terror" as it were. People became apprehensive of a return to the scenes of 1793. Those who styled themselves the moderates, the politicians, and who, like Sieyès, entertained the laudable design, and the somewhat bold pretension of saving France from the fury of the parties, and by giving it a constitution a second time, were indignant at the fury of these new Jacobins. Sieyès in particular had an habitual dread of these persons, and he declared against them with all the vivacity of his temper. At any rate they might be deemed formidable, for besides the "spouters" (criards) and firebrands who displayed their energy in the clubs or in the newspapers, they could count upon allies far more brave, more powerful, and consequently more dangerous, in the government itself. In the first place, there were in the councils all the patriots excluded last year by the separations (scissions), and entered by force at the elections of this year, who in more measured language repeated pretty nearly what was said in the club at the Ride. These were men who did not want to stand the chance of a new constitution, who, moreover, distrusted those who wished to make a new constitution, and who had their apprehensions that maintenance of the government by employing generals boded no good. They were also for availing themselves of measures similar to those employed by the committee of public welfare, in order to extricate France from her present perilous situation. The ancients, more measured, and by their position more cautious, did not participate to any extent in these notions, but more than two hundred members warmly supported them in the five hundred. These were not all of them hot-headed men, as Augereau, but wise and enlightened men, as Jourdan. These two generals gave the patriotic party a great ascendancy in the five hundred. In the directory this party had two voices; Gohier and Moulins. Barras remained undecided; on the one hand, he distrusted Sieyès, who showed him but little respect, and considered him as a most corrupt individual; on the other hand, he feared the patriots and their extravagance. He hesitated therefore to declare himself. In the ministry the patriots had recently gained a new supporter in Bernadotte. This general was much less decided than most of the generals of the army of Italy; and it will be recollected, that his division, on arriving at the Tagliamento, had a quarrel with Augereau on the subject of the word Monsieur, which it had already substituted for that of Citizen. But Bernadotte cherished a restless ambition; his ill temper had been roused by the confidence reposed in Joubert by the reorganizing party; he conceived that Moreau stood best in public estimation since the death of Joubert, and this circumstance rendering him averse to the plans of reorganization, attached him entirely to the patriots. General Marbot, commandant of the citadel of Paris, a violent republican, entertained much the same opinions as Bernadotte.

Thus two hundred deputies in the five hundred whose sentiments were known, at the head of whom were two celebrated generals, the minister at war, the military commandant of Paris, two directors, a great number of newspaper editors and clubs, and a considerable remnant of men who had compromised themselves, and well fitted for a violent and for a decisive movement, were capable of creating serious apprehensions, and though the Mountaineer party could not be revived, the reader may well conceive the alarm it excited with those persons still full of the recollections of 1793.

Some dissatisfaction had been manifested with the mode the magistrate Bourguignon had conducted himself while charged with the police. He was an honest citizen, but very ill advised. Barras proposed to Sieyès, one of his dependents, whom he had recently sent as ambassador to Holland, the accommodating and crafty Fouché, formerly a member of the Jacobins, thoroughly imbued with their spirit and their secret associations, by no means attached to their cause, and only caring how he could, amidst the wreck of parties, save his own fortune—Fouché was eminently qualified to be a spy upon his old friends, and to protect the directory from their schemes. He was accepted by Sieyès and Roger Ducos, and was invested with the ministry of police. This was, under the circumstances, a valuable acquisition. He confirmed Barras in the idea of attaching himself rather to the reorganizing party than to the patriot party, because the latter had nothing to look forward to, and besides, might carry him away too far.

This measure being taken, war against the patriots commenced. Sieyès, who possessed great influence over the ancients, because that council was wholly composed of moderates and politicians, availed himself of that influence to have the new Jacobin club closed. The Ride as adjoining to the Tuileries, was comprised in the precincts of the palace of the ancients. Each council, retaining the police of its own precincts, the ancients had the power of causing the Ride to be closed. In point of fact, the commission of the inspectors issued an ordinance, and prohibited all meetings whatever in that place. A mere sentinel placed at the door was sufficient to prevent the meeting of the new Jacobins. This plainly showed that although their declamations had not altered their tone, their strength was not what it used to be. The preamble of this ordinance was justified at the council of the ancients by a report of the deputy Cornet. Courtois, the same who drew up the report on the 9th Thermidor, seized the opportunity of making a fresh denunciation against the plots of the Jacobins. His denunciation was followed by a discussion which terminated in a report being ordered on this subject.

The patriots, driven from the Ride, retired to a spacious building in the Rue du Bac, and there recommenced their habitual declamations. As their organization into a deliberative assembly still remained unaltered, the constitution gave the executive power a right of dissolving their society. Sieyès, Roger Ducos, and Barras, at the instigation of Fouché, made up their minds to close the club. Gohier and Moulins did not agree with them, stating that, in the present critical state of things, the public spirit should be revived by means of clubs; that the new Jacobin club comprised some men of misguided feeling, but no violently seditious persons, since they had retired before a single sentinel when the Ride was closed. Their opinions were not attended to, and the order was made. Its execution was deferred till after the celebration of the anniversary of the 10th of August, which was to be held on the 23rd Thermidor. Sieyès was president of the directory; in that capacity his duty was to make a speech on the occasion. He made a remarkable speech, in which he strove to point out the danger in which the new anarchists involved the republic, and denounced them as dangerous conspirators, indulging in their day-dreams of a new revolutionary dictatorship. The patriots who attended the ceremony took this speech in ill part, and showed their disapprobation in a noisy manner. In the midst of salvos of artillery, Sieyès and Barras imagined that they heard balls whistling about their ears. They returned to the directory in high dudgeon. Distrusting the authorities of Paris, they resolved to take the command of the citadel from Marbot, who was openly accused of being a warm patriot, and of participating in the pretended plots of the Jacobins. Fouché proposed Lefebvre, a brave general, who had no notion of any thing further than the military watchword, and was an utter stranger to the intrigues of the parties as his successor. Marbot was therefore displaced; and on the next day but one after the ordinance prohibiting the meeting of the club in the Rue du Bac was published.

The patriots offered no more resistance at the Rue du Bac than they did at the Ride. They withdrew, and remained definitely separated. But they had still the journals left them, and of these they made a formidable use. That which styled itself The Freeman's Journal (Journal des Hommes Libres), declaimed with extreme violence against all the members of the directory who were known to have approved of the measure. Sieyès was sadly abused. That perfidious priest, said the patriotic journals, has sold the republic to Prussia. He has agreed with that power to re-establish monarchy in France, and to give the crown to Brunswick. These charges had no other foundation than the well known opinion of Sieyès upon the constitution and his residence in Prussia. In fact, he was for ever repeating, that the firebrands and the "speechifiers" (batards) marred all good government; that authority must be centralized; that liberty might even consist with monarchy, as was evident from England; but that liberty was incompatible with this successive domination of every popular party. He was even alleged to have advanced this doctrine in conversation, that the north of Europe was full of wise and moderate princes, who would be well able, with a sound constitution, of ensuring the happiness of France. Such expressions as these, whether true or false, were quite enough to hold him out as the originator of conspiracies, which had no existence save in the imagination of his enemies. Barras was not a whit better treated than Sieyès. The civilities with which the patriots had long treated him, because he had always flattered them with the hopes of his support, were discontinued. He was now declared by them a traitor, a corrupt man, who was of no service to any party. Fouché, his adviser, an apostate like himself, was hunted down with similar imputations. Roger-Ducos was, according to them, nothing else than an imbecile, blindly adopting the course of two traitors.

The license of the press was unrestrained. The law proposed by Berlier not having been entertained, there was only one mode in which political writers could be punished, and that was by procuring the re-enactment of a law of the convention against those whose acts or writings should tend to the overthrow of the republic. This intention had to be demonstrated by some overt act to bring the offence within the meaning of this law, and then, and in that case the law decreed the punishment of death. It was therefore impossible to resort to this. A new law had been demanded from the legislative body, and it had been settled that the subject should meet with immediate consideration. But in the mean time, the unrestrained fury of the press was continued with the same violence, and the three directors composing the majority declared that it was impossible to conduct the affairs of government. They thought of referring the article 144 of the constitution to this case, which gave the directory a right to issue warrants of arrest against the originators of, or accomplices in, conspiracies formed against the republic. They had therefore to make a tortuous construction of this article, in order to bring the journalists within its meaning. As, however, it was one mode of stopping the outrageous excess of their publications, by seizing their presses and apprehending their persons, the directorial majority, by the advice of Fouché, issued warrants against the authors of eleven journals, and put the seal upon their presses. The ordinance was communicated on the 17th Fructidor (September 3), to the legislative body, and produced strong excitement on the part of the patriots. They cried out against authoritative acts of violence (coups d'état), dictatorship, &c.

Such was the state of affairs. In the directory, in the councils, in short, every where, the moderates and the politicians were in open contest with the patriots. The former had the majority in the directory as in the councils. The patriots were in a minority, but they were sanguine of success, and made noise enough to frighten their adversaries. Fortunately, the means were like the parties, worn out, and on one side as well as the other they were much more likely to cause alarm than do any real mischief. The directory had twice closed the new Jacobin club, and suppressed its journals. The patriots cried out, and made threats, but had neither boldness or numerical force sufficient that Desaix had engaged in an obstinate conflict with the desperate remains of Murad-Bey's army. Not one of the engagements of the French in Egypt was so bloody as this. Two thousand French had to contend with four thousand Mamelukes and eight thousand Fellahs, intrenched in the village of Sédiman. The battle went off in the same way as that of the pyramids, and like all those which were fought in Egypt. The fellahs were behind the walls of the village, and the horse in the plain. Desaix formed his army in two squares, and had placed on his wings two other small squares, in order to deaden the shock of the enemy's cavalry. For the first time, our infantry was broken, and an opening made in one of the small squares. But by a sudden and admirable instinct, our brave soldiers immediately threw themselves on the ground, that the great squares might be able to fire without hurting them. The Mamelukes, passing over them, charged the great squares with fury for several hours together, and concluded by meeting their death in a state of desperation on our bayonets. As usual, the squares then put themselves in motion to attack the intrenchments, and carried them. During this movement, the Mamelukes, describing an arc of a circle, got at the wounded, whom they killed in cold blood on our rear; but they were soon driven from this field of carnage, and the enraged soldiers put to death a considerable number of them. A greater number of slain had never before strewed a field of battle. The French had lost three hundred men. Desaix continued his march during the whole winter; and after a series of actions, having reduced Upper Egypt as far as the cataracts, he made himself as terrible by his intrepidity as beloved for his clemency. In Cairo Bonaparte had been called Sultan Kébir, the Great Sultan; in Upper Egypt Desaix was called the Just Sultan.

Bonaparte had, in the meantime, marched to Belbeys, in order to drive Ibrahim Bey back into Syria, and he had picked up by the way the remains of the caravan of Mecca, plundered by the Arabs. Returning to Cairo, he continued to establish there a form of government in every respect French. A revolt, excited in Cairo by the secret agents of Murad Bey, was sternly repressed, and completely disheartened the enemies of the French*. The winter of 1798-1799 thus elapsed, while great events were expected. During this interval, Bonaparte received intelligence of the declaration of war by the Porte, and of the preparations that state was making against him with the assistance of the English. The Porte was providing two armies, one at Rhodes, the other in Syria. These two armies were to be simultaneously brought into action in the spring of 1799, the one by landing at Aboukir, near Alexandria, the other by crossing the desert which separates Syria from Egypt. Bonaparte, instantly sensible of his position, determined, according to his custom, to destroy the enemy's arrangements, and to forestall him by a sudden attack. He could not cross the desert which parts Egypt from Syria in summer, and he resolved to avail himself of the winter for destroying the military gathering forming at Acre, at Damascus, and in the principal towns. The celebrated pacha of Acre, Djézzar, was appointed seraskier of the army collected in Syria. The pacha of Damascus, Abdallah, commanded his advance guard, and had advanced as far as the fortress of El-Arisch, which separates Egypt on that side of Syria. Bonaparte resolved not to delay his operations. He was in communication with the tribes of Lebanon, the Druses*, the Christian tribes, the Mutualis, and the Schismatic Mahometans, offered him assistance, and sincerely welcomed his arrival. By a brisk assault on Jaffa, Acre, and some other badly fortified places, he might in a short time possess himself of Syria, add this fine conquest to that of Egypt, become master of the Euphrates, as he was of the Nile, and thus have under his own control all means of communication with India. His ardent imagination went still farther, and formed some of those schemes of which his admirers in Europe assumed him capable. It was not impossible that by raising the hordes of the Lebanon, he might obtain sixty or eighty thousand auxiliaries, and that with these auxiliaries, supported by twenty-five thousand soldiers, the bravest in the world, he might march against Constantinople, in order to seize upon that city. Were this gigantic project practicable or not, this much is certain, that it formed the sole object of his thoughts; and when it has been seen what, aided by fortune, he actually did perform, no one can venture to pronounce any of his designs the effect of a disordered imagination.

Bonaparte commenced his march in Pluviose (very early in February), at the head of the divisions under Kleber, Regnier, Lannes, Bon, and Murat, about thirteen thousand strong. Murat's division was composed of cavalry. Bonaparte had raised a regiment of quite a novel description, the dromedary regiment. Two men seated back to back were mounted on each dromedary; and such are the strength and swiftness of those animals, that they can go twenty-five or thirty leagues without stopping. Bonaparte had formed this regiment to give chase to the Arabs who infested the borders of Egypt. This regiment followed the army on the present expedition. Bonaparte had moreover directed rear-admiral Perrée to leave Alexandria with three frigates, and to come to the coast of Syria, for the purpose of conveying thither the siege artillery and ammunition. Bonaparte came up before the fort of El-Arisch on the 29th Pluviose (February 17). After some slight resistance, the garrison surrendered themselves prisoners, to the number of thirteen hundred men. In this fortress were found considerable stores. Ibrahim Bey, who desired to relieve it, was put to flight; his camp fell into the hands of the French, who found in it an immense booty. The soldiers had to endure severe hardships while crossing the desert; but when they saw their general marching by their side, suffering, in impaired health, the same privations and the same fatigues, they dared not complain. They soon reached Gaza; this fortress was taken before the very eyes of Djézzar-Pacha,

* These are a tribe that inhabit the valleys of Mount Lebanon, in Asiatic Turkey; they are governed by their own chief, who is a tributary of the Turkish government. Trans.

• This event took place the 30th Vendémiaire, year VII. (21st October, 1798.)

1799. March.
(Ventôse, Germinal.)

Jaffa destroyed and the prisoners killed.
Siege of St Jean d'Acre.

THE DIRECTORY.

Siege of St. Jean d'Acre.

847

and they found there, as in the fortress of El-Arisch, a great quantity of ammunition and provisions. From Gaza the army proceeded to Jaffa, the Joppa of antiquity. The army got thither on the 13th Ventôse (March 3). This place was surrounded by a massive wall, flanked by towers. It contained a garrison of four thousand men. Bonaparte caused it to be battered in breach, and then summoned the commandant, whose only answer was cutting off the head of the messenger. The assault was made and the fortress stormed with extraordinary intrepidity, and given up to a thirty hours' pillage and murder. Here also were found a considerable quantity of artillery and provisions of every description. There remained some few thousand prisoners, whom the general could not send off to Egypt, because he had not the ordinary means for escorting them, and whom he was by no means desirous to send back to swell the enemy's ranks. Bonaparte decided upon a terrible measure, and which is the only cruel act of his life. Transported into a barbarous country, he had involuntarily adopted its manners: he put to death in cold blood all the prisoners that remained. The army performed with obedience, but with a sort of horror, the execution that was ordered. It was while staying at Jaffa that our soldiers caught the first infection of the plague.

Bonaparte then advanced upon Saint-Jean-d'Acre, the ancient Ptolemais, situated at the foot of Mount Carmel. It was the only place that could now offer a barrier to his progress. Syria was his, if he could carry this fortress. There it was that Djézzar had intrusted himself with all his wealth and a strong garrison. He placed great reliance upon the support of Sidney Smith, who was cruising off that coast, and who furnished him with engineers, artillerymen, and ammunition. Besides, he was shortly to be relieved by the Turkish army collected in Syria, which was advancing from Damascus to cross the Jordan. Bonaparte lost no time in making his attack on this fortress, in order to carry it, as he had done Jaffa, before it was reinforced with fresh troops, and before the English had time to complete its defences. The trenches were immediately opened. Unfortunately, the siege artillery, sent by sea from Alexandria, had been captured by Sidney Smith. All the siege and field-artillery the French possessed consisted of a thirty-two pound carronade, four twelve pounders, eight howitzers, and thirty or so of four pounders. The French had no cannon-balls, but they devised a mode of procuring them. They caused a few horsemen to make an appearance on the beach. Sidney Smith, on observing them, kept up a rolling fire from all the batteries; and the soldiers, to whom five sous were given for each ball, went about and collected them amidst the cannonade and amidst universal laughter.

The trenches had been opened on the 30th Ventôse (March 20). Sanson, general of engineers, in a night survey, thinking he had come to the foot of the rampart, declared that it had neither counterscarp or ditch, and it was therefore conceived that all they had to do was to effect a mere breach, and then proceed to the assault. On the 5th Germinal (March 25), a breach was made, every thing was ready for the assault, but they were stopped by a counterscarp and a ditch. They immediately set about mining. The operation was carried on under the fire of all the ramparts, and of the fine artillery which Sidney Smith had taken from us. He had given Djézzar some excellent English gunners, and Philippeaux, an emigrant engineer officer of distinguished merit. The mine exploded on the 8th Germinal (March 28), and carried away no more than a portion of the counterscarp. Twenty-five grenadiers, headed by young Mailly, went up to the assault. The Turks on seeing that brave officer place a ladder, were frightened; but Mailly fell down dead. The grenadiers were then disheartened; the Turks returned, two battalions which followed were received with a tremendous fire; their commandant, Langier, was killed, and the assault once more became a failure.

Unfortunately for us, the place had just then received a reinforcement of several thousand men, a great number of gunners who practised the European mode of gunnery, and immense supplies of ammunition. This was a heavy siege to be carried on with thirteen thousand men, and almost entirely destitute of artillery. We had to open a new shaft of a mine, and to commence another covered way, before we could blow up the entire counterscarp. It was now the 12th Germinal (April 1). Ten days had we been occupied before the fortress; news arrived of the advance of the grand Turkish army; we had now to carry on our works and to protect the siege, and all with no more than the army allotted to the expedition. The commander-in-chief ordered that we should work without intermission at a fresh mine, and detached Kléber's division towards the Jordan, in order to prevent its being crossed by the army coming from Damascus.

That army, composed of the hordes of the mountains of Naplouse, amounted to about twenty-five thousand men. Its main strength consisted in upwards of twelve thousand horse; it had an immense baggage train, and was commanded by Abdallah Pacha of Damascus. On the 15th Germinal (April 4), it crossed the Jordan at Jacob's bridge. Junot, with Kléber's advanced guard, five hundred strong at most, fell in with the Turkish advanced guards on the road to Nazareth on the 19th (April 8); instead of retreating, he boldly dared the enemy, and formed a square, covered the field of battle with slain, and took five pair of colours. But being obliged to yield to numbers, he fell back upon Kléber's division. The latter was advancing, and was hastening its march to rejoin Junot. Bonaparte apprised of the enemy's force, detached himself with Bon's division to support Kléber, and to fight a decisive battle. Djézzar acting in concert with the army that was coming to raise the siege, would have made a rally, but was so utterly repelled with our fire of grape shot, that he left our works covered with his slain; Bonaparte promptly commenced his march.

Kléber had debouched with his division in the plains that extend at the foot of Mount Tabor, not far from the village of Fouli. He had conceived the idea of surprising the Turkish camp in the night, but had arrived too late to be successful. In the morning of the 27th Germinal (April 16), he found the whole Turkish army in order of battle. Fifteen thousand infantry occupied the village of Fouli, and more than twelve thousand horse were drawn up in the plain. Kléber had scarcely three thousand infantry in square. The whole of the enemy's cavalry set itself in motion and rushed upon our squares. Never had the French yet seen so many horsemen prancing, charging, and in constant motion. They preserved their accustomed coolness, and receiving them at the muzzle of their guns with a terrible fire, at every charge prostrated a considerable number of their assailants. They had soon formed around themselves a rampart of men and horses, and sheltered by this horrible breastwork, they were enabled to resist for six successive hours the utmost fury of their adversaries. At this moment Bonaparte debouched from Mount Thabor with Bon's division; he saw the plain covered with fire and smoke, and Kléber's brave division defending itself under a line of carcasses. He immediately formed the division which he had brought with him into two squares. These two squares advanced in such a manner as to form an equilateral triangle with Kléber's division, and thus put the enemy between them. They marched on in silence, and without giving any sign of their approach till within a certain distance; Bonaparte then ordered a cannon to be suddenly fired, and immediately made his appearance on the field of battle. A tremendous fire immediately discharged from the three points of this triangle assailed the Mamelukes who were in the midst, made them whirl confusedly round one another, and made them take to flight in a most disorderly manner in every direction. Kléber's division, who gained spirits on witnessing this attack, rushed upon the village of Fouli, carried it at the point of the bayonet, and made a great carnage among the enemy. In a moment the whole multitude vanished, and the plain was left covered with the slain. The Turkish camp, the pacha's three tails, four hundred camels, and an immense booty, became the prey of the French.

Murat, posted on the banks of the Jordan, slew a great number of the fugitives. Bonaparte caused all the villages of the Naplousians to be burned. Six thousand French had destroyed that army which the inhabitants had said could no more be numbered than the stars in the heavens and the sands on the sea-shore.

During this interval, there was no end to mining and countermining about the walls of St. Jean d'Acre. A ground turned upside down by the besiegers' art was disputed inch by inch. The French had been six weeks before the place. They had made many assaults, driven back numerous sallies, and killed a great number of the enemy; but, in spite of their constantly maintaining the superiority, they suffered losses in point of time and soldiers that could not be repaired. On the 18th Floréal (May 7), there arrived in the port of Acre a reinforcement of twelve thousand men. Bonaparte, calculating that it would take them at least six hours to land, immediately ordered a twenty-four pounder to play against a considerable portion of wall; this was to the right of the point against which so many exertions had for some time been made. Night came, the breach was mounted, the enemy's works carried and filled up, the guns spiked, and every body in the way slain. The French were at length masters of the place, when the recently landed troops advanced in battle array and exhibited a tremendous mass. Rambaut, who commanded the first grenadiers who mounted to the assault, was killed, Lannes was wounded. At that very moment the enemy made a sally, took the breach in rear, and cut off the retreat of the brave fellows who had made their way inside the fortress; some contrived to make their way back; others, taking a desperate resolution, fled to a mosque, intrenched themselves there, expended their last cartridges, and were prepared to sell their lives as dearly as they could, when Sidney Smith, affected by such bravery, caused a capitulation to be granted them. Meanwhile, the besieging troops marching upon the enemy, drove him back into the place after inflicting on him a frightful carnage, and taking from him eight hundred prisoners. Bonaparte, with a determination of spirit almost amounting to insanity, gave two days' rest to his troops, and on the 21st (May 10), ordered another assault to be made. The men mounted with the same bravery as ever, scaled the breach but could not pass it, the army was there, guarding the place and defending every street. The siege had to be abandoned.

Two months had elapsed while the army had been before Acre; it had sustained considerable losses, and it would have been imprudent to expose it still further. The plague was in that city, and the army had contracted the disorder at Jaffa. The proper time for landing the troops was at hand, and the news came of the arrival of a Turkish army near the mouth of the Nile. If he still persisted in his operations, Bonaparte would so far weaken himself as not to be able to repulse new enemies. The main point of his plan was effected, since he had destroyed the combination of hordes formed in Syria, and had reduced the enemy in that quarter to absolute incapacity. As for the brilliant part of those same plans, as for those vague and illusive hopes of conquests in the east, these he certainly must renounce. He made up his mind at last to raise the siege. But he regretted this so deeply, that notwithstanding his subsequent unparalleled good fortune, he has been frequently heard, when speaking of Sidney Smith, to say; "That man lost me my fortune." The Druses, who during the siege had supplied the army as well as all the tribes hostile to the Porte, received the intelligence of Bonaparte's retreat with despair.

Bonaparte had commenced the siege on the 30th Ventôse (March 20), he raised the siege on the 1st Prairial (May 20th), and it had occupied him for two months. Before quitting Saint-Jean d'Acre, he determined to leave an awful memorial of his expedition; he overwhelmed the town with his fire and left it almost reduced to ashes. He wended his way back by the desert. By the cannonade, hardship, and disease, he had lost nearly one third of his force, that is, about four thousand men. He carried away twelve hundred wounded. He now put himself in marching order once more to traverse the desert. He ravaged the whole country as he went along, and impressed it with the greatest feeling of terror, and arrived at Jaffa, he blew up the fortifications. There was an hospital in that town for the soldiers infected with the plague. To take them with him was impossible:

if they were left behind, they would be exposed to inevitable death, either by the disease, or by famine, or by the cruelty of the enemy. Accordingly Bonaparte told Desgenettes, the physician, that it would be much more humane to give them opium than to continue their existence, to which that physician made this noble reply: "My profession is to cure, not to destroy them." Opium was not administered, and this circumstance served to give rise to an unworthy, but now universally repudiated calumny.

Bonaparte at length reached Egypt after an expedition of nearly three months. It was high time for him to return. The spirit of insurrection had spread throughout the whole Delta. An impostor calling himself the angel El-Mohdhy, who gave out that he was invulnerable, and that he would drive out the French by merely raising a dust, had collected some thousand insurgents. The agents of the Mamelukes gave him their assistance; and he had taken Damanhour and slaughtered the garrison. Bonaparte sent a detachment, which dispersed the insurgents, and killed the invulnerable angel. The disorder had spread to the different provinces of the Delta. His presence produced every where submission and tranquillity. He gave orders for magnificent festivities at Cairo to celebrate his triumphs in Syria. He did not openly allude to that part of his plans which had been foiled, but he boasted, and justly, of the numerous actions fought in Syria, of the glorious battle of Mount Thabor, and of the terrible vengeance that he had wreaked on Djazzar. He issued fresh proclamations to the inhabitants, in which he assured them that he was acquainted with their inmost thoughts, and knew their plans the moment they were formed. They gave implicit belief to these strange assertions of sultan Kebir, and actually believed that he well knew their secret intentions. Bonaparte had to curb not only the inhabitants, but his own generals and the army itself. A deep discontent pervaded it. This discontent proceeded neither from fatigue or from danger, still less from privations, for the army wanted nothing, but from that fondness for his own country which follows the Frenchman go where he will. An entire year had been spent in Egypt, and for nearly six months, they had received no news whatever from France. No ship had been able to reach them; a settled feeling of melancholy preyed upon every heart. There was scarcely a day passed but officers and generals were asking for leave of absence in order to get back to Europe. Bonaparte seldom granted it, or if he did, accompanied it with expressions that were felt as a disgrace. Berthier himself, his faithful Berthier, melancholy from the effect of a long-standing matrimonial engagement, solicited permission to revisit Italy. On the second occasion he was ashamed of his weakness, and declined going. At one time the army had formed the plan of carrying off its colours from Cairo and marching to Alexandria, for the purpose of embarking. But it went no farther than the intention, and durst not oppose its general. Bonaparte's lieutenants, who all set the example of murmuring, were silent in his presence, and submitted themselves to his supremacy. He more than once had high words with Kléber. The ill-temper of the latter was not the consequence of any disheartened feeling, but from his usual peevishness. They were always reconciled, for Bonaparte admired the great soul of Kléber, and Kléber was fully persuaded by the genius of Bonaparte.

It was now Prairial (June). The same ignorance prevailed in the army as to what was going on in Europe, and the unhappiness to which France was subject. All they knew was, that the continent was in a state of real confusion, and that a new war was inevitable. Bonaparte impatiently waited for further particulars, that he might make up his mind as to the course he would pursue, and return, if it were required, to the scene of his early exploits. But before he did so, he wanted to destroy the second Turkish army, collected at Rhodes, the very speedy landing of which was announced.

This army, put on board numerous transports, and conveyed by Sidney Smith's squadron, appeared on the 23rd Messidor (July 11) in sight of Alexandria, and anchored at Aboukir in the same road where our squadron had been destroyed. The place fixed upon by the English for their landing was the peninsula which defends this road, and which bears the same name. This narrow peninsula runs out between the sea and Lake Madich, and has a fort at its extremity. Bonaparte had ordered Marmont, who commanded at Alexandria, to improve the defences of the fort, and to destroy the village of Aboukir, situated around it. But, instead of destroying the village, they thought it better to keep the place in order to lodge the soldiers there; and it had merely been surrounded by a redoubt to protect it on the land side. But the redoubt not joining on both sides the sea, did not present the appearance of a close work, and put the fort on the same footing as a simple field-work. The Turks, in fact, landed with great boldness, attacked the intrenchments sword in hand, carried them, and made themselves masters of the village of Aboukir, putting the garrison to the sword. The village being taken, the fort could no longer hold out, and it was obliged to surrender. Marmont, who commanded at Alexandria, had issued forth at the head of twelve hundred men to hasten to the assistance of the troops at Aboukir. But learning that the Turks had landed in considerable numbers, he durst not attempt to drive them into the sea by a bold attack. He returned to Alexandria, and left them to quietly take up their position on the peninsula of Aboukir.

The Turks amounted to nearly eighteen thousand infantry. These were not the miserable Fellahs who had composed the infantry of the Mamelukes; these were brave janizaries, carrying a musket without bayonet, slinging it at their back after firing, and rushing pistol and sword in hand upon the enemy. They had a numerous and well-served artillery, and were under the direction of English officers. They had no cavalry, for they had not brought more than three hundred horses; but they expected Murad Bey, who was to leave Upper Egypt, proceed along the desert, cross the oases, and throw himself into Aboukir with two or three thousand Mamelukes.

When Bonaparte was informed of the particulars of the landing, he left Cairo instantly, and made from that city to Alexandria one of those extraordinary marches of which he had given so many instances in Italy. He took with him the divisions of Lannes, Bon, and Murat. He had ordered Desaix to evacuate Upper Egypt, and Kléber and Régnier, who were in the Delta, to bring themselves nearer Aboukir. He had chosen the point of Birket, midway between Alexandria and Aboukir, in order to concentrate his forces thither, and to manoeuvre according to circumstances. He was very fearful lest an English army had landed with the Turks.

Murad Bey, according to the plan settled with Mustapha Pacha, had tried a descent into Lower Egypt; but being met and beaten by Murat, he had been obliged to regain the desert. There was now nothing left but the Turkish army to fight, destitute as it was of cavalry, but yet encamped behind intrenchments, and disposed to stand its ground there with its usual pertinacity. Bonaparte, after inspecting Alexandria and the admirable works executed by colonel Cretin, and after reprimanding Marmont, his lieutenant, who had not dared to attack the Turks at the moment of landing, left Alexandria on the 6th Thermidor (July 24). Next day, the 7th, he was at the entrance of the peninsula. His plan was to enclose the Turkish army by intrenchments, and to await the arrival of all his divisions, for all he had with him were no more than the divisions of Lannes, Bon, and Murat, about six thousand men. But on observing the arrangements made by the Turks, he altered his intentions, and resolved to attack them immediately, hoping to enclose them in the village of Aboukir, and to overwhelm them with bombs and howitzers.

The Turks occupied the furthest end of the peninsula, which is very narrow. They were covered by two lines of intrenchments. Half a league in advance of the village of Aboukir, where their camp was, they had occupied two round sand-hills, supported the one on the sea, the other on Lake Madiéh, and thus forming their right and left. In the centre of these two hillocks was a village, which they had likewise kept. They had one thousand men on the hillock to the right, two thousand on the hillock to the left, and three or four thousand men in the village. Such was their first line. The second was at the village of Aboukir itself. It consisted of the redoubt constructed by the French, and was connected with the sea by two trenches. It was there that they had stationed their principal camp and the bulk of their forces.

Bonaparte made his arrangements with his usual promptitude and decision. He ordered general Destaing, with some battalions, to march to the hill on the left, where the one thousand Turks were posted; Lannes to march to that on the right, where the two thousand others were; and Murat, who was at the centre, to make the cavalry file on the rear of the two hillocks. These arrangements were executed with great precision. Destaing marched to the hillock on the left, and boldly climbed it; Murat contrived to get at its rear by a troop of cavalry. The Turks, when they saw this, abandoned their post, fell in with the cavalry, which cut them in pieces, and drove them into the sea, into which they chose rather to throw themselves than to surrender. The same operation was executed on the right.

Lannes attacked the two thousand Mamelukes, Murat got at their rear; and they were in like manner cut to pieces and driven into the sea. Destaing and Lannes then moved towards the centre, formed by a village, and attacked it in front. The Turks there defended themselves bravely, relying upon assistance from the second line. A column in fact was detached from the camp of Aboukir; but Murat, who had already filed upon the rear of the village, cut this column in pieces, and drove it back into Aboukir. Destaing's infantry and that of Lannes entered the village at the charge step, driving the Turks out of it, who were driven in all directions, and who obstinately refusing to surrender, had no other retreat than the sea, wherein they were drowned.

Already four to five thousand had perished in this manner. The first line was carried; Bonaparte's object was accomplished, and now, enclosing the Turks in Aboukir, he could bombard them while waiting for the arrival of Kléber and Régnier. But he desired to make the most of his success, and to complete his victory that very moment. After giving his troops a little breathing time, he marched upon the second line. The division under Lannes, which had been left as a reserve, supported Lannes and Destaing. The redoubt which covered Aboukir was difficult to carry; it had within it nine or ten thousand Turks. On the right, a trench joined it to the sea; on the left, another trench brought it further out; but was not continued quite to Lake Madiéh. The open space was occupied by the enemy, and swept by the fire of numerous gun-boats. Bonaparte, having accustomed his soldiers to defy the most formidable obstacles, sent them upon the enemy's position. His divisions of infantry marched upon the front and the right of the redoubt. The cavalry, concealed in a wood of palm-trees, had to make the attack on the left, and then to cross, under the fire of the gun-boats, the open space between the redoubt and Lake Madiéh. The charge was made; Lannes and Destaing urged forward their brave infantry. The 32nd marched with their pieces on their arms towards the intrenchments, and the 18th got at the rear of the intrenchments on the extreme right. The enemy, without waiting for them, advanced to meet them. They fought hand to hand. The Turkish soldiers, having fired their pieces and their two pistols, drew their flashing sabres. They endeavoured to grasp the bayonets, but received them in their flanks before they could lay hold of them. Thus a great slaughter took place in the intrenchments. The 18th was on the point of getting into the redoubt, when a tremendous fire of artillery repulsed it, and sent it back to the foot of the works. The gallant Letourq fell gloriously, by desiring to be the last to retire; Eugéniéres lost an arm. Murat on his part had advanced with his cavalry, with a view to clear the space between the fire of the redoubt and Lake Madiéh. Several times he had dashed forward, and had turned back the enemy; but taken between the two fires of the redoubt, and that of the gun-boats, he had been obliged to fall back on our rear. Some of his horse-soldiers had advanced to the very ditches of the redoubt. The efforts of so many brave fellows appeared likely to be utterly unavailable. Bonaparte looked coolly on this carnage, waiting for a favourable moment to return to the charge. Fortunately the Turks, as they usually did, quitted the intrenchments for the purpose of cutting off the heads of the slain. Bonaparte seized this opportunity, launched forth two battalions, one of the 22nd, the other of the 69th, which marched upon the intrenchments and carried them. On the right, the 18th also took advantage of this opportunity, and entered the redoubt. Murat, on his side, ordered a fresh charge. One of his divisions of cavalry traversed that most exposed space between the intrenchments and the lake, and made his way into the village of Aboukir. The Turks, affrighted, fled on all sides, and a horrible slaughter of them ensued. They were pressed by the point of the bayonet and driven into the sea. Murat, at the head of his horse, penetrated into the camp of Mustapha Pacha. The latter, in a fit of despair, snatched up a pistol and fired it at Murat, whom he wounded slightly. Murat struck off two of his fingers, and sent him prisoner to Bonaparte. Such of the Turks as were not killed or drowned retired into the fort of Aboukir.

More than twelve thousand corpses were floating in Aboukir bay, which not long ago had been covered by the bodies of our seamen. Two or three thousand had perished by the fire or by the sword. The rest, enclosed by the fort, had nothing to rely upon save the clemency of the conqueror. Such was that extraordinary battle, in which, for the first time perhaps in the history of war, a hostile army was entirely destroyed. It was on this occasion that Kléber, arriving towards the close of the day, clasped Bonaparte round the waist, and exclaimed: "General, you are as great as the world itself!"

Thus, either by the expedition to Syria, or by the battle of Aboukir, Egypt was freed, at least for the time, from the forces of the Porte. The state of the French army might be considered as very encouraging. After all the losses which it had sustained, it still numbered about twenty-five thousand men, the bravest and the best officered in the world. Every day would induce a more cordial feeling between the army and the inhabitants, and would confirm its position. Bonaparte had been there a whole year: arrived in summer before the rising of the Nile, he had employed the first moments in gaining possession of Alexandria and the capital, which he had secured by the battle of the Pyramids. After the rising of the water and in autumn, he had completed the conquest of the Delta, and confided that of Upper Egypt to Desaix. In winter he had undertaken the expedition to Syria, and destroyed Djezzar's Turkish army at Mount Tabor. He had now, in summer, just destroyed the second army of the Porte at Aboukir. Thus the time had been occupied in the best manner possible; and while victory abandoned in Europe the banners of France, she remained faithful to them in Africa and in Asia. The tri-coloured flag waved triumphant over the Nile and the Jordan, even over the places from whence the Christian religion had issued to spread its influence over the world.

Bonaparte as yet knew not what was going on in France. None of the despatches from the directory or from his brothers had ever reached him: he was in a state of the most anxious suspense.

With a view to obtain some intelligence, he ordered brigs to cruise about with orders to stop all merchantmen, and to procure from them some information as to the events which were taking place in Europe. He sent to the Turkish fleet an officer to parley, who under the pretext of negotiating an exchange of prisoners, was to do his best to procure intelligence of some description or other. Sidney Smith detained this officer, treated him exceedingly well, and perceiving that Bonaparte was ignorant of the calamities that had befallen France, gratified a malicious pleasure by sending him an entire file of newspapers. The messenger returned and delivered the packet to Bonaparte. The latter spent the whole night in devouring the contents of those papers, and informing himself of what was passing in his own country. No sooner did he know than he made up his mind what to do: he resolved to sail secretly for Europe, and to attempt the passage at the risk of being captured on the way by the English cruisers. He sent for rear-admiral Guntheaume, and gave him orders to get the Muiron and the Carrère frigates ready for sea. He communicated his intentions to no one, and he hastened to Cairo to make all his arrangements, drew up a long set of instructions for Kléber, with whom he purposed to leave the command of the army, and set out on his return to Alexandria without losing an instant.

On the 3rd Fructidor (August 22), taking with him Berthier, Lanues, Murat, Andréossy, Marmont, Berthollet, and Monge, and escorted by some of his guides, he repaired to an open and exposed but retired part of the coast. Some boats had been got ready; they stepped into them, and went on board the Muiron and Carrère frigates. These were accompanied by La Reclanche and La Fortune xebecs*. They instantly set sail, so that by daylight they might be out of sight of the English cruisers. Unfortunately it fell calm; great anxiety being felt lest they should be surprised, it was proposed to return to Alexandria; Bonaparte would not consent to this. "Be quiet," said he, "we shall give them the go by." Like Cæsar, he relied upon his good fortune†.

This was not, as it has been called, a cowardly flight, for he left a victorious army, to defy dangers of every description; and the most horrible of all, imprisonment in London. It was one of those rash acts by which men of inordinate ambition tempt Heaven, and to which they afterwards owe that unbounded confidence, which alternately elevates and hurls them from their exalted state.

While the fate of such a man as this was thus committed to the chances of the winds or of a meeting with the enemy, victory waited on our banners in Europe, and the republic extricated itself by a sublime effort from the perils to which we have just seen her exposed. Masséna was all the time on the line of the Limmat, deferring the moment of resuming the offensive. The army of Italy, after losing the battle of Novi, had dispersed itself in the Apennines. Fortunately, Suwarrow secured no greater advantages by the victory of Novi than he did by the battle of the Trebbia, and lost in Piedmont that time of which France was making use in preparing herself. At this moment, the aulic council, as inconsistent in its schemes as the directory had been, devised a plan which could not fail to change the aspect of events. The aulic council was jealous of the authority that Suwarrow had wanted to exercise in Italy, and observed with vexation that this general had written to the king of Sardinia, to recall him to his dominions. The aulic council had its own views upon Piedmont, and was on the stretch to detach the old marshal from that country. Besides all this, the Russians and the Austrians were not on the best terms with each other; and all these reasons put together made the aulic council effect a complete change in the distribution of the troops upon the line of operation. The Russians were intermixed with the Austrians on the two theatres of the war. Korsakow was operating in Switzerland with the archduke Charles, and Suwarrow with Mélas in Italy. The aulic council were for transferring the archduke to the Rhine, and Suwarrow to Switzerland. In this manner the two Russian armies would both of them have to conduct their operations in Switzerland. The Austrians would have to act by themselves on the Rhine; and they would also have to solely conduct their operations in Italy, where they were to be soon reinforced by a new army, provided to supply the deficiency left by Suwarrow. The aulic council assigned as a reason for this change, that it was more expedient to let the troops of each nation fight together; that the Russians would find in Switzerland a temperature more analogous to their own climate, and that the movement of the archduke Charles to the Rhine would assist the expedition to Holland. England could not fail to approve of this plan, for she entertained great expectations on this head as well as in respect of the expedition to Holland, and also upon the presence of the archduke on the Rhine, and she was not sorry that the Russians, who had already entered Corfu, with the intent to seize Malta, should be sent off to a distance from Genoa.

* A vessel used on the Mediterranean, pointed at both ends, with three masts, and impelled by sails and oars. Trans.

† Cæsarem vehis et fortunam ejus. Trans.

This shifting and changing, executed before Masséna's eyes, was extremely dangerous, and besides, it transferred the Russians to a theatre of war not so suitable to their habits. These soldiers, accustomed to charge in the plain and with the bayonet, were not expert in the use of the musket, nor, what is particularly desirable in mountain warfare, expert sharpshooters. The aulic council, acting in the very spirit of cabinets, postponed political reasons to military considerations, forbade its generals to urge a single objection, and issued orders for the strict execution of this plan in the middle of Fructidor (the latter end of August).

We have already described the configuration of the theatre of war*, and the mode in which the armies were distributed therein, and the waters

* With every desire to make myself fully understood, I hardly expect to make the reader comprehend the details I am about to relate, if he does not place before him while reading this, some map, no matter whether it be very finished or not. However, these events are so extraordinary, and have in so absolute a manner been the means of saving France, that I consider them worthy of forming part of the present history. The most imperfect map of Swit-issuing from the High Alps, and sometimes running in the form of rivers, and at others collected in the form of lakes, presented different lines one with another, commencing on the right, against a great chain of mountains, and ending on the left in that great river which separates Germany from France. The two principal rivers were those of the Rhine and the Limmat. Masséna, compelled to abandon that of the Rhine, had fallen back upon that of the Limmat. He had even been compelled to retire a little behind the latter, and to support himself upon the Albis. The line of the Limmat did not the less separate the two armies. This line was composed of the Linth, which rises among the High Alps in the canton of Glaris, and then falls into the Lake of Zurich; of the Limmat, which issues from that very lake, and falls into the Aar in the neighbourhood of Brugg. The archduke Charles was behind the Limmat, from Brugg to Zurich. Korsakow was behind the Lake of Zurich, waiting till a position was assigned him. Hotze was keeping the Linth.

According to the plan agreed upon, the position of the archduke, whose appointment had been for the Rhine, was to be taken behind the Limmat by Korsakow. Hotze was to remain upon the Linth, with the Austrian corps of Voralberg, so as to assist Suwarrow on his march from Italy. The question was, what route should Suwarrow take. He had to cross the mountains, and might follow one or the other of the lines which intersect Switzerland. Should he prefer making his way by the valley of the Rhine, he might, by crossing the Splügen, get to Corré to the Upper Rhine, and there form his junction with Hotze. It had been calculated that he might get thither about the 25th of September (3rd Vendémiaire, year VIII.) This movement would possess the advantage of being conducted at a great distance from, and entirely out of the reach of the French, and thus of ensuring its independence of any accident. Suwarrow might with equal propriety take another route, and instead of following the line of the Rhine, enter the valley of the Reuss by the Saint-Gothard, and debouch by Schwytz behind the line of the Linth, occupied by the French. This march had the advantage of bringing him upon the back of the enemy's line; but in that case he would have to cross the Saint-Gothard, occupied by Lecourbe; it would be necessary also to prepare a movement of Hotze beyond the Linth, that he might be able to assist the army coming from the Saint-Gothard; in order to second this movement, there would have to be made an attack upon the Limmat; in one word, a general operation on the whole line, with a harmony and precision so seldom attained, when acting at such great distances and in such numerous detachments. This plan, which the Russians cast upon the Austrians, and the Austrians fling back upon the Russians, was nevertheless preferred. Consequently a general attack on the whole line was ordered for the latter end of September. At the moment when Suwarrow should debouch from the Saint-Gothard into the valley of the Reuss, Korsakow was to make his attack below the Lake of Zurich, that is, along the Limmat, and Hotze above zerland will be quite sufficient to enable the reader to understand at a glance the scene of the operations.

the lake and along the Linth. Two of Hotze's lieutenants, Linken and Jellachich, were to make their way into the canton of Glaris, as far as Schwytz, and assist Suwarrow. The general junction once effected, the troops assembled in Switzerland would amount to eighty thousand men. Suwarrow was coming up with eighteen thousand; Hotze had twenty-five, Korsakow thirty. This latter had in reserve the division of Condé and some thousand Bavarians. But, before the junction could be effected, thirty thousand under Korsakow, and twenty-five thousand under Hotze, that is to say, fifty-five thousand, would find themselves exposed to the attacks of Masséna's entire army.

In point of fact, the moment when the archduke Charles was quitting the Limmat, and before Suwarrow had yet crossed the Alps, was too favourable for Masséna to let pass, and not shake off the inaction which had cost him so much animadversion. His army had been increased by the reinforcements which it had received to about seventy-five thousand men; but it had to extend itself from Saint-Gothard to Bâle, an immense line to cover. Lecourbe, forming his right, and having Gudin and Molitor under his command, guarded the Saint-Gothard, the valley of the Reuss, and the Upper Linth, with twelve or thirteen thousand men. Soult, with ten thousand, occupied Linth up the point where it flows into the Lake of Zurich. Masséna, with the divisions under the command of Mortier, Klein, Lorge, and Mesnard, forming a total of thirty-seven thousand men, was in front of the Limmat, from Zurich to Brugg. Thurenau's division, nine thousand strong, and Chabran's division, of eight thousand, guarded one the Valais and the other the environs of Bâle.

Masséna, though inferior in force, had the advantage of being able to concentrate his principal mass on the essential point. Thus he had in front of the Limmat thirty-seven thousand men whom he could launch against Korsakow. The latter had recently diminished his strength by four thousand men sent as a reinforcement to Hotze behind the Lake of Zurich, which reduced it to twenty-six thousand. Condé's division and the Bavarians, who were to avail Korsakow as a reserve, were still far behind Schaffhausen. Masséna was therefore in a situation of launching forth thirty-seven thousand men against twenty-six thousand. Korsakow beaten, he could then turn against Hotze, and then putting both to the rout, perhaps destroying them, overwhelm Suwarrow, on his coming into Switzerland with the expectation of finding the enemy in that quarter reduced, or at least confined within its line.

Masséna, apprized of the enemy's plans, arranged his general attack for one day in advance, and fixed it for the 3rd Vendémiaire (September 25, 1799). Ever since he had retired to the Albis, a few paces beyond the Limmat, the course of that river belonged to the enemy; he would have to take it from the enemy by effecting a passage across; this was what he proposed to effect with his thirty-seven thousand men. While he was about conducting his operations below the Lake of Zurich, he directed Soult to operate above it, and to cross the Linth that same day. Military critics have considered Masséna to blame in one instance; he should, they say, have rather drawn Suwarrow into Switzerland, than to have kept him away; if, therefore, instead of leaving Lecourbe to fight in vain at the Saint-Gothard against Suwarrow, Masséna had joined him with Soult, he would have been in a far better condition to overwhelm Hotze and to cross the Linth. At any rate, as the result obtained was as great as could be wished, this animadversion upon Masséna's conduct has been made strictly with regard to rules of art.

The Limmat issues from the Lake of Zurich at Zurich itself, and divides the town into two parts; in conformity with the plan concerted with Hotze and Suwarrow, Korsakow made his arrangements for attacking Masséna, and for this purpose he had transferred the mass of his forces to that part of Zurich which is in advance of the Limmat. He had left no more than three battalions at Kloster-Fahr, to guard a point where the Limmat is more accessible: he had sent off Durasof with a division in the direction of the point where the Limmat flows into the Aar, to watch that quarter, but his main body, at least eighteen thousand strong, was in advance of the river, in a commanding situation.

It was upon this state of things that Masséna founded his plan. He resolved to mask rather than attack the point of Zurich, where Korsakow had collected the mass of his forces; next, with a considerable portion of his troops, to attempt the passage of the Limmat at Kloster-Fahr, a point but weakly defended. The passage effected, he purposed that this division should go up along the Limmat on the opposite bank, so as to station itself on the rear of Zurich. He then intended to attack Korsakow on both banks, and to keep him shut up in Zurich itself. The most important consequences might be the result of these arrangements.

Mortier, with his division, which was eight thousand strong, and occupied the right of this field of battle, was sent off to Zurich. The object was first to keep off and next to attack the Russian mass. Klein, with his division, consisting of ten thousand men, was to be placed at Altstetten, between the point of Zurich and that of Kloster-Fahr, where the passage was to be attempted. This division would be thus able either to proceed before Zurich and assist Mortier against the Russian mass, or hasten to the point of crossing, assuming that support was required. This division comprised four thousand grenadiers and a reserve of superb cavalry. The division under Lorge, with part of the division under Mesnard, were to effect the passage at Kloster-Fahr. This mass comprehended nearly fifteen thousand men. The remainder of Mesnard's division had to make hostile demonstrations on the Lower Limmat, to deceive and detain Durasof.

These arrangements, which have been universally admired by military critics, were carried into execution at five in the morning of the 3rd Vendémiaire year VIII. (September 25, 1799.) The preparations for the passage had been made near the village of Dietikon, with extraordinary caution and secrecy. Boats had been dragged to the spot by hand, and concealed in the woods. Very early in the morning they were afloat, and the troops drawn up in silence on the bank. General Foy, since distinguished as a public speaker, commanded the artillery in this ever memorable battle; he arranged several batteries in such a manner as to protect the passage. Six hundred men boldly embarked, and reached the opposite bank. They rushed immediately upon the enemy's riflemen and dispersed them. Korsakow had posted three battalions, with cannon, on the elevated plain (plateau) of Kloster-Fahr. Our artillery, more skilfully directed, soon silenced the fire of the Russian artillery, and protected the successive passage of our advanced guard. When general Gazan had united a sufficient reinforcement with the six hundred men who had first crossed, he marched upon the three Russian battalions guarding Kloster-Fahr. These had posted themselves in a wood, and made a most gallant defence. Gazan surrounded them, and was obliged to kill them almost to the last man before he could dislodge them. These three battalions being destroyed, a bridge was thrown across. The remainder of Lorge's division and part of Mesnard's passed the Limmat. Fifteen thousand men were now beyond the river. Bontemp's brigade was placed at Regensdorf, to confront against Durasof, if he should attempt to ascend the Lower Limmat. The bulk of the troops, directed by Oudinot, chief of the staff, marched up the Limmat, for the purpose of proceeding to the rear of Zurich.

This part of the operation being accomplished, Masséna returned to the other side of the Limmat, to superintend the movement of his wings. Towards the Lower Limmat, Mesnard had so completely deceived Durasof by his demonstrations, that the latter had posted himself upon the bank and opened all his fire on the right. Mortier had advanced upon Zurich by Wollhofen, but he had fallen in with Korsakow's main body, posted, as we have seen, in the advance of the Limmat, and had been obliged to fall back. Masséna coming up at that moment, despatched Klein's division, which was at Altstetten. Humbert, at the head of his four thousand grenadiers, marched to Zurich and restored the fight. Mortier renewed his attacks, and thus the French succeeded in enclosing the Russians in Zurich.

Meanwhile, Korsakow, mortified at hearing cannon in his rear, transferred several battalions to the other side of the Limmat; but this inefficient relief had proved useless. Oudinot, with his fifteen thousand men, continued to ascend the Limmat. He had taken the little camp placed at Hong; he had also taken the heights which are in the rear of Zurich, and possessed himself of the high road to Winterthur, which affords an outlet into Germany, and was the only one by which the Russians could retreat.

The battle was almost over, and most important results were to be the consequence of the next day's proceedings. The Russians were pent up in Zurich; Masséna had moved fifteen thousand men upon their rear by means of the passage of Kloster-Fahr, and placed eighteen thousand in their front. He could scarcely fail of making them experience a reverse. It had been conceived that, instead of leaving Klein's division before Zurich, he should have sent it by Kloster-Fahr, to the rear of that town, to intercept completely the road to Winterthur. But he was apprehensive lest if Mortier were left with eight thousand men only, Korsakow might rush upon his division and drive him into the Linth. Korsakow, it is true, would have fallen in with Soult and Lecourbe; but he might also have met with Suwarrow coming from Italy, and no one knows what might have resulted from this singular combination.

Korsakow had at last become fully sensible of his position, and had moved his troops into the other part of Zurich behind the Limmat. Durasof, on the Lower Limmat, on hearing of the passage, had stolen away; and avoiding Bontemp's brigade by a circuit, had regained the road to Winterthur. Next day, the 4th Vendémiaire (September 26), the battle would certainly be most obstinately contested, since the Russians were determined to cut their way through, and the French also were desirous of rearing fresh trophies. The battle commenced at an early hour. The unhappy town of Zurich, encumbered with artillery, carriages, and wounded, attacked on all sides, was enveloped, as it were, in fire. On this side of the Limmat, it was attacked and ready to be stormed by Mortier and Klein. On the other, Oudinot pressed it in the rear, and purposed to cut off Korsakow's retreat. This road to Winterthur, the scene of a sanguinary conflict, had been several times taken and retaken. Korsakow, preparing at length to retreat, had placed his infantry in the van, his cavalry in the centre, his artillery and his carriages in the rear. In this manner he advanced, forming a long column. His brave infantry, charging with fury, overthrew all before it, and opened a way for itself; but when it had passed, with part of the cavalry the French returned to the charge, attacked the rest of the cavalry and the baggage, and drove them back to the gates of Zurich. At the same moment, Klein and Mortier entered the town on their side. The distinguished and unfortunate Lavater was struck by a ball at the door of his house, by a drunken Swiss soldier who presented his musket at him to extort money; he fell severely wounded in the thigh, which caused his death some months after.

All who remained in Zurich were obliged to lay down their arms. One hundred pieces of cannon, all the baggage, the public papers, the chest of the army, and five thousand prisoners, fell into the hands of the French. Korsakow had, moreover, eight thousand men put out of fighting order in this obstinate engagement. Eight and five made a loss of thirteen thousand men, that is to say, of half his army. The great battles in Italy had not presented more extraordinary results. The consequences for the rest of the campaign were not likely to be less important than the material results. Korsakow, with thirteen thousand men at most, hastened to regain the Rhine.

In the mean time, Soult, who was sent to cross the Linth above the Lake of Zurich, executed his commission with no less success than the commander-in-chief. He had effected the passage between Bülten and Reichenburg. One hundred and fifty brave fellows, holding their muskets over their heads, swam across the river, reached the opposite bank, cleared it of the riflemen, and protected the landing of the advanced guard. Hotze, who had hastened immediately to the point of danger, was killed on the spot by a ball, and his death had thrown the Austrian ranks into confusion. Petrasch, who succeeded Hotze, endeavoured but in vain to throw the corps that had passed into the Linth; he was obliged to fall back, and made a precipitate retreat to Saint-Gall and the Rhine, leaving three thousand prisoners and some cannon. Generals Jellachich and Linken, despatched by the Upper Linth to the canton of Glaris, to meet Suwarrow at the outlet of the Saint-Gothard, had on their part retired, when they received intelligence of all these disasters. Thus nearly sixty thousand men were already driven from the line of the Limmat beyond that of the Rhine, after suffering severe losses. Suwarrow, who expected to debouch in Switzerland on the flank of an enemy, attacked on all sides, and to decide the defeat of that enemy by his arrival, was doomed to find, on the contrary, all his lieutenants dispersed, and himself in the midst of an army victorious in every quarter.

Leaving Italy with eighteen thousand men, Soult had reached the foot of the Saint-Gothard on the fifth complementary day of the year VII. (September 21, 1799.) He had been obliged to dismount his cossacks, and to load their horses with his artillery. He sent Rosenberg with six thousand men to get at the back of the Saint-Gothard by Disentis and the Crispalt. Arriving on the 1st Vendémiaire (September 23) at Airolo, at the entrance of the narrow pass of the Saint-Gothard, he there found Gudin with one of the brigade of Lecourbe's divisions. He fought with the most determined obstinacy; but his soldiers, bad marksmen, having no notion of anything but advancing and fighting till they were killed, fell in whole platoons under the fire and stones.

He determined at length to annoy Gudin on his flank, and thus obliged him to yield the pass as far as the hospital. Gudin had, by his resistance, given Lecourbe time to collect his troops. The latter having only six thousand men at hand, was unable to resist Suwarrow, who was coming up with twelve thousand, and Rosenberg who, having already reached Urseren, had six thousand on his rear. He threw his artillery into the Reuss, then gained the opposite shore by climbing almost inaccessible rocks, and penetrated into the valley. Having got beyond Urseren, and having Rosenberg no longer on his rear, he broke down the Devil's bridge, and killed a great number of the Russians before they had cleared the precipice by descending into the bed of the Reuss and ascending the opposite bank. Lecourbe had thus retreated foot by foot, availing himself of all obstacles to harass Suwarrow's soldiers, and to cut them off one by one.

Thus the Russian army arrived at Altorf, at the extremity of the valley of the Reuss, exhausted with fatigue, in want of provisions, and extremely weakened by the losses which it had sustained. At Altorf, the Reuss falls into the Lake of Lucerne. If Hotze, according to the plan agreed upon, had been able to push forward Jellachich and Linken beyond the Linth as far as Schwytz, he would have sent boats to the mouth of the Reuss to receive Suwarrow. But, after the events which had just occurred, Suwarrow found himself without a single boat, and pent up in a frightful valley. It was the 4th Vendémiaire (September 26), a day generally disastrous all along the whole line. He had, therefore, no other resource than to throw himself into the Schachenthal, and to cross tremendous mountains where there was no beaten track, for the purpose of penetrating into the valley of the Muthenthal. He set out on the following day. Only one man could pass at once along the path that he had to pursue. The army took two days to travel the distance of a few leagues. The first man had reached Muten before the last had yet quitted Altorf. The precipices were covered with carriages, horses, soldiers dying from either famine or fatigue. On reaching the Muthenthal, Suwarrow might debouch by Schwytz, not far from the Lake of Zurich, or yet ascend the valley, and throw himself by the Bragel upon the Linth. But, on the side next to Schwytz, Masséna was coming with Mortier's division, and on the other side of the Bragel was Molitor, who occupied the defile of the Kloenthal, towards the banks of the Linth. After allowing his troops two days' rest, Suwarrow resolved to fall back by the Bragel. On the 8th Vendémiaire (September 30) he commenced his march; Masséna attacked him in rear, while Molitor met him from the other side of the Bragel at the defile of Koenthal. Rosenberg bravely withstood all Masséna's attacks, but Bagration, in the van, made vain efforts to force his way through Molitor. He opened the Glaris road for himself, but could not clear that of Wesen. Suwarrow, after engaging in sanguinary and destructive conflicts, cut off from all the roads, and driven back upon Glaris, had no other resource than to ascend the valley of Engi, and to throw himself into that of the Rhine. But this route was still more frightful than that which he had already traversed. He nevertheless made up his mind to take it, and, after four days of unparalleled efforts and hardships, reached Coire and the Rhine. Out of his eighteen thousand men, he had saved scarcely ten thousand. The Alps were strewn with the bodies of his soldiers. This barbarian, styled invincible, retired overwhelmed with confusion and swelling with rage. In the course of a fortnight, more than twenty thousand Russians and five or six thousand Austrians had fallen. The armies ready to invade us were expelled from Switzerland, and driven into Germany. The alliance was dissolved; for Suwarrow, exasperated against the Austrians, would not serve them any longer. We may say, France was saved.

Perpetual honour to Masséna, who managed to execute one of the most admirable operations whereof the history of the war has made mention, and who had saved us at a more perilous crisis of affairs than even that of Valmi and Fleurus! Battles are entitled to our admiration when they exhibit vastness in either their conception or political result; but those that save a nation are more particularly to be regarded with honour. We owe admiration to the former, gratitude to the latter. Zurich is the brightest gem in Masséna's crown of glory, and there is not a military crown that can exhibit one more brilliant.

While these auspicious events were taking place in Switzerland, victory once more returned to us in Holland. Brune, faintly pressed by the enemy, had found time to concentrate his forces, and after beating the Anglo-Russians at Kastrikum, had pent them up at Zyp, and reduced them to capitulate. The conditions were the evacuation of Holland, the restitution of all that they had taken at the Helder, and the unconditional enlargement of eight thousand prisoners. The restitution of the Dutch fleet would have been very desirable; but this was refused by the English, and fears were entertained of the mischief which they might do to the country if the capitulation were rejected.

Thus terminated this memorable campaign of 1799. The republic, having hurried too soon into action, and committing the error of taking the offensive before she had concentrated her forces, had been beaten at Stockach and at Magnano, and lost by these two defeats Germany and Italy. Masséna, left alone in Switzerland, formed a dangerous salient angle between two victorious masses. He had fallen back upon the Rhine, then upon the Limmat, and lastly upon the Albis. There he had made himself impregnable for four months. In this interval, the army of Upper Italy had been beaten at the Trebbia. A junction being afterwards effected with that army in the rear of the Apennines, then rallied and reinforced, it had lost its general at Novi, had been again defeated, and had conclusively lost Italy. The Apen-nines were even invaded by the enemy, and the Var threatened. But this was the terminating point of our disasters. The alliance, shifting its forces, had transferred the archduke Charles to the Rhine, and Suwarrow to Switzerland. Masséna, seizing this moment, had destroyed Korsakow, thus deprived of the assistance of the archduke, and put to flight Suwarrow, who could no longer be supported by Korsakow. Masséna had thus compensated for our misfortunes by a splendid victory. In the East, brilliant triumphs had concluded the campaign. But it must be confessed, that if those great exploits had upheld the republic when ready to fall, if they had shed over her some additional lustre, they had by no means imputed to her either her greatness or her power. France was saved, but no more than saved; she had not yet recovered her rank, and her situation was even perilous on the Var.

CHAPTER XIX.

BONAPARTE'S RETURN; HIS LANDING AT FRÉJUS; THE ENTHUSIASM INSPIRED BY HIS PRESENCE.—THE AGITATION THAT PREVAILED AMONG THE PARTIES ON HIS ARRIVAL.—HE FORMS A COALITION WITH SEYÈS TO EFFECT THE DESTRUCTION OF THE DIRECTORIAL CONSTITUTION.—EVENTS IMMEDIATELY PRECEDING THE OCCURRENCES OF THE KVILICH BRUMAIRE—ABOLITION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE YEAR III.; INSTITUTION OF A PROVISIONAL CONSULATE.—THE CONCLUSION OF THE PRESENT HISTORY.

THE intelligence of the battle of Zurich, and of the capitulation of the Anglo-Russians, followed each other in rapid succession, and calmed the perturbed excitement of the public mind. It was the first time that those detestable Russians had been beaten, and so completely beaten were they, that the utmost satisfaction could not but prevail. But yet Italy was for ever lost, the Var threatened, the southern frontier in danger. We had not yet been restored to the grandeur of Campo-Formio. At all events, the greatest perils were not now to be apprehended from without, but from within. A disorganized government, and factious parties, who would not submit to authority, and who, nevertheless, were not strong enough to obtain the upper hand; and every where a kind of social dissolution, and robbery, a sign of that dissolution, infesting the high roads, especially in the provinces formerly rent by civil war,—such was the state of the republic. A respite of a few months being ensured by the victory of Zurich, it was not so much a defender that was needed at this moment as a chief who should seize the reins of government. The entire mass of the population desired, above every other consideration, tranquillity, good government, an end of mutual bickerings, and an unity of purpose. The people as a mass dreaded the Jacobins, the emigrants, the Chouans, and all popular parties. This was the witching time for him who should be able to allay all these apprehensions.

The despatches containing the details of the expedition to Syria, and the battles of Mount Tabor and Aboukir, produced an extraordinary effect, and confirmed this idea, that the hero of Castiglione and Rivoli would remain conqueror wherever he made his appearance. His name was again in every body's mouth, and the questions, What is he doing? when will he come? were every where repeated. What if he should return! it was said. By a singular and involuntary movement, a report that he had actually arrived twice or thrice got wind. His brothers had written to him, and so had his wife; but it was not known whether these despatches had ever come to his hand. In point of fact, as we have seen, there was no getting them past the English cruisers.

In the mean time, that man who was the object of such extraordinary anxiety, was quietly ploughing the sea in the midst of the English squadrons. The passage was not prosperous, and was prolonged by contrary winds. More than once the English had been seen, and great fear was entertained lest he should become their prey. He alone, pacing the deck of his ship with calm and serene look, confided in his star, taught himself to confide therein, and not vainly alarm himself as to danger that could not be avoided. He read the Bible and the Koran, works of the nations which he had just quitted. Fearing lest, after the recent events, the south of France should be invaded, he had steered, not for the coast of Provence, but for that of Languedoc. He was for landing at Collioure or Port Vendre. A gale had driven him to Corsica. The whole island hurried to welcome their renowned fellow-countryman. He then sailed for Toulon. He had nearly arrived thither, when all at once, about sunset, thirty sail of the enemy were seen to larboard; they were plainly perceptible amidst the rays of the setting sun. It was proposed to put a boat out to sea, and to stealthily come to land: Still, ever confiding in his destiny, Bonaparte said that he would wait awhile. In fact, the enemy disappeared; and on the 17th (Vendémiaire, year VIII.)

1799. Oct.

Bonaparte's apparently cordial reception by the directory.

THE DIRECTORY.

The popular parties in a great ferment on Bonaparte's arrival.

857

Vendémiaire, year VIII. (October, 1799), at day-break, the frigates Le Muiron, La Carrère, and the xebecs La Revanche and La Fortune, came to an anchor in the Gulf of Fréjus.

The inhabitants of Provence had, for three successive years, been in constant dread of an invasion by the enemy. Bonaparte had freed them from this apprehension in 1796, but it had recurred more powerfully than ever since the battle of Novi. On learning that Bonaparte had anchored off the coast, they imagined that their deliverer had arrived. All the inhabitants of Fréjus hurried out, and in a moment the sea was covered with boats. A multitude, highly excited by enthusiasm and curiosity, stormed the vessels, and breaking through all the sanitary regulations, communicated with the new comers. All enquired for Bonaparte, all wanted to see him. This was no time for enforcing sanitary regulations. The board of health was obliged to dispense with the general's performing quarantine, for in that case it must have condemned the whole population, which had already communicated with the crews, to the same restraint. Bonaparte immediately went ashore, and resolved to set out the same day for Paris.

The telegraph, speedy as the wind itself, had already spread along the road from Fréjus to Paris the grand news that Bonaparte had arrived. This intelligence had caused a great and confused outburst of joy. The news, proclaimed in all the theatres, had produced an extraordinary impression there. The singing of patriotic hymns had in every instance been substituted for the theatrical representations. The deputy Baudin, (of the Ardennes,) one of the framers of the constitution of the year III., a discreet and staunch republican, passionately attached to the republic, and looking on it as utterly lost if some powerful arm were not stretched forth to save it—Baudin (of the Ardennes) died of joy on receiving intelligence of this event.

Bonaparte had set out that same day, the 17th Vendémiaire (October 9), for Paris. He had passed through Aix, Avignon, Valence, and Lyons. In all these cities the enthusiasm was unbounded. There was ringing of bells in the villages, and at night bonfires on the roads. At Lyons, in particular, the impression produced was more vivid than any where else. On leaving the latter city, Bonaparte, who wished to arrive incognito, took a different route from that which he had mentioned to his couriers. His brothers and his wife, misled by his directions, were travelling to meet him while he was entering Paris. On the 24th Vendémiaire (October 16), he was already in his own house, in the Rue Chanteraine, before any one had the least notion of his arrival. Two hours afterwards he repaired to the directory. The guard recognized him, and shouted, on seeing him, Bonaparte for ever. He hastened to the president of the directory, who was Gohier. It was settled that he should be presented to the directory on the following day. In fact, he was the next day, the 25th, ushered into the presence of the supreme magistracy. He said that, after confirming the establishment of his armies in Egypt by the victories of Mount Tabor and Aboukir, and confiding it to the care of a general well able to ensure its prosperity, he had set out to fly to the succour of the republic, which he believed to be undone. He had found it saved by the exploits of his brethren in arms, and at this he rejoiced. Never, he added, putting his hand to his sword, never would he draw it but in defence of that republic. The president congratulated him on his triumphs and on his return, and gave him the paternal embrace. The reception was apparently most cordial, but at bottom apprehensions of a serious nature began to arise, and were too strongly justified by circumstances to render his return a matter of congratulation to the five republican magistrates.

Now when men are roused at last from a long insensibility, and attach themselves to any particular object, it is with strong feeling. In that void into which opinions, parties, and all the authorities had fallen, every body had for some time been without having their attention absorbed in any one particular object. An universal disgust was felt for men and things as they then stood. But, on the appearance of that extraordinary individual whom the East had restored to Europe in so unexpected a manner, all feelings of disgust, all uncertainty was at an end. It was on him alone that all eyes, all aspirations, and all hopes, were instantly fixed.

All the generals, employed or not employed, patriots or moderates, all flocked round Bonaparte. This was nothing else than natural, since he was the first member of that most ambitious and most discontented class. In him that class seemed to have found an avenger against the government. All the ministers, all the functionaries who had been dismissed one after the other during the fluctuations of the directory, flocked also round the new comer. In appearance they went to visit the illustrious warrior, but in reality to observe and to flatter that man who seemed to have a control over the future.

Bonaparte had brought with him Lannes, Murat, and Berthier, who never left him. It was not long before Jourdan, Augereau, Macdonald, Bessières, Leclerc, Lefebvre, and Marmont, notwithstanding differences of opinion, showed themselves on his side. Moreau himself soon formed part of this assembly. Bonaparte had met him at Gohier's. Sensible that his superiority permitted him to make the first advances, he went up to Moreau, expressed his anxiety to make his acquaintance, and testified a personal respect for him, which deeply affected him. He afterwards presented him with a Damascus sword, enriched with precious stones, and contrived to gain him over entirely to his side. In a few days, Moreau was an attendant at his levee. He also was discontented, and went with all his comrades to visit the reputed avenger. To these illustrious warriors were added men embarked in every career of life. Among these were to be observed Bruix, ex-minister of the navy, who had just been scouring the Mediterranean, at the head of the French and Spanish fleets, a man of acute and subtle mind, quite as capable of conducting a negotiation as of commanding a squadron. There also might be observed M. de Talleyrand, who had reason to fear the displeasure of Bonaparte for not having gone with him to Egypt. But M. de Talleyrand relied upon his talents, his reputation, and his importance, as ensuring him a favourable reception; and he was not disappointed. The tastes of these two men were too closely allied, and they had too much need of each other's friendship to be otherwise than on good terms with one another. There was also to be seen in the Rue Chantierine, Rœderer, formerly procureur of the commune, a man full of frankness and intelligence, as well as Regnault de Saint-Jean d'Angely, an old constituent, to whom Bonaparte had attached himself in Italy, and whom he had employed at Malta, a brilliant and a fertile orator.

But it was not merely these who were in disgrace and the discontented who repaired to Bonaparte's. The present heads of the government also made their appearance there with the same anxiety to pay him attention. All the directors and all the ministers gave him entertainments, as on his return from Italy. A great number of the members of the two councils procured themselves to be introduced to him. The ministers and the directors paid him far more flattering homage. They came every moment to consult him as to what they had to do. Dubois Crancé, the minister at war, had in some measure transferred his portfolio to Bonaparte. Moulins, that director who particularly occupied himself with the department of war, generally spent part of his morning with him. Gohier and Roger-Ducos went thither also. Cambacérès, minister of justice, an able lawyer, who possessed that inclination for Bonaparte that weak men have towards men of strong minds, and whom Bonaparte affected to caress, to prove that he could appreciate merit in a civilian. Fouché, minister of the police, who wanted to exchange his declining patron Barras for a new and powerful protector; Réal, commissary for the department of the Seine, a warm and generous patriot, and one of the most intelligent men of his time, paid all of them equal court to Bonaparte, and conversed with him on affairs of state. The general had scarcely been eight days in Paris, before the superintendence of affairs was almost involuntarily referred to him. Instead of the expression of his will, which as yet was nothing, he was asked for his opinion. On his part, he affected, with his usual reserve, to withdraw himself from the attentions so assiduously rendered him. He was not accessible to many persons, and he showed himself but little, and went abroad only, as it were, by stealth. His face had become thinner, and his complexion darker. He wore since his return a gray frock coat, and a Turkish sabre, fastened by a silken cord. To those who had been fortunate enough to obtain a sight of it, this was an emblem that called up the associations of the east, the Pyramids, Mount-Tabor, and Aboukir. The officers of the garrison, the forty adjutants of the national guard, and the staff of the place, desired to be presented to him. He delayed from day to day, and seemed to subject himself with reluctance to all this exterior respect. He listened, kept his opinion to himself, and observed every thing closely. This was deep policy. When a man becomes needful, he need not be afraid of having to wait. This excites the impatience of people; they flock about you; and you have nothing to do than to make your own election.

What course will Bonaparte take? was the common question of the day. It proved that there was something to be done that could not be avoided. Two principal parties, and a third, a subdivision of the two others, offered themselves to him, and were disposed to serve him if he adopted their views; these were the patriots, the moderates or politicians, and lastly, the rotten ones (pourris), as they were called—the corrupt of every time and every faction.

The patriots certainly mistrusted Bonaparte and his ambition; but with their habitude of distrust, and their heedlessness for the morrow, they would rather have availed themselves of his arm to overturn every thing, without giving themselves much concern for the future. At any rate, these were only the notions of none other than those furious madmen, who, always dissatisfied with things as they are, consider destructiveness as the most important of all affairs. The rest of the patriots, those who might be called the republicans, took umbrage at the renown of the general, wished at most that a place should be given him in the directory, and even saw with pain that for this purpose a dispensation on account of age would have to be granted him, and in particular were above all things desirous that he should go to the frontiers to restore the glory of our arms, and to reinstate the republic in its former splendour.

The moderatists or politicians, persons who were in fear from the fury of the parties, and especially of the Jacobins, having nothing to hope from a violated and worn-out constitution, wanted a change, and wished that it should be effected under the auspices of some mighty man. "Accept absolute authority, ordain us a wise and mild constitution, and let us have security"—such was the language which they addressed to Bonaparte in private. These persons composed the most numerous party in France. It included even a great number of compromised patriots, who, having their fears for the revolution, were anxious that the commonwealth should be confided to some powerful individual. They possessed the majority in the council of ancients, but were considerably in the minority in the five hundred. They had up to this point attached themselves to the highest civil renown, that of Sieyès, and they more particularly adhered to him ever since he had been abused at the Rude. But at this time they must needs run after Bonaparte with far greater solicitude, for it was power (force) that they were looking for; and absolute power existed more essentially in a victorious general than it ever could in a political writer, how illustrious soever he might be.

Lastly, the corruptionists (pourris) comprehended the whole crew of those dishonest intriguers who were striving to make their fortune, who had sullied their character in effecting this purpose, and who still continued in the same dirty practices for the same object. These were in the train of Barras and the minister of police, Fouché. There were to be found among them Jacobins, moderatists, and even royalists. They could hardly be said to form a party, but rather a numerous set.

We must not add to this catalogue of parties the advocates of royalty. They were too insignificant since the 18th Fructidor, and besides, they had nothing to expect or hope from Bonaparte. Such a man could only look to himself, and could not accept the supreme power, merely to transfer it to others. They therefore contented themselves with adding themselves to the opponents of the directory, and to vilify it in much the same language adopted by all the popular parties.

Among these different parties, Bonaparte had only one choice to make. The patriots did not suit him at all. Some, well content with the present state of things, distrusted his ambition; others were wishing for some sudden and great act, and then what never-ending agitation there would be; and nothing could be relied upon with regard to the patriots. Besides, they were not in accordance with the spirit of the time, and were fast expiring. The corruptionists (pourris) were nought, they were nothing, save in the government, into which they had naturally insinuated themselves, for it is thither their aspirations are always directed. At any rate, he had nothing to do with them, but rather to let them alone; they would certainly go over to him who should get most chances in his favour, because they wanted to retain possession of both places and money. The only party on which Bonaparte could support himself was that which, identifying itself with the requisitions of the entire population, was desirous of protecting the republic from the factions, by imparting to it a solid constitution. In this consisted all hope for the future, and it was on this side that he ought to declare himself.

His selection could not be long protracted. He had involuntarily settled it in his own mind beforehand. Bonaparte had a horror of turbulent, and was disgusted with corrupt men. He never could bring himself to regard other than those well-constituted persons who wished some one to govern for them; in other words, the nation itself. But he had yet to wait, to permit himself to be first addressed by the popular parties, and to keep an eye upon their leaders, in order to discover with whom it would be most prudent to form an alliance.

The popular parties were all of them represented in the directory. The patriots had for their representatives, as we have already observed, Moulins and Gohier. The corruptionists (pourris) had Barras. The politicians or moderatists had Sieyès and Roger-Ducos.

Gohier and Moulins, staunch and well-intentioned patriots, more moderate than their party, because they were in power, admired Bonaparte; but having no desire to avail themselves of his military services, save to maintain the glory of the constitution of the year III., they were desirous of sending him to the armies. Bonaparte treated them with great respect; he esteemed their honesty, for he always regarded that virtue in others (a natural self-interested inclination in a man born to govern). Besides, the respect he entertained for such persons afforded him the opportunity of demonstrating his esteem for genuine republicans. His wife was intimate with the wife of Gohier. She truly appreciated also her husband's situation, and had observed to Madame Gohier, "My intimacy with you will be a reply to all idle assertions."

Barras, who felt his political end approaching, and who beheld in Bonaparte a man who would certainly take his place, thoroughly detested him. He would have submitted to flatter him as formerly, but he felt that he was more than ever despised by him, and he kept aloof from him. Bonaparte entertained for this ignorant, inflated, corrupt epicurean, an aversion that daily became insurmountable. The name of 'pourris' (rotten, thoroughly corrupt), which he had given to him and those about him, sufficiently proved his disgust and contempt. He could hardly have ever consented to ally himself with him.

There yet remained that really important person, namely, Sieyès, drawing in his train Roger-Ducos. In calling Sieyès to the directory at the crisis of the 30th Prairial, it would seem as if it had been intended that every thing should be surrendered to him. Bonaparte owed him somewhat of a grudge for having taken the first place in his absence, for having made himself the object of general attention for a moment, and for having raised hopes. He felt a prejudice against him which he never explained. Although they were both very much opposed to each other in talents and inclinations, they nevertheless possessed sufficient elevation of mind to understand one another, and make mutual allowances for each other, but they both possessed too much pride to make mutual concessions. Unfortunately, they had not yet spoken to each other; and two great minds which have not paid each other mutual compliments, instinctively become hostile. They closely observed one another, and each expected that the other would make the first advances. They met at dinner at Gohier's. Bonaparte had felt himself sufficiently Moreau's superior to make the first advances; he thought that he could not do so towards Sieyès, and did not speak to him. The latter exhibited the same reserve. They retired in a rage. "Did you notice that little insolent fellow?" said Sieyès, "he never even saluted the member of a government that ought to have had him shot." "What could have possessed folks," said Bonaparte, "to put that priest into the directory? He is sold to Prussia, and unless you look sharp, he will betray you to her." Thus, in men of the highest qualifications, pride gets the better even of policy. If at any rate it were otherwise, they would no longer possess that elevation which renders them fit to bear rule.

Thus the personage whom it particularly concerned Bonaparte to gain, was the very man for whom he felt the greatest aversion. But their interests were so identical, that they were soon, in spite of themselves, about to be propelled towards one another by their own partisans.

While they were thus measuring each other, and the number of attendants at Bonaparte's levee were constantly multiplying, the latter still uncertain what course he ought to take, had sounded Gohier and Ducos, to ascertain whether they would consent to his being director, notwithstanding he had not attained the requisite age. His object was to make way for himself in the directory by displacing Sieyès. By excluding Sieyès, he should become master of his other colleagues, and be assured of governing in their name. This certainly was far from perfectly succeeding in his object; but it was a means of arriving at supreme power without exactly effecting a revolution; and once having attained supreme power, he should have time to survey his position. Whether he was sincere, or whether he meant to deceive them, as is very possible, and to persuade them that his ambition was limited to a place in the directory, he sounded them, and found them most peremptory in their objections in reference to age. A dispensation, though given by the councils, appeared to them an infraction of the constitution. He was, therefore, obliged to abandon this idea.

The two directors, Gohier and Moulins, beginning to feel uneasy on account of the strong inclination Bonaparte manifested for political offices, and were thinking how they could get rid of him by giving him the command of an army. Sieyès by no means concurred in this, and said, with his usual moroseness, that so far from affording him occasion to acquire fresh glory, they ought, on the contrary, to forget him, and to cause him to be forgotten. There was some talk of sending him to Italy, when Barras said that he had managed matters so well for himself that he was by no means anxious to return thither. At length it was settled that they should send for him, and invite him to take a command, leaving it to himself to make his election what army he would take.

Bonaparte, being summoned, repaired to the directory. He understood well enough what had been insinuated by Barras. Before the cause of his summons thither had been notified to him, he opened the conversation in a high and threatening tone, alluded to the insinuation of which he had to complain, and looking Barras full in the face said, that if he had made his fortune in Italy, at least it had not been made at the expence of the republic. Barras made no reply. Gohier, the president, replied to Bonaparte, that the government was persuaded that his laurels were the only fortune he had made in Italy. He then told him that the directory invited him to take a command, leaving it to himself to choose the army he would prefer to command. Bonaparte answered coldly, that he had not yet rested sufficiently from his fatigues; that the transition from a dry to a moist climate had severely tried his constitution, and that he needed a little more time to regain his health. He retired without further explaining himself. Such an act as this necessarily apprized the directors of his views, and at the same time gave him intelligence of their distrust.

This was quite enough to induce him to lose no time: his brothers, his intimate advisers, Roederer, Réal, Regnault de Saint-Jean d'Angély, Bruix, and Talleyrand, brought to him every day members of the moderate and political party in the councils. These were, in the five hundred, Boulay (of La Meurthe), Gaudin, Chazal, Cabanis, Chénier; in the ancients, Cornudet, Lemercier, Fargues, and Daunou. All were of opinion that he should ally himself with the true party, the reforming party, and coalesce with Sieyès, who had a constitution ready made, and the majority in the council of the ancients. Bonaparte was of just the same opinion, and felt sensible that he had no power of selection; but he must first be reconciled with Sieyès, and this was a difficult matter. However, the interests in question were so great, and so delicate and so expert were the negotiators between his pride and that of Sieyès, that the coalition could not fail of being effected. M. de Talleyrand would have conciliated far more offensive pride than existed in either of these two men. The negotiation was soon opened and concluded. It was agreed that a more powerful constitution should be given to France under the auspices of Sieyès and Bonaparte. Without going fully into the form and nature of that constitution, it was impliedly agreed that it should be republican, but that it should deliver France from what both of them termed the "speechifiers" (bavards), and allot to those two master minds, now in close alliance, the greatest preponderance in public in the conduct of affairs.

A systematizer dreaming of the long-deferred accomplishment of his conceptions, an ambitious man seeking to rule the world, were, in the centre of that nothingness of all system and all power, eminently calculated to coalesce. Their mutual antipathy of temper was of little consequence. The adroitness of the negotiators, and the importance of the interests, sufficed to palliate that inconvenience, at least for a moment; and one moment was quite enough for effecting a revolution.

Bonaparte was, therefore, determined to act with Sieyès and Roger-Ducos. He still testified the same aversion for Barras, the same respect for Gohier and Moulins, and preserved the same reserve with all three. But Fouché, who well knew how to worship the rising sun, perceived with the utmost regret the aversion Bonaparte entertained for his patron Barras, and was vexed when he observed that Barras did nothing towards counteracting that aversion. He had entirely made up his mind to go over to the camp of the new Caesar; but hesitating from a slight remnant of shame to desert his protector, he would rather have drawn him along with him. Paying constant attention to Bonaparte, and not unfavourably received because he held the portfolio of the police, Fouché did his utmost to overcome Bonaparte's repugnance for Barras. He was seconded by Réal, Bruix, and the other advisers of the general. Conceiving that he had succeeded, he got Barras to invite Bonaparte to dinner. Barras sent him an invitation for the 8th Brumaire (October 30th), which Bonaparte accepted. After dinner, a general conversation took place as to politics. Bonaparte and Barras waited till one of them opened the conversation. Barras first entered upon the subject. He began with making some general remarks upon his personal situation. Hoping no doubt that Bonaparte would contradict him, he told him that he was ill, worn out, and compelled to resign all participation in business. Bonaparte still being silent, Barras added, the republic was disorganized, that it was necessary to ensure its salvation, to centralize the supreme power, and to appoint a president; and he then named general Hédouville as a fit person to be chosen. Hédouville was as unknown as he was unfit. Barras wished to conceal his thoughts, and named Hédouville, in order to avoid making mention of himself: "As for you, general," added he, "your intention is to proceed to the army; go, and there acquire further glory, and reinstate France in her proper rank. As for me, I am going to seek that retreat of which I have now so much need." Bonaparte looked hard at Barras, made no reply, and there the conversation dropped. Barras, dumbfounded, added not another word. Bonaparte immediately retired, and before he left the Luxembourg, went to the apartments of Sieyès. He went on purpose to declare to him most explicitly that his desire was to act with him alone, and that they had only to settle the means of execution. The alliance was sealed at that interview, and they agreed to prepare every thing for the 18th or the 20th Brumaire.

On his return home, Bonaparte found there Fouché, Réal, and the friends of Barras; "Well," said he to them, "what do you think your friend Barras has proposed to me? why, to appoint a president, who was to be Hédouville, meaning himself all the time; and as for me, I was to pack off to the army. There is nothing to be done with such a man." The friends of Barras were anxious to cure the effects of this awkwardness, and did all they could to excuse him. But Bonaparte did not urge the matter, and diverted the conversation, for he had made up his mind. Fouché immediately called on Barras to call him to account, and to prevail on him to go and counteract the effect of his absurd conduct. The first thing next morning Barras hied away to Bonaparte, to excuse himself for the language of over-night, and tendered his devotions and his co-operation in all that the general might think fit to attempt. Bonaparte did not believe him, replied in general terms, and talked, in his turn, of his fatigues, of his impaired health, and of his being disgusted with men and public business.

Barras saw that he was lost, and felt that he had no further part to play. It was indeed time that he should reap the reward of his double intrigues, and his base turncoat acts. The ardent patriots would have no more to do with him since his conduct towards the club at the Rêve; the republicans attached to the constitution of the year III. possessed no other feeling towards him than contempt and distrust. The reformers and the politicians looked upon him in no other light than as a man who had forfeited everybody's esteem, and applied to him the term rotten or thoroughly corrupt (pourri), an expression which originated with Bonaparte. All the resources that Barras still had left him were some intrigues with the royalists by means of certain emigrants concealed in his court. These intrigues were of long standing. They had commenced as far back as the 18th Fructidor. He had communicated them to the directory, and got himself authorized to prosecute them, so that he might have in his hands the groundwork of counter-revolution. He had thus adroitly obtained the means of betraying at will either the republic or the pretender. There was a sort of treaty on foot at this moment with this last-named personage as to furnishing a sum of several millions [francs] to assist him in his return. It is very possible, after all, that Barras was not sincere with the pretender, for all his inclinations must certainly have been identified with the republic. But to correctly ascertain what this old corruptionist really preferred would be a hard matter. In all probability he himself scarcely knew what partialities he entertained. Besides, at such a pitch of corruption, a little money will unfortunately prevail against the strongest inclinations of private bias or opinion.

Fouché, in despair to see his patron undone, mortified above all to find himself compromised in his disgrace, renewed his attentions to Bonaparte. The latter, who exceedingly mistrusted such a man, carefully concealed from him all his designs;

but Fouché, nothing discouraged, for he saw that Bonaparte was certain of success, resolved to overcome his chilling behaviour by dint of services. He had the police; he conducted it skilfully, and he knew that conspiracies were forming in every quarter. He was cautious not to communicate this fact to the directory, the majority of which, composed of Moulins, Gohier, and Barras, might in consequence of his discoveries have adopted a determination adverse to the conspirators.

It was now about a fortnight that Bonaparte had been at Paris, and almost every thing was already prepared. Berthier, Lannes, and Murat, were daily gaining the officers and the generals. Among these, Bernadotte out of jealousy, Jourdan from attachment to the republic, and Augereau from Jacobinism, had hung back, and had communicated their apprehensions to all the patriots of the five hundred; but the mass of the military men was gained. Moreau, a staunch republican, but suspected by the patriots who were the dominant party, dissatisfied with the directory, which had so ill rewarded his talents, had no other refuge than Bonaparte. Caressed and won by him, and by no means unwilling to bear a superior, he declared that he would second all his projects. He had no wish to be let into the secret, for he had a horror of political intrigues, but he desired to be called in at the moment of execution. There were in Paris the 8th and 9th dragoons, which had formerly served under Bonaparte in Italy, and were devoted to him. The 21st light infantry, organized by him, when he commanded the army of the interior, and which had once reckoned Murat in its ranks, was quite as devoted to his cause. These regiments were constantly soliciting permission to pass in review before him. The officers of the garrison and the adjutants of the national guard were likewise asking to be presented to him, and had not yet received his assent. He postponed this, desiring to make this introduction subservient to his plans. His two brothers, Lucien and Joseph, and the deputies of his party, were daily making fresh acquisitions in the councils.

An interview with Sieyès was fixed for the 15th Brumaire, in order to settle the plan and the means of carrying it into execution. On that same day the councils were to give a banquet to Bonaparte, as had been done on his return from Italy. This was not, as on the former occasion, an entertainment given by the councils in their official character. The thing had been proposed in secret committee; but the five hundred, who, on the first moment of his landing, had chosen Lucien president, with a view to do honour to the general in the person of his brother, were now distrustful, and refused to order a banquet. It was then decided that it should be given by subscription. At any rate, the number of the subscribers was from six to seven hundred. The feast took place in the church of St. Sulpice; every one was cold and silent; all were most circumspect in their behaviour, and maintained the utmost reserve. It was very plain that some great event was expected, and that it would be effected by a part of those who attended the banquet. Bonaparte was silent and abstracted. This was but natural, since he was, on leaving, to go and determine the place and hour of a conspiracy. The dinner was hardly over before he rose, took a turn with Berthier round the tables, addressed a few words to the deputies, and then precipitately withdrew.

He repaired to Sieyès, to make his final arrangements with him. There it was that they first agreed upon the mode of government to be adopted in the place of the existing government. It was resolved that the councils should be suspended for three months; that the five directors should be superseded by three provisional consuls, who, during these three months, should exercise a kind of dictatorship, and be commissioned to frame a constitution. Bonaparte, Sieyès, and Roger Ducos, were to be the three consuls. The next thing they did was to find the means of carrying this design into execution. Sieyès had a certain majority in the ancients. As there was always a set of floating reports imputing incendiary projects to the Jacobins, the device was to invent an accusation against them of intending to commit an outrage upon the national representation. The commission of the inspectors of the ancients, wholly at the disposal of Sieyès, was to propose to transfer the legislative body to Saint-Cloud. In point of fact, the constitution authorized the council of ancients to do this. That council was, in addition to that measure, to perform another act, which was not authorized by the constitution, and that was to confide the office of protecting this translation of the government to a general of its selection, that is to say, to Bonaparte. The ancients were to invest him at the same time with the command of the 17th military division, and of all the troops cantoned in Paris. With these forces, Bonaparte was to escort the legislative body to Saint-Cloud. There it was expected that they would be able to control the five hundred, and to extort from them the decree of a provisional consulate. Sieyès and Roger Ducos were, on that same day, to hand in their resignation as directors. It was proposed to intimidate Barras, Gohier, and Moulins, into giving in their resignations. Then the directory would thus be disorganized by the dissolution of the majority; they would then go to the five hundred with the statement that there no longer existed a government, and compel them to name the three consuls. This plan was perfect in its conception; for it is always necessary, when a revolution is to be effected, that the illegality of a procedure should be cloaked as far as is practicable, to make use of constitutional terms to destroy a constitution, and make the members of a government subservient to its abolition.

The 18th Brumaire was fixed for getting up the decree of translation of the government, and the 19th for the decisive sitting at St. Cloud. The task was divided. The decree of translation, and the managing matters so as to obtain it, were confided to Sieyès and his friends. Bonaparte undertook to have the armed force in readiness, and to lead the troops to the Tuileries.

Every thing being resolved upon, they parted. Wherever one went nothing was heard but that a great event was ready to burst forth. This had been the case on previous occasions. No revolutions are successful, save those which can be foreseen. Fouché, moreover, took good care not to forewarn the three directors who had nothing to do with the conspiracy. Dubois-Cranceé, notwithstanding his deference for the high intelligence of Bonaparte in matters of war, was a warm patriot; he got scent of the plan, and ran to denounce it to Gohier and Moulins, but he obtained no credence. They believed that some ambitious project might demonstrate itself, but had no idea of a conspiracy ready to break out. Barras plainly perceived a great movement was about to take place; but he was sensible he was undone whichever way things went, and he basely resigned himself to the course of events.

The commission of the ancients, over which the deputy Cornet presided, had directions to prepare every thing in the night between the 17th and 18th for getting the decree of translation passed. The shutters were closed, and the window-curtains drawn, that the public might not be apprized by the lights that the commission were occupied during the night. Care was taken to summon the council of the ancients for seven o'clock, and that of the five hundred for eleven. According to this arrangement, the decree of translation ought to be passed before the five hundred commenced their sitting; and as all debate was prohibited by the constitution at the moment when the decree of translation was promulgated, the tribune of the five hundred would be closed by this promulgation, and all awkward discussions prevented. Another thing was provided for; that was, to delay sending off the letters of summons for certain deputies. This ensured the certainty that those who were distrusted would not arrive till after the vote had been given.

Bonaparte, on his side, had taken every necessary precaution. He had sent for colonel Sebastiani, who commanded the 9th dragons, to assure himself of the inclinations of the regiment. That regiment was composed of four hundred foot and six hundred horse. It contained many young soldiers, but it derived its character and bearing from the veterans of Areola and Rivoli. The colonel answered to Bonaparte for the regiment. It was agreed that the colonel, on pretence of a review, should leave his barracks at five o'clock, distribute his men, part in the Place de la Révolution, and part in the garden of the Tuileries, and that he himself, with two hundred horse, should occupy the Rue Mont-Blanc and the Rue Chantereine. Bonaparte then sent word to the colonels of the other regiments of cavalry, that he would review them on the 18th; as an excuse for appointing such a time, he intimated he was about to take a journey. He sent to appoint Moreau and all the generals to be in the Rue Chantereine at the same hour. At midnight, he dispatched an aide-de-camp to Lefebvre, to beg him to call upon him at six in the morning. Lefebvre was entirely devoted to the directory, but Bonaparte felt fully assured that he would not stand out against his ascendancy. He had not given any previous intelligence either to Bernadotte or Augereau. He had taken care, in order to put Gohier completely off his guard, to invite himself to dine with him on this same 18th, with all his family; and at the same time, in order to induce him to send in his resignation, he had, by his wife, requested him to come the next morning at eight o'clock to take breakfast with him in the Rue Chantereine.

On the morning of the 18th, a great stir, totally unexpected, even by those who were mainly concerned in causing it, was very visible on all sides. A numerous cavalry passed along the Boulevards; all the generals and officers in Paris proceeded in full uniform to the Rue Chantierne, little thinking to meet such a crowd as they would find when they got thither. The deputies of the ancients hurried to their post, astonished at receiving such short summonses. The five hundred were for the most part perfectly unconscious of what was about to be done. Gohier, Moulins, and Barras, knew nothing about the matter; but Sieyès, who had for some time been taking lessons in riding, and Roger Ducos, were already on horseback and on their way to the Tuileries.

As soon as the ancients had met, the chairman of the commission of the inspectors addressed them. The commission appointed to watch over the safety of the legislative body had, he said, received intelligence that some dangerous conspiracies were in agitation; that conspirators were coming in shoals to Paris, were there holding clandestine and secret meetings, and were there designing some outrage upon the freedom of the national representation. The deputy Cornet added, that the council of the ancients had the means of saving the republic entirely in its own power, and that it ought to avail itself of them. These means were nothing else than in translating the legislative body to Saint Cloud, so as to render it less exposed to the attempts of the conspirators, and in the meantime place the public tranquillity under the protection of a general who had the ability of performing this duty, and to select Bonaparte as general for that purpose. The reading of this proposition and of the decree which comprehended it had hardly been completed before a certain movement manifested itself in the council. Some members were determined to oppose this proposition; Cornudet, Lebrun, Fargues, and Regnier, supported it. The name of Bonaparte, on which great stress had been laid, and of whose support they felt assured, decided the majority. At eight o'clock the decree was passed. This decree translated the councils to St. Cloud, and summoned them to meet on the following day at noon. Bonaparte was appointed commander-in-chief of all the troops comprised in the 17th military division, of the guard of the legislative body, of the guard of the directory, of the national guards of Paris and of the environs. Lefebvre, the commandant of the 17th division, was placed under his command. Bonaparte was ordered to appear at the bar to receive the decree, and to take the oath the president was to administer to him. A state messenger was directed to convey the decree to the general without loss of time. The state messenger, who himself was the deputy Cornet, found the Boulevards blocked up by a vast body of cavalry, and the Rue du Mont-Blanc and the Rue Chantierne crowded with officers and generals in full uniform. All of them were making all possible haste to attend general Bonaparte's invitation. As the reception rooms of the latter were too small to receive so great a concourse, he ordered the doors to be thrown open, went out on the balcony, and harangued the officers. He told them that France was in danger, and that he relied upon them to assist him in saving her. The deputy Cornet at this point handing him the decree, he snatched it out of his hand, read it out loud to them, and asked if he could reckon upon their support. The reply was by all of them, putting their hands to their swords, and saying, that they were ready to stand by him. He likewise addressed himself to Lefebvre. The latter, seeing the troops in motion, without orders from him, had asked colonel Sebastiani what all this meant, who, without replying, had told him to go in and enquire of general Bonaparte. Lefebvre went in, somewhat discomposed. "Well, Lefebvre," said Bonaparte to him, "you, one of the main stays of the republic, will you suffer it to perish in the hands of these lawyers? (avocats.) Unite with me in assisting me to save her. Hold," added Bonaparte, holding out a sword, "there is the sword which I wore at the battle of the Pyramids; I present it to you as a token of my esteem and my confidence." "Yes," replied Lefebvre, with deep emotion, "let us throw the lawyers overboard." Joseph had brought round Bernadotte; but the latter seeing what was going on, withdrew to put the patriots on their guard against them. Fouché was not in the secret; but apprized by the event, he had given orders for closing the barriers, and had countermanded the departure of the mail and public conveyances. He then came in all haste to tell Bonaparte, and to tender his declaration of attachment to his cause. Bonaparte, who had hitherto neglected him, did not give him a rebuff on this occasion, but told him that his precautions were useless; that there was no necessity for closing the barriers or causing a suspension of the ordinary course of things; that he was going hand in hand with the nation, and reckoned upon its supporting him. Bonaparte at this moment learnt that Gohier refused to attend his invitation; he exhibited a slight degree of anger on hearing this, and sent him word by a mutual friend, that he would ruin himself in vain by desiring to hold out. He immediately mounted his horse to proceed to the Tuileries, and to take the oath before the council of the ancients. Almost all the republican generals were on horseback by his side. Moreau, Macdonald, Berthier, Lannes, Murat, and Leclerc, rode behind him as his lieutenants. Arrived at the Tuileries, he there found the detachments of the 9th; he harangued them, and having fully excited their enthusiasm, went into the palace.

He presented himself before the ancients, accompanied by this magnificent staff. His presence produced a lively sensation, and proved to the ancients that they had associated themselves with a powerful man, who possessed all the means requisite for ensuring success to a necessary and violent act of state policy (coup d'état). He made his appearance at the bar. "Citizens, representatives," said he, "the republic was on the eve of destruction; your decree will be the means of saving her. Woe to those who seek to prevent its being fully carried out! Aided by all my companions in arms here assembled around me, I shall know how to be beforehand with them. In vain can historical parallels be cited to cause you anxiety; there is no historical parallel to the eighteenth century, and nothing that has occurred in the present century bears any resemblance to the acts that attend its close. We are determined to have the republic. We will have that republic based upon genuine liberty, and upon the representative system. We will have that republic; I swear it in my own name and in the name of my companions in arms." "We all of us swear it," repeated the generals and the officers who were at the bar. The way in which Bonaparte took the oath was very well managed, inasmuch as he had evaded swearing fealty to the constitution. A deputy would have spoken for the purpose of remarking this; but the president refused to hear him, on the ground that the decree of translation prohibited all discussion whatever. The assembly immediately broke up. Bonaparte then went into the garden, mounted his horse, accompanied by all the generals, and reviewed the regiments of the garrison as they each of them came up. He made a short and energetic speech to the soldiers, telling them that he was going to effect a revolution which would restore them to plenty and glory. Shouts of Long live Bonaparte! came from the ranks. The weather was very fine for the season, the concourse very great. Everything seemed to lend appliances to that most necessary enterprise, that was now to put an end to the disorder that had prevailed by creating an absolute power.

At this moment the five hundred, apprised of the revolution that was now being got up, had repaired in a disorderly manner to the hall in which they held their session. No sooner had they assembled, when they received a message from the ancients containing the decree of translation. On hearing it read, a multitude of voices burst forth at once; but the president, Lucien Bonaparte, soon put them to silence by virtue of the constitution, which prohibited further discussion. The five hundred broke up immediately; the most fiery of them ran off to each other's houses, and held clandestine meetings to vent their indignation in common, and to devise some means of opposition. The patriots of the faubourgs were in a high state of ferment, and got together as many of their party as they could to rally tumultuously around Santerre.

In the meantime Bonaparte, having finished the review of the troops, had gone back to the Tuileries, and proceeded to the commission of the inspectors of the ancients. The commission of the five hundred had altogether adhered to the new revolution, and concurred in every thing that was in preparation. It was with them that whatever had to be done should be carried out under the pretence of duly carrying the translation into effect, and there it was that Bonaparte held a permanent sitting. Cambacérès, the minister of justice, also repaired thither. Fouché, on his part, also came thither. Sieyès and Roger Ducos also came to give in their resignation. It was a matter of importance to get one more resignation from the directory, for then, and in that case, the majority being dissolved, there would no longer exist an executive power, and there would no longer be any reason for apprehending a closing act of energy on its part. There was no expectation that either Gohier or Moulins would send in their resignation; M. de Talleyrand and admiral Bruix were therefore despatched to Barras, in order to extort from him his resignation.

Bonaparte then made his distribution of the command of the troops. He sent Murat, with a numerous cavalry and a corps of grenadiers, to occupy Saint-Cloud; Serrurier was posted at the Point-du-jour with a reserve. Lannes had the command of the troops that guarded the Tuileries confided to him. Bonaparte then gave Moreau a singular commission, and certainly the least honourable of all, in this great event: he charged him to go with five hundred men, and guard the Luxembourg. Moreau's instructions were to cut off every approach to the directors upon pretence of providing for their safety, and to debar them of all communication from without. At the same time Bonaparte caused it to be notified to the commandant of the directorial guard, that he was to obey Bonaparte, that he was to leave the Luxembourg with his troops, and to come and join him at the Tuileries. With the assistance of Fouché, a last and an important precaution was taken. The directory had the power of suspending the municipalities; Fouché, acting in his capacity of minister of the police, and as if he had been authorized by the directory, suspended the twelve municipalities of Paris, and deprived them of all authority whatever. By adopting this measure, there no longer remained any rallying point for the patriots, either in the directory or in the twelve communes that had succeeded to the great commune of heretofore. Fouché then caused bills to be posted recommending the citizens to maintain order and tranquillity, and assuring them that everything that could be done was being at that moment done to save the republic from the perils by which she was surrounded.

These measures were completely successful. The authority of general Bonaparte was everywhere acknowledged, although the council of the ancients had not acted constitutionally in conferring it on him. This council, in point of fact, might lawfully make an advance for the translation, but were not justified in appointing a commander-in-chief of the armed force. Moreau proceeded to the Luxembourg, and closed all the avenues with five hundred men. Jubé, commandant of the directorial guard, immediately obeying the orders he had just received, made his men mount, left the Luxembourg, in order to go to the Tuileries. In the meantime the three directors, Moulins, Gohier, and Barras, were in the most painful state of perplexity. Moulins and Gohier being at last made fully sensible of the conspiracy which had hitherto escaped their notice, went to the apartments of Barras, to ask him if he would stand firm with them, and form the majority. The luxurious director was in the bath, and was with some difficulty made to understand what Bonaparte was doing in Paris. "That fellow," he exclaimed, with a gross expression, "has cheated us all." He promised to unite with his colleagues, for he always promised everybody, and everything, and sent Bottot, his secretary, to the Tuileries, to see what he could learn. But Gohier and Moulins had hardly left him before he fell into the hands of Bruix and M. de Talleyrand. They experienced no great difficulty in making him sensible of the impotence to which he was reduced, and there was no reason to fear that he would fall gloriously in defence of the directorial constitution. They undertook that he should enjoy tranquillity and fortune; and on these terms he consented to give in his resignation. A letter had been prepared for his

"prevent all these calamities; let us save the two things for which we have made so many sacrifices, liberty and equality." "Speak also in the same manner of the constitution," exclaimed the deputy Linglet. This interruption disconcerted the general for a moment; but he soon recovered his self-possession, and in broken accents he replied, "As for the constitution, you no longer have a constitution! It was you who destroyed it yourselves by committing an outrage upon the national representation on the 18th Fructidor; by annulling on the 22nd Floréal the popular elections, and by attacking, on the 30th Prairial, the independence of the government. That constitution, of which you speak, all the popular factions are doing their utmost to destroy. They have all come to impart their designs to myself, and to beg my assistance. I have not assented. If I am required, I will name the parties and the men." "Name them," cried the opponents, "name them, and call for a secret committee." A protracted confusion succeeded this interruption. Bonaparte at length proceeded, and again describing the state in which France was placed, exhorted the ancients to take such measures as were capable of saving her. "Surrounded," said he, "by my brethren in arms, I am well able to assist you. I call to witness those brave grenadiers, whose bayonets I see, and whom I have so often led against the enemy; I call to witness their courage; we will co-operate with you in saving the country. And if any speaker," added Bonaparte in a threatening tone, "if any speaker, the hireling of foreign courts, should talk of outlawing me, I will then appeal to my brethren in arms. Call to mind, that I march accompanied by the god of fortune and by the god of war."

These audacious expressions told the five hundred what they had to expect. The ancients took them in very good part, and appeared to be gained over by the presence of the general. They accorded him the honours of the sitting.

Bonaparte, after infusing a little of his fervid spirit into the ancients, next made it his business to go to the five hundred, and endeavour to see if he could not overawe them. He made his way thither, with some grenadiers in his train; he entered, but left them behind him at the furthest end of the hall. He had to walk nearly half the length of the hall to reach the bar. He had scarcely got half way up before furious outcries issued from all sides. "What!" cried a multitude of voices, "soldiers here! arms! What does all this mean? Down with the dictator! down with the tyrant!" A great number of deputies dashed into the middle of the hall, surrounded the general, and addressed to him the most pointed remonstrances. "What!" said they, "is it for this that you have conquered? All your laurels are faded. Your glory is changed into infamy. Respect the sanctuary of the laws. Retire! retire!" Bonaparte was confounded amidst the crowd that thronged around him. The grenadiers whom he had left at the door hastened up, pushed back the deputies, and put their arms around him. It is said that in this disturbance some of the grenadiers received dagger wounds, which were intended for him. A grenadier, named Thomé, had his clothes torn. It is very possible that in the confusion his clothes may have been torn, without daggers being drawn. It is likewise possible that daggers might have been found in more than one hand. Republicans, conceiving that they beheld a new Cæsar, might arm themselves with the steel of Brutus, without being assassins. It is very absurd to think of justifying them on this point. Be this as it may, Bonaparte was turned out of the hall. It is said that he was confused, which is not more surprising than the supposition of daggers. He mounted his horse, went off to his troops, told them that the five hundred had wanted to assassinate him, that he went in fear of his life, and was every where received with shouts of Bonaparte for ever!

The storm meanwhile raged with greater violence than ever in the assembly, and was pointed against Lucien. The latter displayed extraordinary firmness and courage. "Your brother is a tyrant," said they to him; "in one day he has lost all his glory." Lucien strove in vain to justify him. "You would not hear him," he replied; "he came to explain his conduct, to acquaint you with his mission, and to answer all the questions upon which you have been constantly addressing him ever since you met. His services at least entitled him to be allowed time to defend himself." "No, no, down with the tyrant!" shouted the furious patriots. "Outlaw him!" added they; "outlaw him!" This was a terrific word; it had undone Robespierre. Uttered against Bonaparte, it might perhaps make the military hesitate, and detach them from his cause. Lucien courageously opposed the proposition of outlawry, and insisted that his brother ought first to be heard. He struggled for a long time, amidst a tremendous uproar. At length, taking off his cap and his gown, "Wretches," he exclaimed, "would you have me outlaw my own brother? I leave the chair, and I now go to the bar to defend him who is accused."

At this moment Bonaparte heard outside the scene that was passing in the assembly. He got alarmed for his brother, and sent ten grenadiers to hear him out of the hall. The grenadiers entered, found Lucien encompassed by a group, laid hold of him by the arm, saying that it was by his brother's orders, and drew him out of the hall. Now was the time to do a decisive act. The slightest hesitation, and all would be lost. The assembly being impervious to the strongest oratorical appeal, there was but one alternative, and that was force; one of those daring acts, on the eve of which usurpers are always known to have hesitated, had now to be performed. Cæsar hesitated when he passed the Rubicon, Cromwell when he dissolved the [long] parliament. Bonaparte now made up his mind to let loose his grenadiers against the assembly. He put himself on horseback, accompanied by Lucien, and rode in front of the troops. Lucien harangued them. "The council of the five hundred is dissolved," said he; "it is I that tell you so. Assassins have taken possession of the hall of session, and have done violence to the majority. I now call upon you to march and to clear it of them." Lucien next swore that himself and his brother would be the faithful defenders of liberty. Murat and Leclerc then put themselves in motion with a battalion of grenadiers, and conducted it to the door of the five hundred. They advanced to the entrance of the hall. At the sight of the bayonets, the deputies set up a tremendous outcry, as they had done at the appearance of Bonaparte; but the rolling of the drums drowned their noise. "Grenadiers, forward!" cried the officers. The grenadiers entered the hall, and dispersed the deputies, who fled, some by the passages, others by the windows. In a moment the hall was cleared, and Bonaparte was left master of this deplorable field of battle.

Intelligence of this event soon reached the ancients, and filled them with uneasiness and sorrow. They were far from desiring such an outrageous proceeding. Lucien appeared at their bar, to justify his conduct with regard to the five hundred; his reasons were not gainsayed, for what could be done in such a situation? Matters must now be brought to a conclusion, and the object that had been proposed fulfilled. The council of the ancients could not, of themselves, decree the adjournment of the legislative body and the institution of the consulship. The council of five hundred was dissolved; but there were still left some fifty deputies, who advocated the recent violent but necessary state measure. They were got together and made to pass the decree, the very object of the revolution that had just been effected. The decree was then carried to the ancients, who adopted it about midnight. Bonaparte, Roger-Ducos, and Sieyès, were nominated provisional consuls, and invested with the whole executive power. The councils were adjourned to the 1st Ventôse next ensuing, and were replaced by two commissions of twenty-five members each, selected from the councils, who had it in charge to authorize such legislative measures as the three consuls should find it expedient to take. To the consuls and the commissions was confided the office of framing the draught of a new constitution.

Such was the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, concerning which such opposite opinions are entertained, being considered by some as an outrage which absolutely destroyed our rising liberty, and by others as a daring but necessary act, that terminated a state of anarchy. What may be said of it is this, that the revolution, after having appeared in every character, either as monarchical, republican, or democratic, at length assumed the military character; because amidst that perpetual conflict with Europe, it was requisite that she should constitute herself in a strong and solid manner. The republicans groaned in spirit over so many abortive efforts, so much blood spilt to no purpose, in order to establish liberty in France, and they deplored her immolation by one of the heroes whom she had brought forth. But in this their elevation of feeling tends to mislead them. The revolution, which was to give us liberty, and which has so disposed events that we shall some day enjoy her, was not, neither could it be, liberty. The revolution could not be any other than a great struggle against the old order of things. Having been the conqueror in this conflict in France, the next thing was to obtain the like mastery in Europe. But so violent a struggle was not consistent with the forms or the spirit of liberty. For one brief moment liberty existed under the constituent assembly; but when the popular party became so overbearing as to intimidate public opinion; when that party stormed the Tuileries on the 10th of August; when, on the 2nd of September, that party sacrificed all those who excited its distrust; when, on the 21st of January, that party forced every one to compromise himself with it by dabbling his hands in royal blood; when, in August, 1793, that party obliged all the citizens to go off to the frontiers, or to surrender their fortune; when that same party abdicated its power, and transferred it to that great committee of public welfare, composed of twelve individuals, was there liberty, or could liberty exist? No; there was a violent effort of highly-wrought feeling and heroism; there was the muscular tension of an athlete wrestling with a powerful antagonist. After this moment of danger, after our victories, there was an interval of repose. The last days of the convention and the directory exhibited moments of freedom. But the contest with Europe could not be otherwise than temporarily suspended. This contest soon recommenced; and on experiencing the first reverse, all the popular factions uprose against a too moderate government, and invoked the aid of some more mighty arm. Bonaparte, returning from the east, was hailed as sovereign, and called to the supreme power. It is idle to say that Zurich had saved France. Zurich was a mere accident, a respite; a Maréngo and a Hohenlinden would still have been required in order to save her. It required something more than military successes; it required a powerful reorganization at home of all the departments of the government, and it was a political leader rather than a military chief of whom France had need. The 18th and 19th Brumaire could not, under the circumstances we have related, have been avoided. All we can say is, that the 20th is to be condemned, and that the hero turned the service which he had just rendered to a bad account. But it may be replied, that he came to fulfil an inscrutable mission, of which he was made the unconscious instrument by fate, involuntarily fulfilling her mysterious purposes. It was not liberty that he came to maintain, for she could no longer exist. He came to maintain, under monarchical forms, the revolution in the world; he came to maintain the revolution by seating himself, a plebeian, on a throne; by bringing the pontiff to Paris to anoint a plebeian brow with the sacred oil; by creating an aristocracy out of plebeians; by compelling the old aristocracies to associate themselves with his plebeian aristocracy; by making plebeians kings; and finally, by talking to his bed the daughter of the Cæsars, and mingling plebeian blood with the blood of one of the oldest families in Europe; by confounding all nations; by diffusing the French laws in Germany, Italy, and Spain; by dispelling illusions of such ancient date, by shaking so many things to their centre, and confusing them. This was the vast mission he came to fulfil; and in the mean time, the new social order was to be confirmed under the protection of his sword; and Liberty was yet some day to come. She has not yet come; but come she will. I have described the previous crisis that has so disposed matters for her advent in Europe; I have done so without personal resentment, compassionating false opinions, honouring virtue, admiring greatness, striving to comprehend the unfathomable designs of Providence in these mighty events, and attributing to them their due influence so soon as I imagined that I fully attained to their true interpretation.

APPENDIX.

NOTE 1. Page 10, col. 2.

I SHOULD not cite the following passage of the memoirs of Ferrières, if base detractors had not endeavoured to vilify every scene of the French revolution. The passage I am about to extract will enable my readers to form a judgment of the effect which the national solemnities of this period produced on the hearts of those who were the least affected by the general exultation of the people.

"I recal, with pleasure, the impression which this august and touching ceremony made upon me. I shall copy the relation I then wrote, which is full of the sensations it excited; and if this fragment is not historical, it will possess, perhaps, on that account, a more lively interest for some readers.

"The nobility were dressed in black coats, waistcoats, and breeches, richly embroidered with gold, silk cloaks, lace cravats, and hats mounted with feathers à la Henri IV.; the clergy in gowns, large mantles, and cornered hats; the bishops in their purpled robes and surplices; and the third class in black suits, with silk cloaks and cambric cravats. The king was seated in a vehicle in the form of an alcove, richly decorated; Monsieur, the count D'Artois, the princes, the ministers, and the chief officers of the crown, took their place beneath, the queen opposite; and Madame, the countess D'Artois, the princesses, and the ladies of the court, gaily attired, and sparkling with diamonds, formed his brilliant suite. The streets were hung with tapestry; the régiments of the French and Swiss guards formed a line from Notre Dame to Saint-Louis; immense crowds observed the procession in respectful silence; the balconies were ornamented with the most expensive drapery, the windows filled with spectators of every age and both sexes, particularly with beautiful women, elegantly dressed: every variety of hats, feathers, and apparel was displayed on this occasion; a most amiable emotion was painted on every countenance, and joy sparkled in all eyes. Clapping of hands and expressions of the most cordial interest welcomed us, and followed us after we were out of sight. How vainly do I endeavour to describe this ravishing and enchanting scene. Bands of music, placed at convenient distances, filled the air with melodious sounds; and military marches, the beat of drums, the flourishing of trumpets, and the noble chaunt of the priests, alternately succeeding each other without discord or confusion, animated this triumphant procession."—Memoirs of the Marquis de Ferrières, vol. i. p. 18.

NOTE 2. Page 13, col. 1.

The following is an enumeration of those considerations which determined the third class to adopt this first revolutionary measure. As this was the act with which the revolution may be said to commence, and was of great importance in itself, I do not think I can do better than by relating the grounds and motives which governed the decrees of the commons: they emanate from the pen of the abbé Sieyès.

"The assembly of the communes, deliberating concerning the overture of reconciliation proposed by the commissioners of the king, have thought it, at the same time, incumbent on them to take into consideration the resolution which the nobility have entered into with respect to that same overture.

"They have observed that the nobility, in spite of their first acquiescence in the proposal of the king, modified it immediately afterwards, which almost entirely nullifies its intention; and that thus their resolution on the subject under consideration can be regarded as nothing less than a positive refusal.

"In consideration of this conduct, and the continued perseverance of the nobility in their preceding determinations, which are opposed to every project of reconciliation, the deputies of the communes think it absolutely useless to occupy themselves any longer in a project which can no longer be called conciliatory, since it has been rejected by one of the parties whose object it was to conciliate.

"In this state of things, which replaces the deputies of the communes in their first position, it appears to them that they can no longer remain in inaction, waiting for the junction of the privileged classes, without rendering themselves culpable towards the nation, which has, without doubt, a right to require a better employment of their time.

"The deputies of the communes therefore deem it the pressing duty of all the representatives of the nation, to whatever class of citizens they may belong, to form themselves, without delay, into an active assembly, capable of commencing and fulfilling the object of their mission.

"They therefore direct the commissioners, who have been the mediators in the several conferences called conciliatory, to draw up the recital of the repeated and wise efforts which they have made to bring to an equitable arrangement the differences which have arisen between them; and direct them also to detail the motives which have forced them to pass from a state of attendance to one of action; and, finally, resolve that these motives shall be printed at the head of the present deliberation.

"But since it is not possible to form an active assembly without recognising previously those who have a right to compose it, that is to say, those who have the faculty of voting as representatives of the nation, the deputies of the communes believe it their duty to make a last attempt to induce the clergy and nobility, who possess the same powers as themselves, yet have hitherto refused to confirm them, to join them.

"Further, the communes deeming it necessary to gain proof of the refusal of those two classes of deputies to join them, in case they persist in their present determination, judge it their indispensable duty to give them a last invitation, which will be carried to them by deputies ordered to read it in their presence, and to leave them a copy of it, which is herewith subjoined.

"Messieurs, we are ordered by the deputies of the communes of France to inform you that they can no longer defer the fulfilment of the obligation imposed upon all the representatives of the nation. It is assuredly time for all who acknowledge this title to confirm it by a common verification of their powers, and to commence finally to occupy themselves in the consideration of the national interest, which alone, and to the exclusion of all private interests, presents itself as the great object which all the deputies should endeavour to promote by their united efforts. In consequence of this obligation, and the necessity which calls upon the representatives of the nation no longer to remain in inactivity, the deputies of the communes call upon you again, gentlemen, to join them; and their duty obliges them, as much individually as collectively, to give you this last invitation to concur in, and submit yourselves to a common verification of powers. We are at the same time ordered to inform you that the general calling over of all the convoluted bailiwicks will take place in an hour, that the verification will then immediately take place, and all absentees will be deemed in default."

NOTE 3. Page 18, col. 1.

I support nothing by notes or citations but that which is liable to be disputed. This question of whether we possessed a constitution or not, appears to me one of these; and a more respectable and less suspected opinion on this subject cannot be cited than that of Lally-Tolendal. After some preliminary observations, he thus goes on.

"You have not certainly a law which establishes that the states-general are an integral part of sovereignty, for you demand one, and hitherto, sometimes a resolution of the council has forbidden their deliberations, and sometimes the decree of a parliament has annulled their decisions.

"You have not a law which necessitates the periodical assembling of your states-general, for you demand one, and a hundred and seventy-five years have elapsed since they were assembled.

"You have not a law which protects individual liberty from arbitrary arrests, for you demand one, and during the reign of a king, whose justice is acknowledged, and whose probity is respected throughout all Europe, ministers have dragged your magistrates from the sanctuary of the laws by military force.

"You have no law which establishes the liberty of the press, for you demand one.

"You never had, or have no longer, a law which makes your consent necessary to levy taxes, for you demand one, and, for the space of two centuries, you have been loaded with three or four hundred millions of taxes, without having assented to a single one.

"You have not a law which renders the ministers of the executive power responsible, for you demand one.

"Finally, you have no general positive written law, a code at the same time national and royal, a grand charter of a fixed and invariable nature, by which every individual may learn what portion of his liberty and property he must sacrifice for the preservation of the remainder, and which ascertains the nature of civil rights, and defines the nature of civil power.

"I limit myself to these details, for I could extend them to infinitude; but if all these facts are true, if you have none of those laws which you demand, or if in possessing them, (pay attention to this,) or if in possessing them, you have not one which enforces their execution, which ensures their accomplishment, and which maintains their stability, define what you mean by the word constitution, and agree at least that some indulgence should be extended towards those who cannot help entertaining some doubts concerning the existence of ours."

NOTE 4. Page 18, col. 1.

I deem it necessary to recite in this place the recapitulation of the papers made to the national assembly by M. de Clermont-Tonnerre. It furnishes a correct statement with regard to public opinion at this period, through the whole length and breadth of France. In this report, the recapitulation is of extreme importance; and although Paris had been prejudiced upon the digesting of these papers, it is not the less true that the provinces were for the greater part quite as much so.

Report of the Committee of the Constitution, containing a Recapitulation of the Contents of the Papers relative to the formation of a Constitution, read at the National Assembly by the Count de Clermont-Tonnerre, on the 27th of July, 1789.

"Gentlemen, you are called together to regenerate the French empire, and you bring to this great work both your own wisdom and the wisdom of your constituents.

"We have thought it our duty first to collect together and present to your consideration the opinions contained in the greater number of your papers; we shall then state to you the particular views of your committee, and those which it has, or may become acquainted with, from the several plans and observations, which have or may be communicated to it by the members of this august assembly.

"It is of the first part of this task, gentlemen, that we are now about to give an account.

"Our constituents, gentlemen, are all agreed on one point; they all desire the regeneration of the state; but some look for this as the result of a simple reform of abuses, and of the re-establishment of a constitution which has stood for fourteen centuries, and which appears to them capable of reparation; while others regard the social system at present existing as so perfectly vitiated, that they demand a new constitution, and, with the exception of a monarchical form of government, which is respected, and cherished in the hearts of all Frenchmen, they have given you every power necessary to create one, and to establish on the surest principles the prosperity of the kingdom of France. These persons, gentlemen, think that the first chapter of the constitution ought to contain a declaration of the rights of man, of those inalienable rights, the maintenance of which alone can make any system of society a blessing to its members.

"The demand for this declaration of the rights of man, the nature of which has been so constantly mistaken, is the only real difference which exists between those papers which demand a new constitution, and those which merely require the re-establishment of that which they regard the present constitution.

"Both the one and the other equally desire a monarchical government, a legislative body, the national consent for the imposition of taxes, a new organization of all administrative bodies, and the inviolability of the rights of citizens.

"We shall now, gentlemen, recapitulate the particular topics on which our constituents express their sentiments, and distinguish those on which they all agree, from those on which their opinions seem to be divided, by presenting to you the former as decisions, and proposing the latter as questions.

1st. "The monarchical form of government, the inviolability of the sacred person of the king, and the hereditary descent of the crown from male to male, are equally acknowledged by the greatest number of your papers, and not questioned by any.

2nd. "The king is declared the depositary of all the plenitude of the executive power.

3rd. "The responsibility of all the agents of power is generally demanded.

4th. "Some papers acknowledge the legislative power of the king, limited by the constitutional and fundamental laws of the kingdom; others declare that the king, during the interval of the sessions of the states-general, can alone make laws of police or administration, to be afterwards enregistered in the sovereign courts; one bailiwick has maintained that this record should not take place without the consent of two-thirds of the intermediate commissioners of the assemblies of the districts. The majority of the papers acknowledge the necessity of the royal sanction in the promulgation of the laws.

"As to the legislative power, the plurality of the papers acknowledge it as residing in the national representation, authorized by the royal sanction; and it appears that this ancient maxim, Lex fit consensu populi et constitutione regis, is almost generally adjoined to by your constituents.

"As to the organization of the national representation, the questions on which you have to decide relate to the convocation, the duration, and the composition of this representation, or to the mode of deliberation which your constituents propose.

"As to the convocation, some have declared that the states-general can only be dissolved by themselves; others, that the right of convoking, proroguing, and dissolving, belongs to the king, under the single condition that, in case of dissolution, he must immediately summon a new convocation.

"As to the duration of the states-general, some demanded that it should be periodical, that its periodical re-assembling may depend neither on the will nor interest of authority; others, but a less number, advocate its permanency, that the separation of its members may not bring on the dissolution of the states.

"The question of the periodical return of the states has given rise to another; whether an intermediate commission during the interval of the sessions would not be expedient? But the majority of your constituents regard the establishment of an intermediate commission as a dangerous institution.

"As to the composition of the states, some decidedly favour the distinct existence of the three orders; but with respect to this, the extension of powers which many representatives have already obtained, leaves undoubtedly a much greater latitude for its solution.

"Some bailiwicks have demanded the union of the two first orders in the same chamber; others the suppression of the clergy, and the division of its members between the two other orders; others that the representation of the nobility should be double that of the clergy, and that both together they should be equal in number to the commons.

"One bailiwick, in demanding the union of the two first orders, has required the establishment of a third, under the title of the order of the country. It has been also demanded that every person possessing a place or employment at court should be excluded from becoming a deputy of the states-general. Finally, the inviolability of the persons of the deputies is acknowledged by the majority of the bailiwicks, and is contested by none. As to the mode of deliberation, the question of individual voting, or voting by order, has been decided in favour of the first; some bailiwicks demand two-thirds of the opinions of the whole assembly to form a resolution.

"The necessity of the national consent for the imposition of taxes is generally acknowledged by your constituents, and established by your papers; they all limit the duration of every tax to the term which you may fix, a term never to extend further than from one session to another; and this imperative clause appears to your constituents the surest guarantee for the perpetuity of national assemblies.

"Loans, being but indirect taxes, ought, in the opinion of your constituents, to be subjected to the same regulations.

"Some bailiwicks except those taxes from the foregoing regulations which have for their object the liquidation of the national debt.

"As to administrative bodies, or provincial states, all the papers demand their establishment, and the majority leave their organization to your wisdom.

"Finally, the definition of the rights of citizens, individual liberty, and the security of property, are loudly called for by the whole French nation.

She demands for her members the inviolability of their private possessions, and for herself the inviolability of public property. Individual liberty, in the broadest sense of the word, is claimed: the liberty of the press is also demanded; lettres de cachet are denounced with indignation, as the most infamous invention of despotism."

In this multitude of claims, gentlemen, we have remarked some particular modifications relative to lettres de cachet, and the liberty of the press. You will consider them in your wisdom; you will undoubtedly encourage those sentiments of honour which animate the French nation, and will assuredly find that those who are the first to resist those laws which crush the weak, will be the readiest to yield obedience to those which bind the strong; you will calm the inquietudes of religion, so often outraged by libels in times of persecution; and the clergy, recollecting that licentiousness has long been the companion of slavery, will acknowledge that the first and natural effect of liberty is the return of order, decency, and respect for objects of public veneration.

Such, gentlemen, is the account which your committees have thought it their duty to give you of that part of your papers which treat of the constitution. You will find there, without doubt, all the foundation-stones of the edifice you are appointed to raise to its complete height; but you will look in vain, perhaps, for that order and harmony of combination, without which the social system will always contain numerous defects: all the great objects we have in view are certainly pointed out by our constituents, but are not detailed with sufficient accuracy; the organization of the national representation is not marked out with the necessary precision; the requisites of eligibility are not stated; and it is by your wisdom that all these hints must be matured into efficient measures. The nation wishes to be free, and it is on you that the work of emancipation has devolved. The genius of France has hurried on the march of public spirit. It has acquired by a few hours' experience that which could have hardly been expected from the reflection of many ages. You are empowered, gentlemen, to give a constitution to France; the king and the people demand it; and both have merited it.

Result of the examination of the papers.

AVOWED PRINCIPLES.

Article 1st. The French government is a monarchical government.

2nd. The person of the king is sacred and inviolable.

3rd. His crown is hereditary, descending from male to male.

4th. The king is the sole depositary of the executive power.

5th. Agents of authority are responsible.

6th. The royal sanction is necessary in the promulgation of the laws.

7th. The nation and the royal sanction combined makes the law.

8th. The national consent is necessary for the levying of loans and taxes.

9th. Taxes can only be imposed for the space of from one holding of the states to another.

10th. Property is sacred.

11th. Individual liberty is sacred.

Questions concerning which all the papers are not in agreement.

Article 1st. Does the king possess legislative power, limited by the constitutional laws of the kingdom?

2nd. Can the king make provisionary laws of police and administration during the intervals between the holding of the states?

3rd. Are these laws to be submitted to the free record of the sovereign courts?

4th. Can the states-general only be dissolved by themselves?

5th. Can the king alone convoke, prorogue, and dissolve the states-general?

6th. In case of dissolution, is not the king obliged immediately to convoke a new assembly?

7th. Are the states-general permanent or periodical?

8th. If they are periodical, is an intermediate commission necessary?

9th. Are the two first orders to be united in the same chamber?

10th. Are the two chambers to be formed without distinction of orders?

11th. Are the members of the clerical order to be divided between the two other orders?

12th. The representation of the clergy, the nobility, and the commons, is it to be in the proportion of one, two, and three?

13th. Is a third order to be established under the title of the order of the country?

14th. Can the persons possessing employments or places at court be deputies of the states-general?

15th. Are two-thirds of the votes of the whole assembly requisite to form a resolution?

16th. Are the taxes which have for their object the liquidation of the national debt, to be gathered till its extinction?

17th. Are lettres de cachet to be abolished or modified?

18th. Is the liberty of the press to be indefinite or limited?

NOTE 5. Page 33, col. 1.

At the commencement of the history of the legislative assembly *, the reader will find some opinions concerning the faults imputed to the constitution of '91, which appear to me just. I have only one word to say here concerning the project of establishing in France, at this period, the English constitution. This form of government is a reconciliation between the three interests which divide modern states, royalty, aristocracy, and the people. And this reconciliation cannot possibly be effected before the strength of the contending parties is exhausted, that is to say, before a contest, or a revolution. In England it was in fact brought about by a long struggle, and after the reign of democracy and usurpation. To wish to effect it before a contest, is, in fact, to wish to make peace before war is declared. This is a lamentable truth, but it is incontestable; men never enter into treaties till they have exhausted all their resources. It was not therefore possible to establish the English constitution in France till after the revolution. It was well no doubt to propose it as an example, but this task was clumsily executed; and even if it had been more ably managed, it would not have succeeded better. I shall add, to diminish the regret of the partisans of the English constitution, that even had it been fairly written on the tables of our law, it would not have appeased the passions of men; that the ensuing struggle would nevertheless have been engaged in, and the battle been fought in contempt of this preliminary treaty. I repeat, therefore, that war, that is, the revolution, was inevitable. Justice is not to be obtained without fighting for her.

NOTE 6. Page 34, col. 1.

I am far from blaming the unyielding firmness of the deputy Mounier, for nothing can be more respectable than a man who acts from conviction, but the fact is sufficiently curious to call for proof. The following is a passage extracted from his report to his constituents:—

"Many deputies," said he, "had resolved to obtain from me the sacrifice of this principle (the royal sanction), and by abandoning it themselves, thought to engage me, from feelings of gratitude, to grant them some compensation; they conducted me to the house of a zealous partisan of liberty, who was desirous that a coalition should take place between them and me, that the cause of liberty might meet with fewer obstacles, and who requested to be present at our conferences, though he declined taking part in our decisions. For the purpose of endeavouring to convince these gentlemen of their errors, or to gain conviction of my own, if I was mistaken in my principles, I accepted this invitation. My opponents declaimed violently against the pretended inconveniences which would accrue from the king having an unlimited power of hindering the passing of any new law, and declared that if this power was acknowledged by the assembly, there would be a civil war. These conferences, twice renewed, had no success; they were resumed afterwards at the house of an American, well known for his talents and his virtues, who possessed at the same time a theoretical and experimental knowledge of those institutions which are adapted to maintain liberty. He decided in favour of my principles; and when my opponents found that all their efforts to make me abandon them were useless, they declared that they considered the question of the royal sanction as of little importance, although they had represented it, a few days before, as involving consequences which would lead to a civil war; they offered then to vote for an unlimited sanction, and also for the two chambers, but on condition that I would not defend, in favour of the king, the right of dissolving the assembly of representatives; that I would merely require, for the upper chamber, a suspending veto, and that I would not oppose a fundamental law which went to establish periodical national conventions, to be convoked either by a requisition of the assembly of representatives, or by that of the provinces, for the purpose of revising the constitution, and making those alterations they might judge necessary. By national conventions was understood assemblies into which all the rights of the nation were to be transferred; who would unite in themselves all the powers of the state, and consequently would annihilate, by their simple existence, the authority of the monarch and the ordinary legislature; who would have the power of disposing arbitrarily of all kinds of authority, overthrowing, at their will, the constitution, and re-establishing despotism or anarchy. Finally, my opponents wished to commit to one single assembly, which would have borne the name of the national convention, the supreme dictatorship, and thus expose the kingdom to a periodical return of factions and tumult.

"I testified my surprise at my opponents inviting me to enter into treaties with them concerning the interests of the kingdom, as if we alone were its absolute masters; I observed, that in granting merely a suspending veto to the upper chamber, if it was to be composed of eligible members, it would be difficult to fill it with persons worthy of the public confidence; since every citizen would prefer being nominated a representative; and that that chamber which was to be judge of the crimes of the state ought to possess great dignity, and that consequently its authority ought not to be less than that of the other chamber. Finally, I added, that when I believed a principle to be true, I was obliged to defend it, and that I could not dispense with this obligation, since truth was the inviolable property of every citizen."

NOTE 7. Page 36, col. 1.

The particulars of the conduct of Mirabeau are not yet well known, but they soon will be. I have obtained from those who intend to publish them, positive details; I have seen many important papers on this subject, and especially that written in the form of a profession of faith, which formed part of his secret treaty with the court. I cannot at this moment give any of those documents to the public, nor even point out where they are deposited. I can only affirm that of which the truth will be demonstrated when the above-mentioned details are published.

Thus far I can sincerely state, that Mirabeau had never been party to the supposed conspiracies of the duke of Orleans. Mirabeau, when he set out from Provence, had but one single object in view, that of exerting himself against arbitrary power, which in his case had severely injured him, and which his reason as well as his sentiments induced him to consider as detestable. I have said, and I repeat it, he belonged to no party. The duke of Orleans alone has been able to make it appear that he had some connection with him; and the public were willing to believe, that because the duke and Mirabeau were on familiar terms, and both of them ambitious characters, the one as a prince, the other as a man of the people, they must necessarily have been on some footing of political intimacy. The pecuniary distress of Mirabeau and the opulence of the duke might seem an adequate motive for such an association. Nevertheless, Mirabeau, up to the time of his connection with the court, remained poor.

NOTE 8. Page 36, col. 1.

The letter of the count d'Estaing to the queen is a curious record, which ought always to be consulted in regard to the events of the 5th and 6th of October. This brave sailor, a most faithful and independent spirit (qualities apparently contradictory, but often united in the character of sailors), had been in the habit of stating all he knew to those princes for whom he felt regard. His testimony ought not to be involved in doubt at the time when, in a confidential letter, he acquaints the queen of the intrigues he had discovered, and which caused him alarm. The reader will observe whether, in point of fact, the court had not some object in view at this period.

The Letter of Count d'Estaing to the Queen.

"My duty and my fidelity exact it, and I must therefore lay at the feet of the queen, the account of a journey I have made to Paris. I have been applauded for sleeping soundly on the eve of an assault or a naval combat. I can assure you that I am not timid. Being brought up with M. le Dauphin, by whose favour I was much distinguished, accustomed to speak the truth at Versailles from my infancy, both a soldier and sailor, and acquainted with the forms of society, I respect them, but suffer them not to deprive me either of my frankness or firmness.

"Alas! I must avow to your majesty that I did not close my eyes the past night. I have been told in good society, in good company, (just heavens, what would be the consequence if it should spread among the people!) it has been repeated to me, that the nobility and clergy have assumed party signatures. Some pretend that the king acts in concert with them; others believe that he is ignorant of the whole matter. I have been assured that a plan is formed; that the king will either flee from Paris, or be carried off by the road to Champagne or Verdun, and will finally go to Metz. M. de Bouillé is named, and by whom? by M. de Lafayette, who told it me in a whisper at the house of M. Junge, at table. I trembled lest a single servant should overhear him; I observed to him that a word of his mouth might become the signal of death. M. de Lafayette is deliberately positive; he told me that at Metz, as elsewhere, the patriots were the strongest party; and that it was better that one should die than that all should be sacrificed.

"M. le baron de Breteuil, who delays his departure, is said to be the chief director of this project. Money is said to be accumulated, and a million of francs per month is to be furnished for the furtherance of the concerted plan. M. the count de Mercy has, unhappily for his reputation, been cited as one of the actors. These are the particulars; if they spread among the people, the mischief that may result from them is incalculable; the project as yet is only whispered. All good men appear to me to be alarmed at the consequences which may result; if a suspicion of its reality transpires, they may be dreadful. I have been to the house of the Spanish ambassador, and certainly I shall not conceal from the queen that my alarm has been redoubled by an interview with him. M. Fernand Nunès conversed with me about the reports I have mentioned, expressed his horror at the supposition that such a plan was possible, which would cause the most disastrous and humiliating of civil wars, which would dreadfully weaken, if not totally overthrow monarchy, become the prey of civil discord, and foreign ambition, and which would bring irreparable misfortunes on the persons the most dear to France. After having spoken of the fugitive court, persecuted and deceived by those who would not support it when they could, and who actually wish to see its dissolution, afflicted by a general bankruptcy, become inevitable, and dreadful to be contemplated . . . , exclaimed that no other evil consequence could happen from these false reports except their propagation, because in reality they were without any foundation of truth. M. the ambassador of Spain cast down his eyes at this last expression. I became urgent; and he at last declared that a person of very considerable importance, and who was worthy of credit, told him that he had been asked to sign a bond of association. He would not mention his name; but either through inattention, or for the good of the public welfare, he happily did not demand that secrecy from me which had not been imposed upon himself. I therefore did not promise to keep this fact secret. It has filled me with more terror than I have ever before experienced; but it is not for myself that I feel it. I supplicate the queen in her wisdom to calculate all the consequences that may happen from such an evil line of conduct: the first false step will cost sufficiently dear. I have seen the queen, in the goodness of her heart, shed tears at the lot of condemned criminals; but in the present instance, rivers of blood vainly shed will be to be regretted. A simple indecision may be remediless. It is only by sailing with the stream, and humouring its waywardness, that she can escape wreck. Nothing is as yet lost. The queen may conquer the kingdom for the king. Nature has given her the means; they are the only possible ones. She may imitate her august mother: if not, I am silent. I supplicate your majesty to grant me an audience for one of the days of the present week."

NOTE 9. Page 41, col. 1.

The province of history is not sufficiently extensive to descend into minute particulars for the justification of individuals, especially in revolutions where even first rate characters are extremely numerous. Yet as M. Lafayette has been so much calumniated, and as his character is nevertheless so pure, and was so well sustained throughout the arduous contest in which he acted, one note at least must be devoted to his vindication. For this purpose, it will be only necessary to observe, that there is a wide distinction between a general who has long led his soldiers to victory, and so acquired the authority of absolute command, and one whose influence over his troops depends upon his political opinions. In the latter case, all control would cease upon suspicion of change of sentiment in the general. Lafayette, therefore, could not assume the tone of imperative authority, yet he resisted the entreaties of his soldiers for a whole day; and did not at last comply with them till his compliance became a duty of prudence. It is certain that had not the national guard arrived when they did at Versailles, the château would have been taken by assault, and what might have been the fate of the royal family in the midst of a popular insurrection, it is impossible to conjecture. Had it not been for the assistance of the national guard, the garde du corps would have been repulsed; and upon the whole it is evident, nothing but the presence of M. de Lafayette could have insured the safety of the king and his family. But, having arrived at Versailles, he has been bitterly reproached with retiring to rest. It must however be recollected, that he remained up till five o'clock in the morning, during which time he was unceasingly employed in sending out patrols, and taking every other precaution to prevent tumult. It was not till every thing appeared calm, that he did what every one in his situation would likewise have done, flung himself on his bed, to take that repose of which he had been deprived for four-and-twenty hours. The testimonies of his contemporaries must also be attended to. Madame de Staël, who certainly was no friend of Lafayette, declares she heard the gardes du corps cry, "Live Lafayette." Mounier, whose testimony is equally free from aspersion, praised his disinterested devotion; and M. de Lally-Tolendal regretted that he had not been invested with a species of dictatorship. The opinions of these two deputies, who were so decidedly hostile to the transactions of the 5th and 6th of October, should be received with confidence.

NOTE 10. Page 42, col. 2.

I have already shown how slender the connexion between Mirabeau and the duke of Orleans really was. The following is an explanation of the famous expression: that ——— does not deserve the trouble that is taken for him! The restraint imposed by Lafayette on the duke of Orleans displeased the popular party, but more particularly irritated the friends of the prince condemned to exile. These persons, taking advantage of Mirabeau's aversion to Lafayette, thought to make him advocate the cause of the duke against the general. Lauzun, a friend of the former, came to his house one evening to urge him to speak in the assembly the next morning on the subject of the duke's banishment. Mirabeau, who often allowed himself to be persuaded, was about to yield to his solicitations, when his friends, more careful of his reputation than he was himself, pressed him not to interfere in the business. He was then resolved to be silent. The next day, at the opening of the sitting, the departure of the duke of Orleans was reported; and Mirabeau, who was angry at his yielding to Lafayette, calling to mind the useless efforts of his friends, exclaimed: that ——— does not deserve the trouble which is taken for him.

NOTE 11. Page 43, col. 1.

Mirabeau possessed, as many other great men, much littleness as well as much grandeur of character. It was necessary to feed his ardent imagination with hopes. Although it was impossible to give him the ministry without destroying his influence, ruining his reputation, and enfeebling the assistance which could be derived from him, it was still necessary to hold out this allurements to his imagination. Those, therefore, who mediated between him and the court, counselled the latter to give him at least hopes of the ministry. Nevertheless, the personal interests of Mirabeau were never particularly mentioned in the several communications which took place; neither money nor favours were ever spoken of, and it was difficult to make Mirabeau understand that which the court wished to insinuate. For this purpose a very adroit method was pointed out to the king. Mirabeau had so bad a reputation, that very few persons would associate with him as a colleague. The king, addressing himself to de Lamoignon, for whom he entertained a particular friendship, asked him if, for the purpose of being useful to him, he would accept of the ministry with Mons. de Mirabeau. M. de Lamoignon replied, that he was ready to do any thing which the interests of his majesty's service required. This conversation was quickly reported to the orator: it gave him great satisfaction, and he doubted no longer that, if circumstances permitted it, he should be nominated to the ministry.

NOTE 12. Page 45, col. 2.

It will not be uninteresting to learn the opinion of Ferrières concerning the manner in which the deputies of his own order conducted themselves in the assembly.

"There were not in the assembly," says Ferrières, "more than three hundred truly upright members, exempt from party spirit, unassociated with both clubs, desiring the public good for its own sake, independent of the interests of any order or body of men, always ready to support the most just and useful propositions, without caring from what quarter they might come, or by whom they were espoused. These men were worthy of the honourable part they were called upon to act, and it is from them that every good law which was established by the assembly proceeded. Adopting every salutary, and rejecting every evil measure, they often gave a majority to motions, which, but for them, would have been discarded by the spirit of faction; and frequently repulsed propositions, which, unopposed by them, would have been adopted through motives of private interest.

"I cannot on this subject help noticing the impolitic conduct of the nobility and bishops. As their only object was to dissolve the assembly, and to throw discredit on its proceedings, far from opposing evil decrees, they manifested an indifference in this respect which it is hardly possible to conceive. They left the chamber the moment the president proposed any question of this nature, and invited the deputies of their party to follow them; or, if they remained, they declared their resolution of not entering into the deliberation. The clubbists, who, by their abandonment of their duty, became the majority of the assembly, carried every thing they wished. The bishops and the nobles, firmly believing that the new order of things could not last, endeavoured with impatience to accelerate the ruin of the throne, and wish it their own. To this insensate conduct they added a most insulting indifference both towards the assembly and the people who occupied the galleries. They paid no attention to any question that might be before the chamber, but laughed and conversed in a loud tone of voice among themselves, thus confirming the unfavourable opinion the people entertained of them; and, instead of endeavouring to regain their confidence and esteem, did all in their power to acquire their hatred and contempt."—Ferrières, vol. ii. p. 122.

NOTE 13. Page 45, col. 2.

The recall of the gardes-du-corps gave occasion to an anecdote which is worthy of being recorded. The queen complained to M. de Lafayette that the king was not free, and gave as a proof of it, that the service of the château was performed by the national guard, and not by the gardes-du-corps. M. Lafayette immediately asked her if she would wish to see the recall of the latter. The queen at first hesitated, but did not dare to reply otherwise than in the affirmative. The general then commu-niented this conversation to the municipality, who, at his instigation, made an official demand to the king for the recall of the gardes-du-corps, offering, at the same time, to divide the service of the châteaueu with them. The king and the queen received this demand very unwillingly; they were soon made to feel its consequences, and those who did not wish that they should appear free, made them reply to it by a refusal. Yet to give reasons for this refusal was an embarrassing task, and the queen, who was often employed in difficult dilemmas, was commissioned to tell M. de Lafayette why the proposition of the municipality was not accepted. The motive which she gave was, that the king would not expose the gardes-du-corps to be massacred. M. Lafayette had just met one of them walking in the Palais Royal in full uniform. He related this fact to the queen, who became still more embarrassed, but persisted in the intention she had been commissioned to express.

NOTE 14. Page 46, col. 1.

The address of Monsieur to the Hotel de Ville, contains a passage too important to be passed over.

"As to my personal opinions," said this august personage, "I shall speak with confidence to my fellow-citizens. Since the day when, in the second assembly of the notables, I declared my sentiments concerning that fundamental question which then divided the minds of all men, I have not ceased to believe that a great revolution was in preparation; that the king, by his patriotic intentions, his virtues, and his supreme rank, was eminently fitted to be its chief, since it cannot be advantageous to the nation without being equally so to the monarch; and that finally the royal authority ought to be the rampart of national liberty, and national liberty the basis of royal authority."

NOTE 15. Page 46, col. 2.

The speech pronounced by the king on this occasion is too remarkable not to be cited, with some observations.

This excellent man and unfortunate prince was continually vacillating, but upon particular occasions he saw with great propriety what was due from him, and the unreasonable behaviour of the court. The tone which pervades his speech of the 4th February is sufficient to show that in the present instance the words were not put into his mouth, and that he spoke with truth and sincerity as to his present position.

"Gentlemen," said he, "the vast importance of many events which have lately happened, and the critical situation in which France is now placed, make me feel it my duty to offer you my undisguised opinion on the state of affairs. The progressive advance of disorder and insubordination, the suspension or inactivity of justice, the discontents which have arisen from individual privations, the conflicts and unhappy animosities which are the inevitable result of long dissensions, the precarious situation of the finances, and the uncertainty of the public welfare, and finally, the general agitation of all minds; seem all to unite to increase the anxiety of the true friends of the prosperity and welfare of the kingdom.

"A grand object is presented to your view. But you must endeavour to attain it without increasing the public troubles, and without new convulsions. It was my intention to lead you to this object by tranquil and gentle means when I first formed the design of assembling you, and of uniting in your public deliberations the wisdom and will of the representatives of the nation. My happiness and glory are most intimately allied to the success of your endeavours.

"I have taken care, by continual vigilance, to protect your proceedings from that fatal influence which the calamitous circumstances, in the midst of which you are placed, might have upon them. The horrors of famine, which France had to fear last year, have been dispelled by unremitting exertions to provide for the necessities of the population. The disorders which the impoverished state of the finances, the national discredit, the excessive scarcity of money, and the gradual decrease of the revenue naturally occasioned, have at least been partially suppressed. I have in some measure remedied everywhere, but particularly in the capital, the dangerous consequences which might arise from want of employment for the labouring classes; and notwithstanding the enfeebled state of all authority, I have maintained the kingdom, not, it must be allowed, in perfect calmness, but in a state of sufficient tranquillity to receive the benefit of a moderate and well-organized system of liberty; finally, in spite of the internal agitation of the kingdom, and the political convulsions which disturb other nations, I have preserved peace with foreign states, and kept upon such terms of friendship with the powers of Europe as may render this peace durable.

"After having thus protected you from the many dangers which might have thwarted your proceedings, the moment has at length arrived in which the interests of the nation call upon me to assist, in a more express and decisive manner, in the execution of all you have concerted for the advantage of France. I cannot seize upon a more fitting opportunity for effecting this purpose than that which offers itself to me by my acceptance of those decrees which are destined to establish a new organization of government in the kingdom, and which must have so important and propitious an influence on the happiness of my subjects, and the prosperity of the empire.

"You know, gentlemen, that it is now more than ten years since, and at a period when the sense of the nation had not so fully declared itself in regard to provincial assemblies, that I had commenced the substitution of this species of administration for one which antiquity and long usage had sanctioned. Experience having demonstrated to me that I was not deceived in the opinion I had entertained concerning the utility of these institutions, I have earnestly sought to extend the same benefit to all the other provinces of my kingdom; and in order that the new administrations should enjoy public confidence, it was my desire that the members of which they were to be composed should be freely nominated by the body of the citizens. You have in various ways improved upon these views, and certainly the most essential improvement is that equal and justly conceived subdivision, which by diminishing the ancient separations of province from province, and by establishing an uniformity of system, and a perfect political balance, still further tends to make all parts of the kingdom unite in one common feeling and the same political interests. This great conception, this beneficial intention, are entirely owing to you; indeed, nothing short of an universal consent on the part of the representatives of the nation, and nothing short of that proper influence they were enabled to exercise over public opinion, could enable them to undertake with confidence the conduct of a reform of so great importance, and to combat by the force of reason the oppositions of those who cling to ancient custom and individual interests."

All that the king states here is perfectly just, and very well conceived. It is true, that he had already upon his own impulse suggested every possible reform, and that he had furnished a rare example to princes, that of anticipating the requisitions of their subjects. The encomiums he bestowed upon the new mode of territorial division appear upon the face of them to have been uttered with the most perfect good faith; for it certainly was serviceable to government by destroying the opposition which local jurisdictions and prejudices had not unfrequently set up against it. Every thing therefore induces the belief that the king on this occasion spoke in the utmost sincerity of his heart. He continued,

"I shall countenance and shall assist, with my utmost ability, the success of this vast organization, on which the safety of France depends; and I consider it incumbent on me to declare, that I am too anxious about the internal situation of the kingdom, and have my eyes too open to the dangers of all kinds with which we are surrounded, not to feel convinced that in the present state of public feeling, considering the situation of public affairs, a new order of things should be established without disturbance or discord, or that the kingdom will be exposed to all the calamities of anarchy.

"Let all those who are true citizens think on this, as I have also done, that by solely fixing their attention on the common weal, they will perceive, even under every difference of opinion, that one great interest ought to cordially unite them at this time. Time will remedy those defects which the legislation of this present assembly may leave for amendment, (this indirect and well-introduced remark, is a proof of itself that the king would not flatter them, but simply state the truth though in most calm and temperate language;) but every design that may tend to shake the principles of the constitution itself, every scheme that shall have for its object the subversion or diminution of its benign influence, will do nought else than serve to bring down upon us the frightful calamities attendant upon dissension; and assuming the success of such an attempt upon my people and myself, the result will for ever deprive us of various advantages of which a new order of things has in store for us.

"Let us indulge, then, cordially in the hopes which the present aspect of things may justify us in entertaining, and think only of realizing them by an unanimous concordance in our efforts. Let it be known throughout the kingdom, that the monarch and the representatives of the nation are united by the same interests and the same objects, that the firm belief of this alliance may spread the spirit of peace and mutual benevolence through the provinces, and that all good citizens, and all who can serve the state by their zeal or abilities, may hasten to take part in the different subdivisions of the general administration, whose united exertions will effectually re-establish order and prosperity throughout the kingdom.

"We must not conceal the truth from ourselves; there is much to be done before we can attain this object. Unanimity and a general and common effort are absolutely necessary to obtain effectual success. Persevere therefore in your proceedings without any other object than that of the public good; fix your chief attention on the condition of the people and public liberty; but do not overlook the necessity of destroying all suspicions, and of removing without delay the several causes of fear which have banished from France so great a number of her citizens, the effect of which is strongly contrasted with the laws of safety and liberty you are about to establish. Measures of compulsion can never have a prosperous issue; a general consent is necessary to their beneficial operation. At present we enjoy bright hopes; may those hopes be quickly converted into solid happiness!

"The day, I trust, will shortly arrive, when the advantage of the entire suppression of ranks in society will be acknowledged by all Frenchmen. But at the same time, it must not be forgotten that all which reminds a nation of the antiquity and continued services of an honourable race of men, is a distinction which nothing can destroy, and, as the duty of gratitude is included in it, those who, in all classes of the community, truly aspire to serve their country, and those who have already had the happiness to succeed in such glorious enterprises, have an interest in respecting that transmission of titles or recollections, which is the noblest heritage they can leave to their children.

"Neither can the respect due to the ministers of religion be effaced; and their dignity being closely united to that of those sacred truths which are under the guardianship of order and morality, all upright and enlightened citizens will have an equal interest in maintaining and defending it.

"Without doubt those who have abandoned their pecuniary privileges, those who will form no longer, as they formerly did, a political order in the state, must submit to sacrifices of which I know all the importance; but I am persuaded that they possess sufficient generosity to seek their requital in the public advantages of which the establishment of national assemblies affords hopes."

The king proceeded, as we see, to expound to all parties the benefits proposed by the new laws, and at the same time alluded to the necessity there was to preserve some of the old. His address to the privileged orders on this head demonstrates his real opinion as to the necessity and propriety of the sacrifices to which he had subjected them, and their opposition will be eternally condemned by the expressions contained in this speech. It is no purpose for them to say that the king was not a free agent; the care he took on this occasion to measure his concessions, his advice, and even his censures, show that he spoke with sincerity. He expressed himself in far different language at a later period, when he was desirous of rescuing the state from the bondage in which he believed her to be. His letter to the ambassadors, given lower down, will sufficiently prove that. The vulgar exaggeration that prevails in that letter sufficiently demonstrates the intention, on his part, no longer to appear a free agent. But on this present occasion the measured tone of his language leaves no doubt whatsoever, and what follows is so affecting and so beautifully expressed, that it must have been utterly impossible any one not to have felt in accordance with it, especially after having consented to write and to speak it.

"I also should have many losses to reckon up, if I engrossed the great interests of the state. I could stoop to personal considerations; but I have found a compensation which satisfies me, a full and perfect compensation in the increase of the happiness of the nation, and it is from the bottom of my heart that I express this sentiment.

"I therefore pledge myself to maintain and defend the constitutional liberty of the state. I will do more, and in concert with the queen, who partakes these sentiments with me, I will early prepare the understanding and heart of my son for the new order of things, which circumstances have brought about. I will habituate him from his earliest years, to make his happiness consist in the happiness of France.

"I doubt not that before you conclude your legislative labours, you will strengthen and establish the executive power on a firm basis; you must perceive, that, without your system derives stability from an active and tutelary authority, its parts cannot long hold together, and that that liberty which we have been so careful to introduce into the public administration, and which we cherish with so fervent an attachment, must degenerate into anarchy, be destroyed by blind violence, and finally give place to the most alarming of all tyrannies.

"Thus, not so much on my own account, gentlemen, who do not lay any particular stress on what is especially due to myself, according to the laws and the institutions which must necessarily regulate the future welfare of the empire, but for the good of our country, for its prosperity and its power, I call upon you to dismiss from your minds all momentary impressions that may divert from considering altogether and without regard to details, what such a kingdom as France demands, as well from her vast extent and great population as from her foreign connexions which are inseparable from her existence.

"I need not remind you, to fix your special attention on that which must be the primary object of all legislators; the morals of a people, distinguished among the nations of Europe for all the social virtues.

"The rights of property also demand your closest attention; these rights, you must be aware, do not derive their sacredness from any privileged orders, nor have they been accidentally acquired, but spring out of the very nature of civil society, are the very preservatives of order in every community, and lie at the foundation of all social harmony.

"From what fatal circumstance has it come to pass, that while tranquillity was restoring, renewed disturbances should have spread over the provinces! How can these continued excesses be accounted for! Concur with myself in repressing them, and let us use our utmost exertions, that criminal outrages do not cast a stain on those days which are the harbingers of national prosperity. You who have in so many ways the power of influencing public confidence, do you enlighten the people that is led astray with regard to their true interests, my good subjects, so dear to me, and of whose entire affection I am assured, when they express themselves desirous to soothe my cares on their behalf. Ah! if they did but know how much I feel on receiving the intelligence of the attacks made on property and the violence committed against persons, they would, perhaps, spare me this grievous affliction.

"In speaking of the great interests of the state, I cannot omit urging you to take some speedy and definitive measures for the re-establishment of order in the finances, and for the satisfaction of that innumerable multitude of citizens, whose private interests are involved in that of the national funds.

"Gentlemen, it is time that all the discontents of party should be appeased, it is time that the public credit of the kingdom should be established on a durable foundation. But you cannot do all at once. Reserve, therefore, for a future period, some of the multiplied objects that engross your attention. When you have settled the administration of justice; when you have established a perfect equilibrium between the revenues and expenses of the state; when you shall have completed the constitution, you will have acquired a strong claim upon the public gratitude, and successive assemblies will only have to preserve what you have gained, and improve upon your first principles. May this day, in which your king unites himself to you, in the most frank and intimate manner, be a memorable epoch in the history of the nation! May all dissensions from henceforward cease, and peace and concord prevail among you! May every one sacrifice his private animosities to the public welfare! May all painful recollections be for ever obliterated! and if my gratitude and affection can be any compensation for such eradication of long cherished hostilities, I pledge myself that such disinterested patriotism shall be amply recompensed.

"Let us, I say, from this very day profess (and I set you the example) but one single opinion, one sole interest, and one sole spring of action,—attachment to the newly-formed constitution, an heartfelt desire for peace and the happiness and prosperity of France."

NOTE 16. Page 49, col. 1.

I cannot do better than cite the Memoirs of M. Froment himself, in order to impart a correct idea of emigration, and the contrary opinions which prevailed on this subject; in a volume intitled "A Collection of Sundry Documents relative to the Revolution" (Recueil de divers Ecrits relatifs à la Révolution), M. Froment expresses himself as follows in the fourth and following pages.

Extract from M. Froment's collection of documents, relative to the revolution:—

"I went secretly to Turin, (January, 1790,) to the princes of France, to solicit their approbation and support. On my arrival, a council was held. I there maintained, that if the partisans of the throne and the altar could be brought to act in concert; if the interests of royalty and religion were linked together, both might be preserved. Although strongly attached to the faith of my fathers, I felt no resentment against those who had separated from the Church of Rome; but those who were the declared enemies both of catholicism and royalty, those who openly maintained that Jesus Christ and the Bourbons had been too long associates together, were the objects of my enmity, whose aim it was to strangle at the same time both monarchy and religion. The nonconformists to the Church of Rome who remained faithful to royalty have ever found in me a kindly-disposed fellow-citizen, the rebel Catholics the most implacable enemy.

"The true argument of the revolutionists being force, I conceived that the true answer should be force likewise: then, as now, I was convinced of this grand truth, that one strong passion could only be stifled by another still stronger, and that religious zeal could alone subdue republican delirium. The miracles which zeal for religion has since operated in La Vendée and Spain, prove that all the philosophers and revolutionists would never have succeeded in establishing their anti-religious and anti-social system, in a few years, over the greatest part of Europe, if the ministers of Louis XVI. had conceived a project such as mine, or if foreign princes had sincerely adopted and vigorously maintained it.

"But, unfortunately, most of the persons in the confidence of Louis XVI., and the princes of his house, reasoned and acted on philosophical principles. The very mention of the word religion they thought would cover them with ridicule, and they therefore were ashamed to have recourse to the powerful resources it offered them, though the greatest politicians at all times have made use of them with success. They imagined they could lead the people back to the duties of submission and obedience, by exposing the inconsistencies of the new laws, and by depicting the sufferings of the king. But these means were perfectly inadequate to the object they had in view, for the clamours of discontent could never arrest the enterprises of faction. The adoption of my advice would probably have cost me my life. Its disinterestedness, therefore, ought to have given it value. But the titles and riches of the nobility were more weighty, and prevailed."

M. Froment continues his narrative, and moreover describes the characters of the parties into which the exiled court was divided, in the following mode. Page 33.

"These honourable designations and the respect generally expressed towards me at Turin, would have made me forget the past, and conceive the most flattering hopes of the future, provided I could have perceived great appliances on the part of the counsellors of the princes, and a good understanding amongst the most influential persons in our affairs; but I witnessed with regret that the emigration was divided into two parties, whereof the one was not desirous of attempting a counter-revolution, except by the assistance of foreign powers; and the other, by the royalists at home.

"The first party asserted, that by ceding certain provinces to foreign powers, those provinces would furnish to the French princes armies sufficiently numerous to effect a complete reduction of the factions; that after some lapse of time the concessions that had been compulsorily made could be revoked; and that the court by not contracting any obligation with any one particular state body, could give law to all France. . . . The courtiers trembled, lest the provincial nobility and the royalists of the tiers-état should have the honour of reseating the tottering monarchy on the throne. They were sensible that they no longer were the dispensers of bounties and favours, and that their reign would terminate the very moment that the provincial nobility had, at the price of her blood, restored the royal authority, and thereby deserved the gratitude and the confidence of her sovereign. The apprehension of this new order of things brought them to unite together, if not to divert the princes from making use of the royalists at home in any wise soever, at least to make them fix their attention upon the European cabinets, and induce them to found their greatest expectations upon foreign assistance. As a consequence of this apprehension, they secretly put in use the most efficacious means to ruin the resources of the interior, and to thwart the plans proposed, some of which might bring about the restoration of order, had they been discreetly directed and substantially upheld. It is this of which I am able to testify: this it is that I shall some day demonstrate by acts and authentic documents; but the moment has not yet arrived. In a conference which took place much about this period, upon the point as to what party could excite the sympathies of the Lyonnese and the Franch-comtois, I laid down, and that without circumlocution, the measures that ought to be employed, and at the same time ensure the ascendancy of the royalists of the Gévandau, the Cevennes, the Vivarais, the Comtat-Venaissin, Languedoc, and Provence. During the heat of the discussion, M. the marquis of Autichamp, a field-marshal, a great advocate for foreign powers, said to me, 'But will not the oppressed and the relatives of the victims endeavour to revenge themselves?—Well! what does that matter? so long as we obtain our end!—Don't you see,' he cried, 'that I have brought him to confess that vengeance will be wreaked upon individuals!' Extremely surprised at this observation, I said to the marquis de la Rouzière, who stood near me, 'I am not of opinion that a civil war should resemble a mission of capuchin friars!' It was thus that by exciting in the princes a fear of being made odious in the eyes of their most cruel enemies, the courtiers always induced them to use none but half measures, sufficient, no doubt, to call forth the zeal of the royalists at home, but extremely inadequate, after having compromised them for securing them against the fury of the factions. Since then it has occurred to my recollection, that while the army of the princes was making a stay in Champagne, M. de la Porte, an aid-de-camp of the marquis of Autichamp, having taken a republican prisoner, thought that, by following the system adopted by his commander, he should bring the republican to a sense of his duty by a pathetic exhortation, and by restoring him his army and his liberty; but the republican had not gone many paces before he stretched his conqueror on the earth. M. the marquis of Autichamp, then losing sight of the moderation he had exhibited at Turin, burnt numerous villages, in order to avenge the death of his imprudent missionary.

"The second party maintained that since the foreign powers had several times taken arms in order to humiliate the Bourbons, and in particular to prevent Louis XIV. from securing the crown of Spain to his grandson, so far from calling them to our assistance, we had much rather revive the zeal of the clergy, the devotion of the nobility, the love of the people for the king, and to do one's best to hush up a family quarrel, of which the foreign enemy might perhaps be tempted to take advantage.

"It is to this fatal dissension amongst the leaders of the emigration, and to the indiscretion or perfidy of the ministers of Louis XVI., that the revolutionists owed their first success. I go still further, and I maintain that it was not the National Assembly that created the revolution, but rather the associates of the king and the princes; I maintain that the ministers have delivered Louis XVI. over to the enemies of royalty, as certain empty-headed personages have betrayed the princes and Louis XVIII. to the enemies of France; I maintain that the greater portion of the courtiers who surrounded the kings, Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and the princesses of that house, were and are quacks, and true political nondescripts, (des charlatans, de vrais eunuques politiques;) that it is to their inertness, their cowardice, or their treason, all the ills France has undergone, and those which now threaten the whole world, are to be imputed. Admitting that I inherit a great name, and have been of the council of the Bourbons, I shall never get rid of the idea that a horde of vile and cowardly miscreants, not one of whom ever exhibited a particle of originality or superior talent, has contrived to tumble down the throne, to establish her supreme ascendancy amongst the most powerful states of Europe, and made the world tremble before them; and since this idea haunts me, I have buried myself in the utmost privacy, to shelter myself from censure, more especially as this same idea has rendered me totally incompetent to stay the progress of the revolution."

I have already cited some passages of the Memoirs of Ferrières relative to the first session of the states-general. As nothing is of greater importance than to state with precision the true feelings which the revolution excited in the minds of men, I consider that I ought to give a description of the federation from this same Ferrières. It will there be made appear whether the enthusiasm was real, whether it communicated its excitement to others, and whether this revolution was, after all, so hideous as some have desired to make it appear.

"In the mean time, the federalists arrived from all parts of the empire. They were lodged in private houses, whose occupiers most cordially furnished them with beds, linen, wood, and every thing that could make their visit to the capital comfortable and convenient. The municipality took precautions to prevent such a confluence of strangers disturbing the public tranquillity. Twelve thousand labourers worked without ceasing at the preparations in the Champ de Mars; yet the work advanced but slowly, and it was feared that it would not be finished by the 14th of July. In this difficulty the districts invited, in the name of the nation, all the citizens of Paris to assist the labourers. This invitation was accepted with great eagerness. Schoolmasters, scholars, sisters of religious orders, and monks grown old in solitude, quitted their cloisters to assemble at the Champ de Mars, with spades at their backs, and carrying banners ornamented with patriotic emblems over their shoulders. The scene which this plain presented was as singular as it was interesting. The most dissimilar characters were associated together with the most perfect equality; a dishevelled courtizan and virtuous matron might be seen working together as fellow-labourers, a capuchin and a chevalier of St. Louis drawing the same dray, a porter and a petit-maitre digging at the same piece of ground, a robust fish-woman and an elegant lady of rank filling the same barrow. The rich, the poor, the well-dressed, and the ragged, old men, children, comedians, soldiers, clerks, some at work, some at rest, actors, and spectators, afforded altogether a spectacle full of life and motion. Moving taverns, and portable shops; songs, and exclamations of joy, the sound of drums and military music, the clatter of spades, and the rumble of barrows, and the voice of the labourers calling to one another, and encouraging each other. The soul melted away under the influence of a delicious enchantment, at the sight of an entire nation reverting all at once to the tender feelings of primitive brotherhood. At nine o'clock the groups separate. Each citizen repairs to the spot where his section is appointed, rejoins his family and acquaintance. Parties form themselves in order of march to the sound of the drum, return to Paris preceded by torches, occasionally uttering sarcastic reflexions upon the aristocrats, and singing the famous air of "Ça ira."

"Finally, the 14th of July, the day of the confederation, arrived. If this grand ceremony had not the serious and august character of a fête, at the same time religious and national, a character which is nearly irreconcilable with the temper of the French people, it presented a delightful and animated picture of joy and enthusiasm a thousand times more touching. The federalists, ranged by departments under eighty-three banners, set out from the Place of the Bastille; the troops of the line, bands of sailors, the Parisian national guard, drums, choirs of music and flags, opened and closed the march.

"The federalists traversed the streets of Saint-Martin, Saint-Denis, and Saint-Honoré, and proceeded to a bridge of boats, built on the river. They were received in their procession by the acclamations of an immense populace, who thronged the windows, the streets, and the quays. The rain, which came down in torrents, neither disturbed or impeded the procession. The federalists, dripping with rain and perspiration, danced in circles hand in hand, shouting, 'Long live our brothers the Parisians.' Wine, hams, and fruit were let down to them from the windows, and the people hailed them with benedictions. The National Assembly joined the procession at the Place of Louis XV., and marched between a battalion of veterans, and of scholars of the military school: a station expressively emblematic, which seemed to intimate that in them the interests of all ages were united.

"The way leading from the Champ de Mars was thronged with people clapping their hands and singing "Ça ira." The Quai de Chaillot and the high grounds of Paisy exhibited one long amphitheatre, where the elegance of the dress, the charms and the graceful bearing of the women there seated, charmed the eye and deprived it of the faculty of making a preference in favour of one over another. The rain continued to fall; but no one seemed to care about it; the natural gaiety of the French triumphed over bad weather, muddy streets, and the length of the procession.

"M. de Lafayette, seated on a fine horse, and surrounded by his aids-de-camp, exercised his superintendence, and received the homage of the people and the federalists. His face ran down with perspiration. One man, with whom nobody seemed to be acquainted, made his way through the crowd, holding a bottle in one hand, and a drinking-glass in the other. 'My general, you are hot; here, take a drink.' This man raised his bottle, filled a large tumbler, and handed it to M. de Lafayette. M. de Lafayette took the glass, looked steadily at the unknown, and swallowed the wine at a single draught. The people shouted applause. Lafayette cast a smile of affability and kindness on the crowd; and his look seemed to say, 'I shall never entertain any distrust; I shall experience no anxiety for myself whilst I am in the midst of you all.'

* "Ça ira" was the refrain of one of the most noted revolutionary ballads of the day. Trans

"Meanwhile, more than three hundred thousand persons had been assembling from Paris and the environs, at the Champ de Mars, since six o'clock in the morning. They were seated on the grass bank, which formed a circus round the plain, dripping with rain, and splashed with mud, and holding up parasols to keep off the torrents which poured upon them, and, on the slightest symptom of returning sunshine, wiping their faces, adjusting their dresses, and awaiting with smiles the national assembly. As soon as the first federalists arrived, they struck up a hand in hand dance. Those who followed imitated their example. This spectacle of so great an assemblage of men come from all parts of France, banishing all memory of the past, all thought of the present, and all apprehension of the future, and giving unrestrained loose to the gaiety of the moment; and of three hundred thousand spectators of every age, and both sexes, following their motions with their eyes, beating time with their feet, and forgetting the rain, hunger, and the wearisomeness of waiting so many hours, was worthy the contemplation of a philosopher. At last the whole procession entered the Champ de Mars; the dancing ceased, each federalist went to join his own banner. The bishop of Autun proceeded to solemnize the mass at an altar after the antique, placed in the midst of the Champ de Mars. Three hundred priests in white vestments, with broad tricoloured ribands, arranged themselves round the four corners of the altar. The bishop of Autun blessed the consecrated standard and the eighty-three banners: he then opened the chant of the Te Deum. Twelve hundred musicians performed this anthem. Lafayette then, at the head of the Parisian militia, and of the naval and military deputies, approached the altar, and swore in the name of the troops and confederates to be faithful to the nation, the law, and the king. The discharge of four pieces of artillery announced to France this solemn adjuration. The president of the national assembly repeated the same oath. The people took it up, and the words I swear it, rent the air. The king rose up and proclaimed with a loud voice, 'I, king of France, swear to employ the power with which a constitutional act of the state has invested me, to maintain the constitution decreed by the national assembly, and accepted of by me.' The queen at the same moment taking the dauphin in her arms, and holding him up to the people, exclaimed, 'Behold my son; he joins me in these sentiments.' This unexpected exclamation called forth a thousand shouts of 'Live the King! Live the Queen! Live the Dauphin!' The cannon continued to mingle their roar with the bands of military music, and the acclamations of the people; the weather cleared up; the sun shone forth in all his splendour; it would seem as if the Supreme Being himself desired to be a witness of this mutual contract, and ratify the same by his presence. Yes, He did witness it, He did hear it; and the frightful calamities which from that day have never ceased to desolate France, (O just Providence!) are the due punishment of a broken oath. Thou hast stricken both the monarch and the subjects who have violated their solemn vow!

"The enthusiastic feeling and the fêtes were not confined to the day of the federation. There was, during the stay made by the federalists in Paris, a continued succession of feasting, dancing, and amusements. The Champ de Mars was revisited, and drinking, singing, and dancing took place there. M. de Lafayette reviewed a part of the national guard of the departments and the army of the line. The king, the queen, and the dauphin, were present at this review. They were received with acclamations. The queen graciously presented her hand for the federalists to kiss, and held up the dauphin before them. The federalists, before they quitted the capital, went to pay their respects to the king; all of them exhibited the most respectful demeanour and the most perfect attachment to his person. The chief of the Bretons knelt on one knee, and presenting his sword to Louis XVI. said: 'Sire, I hand you the sword of the loyal Bretons, it will never be stained but with the blood of your enemies.' 'This sword cannot be in better hands than in the keeping of my dear Bretons,' replied Louis XVI. while raising the chief of the Bretons, and returning him his sword; 'I never doubted their attachment and loyalty: assure them that I am the father, the brother, the friend of all the French.' The king, agitated by deep emotion, grasped the hand of the Breton chief, and embraced him. A pause, occasioned by the tender emotions of both parties, protracted this affecting scene. The Breton chief was the first to break silence. 'Sire, every Frenchman, if I can judge of the French by ourselves, have maintained and will preserve the utmost attachment towards you, because you are a citizen king.'

"The municipality of Paris were not behindhand in feting the federalists. There were sports on the river, fireworks, illuminations, a ball and collation at the corn-market, and a ball upon the site of the Bastille. As you entered, there was to be seen in large letters, 'Dancing here,' a felicitous association, which bore a striking contrast to the ancient ideas of honour and despair which that hateful prison was calculated to recall. The people went and came from one place to another without confusion. The police, by prohibiting carriages in the streets, had taken care to prevent those accidents so frequently occurring on occasions of public rejoicing, and thus did away with that tumult, hurry, and terror which not unfrequently gives an appearance of a hurried flight from danger to the best regulated and brilliant public rejoicing. Public fêtes are exclusively reserved for the people. If the wealthy are desirous to partake in popular rejoicings, let them on that occasion mix with the people; they will obtain impressions previously unknown to them, and will disturb by their presence the gaiety of their fellow-citizens.

"It was particularly at the Champs Elysées that reflecting imaginations felt the greatest satisfaction at the sight of this charming popular rejoicing. Lamps were suspended from every tree, festoons of small lamps interlaced one another, pyramidal fireworks, placed at certain distances, gave a strong light, affording a strong contrast to the darkness of the trees. The grass-plots and walks were filled with the people. The tradesman, seated with his wife, in the midst of his children, ate, talked, and walked about, and enjoyed himself. Here were to be observed girls and youths, who were dancing to the sound of bands of music in spaces that they had cleared for themselves. A little further on some sailors, in jackets and aprons, surrounded by parties who seemed interested in their proceedings, endeavoured to climb up poles, rubbed with soap, and to win the prize allotted to him who should contrive to carry off a tri-coloured flag fastened at top. No one could fail to observe the bursts of laughter against those who found themselves compelled to abandon the undertaking, and the hearty cheering afforded to those who, more fortunate or more dexterous, appeared likely to carry off the prize. A tempered and deep-seated satisfaction appeared manifest on every face there, and sparkled in every eye, called to mind the peaceful recreations of the happy shades in the Elysian fields, imagined by the ancients. The white apparel of a vast number of women wandering about under the trees of these splendid walks, still further added to the illusion."—Ferrières, vol. ii. p. 80.

NOTE 18. Page 56, col. 2.

M. de Talleyrand predicted in a very remarkable manner the financial consequences of this paper-money. In his address, he first demonstrates the quality of this money, characterises it with great accuracy, and illustrates the reasons of its approaching depreciation. "The national assembly will not surely," said he, "order another emission of two millions of paper-money. It is thought, perhaps, that this second emission will be successful because the first was so; but it must be recollected, that the demands of commerce, so much increased by the revolution, and which gave so rapid a currency to our first conventional money, which demands were so great, that, in my opinion, your paper would have circulated freely and without force, have very much diminished. To build, therefore, your hopes on your first success, which indeed is not complete, since your assignats lose their value in favour of a second and more ample emission, is to expose the state to great danger, for the empire of the law has its limit; this limit is interest, which we must either respect or violate at our peril!

"Without doubt your assignats when issued will have a character of security which no other paper-money ever had; so precious a pledge, secured by so substantial a mortgage, has never before been created: this I am free to confess. The assignat, considered as a bond of debt, has a positive and material value; this value is exactly equivalent to that of the land which it represents; nevertheless it must be granted, that no national paper will ever be able to keep pace with coin; never will the supplementary sign of the first sign representative of riches have the exact value of its model; its title itself proves the want of specie, and want always creates fear and distrust.

"But why, you will ask, must paper-money always be below coin? Because the exact proportion between the mass of your assignats and that of your territorial acquisitions will always be a matter of doubt; and because the period at which your fund of assignats will be exhausted will not be known; coin and paper being put into currency together, both will become a saleable commodity, and the more abundant this commodity, the lower will fall its price; finally, paper-money may be dispensed with, coin cannot; an abundance of the latter would soon stop the circulation of the former."

Further on the orator adds, "Paper-money must be considered merely as a representative of coin. However sure, therefore, or solid it may be, it is only the sign, whether free or forced, not of riches, but of credit. It follows from hence, that to give paper the character of specie, by making it intermediate between all articles of exchange, is to change the standard value of money, and to operate in a moment that which ages will scarcely bring about in the most flourishing commercial states."

After having shown the nature of the new money, M. de Talleyrand predicts, with singular precision, the confusion which has taken place in private transactions.

"But finally, let us follow the march of the assignats, and see what course they will take. The reimbursed creditor must either buy land with his paper, or keep it, or employ it in gaining other acquisitions. If he purchases land, then your object is gained; I shall applaud you for the creation of the assignats, for they will not have been disseminated by circulation, and will have effected that which you desired, by giving the public creditors the ability of paying themselves by the public domains. But if the distrustful creditor prefers neglecting your interests by preserving a dormant claim; or if he converts his assignats into coin to get rid of them, or transports them into foreign countries in exchange for goods; or if these instances are much more numerous than the former; if, in a word, the assignats remain a long time in circulation before they are annihilated; if they are forced into and remain in the hands of men obliged to receive them as equal in value to coin, and who, owing nothing, cannot dispose of them but with loss; if they become the occasion of great injustice committed by debtors towards their creditors by forcing them to receive assignats as equal to money, whilst in reality their value is less, since it will be impossible to oblige sellers to receive them at such a value, that is to say, without augmenting the price of their merchandise in proportion to the inferiority of the assignats; then how much will this ingenious operation have deceived the patriotism of those whose sagacity has planned, and who sincerely defend it; and to what inconsolable regrets shall we not be condemned for our precipitate confidence."

It cannot then be said, that the constituent assembly was in utter ignorance of its determination; but to these conjectures we can reply one of those answers which no one ever ventures to make at the particular period, but that which must become decisive, and are so in their consequence: this answer was, necessity; that is to say, the necessity for providing for the national debt, and dividing the national property.

NOTE 19. Page 59, col. 2.

It is not possible that there should not be a diversity of opinion on a work composed collectively, by a great number of men. Unanimity is rare; every one must have disapproved of that which he voted against. Thus each article of the constitution of 1791 was condemned by individuals of that body which framed it; nevertheless it was their real and incontestable work. The want of unanimity which is here noticed must happen to every deliberative body. Mirabeau's plan, therefore, was nothing but a fraud. It might even be said, that there was but little delicacy in his procedure, but we must excuse that in a great but irregular man, who seemed to think the propriety of the end justified the means, I mean the morality of the object in view, for Mirabeau was a sincere believer in the necessity there was for a reformed constitution; and so far as his ambition and his petty personal rivalries could assist in estranging him from the popular party, he had a great dread of anarchy. Others, far differently constituted than he was, dreaded the court and the aristocracy far more than the people. Thus he had real dangers to apprehend, whatever position he took. Conviction shifts with the point from which the view is made, and morality, that is to say, integrity, may be found in parties the most opposed to each other.

NOTE 20. Page 61, col. 1.

Ferrières, who was an eye-witness of the intrigues of this period, relates those which were employed to prevent the priests from taking the oath. This passage appears to be too characteristic not to be cited.

"The bishops and the revolutionists consult and intrigue together; the one party to force the priests to take the oath, the other to hinder them. Both parties feel the influence which the conduct of the ecclesiastics of the assembly will have in the provinces. The bishops become intimate with their curates; all the devout are in great agitation. All conversations turn upon the oath of the clergy. It appears as if the fate of France, and the destiny of all Frenchmen, depended on the taking or rejection of it. Men the most liberal in their religious opinions, and women the most infamous in their morals, have become, all at once, severe theologians and zealous upholders of the purity and integrity of the Romish faith.

"The Journal de Fontenay, L'Ami du Roi, and the Gazette de Durosier, employ their ordinary arms, exaggeration, falsehood, and calumny. Numerous papers are circulated by them, in the which the civil constitution of the clergy is treated as schismatical, heretical, and destructive of religion. The bigots carry these papers from house to house; they pray, beg, or make threats, according to the different dispositions or characters they have to deal with. To some are displayed pictures of the clergy triumphant, the assembly dissolved, the prevaricating ecclesiastics deprived of their benefices, and shut up in houses of correction, and those who have remained faithful, rewarded with glory and riches. The pope, according to these representations, is about to launch his thunders against the sacrilegious assembly and apostate priests. The people, deprived of the sacraments, are to rise in insurrection, foreign powers to enter France, and the edifice of iniquity which has been raised by the assembly, is about to crumble on its own foundations."—Ferrières, vol. ii. p. 198.

NOTE 21. Page 62, col. 1.

M. Froment relates the following fact in his memoirs already cited:—

"Under these circumstances, the princes conceived the idea of forming regiments in the interior of the kingdom entirely composed of those who remained loyal subjects of the king, to make use of them till the troops of the line were entirely re-organized. Being desirous of being at the head of the royalists whom I had commanded in 1789 and 1790, I wrote to Monsieur the count d'Artois, to beg his royal highness to grant me the brevet rank of colonel commandant, on the condition of my enlisting a sufficient number of citizens to form a regiment, requesting him at the same time to make the same grant to every other royalist. M. the count d'Artois applauded the idea, and received my demand favourably, but the members of the council did not entertain the same sentiments; they found it so strange that a bourgeois should pretend to a military brevet, that one of them asked me in a disdainful manner, why I did not demand a bishopric? my only answer to this observation was a burst of laughter, which a little disconcerted the gravity of the interrogator. Nevertheless the question was discussed again at the house of M. de Flaschlanden; this council thought that the new corps should be denominated 'legions bourgeoises.' I observed that under this title they would simply form new bodies of national guards; that the princes could not order them to march wherever they might be required, because their duty would merely be to defend their own homes; that it was to be feared that the factions would embroil them with the troops of the line; that the revolutionists had, under specious titles, armed the people against the public authorities; and that it would be wise to follow their example, and give to the new corps the denomination of the royal militia, that * * * *

"The bishop of Arras here interrupting me suddenly, said, 'No, no, sir, the word bourgeois must be in your commission;' and the baron de Flaschlanden, who drew it up, accordingly introduced that denomination."—Collection of Papers relative to the Revolution, p. 62.

NOTE 22. Page 68, col. 1.

The following are the details of the return from Varennes which madame Campan received from the mouth of the queen herself:—

"On the day of my arrival, the queen called me into her cabinet to tell me that she should have great occasion for me to carry on the communications she had entered into with Messieurs Barnave, Duport, and Alexander Lameth. She informed me that M. J—— was her mediator with these members of the constitutional party, who had good intentions, unhappily too late; and assured me that Barnave was a man worthy of esteem. I was astonished to hear her pronounce the name of Barnave with so much kindness. When I quitted Paris he was spoken of only with abhorrence. I made this remark to her; she was not astonished at it, but said that he was very much changed; and that he was a young man of genius and noble sentiments, but misled by ambition: 'a sentiment of pride which I cannot very heavily censure in a young man of the tiers état,' said the queen, when speaking of Barnave, 'captivated him with all that paved the way to distinction for that class in which he is born; and if ever power return into our hands, the pardon of Barnave is already written in our hearts.' The queen added, 'that it was not the same with respect to the nobles who had thrown themselves into the revolution, for they had obtained all the favours of the court, and often to the detriment of the inferior classes, among whom the greatest talents were found; and finally, that being nobles, they were the natural rampart of monarchy, and were consequently too culpable to be pardoned.' The queen astonished me more and more by the warmth with which she justified the favourable opinion she had conceived of Barnave. She told me that his conduct on the road was that of a perfect gentleman, whilst the republican rudeness of Pétion was disgusting, for that the latter ate and drank in the most uncleanly manner in the carriage, and threw his bones out of the window, at the risk of throwing them into the king's face; and that this conduct was premeditated, since the man had received some education, and that Barnave was perfectly shocked. He, when he was pressed by the queen to take some refreshment, replied, 'Madame, the deputies of the national assembly, on so solemn an occasion as the present, only claim your majesty's attention with regard to their mission, and not with regard to their wants.' All these respectful regards and delicate attentions gained not only the goodwill of the queen, but that of madame Elizabeth.

"The king had begun to talk to Pétion on the situation of France, and the motives of his own conduct, which were founded on the necessity of giving a necessary force to the action of the executive power, for the good of the constitution itself, since France could not become a republic. 'Not yet, in truth,' replied Pétion, 'because the French are not sufficiently ripe for that.' This audacious and cruel reply imposed silence on the king, who spoke no more till his arrival at Paris. Pétion held on his knees the young dauphin; he amused himself by twisting the auburn locks of this interesting child round his fingers, and in the vehemence of speaking pulled his hair so violently as to make him cry. 'Give me my son,' said the queen, 'he has been accustomed to care and attention, which render him ill fit for such familiarities.'

"The chevalier de Dampierre had been killed near the carriage of the king going out of Varennes. A poor curate of a village at some leagues distant from the place where this crime was committed had the imprudence to approach to speak to the king; the infuriated rabble surrounded the carriage and attacked him furiously. 'Tigers,' said Barnave, 'have you ceased to be Frenchmen? Nation of heroes, have you become a race of assassins?' These words alone saved from certain death the curate, who was already thrown to the earth. Barnave, in pronouncing them, sprang nearly out of the door of the carriage, and madame Elizabeth, touched by his noble feelings, held him back by his coat. The queen said, when speaking of this event, that at the most critical moments, ridiculous contrasts always struck her; and, in the present instance, the pious Elizabeth holding Barnave back by his coat, appeared to her a most comic situation. The deputy experienced another kind of astonishment. The discourse of madame Elizabeth on the situation of France, her soft and persuasive eloquence, the noble simplicity with which she conversed with Barnave, without diminishing, in the least degree, her dignity, appeared to him enchanting in this charming princess, and his heart, disposed to receive the noblest sentiments, if it had not been seduced into error, was captivated by the most touching admiration. The conduct of the two deputies displayed to the queen at once the distinction between the republican and constitutional party. At the inns where she stopped she had some private conversations with Barnave. He spoke much of the faults of the royalists during the revolution, and said that he had found the interests of the court so feebly and badly defended, that he had been many times tempted to offer himself as its courageous champion, who knew the spirit of the age and the nation. The queen asked him what were the means the employment of which he would have advised? 'Popularity, madam,' replied he. 'And how could I have any?' answered her majesty. 'Ah, madame,' said Barnave, 'it would be much more easy for you to command it than for me to obtain it.' This assertion has furnished matter for commentary; I confine myself to the narration of this curious conversation."—Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 150.

NOTE 23. Page 69, col. 1.

The following is the answer itself from the pen of Barnave, a beautiful specimen of argument, address, and dignity.

"I see, gentlemen," said Louis to the commissioners, "I see by the object of your mission that there is no question here of interrogation; so that I myself wish to fulfil the desires of the assembly. I shall never fear to make the motives of my conduct public. The outrages and menaces which were practised against me and my family on the 14th of April, were the cause of my quitting Paris. Many writers had endeavoured to excite the people to violence against my person and family. There appeared to be no more safety or even consideration for me in this city. I never intended to quit the kingdom; I have never entered into any plan for the furtherance of such an object, neither with foreign powers, with any relations, nor with any of the French emigrants. As a proof of my intentions, I can assure you lodgings were prepared for me at Montmédy. I chose this place because, being fortified, my family would be in greater security; and because, being near the frontier, I should have been better prepared to oppose any invasion of France, if any had been attempted. One of my principal motives in quitting Paris was to destroy the argument of my want of freedom, which might have given occasion to disturbances. If I had had the intention of quitting the kingdom, I should not have published my declaration on the very day of my departure; I should have waited till I was beyond the frontiers; but I always retained the desire of returning to Paris. It is in this sense that the last sentence of my declaration should be understood, in which it is said, 'Frenchmen, and you especially, Parisians, with what pleasure shall I not return again amongst you ? I had only in my carriage three thousand louis in gold, and fifty-six thousand livres in assignats. I only informed Monsieur of my intended departure a very short time before it took place. Monsieur went into a foreign country, because he had agreed with me that we should not take the same road ; it was his intention to return to France after me. The passport was necessary to facilitate my journey, and was taken for a foreign country because passports are not given at the foreign-office for the interior of the kingdom. The road to Frankfort was not even followed. I made no protestation except that which I left in my declaration before my departure. This protest does not touch upon, as its contents show, the fundamental principles of the constitution, but the form of the sanctions, that is to say, the little liberty I appeared to enjoy, and on the impossibility of judging of the constitution as a whole, the decrees having been presented to me separately, and not in a body. The principal reproach which is contained in the declaration relates to the difficulties attending the administrative and executive powers. I observed, in my journey, that the public opinion was in favour of the constitution ; I could not form an opinion of the public opinion of Paris ; but from the remarks I have personally made on my journey, I am convinced how necessary it is, for the support of the constitution, to give strength to the established authorities for the maintenance of public order. Immediately I perceived the general wish of the nation, I hesitated no longer, as I have never hesitated in making a sacrifice of any thing personal to myself. The happiness of the people has always been the object of my desires. I shall forget willingly all the troubles I have experienced, if I can promote the welfare of the nation."

NOTE 24. Page 72, col. 1.

Bouillé possessed an intimate friend in the count de Gouvernet; and although they did not agree upon every point, they had a great regard for each other. Bouillé, who deals but little in constitutionals, expresses himself with the highest respect towards M. Gouvernet, and opens his mind fully on the subject. For the purpose of imparting in his memoirs a notion of what was taking place in the assembly at this period, he cites the following letter, written to himself by the count de Gouvernet, the 26th August, 1791 :—

"I have given you hopes which I entertain no longer myself. This fatal constitution, which was to have been revised and ameliorated, will remain unaltered. It will remain, as it is, a code of anarchy, a source of calamities; and our baneful star, at the very moment when the democrats perceived, in some degree, their errors, has caused the aristocrats to refuse their support, and oppose all reparation. To inform you of the present state of affairs, and to clear myself from the imputation of having given you false hopes, I must take a retrospective view, and acquaint you with all that has lately happened, as I have at present an opportunity of writing to you.

"On the first and second day of the departure of the king, the two sides of the assembly remained in an attitude of observation on the respective movements of each other. The popular party was struck with consternation; the royalist party appeared unquiet; the least indication might have awakened the fury of the people. All the members of the right side remained silent, and those of the left, left to their leaders the proposition of those measures which they called measures of security, and which no one opposed. On the second day the jacobins became menacing, and the constitutionalists moderate. The latter were then and are still much more numerous than the jacobins. These spoke of an accommodation, and a deputation to the king. A conference to be held the next day was also proposed to M. Malouet, but the arrest of the king prevented it taking place. Nevertheless the opinions of the constitutionalists were decidedly pronounced by the part they had already taken, and this separated them still more widely from the violent party. Barnave, since his return, has shown a disposition decidedly favourable to the royal sufferers. He, as you know, is the most talented of his party. As a first effort of his newly-acquired zeal, he rallied around him four-fifths of the left side, not only to save the king from the fury of the jacobins, but also to restore to him a portion of his former authority, and enable him in future to defend himself without violating the constitution. With regard to the last part of Barnave's plan, Lameth and Duport were alone in the secret; the revision of the constitution still inspired much apprehension, and the constitutionalists could by no means make sure of a majority without counting the members of the right side; this, however, they thought they might confidently do, and therefore in the approaching revision intended to give a wider latitude to the royal authority.

"Such was the state of things when I wrote to you last. But convinced as I was of the perverse disposition of the aristocrats, and of the continual inconsistencies of their conduct, I did not think they would have gone so far as they have gone.

"As soon as the news of the arrest of the king was known, the right side, in their secret committees, resolved to vote no longer, and to take no part in the deliberations or discussions of the assembly. Malouet did not agree with them in this resolution. He represented to them that whilst the session lasted, and they assisted at it, they were under an obligation to oppose actively every measure destructive of public order, and the fundamental principles of monarchy. All these representations were useless; they persisted in their resolution, and drew up secretly a protest against all the acts of the assembly. Malouet protested in his turn against the adoption of this measure, and made every effort to prevent its being carried into effect. He, however, gained over only from thirty-five to forty members to his opinion, and he told me that he feared greatly that Barnave's plan would fail for want of support.

"The general dispositions of the assembly were so favourable to the king, that whilst he was on his road to Paris, Thouret having ascended the tribune to determine the manner in which he should be guarded, (I was at the sitting,) the most perfect silence prevailed throughout the chamber, and in the galleries. All listened to the fatal decree with an air of consternation; but no one spoke. The president was going to put it to the vote, when, all at once, Malouet rose up, and with an indignant air cried out, 'What are you about to do, gentlemen? After having arrested your king, do you propose to make him a prisoner? Where will this conduct lead you? Think well of it. Will you order your king to be imprisoned? 'No! no!' exclaimed many members of the left side, rising in tumult; 'we do not mean that the king should be a prisoner;' and the decree was on the point of being almost unanimously rejected, when Thourat hastened to add,—

"The object of this decree has been wilfully misinterpreted. The imprisonment of the king has never been contemplated, it is only for his safety, and that of his family, that measures are proposed.' It was only after this explanation that the decree passed, although the imprisonment is real, and is shamelessly prolonged even to the present moment.

"Towards the end of July, the constitutionalists, who expected a protest from the right side, yet were not sure of it, gradually pursued their plan of revision. They feared the jacobins and aristocrats more than ever. Malouet attended their committee of revision. He spoke to them first as to men to whom he could teach nothing with respect to the dangers and vices of their constitution; but he found them little disposed to great reforms. They feared the loss of their popularity. Target and Dupont warmly defended their work. The next day Chapelier, who had at first disdainfully refused to hear any thing of Barnave's plan, but had afterwards agreed to take part in it, joined this conference. Malouet proposed discussing in the sitting of the 8th, the merits of all the principal articles of the constitution, and severally pointing out its vices. 'You, gentlemen,' said he, 'answer me; overwhelm me with your indignation; defend your work skilfully on the least dangerous articles, and even on the majority of points to which my censures will be directed; and as to those which I shall declare to be anti-monarchical, reply that neither the assembly nor the committee needed my remarks on those questions; that you intended yourself to propose the reform of the articles to which I had alluded, and forthwith propose it.' This plan was agreed to; but the protest of the right side being known, and their obstinate determination to withhold their votes from every discussion, whilst the strenuous opposition of the jacobins was certain, it was given up with deep regret. Malouet, who had no regular communications with the constitutionalists, nevertheless made his attack. He solemnly rejected the constitution as anti-monarchical, and impracticable on many points. His arguments had already begun to make a great impression, when Chapelier, who expected no success from this project, interrupted the orator, declared he had been uttering blasphemies, and requested the president to make him descend the tribune, which he was, in fact, obliged to do. The next day he avowed that he had been to blame; but said that the obstinacy of the right side had deprived himself and his party of all hope, and that they were therefore unwilling to venture an attack which would certainly prove fruitless.

"It was necessary to give you this long history, that you might not lose all confidence in my prognostications. They are gloomy at present; the evil of the state of public affairs is extreme; and I see, neither within nor without, but one remedy, that of adding force to reason."—Memoirs of Bonillé, p. 282.

NOTE 25. Page 74, col. 2.

The minister Bertrand de Molleville has given us so clear an insight into the inclinations of the king and queen at the commencement of the first legislative assembly, that no doubt can remain of their sincerity at that time. The following is an account of his first interview with these august personages:—

"After having answered to some general observations I had made concerning the difficulty of circumstances in which, as minister, I should be placed, and the numerous errors I might commit in a situation, the duties of which I was perfectly unacquainted with, the king continued: 'Well! have you any other objection to make?'—'No, sire, the desire to obey and please your majesty is the only sentiment I feel; but to know whether I can flatter myself with the idea of doing this, it will be necessary to give me some notion of your majesty's plan relative to the observance of the constitution, and what is the conduct you would wish your ministers to pursue.'

"'This is just,' replied the king; 'I do not, I must confess, regard the constitution as a chef-d'œuvre, and what is more, I believe it has great defects, and that if I had the liberty of addressing some observations to the assembly on the subject, very advantageous reforms might result from them; but the time for doing this has passed by; I have accepted of it, such as it is; I have sworn to put it into execution; it is my duty to do so. I will be strictly faithful to my oath, and more particularly so, because I believe that the most exact execution of the constitution is the surest method of making its defects known to the nation, and of bringing about such reforms as it may require. I have, and can have no other plan than this; I shall never deviate from it myself, and it is my desire that the conduct of my ministers should be conformable to it also.' 'This plan appears to me infinitely wise, sire; I feel myself perfectly disposed to follow it, and I enter into the engagement so to do. I have not sufficiently studied the new constitution, either in its general character, or its details, to have any decided opinion concerning it, and I shall abstain from adopting any, till the execution of it has enabled the nation to appreciate its merits by its effects. But is it permitted me to ask your majesty whether the opinion of the queen is conformable to that of your majesty?' 'Yes, absolutely; she will tell you so herself.'

"I then visited the queen, who after having declared, with extreme graciousness, that she felt herself under the same obligation to me as the king, by my acceptance of the ministry at such a critical period, added these words: 'The king has acquainted you with his intentions relative to the constitution; do you not think that the only plan he should follow, is to be faithful to his oath?' 'Yes, certainly, madame.' 'Well! be assured that no one will make us change it. Courage, M. Bertrand, all is not yet lost; patience, firmness, and time will restore all.'"—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. vi. p. 22.

NOTE 26. Page 77, col. 1.

We learn from madame Campan that the king had a secret correspondence with Coblenz.

"Whilst couriers carried letters from the king to his brothers, and the foreign princes, the assembly prayed him to write to the princes to persuade them to return to France. The king ordered the abbé de Montesquieu to write such a letter as he would wish to send them. This letter, which was excellently written, in a style touching and simple, suitable to the character of the king, and filled with powerful arguments for rallying round the constitution, was given to me by the king that I might take a copy of it.

"About this time, M. Mor . . . , one of the superintendents of the household of Monsieur, obtained a passport from the assembly to join that prince, on some indispensable domestic affair. The queen chose him for the porter of this letter; she insisted upon giving it him herself, and explaining to him its contents. The choice of this courier astonished me: the queen assured me he was perfectly suitable; that she even reckoned on his indiscretion, for that it was essential that the knowledge of this letter being written from the king to his brother should get abroad. The princes were, without doubt, warned by the private correspondence of this manœuvre. Nevertheless, Monsieur manifested some surprise at the receipt of the letter, and the messenger returned more hurt than gratified by a mark of confidence which might have cost him his life during the reign of terror."—Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 172.

NOTE 27. Page 78, col. 2.

Letter of the King to his Brother Louis Stanislaus Xavier.

"Paris, 11th Nov. 1791.

"I wrote to you, my brother, on the 16th of October last, and you ought not to have doubted of the truth of the sentiments I then expressed. I am astonished that my letter did not produce the effect I had a right to expect from it. I have appealed to every motive which ought to influence you, to recall you to your duties. Your absence affords a pretext to evil designers, and a sort of excuse to all those who are misled, and who think they are serving me by keeping France in a state of inquietude and agitation, which is the torment of my life. The revolution is finished, the constitution is established, France has chosen it, and I will maintain it; it is on its stability that the safety of the monarchy at present depends. The constitution has given you rights, but has imposed a condition upon them which you ought to hasten to fulfil. Believe me, my brother, and dismiss those doubts which have been instilled into you, with respect to my liberty. I am about to prove, by a solemn act, and at a most interesting conjuncture, that I can act freely. Prove to me that you are my brother and a Frenchman, by yielding to my entreaties. Your proper place is near me; your interest, and the sentiments of your heart, must equally prompt you to resume it; I invite you, or if I must, I command you to do so.

(Signed)

"Louis."

The Answer of Monsieur to the King.

"Coblentz, Dec. 3rd, 1791.

"Sire, my Brother and Lord,—The count de Vergennes has sent me a letter from your majesty, the address of which, although my Christian names are on it, so little resembles mine, that I thought of returning it unopened. Nevertheless, on his positive assurance that it was for me, I opened it, and the name of brother leaving me no doubt of its being intended for me, I read it with the respect which is due to the handwriting and signature of your majesty. The order which it contains for me to return near the person of your majesty, is not the free expression of your majesty's will, and my honour, my duty, and even my affection equally forbid my obedience. If your majesty would wish to have a more detailed explanation of my motives, I pray your majesty to refer to my letter of the 10th of September last. I pray you also graciously to receive the homage of the most tender and respectful sentiments, with which

"I am, Sire, &c. &c. &c."

Letter of the King to his Brother Charles Philip.

"Paris, 11th Nov. 1791.

"You have assuredly been informed of the decree which the national assembly have passed with respect to emigrants, to which I have thought it my duty to refuse my consent, as I would wish to persuade myself that gentle means will more effectually accomplish the proposed end, which the interest of the state imperatively calls for. My uniform conduct with respect to you can leave you no doubt as to my intentions or wishes. The public tranquillity and my personal repose are interested in your return. You certainly cannot persist in a conduct which disturbs France and afflicts me, without failing in your most essential duties. Spare me the regret of having recourse to severe measures against you; consult your true interest; allow yourself to be guided by the love which you owe to your country, and yield, finally, to the desires of the nation, and those of your king. This conduct, on your part, will be a proof of your sentiments of attachment to me, and will secure to you the continuance of those I have always entertained for you.

(Signed)

"Louis."

Answer of the Count d'Artois to the King.

"Coblentz, Dec. 3rd, 1791.

"Sire, my Brother and Lord,—The count de Vergennes sent me yesterday a letter, which he assures me was addressed to me by your majesty. The superscription which gives me a title which I cannot admit of, made me believe that the letter was not destined for me; nevertheless, as I recognised the seal of your majesty, I opened it, and paid due respect to the handwriting and signature of my sovereign; but the total omission of the name of brother, and, more than all, the decisions referred to in the letter, gave me a new proof of the moral and physical captivity in which our enemies dare to retain your majesty. After this discovery, your majesty will not be surprised, if, faithful to my duty, and the laws of honour, I yield not obedience to orders evidently extorted by violence.

"For the rest, the letter I had the honour of writing to your majesty, conjointly with Monsieur, on the 10th of September last, contains those sentiments, principles, and resolutions, from which I shall never deviate; I refer your majesty therefore to that; in it is contained the fundamental principles of my conduct, from which I here again pledge myself never to swerve. I pray your majesty to receive the homage of my most tender and respectful sentiments, with which

"I am, Sire, &c. &c. &c."

NOTE 28. Page 78, col. 2.

The report of Messrs. Gallois and Gensonné is, without contradiction, the best account of the commencement of the disturbances in La Vendée. The beginning of these disturbances is the most interesting part, because it brings us acquainted with their cause. I think it therefore necessary to cite this report. It appears to me to throw light on one of the most curious parts of this fatal history.

Report of Messieurs Gallois and Gensonné, Civil Commissaries, sent into the Departments of La Vendée and the Two Sèvres, by virtue of a decree of the Constituent Assembly, received by the Legislative Assembly, on the 9th of October, 1791.

"Gentlemen,—The national assembly decreed on the 16th of July last, on the report of its committee of inquiry, that civil commissaries should be sent into the department of La Vendée, to gain all the information they could procure on the causes of the late disturbances in that country, and to endeavour to repress them, and, in concert with the legislature, to prevent their recurrence.

"On the 23rd of July we received this mission, and we set out two days after for Fontenay-le-Compte, the chief town of the department.

"After having conferred some days with the administrators of the directory on the situation of things, and the disposition of the public mind; and after having, in conjunction with the administrative bodies, entered into some preliminary measures for the maintenance of public order, we determined to travel into the different districts into which this department is divided, that we might examine whether the complaints which had reached us were true or false, real or exaggerated, and that we might be able to state, with the greatest possible exactness, the situation of this department.

"We have now traversed nearly the whole of its extent, sometimes to gain necessary information; sometimes to maintain peace and prevent disturbances, and at others to ward off acts of violence with which some citizens believed themselves menaced.

"We have received from many district directories communications from all the municipalities of which they are composed; we have listened, with great attention, to all citizens who had either facts to communicate, or views to propose to us; and we have with great care collected all the details which have come to our knowledge; but as our information has been multiplied rather than various, as the facts, complaints, and observations, which have come under our notice have always been of the same description, we think it best to present to you, under one general point of view, and in a concise but exact manner, the general result of such a multitude of particulars.

"We consider it useless to lay before you the details we have procured concerning former disturbances; they do not appear to us to have had any direct influence on the actual situation of the department; besides, the law of amnesty having arrested the progress of those law proceedings to which those troubles had given rise, we could only give you, on those subjects, vague conjectures and uncertain results.

"As the time when the ecclesiastical oath was first enforced, disturbances took place in the department of La Vendée; until then the people had enjoyed the greatest tranquillity. Being far removed from the common centre of activity and tumult, and disposed, by their natural character, to peace and good order, they seemed to enjoy the benefits of the revolution, without partaking of its evils.

"The seclusion of this province, its difficulty of communication with any other, the simplicity of an agricultural life, ignorance of letters, and the seductions of a worship extremely captivating, have rendered the inhabitants of these parts so susceptible of superstitious feelings, and kindled such a fanatical enthusiasm in their minds, that it appears hopeless to endeavour to enlighten their understandings by reason.

"The religion of the Vendéans, that is to say, the view they have taken of religion, has become the strongest, or to speak more properly, the only moral feeling of life; the most essential duty it presents is the worship of images, and the minister of this worship, whom the inhabitants regard as the dispenser of heavenly blessings, who can, say they, by the fervour of his prayers, mitigate the inclemency of the seasons, who, they believe, has power to determine their eternal weal or woe, has acquired absolute control over the most amiable and ardent affections of their souls.

"The constancy of these people in their religious fervour, and the unlimited confidence their priests enjoy, are the principal causes of the disturbances which have taken place, and may still continue to prevail in this department.

"It is easy to conceive with what activity the priests and the factions take advantage of this disposition of the people in their favour; nothing has been neglected to inflame their zeal, to alarm their consciences, to fortify the weak, and insipid the daring; inquietude and remorse has been instilled into the minds of some; to others hopes of triumph and success have been held out; and the influence of seduction or of fear has been successfully practised upon nearly all.

"Many of the ecclesiastics of these districts act their part with sincerity; they appear to be strongly impressed with the opinions they propagate, and the sentiment they inspire; others are accused of concealing their real designs under the cloak of religion; and the political activity of these latter increases or moderates, according to circumstances.

"A powerful coalition has been formed between the former bishop of Luçon, and a part of the clergy of his diocese; they have resolved upon a plan of opposition to the execution of many decrees about to be carried into effect in several parishes; mandates and inflammatory publications have been addressed to all the curates, to fortify their resolutions of resistance, or to engage them in a confederation which is supposed to be general; a circular letter of M. Beaurégaud, grand-vicar of M. de Merco, formerly bishop of Luçon, deposited at the registry of the tribunal of Fontenay, and which the ecclesiastic has since acknowledged in his examination, will enable you, gentlemen, to form a pretty correct opinion, both of the secret of this coalition, and of the skilful and combined plan which has been formed for forwarding their designs. It is as follows:—

"Letter dated Luçon, 31st of May, 1791, addressed under cover to the Curate of Reorthé.

"Sir,—A decree of the national assembly, dated May 7th, grants to those ecclesiastics which it pretends to deprive of the exercise of their functions, on account of their refusal to take the oath, the use of parish churches solely for the purpose of celebrating mass; the same decree authorises Roman Catholics, as also all nonconformists, to assemble for the practice of their religious worship in any place they may choose for that purpose, on condition that in their public exhortations the civil constitution of the clergy be not animadverted on.

"The liberty granted to the legitimate pastors by the first article of this decree, should be regarded only as a dangerous snare; almost all the churches have been seized upon by false pastors; the faithful may, therefore, be forced to listen to their instructions, and receive the sacrament from schismatics, which the laws of the church forbid. To avoid so great an evil, all curates will feel the necessity of securing at least one place, where they can, by virtue of the second article of the decree, exercise their functions, and assemble their faithful parishioners, whilst their pretended successors occupy their church; without this precaution, many, in the fear of being deprived of the mass, and other divine institutions, might be induced to communicate with false pastors, and thus be exposed to the risk of almost inevitable seduction.

"In the parishes where there are but few rich proprietors, it will undoubtedly be difficult to find a suitable place, and to procure sacred vases, &c.; in such cases, a simple barn, a portable altar, and earthenware vases, will serve to solemnize the sacred mysteries.

"This simplicity and poverty, by recalling to our minds the first ages of the church, the cradle of our holy religion, will be a powerful means of exciting the zeal of the ministers, and the fervour of the faithful.

"The bishop of Luçon, in the instructions he has transmitted to us as a supplement to those of the bishop of Langres, and which will be equally communicated to the other dioceses, urges all the clergy,—

"1st. To keep a registry in duplicate of all acts of baptism, marriage, or burial, of all the catholics of their respective parishes; one of these registers to remain in their own hands, and the other to be deposited yearly in the hands of some person worthy of confidence.

"2nd. Besides this register, all curates are also recommended to keep another, with a duplicate, in which to insert all acts of dispensation relative to marriages; these acts to be signed by two credible and faithful witnesses, and to give them the greater validity, the registers in which they are inserted should be approved and examined by the bishop, or in his absence by one of his vicars-general; a duplicate of this document should also be committed to the care of some trustworthy individual.

"3rd. The clergy will be careful not to retire from their respective churches till the nomination of their successors is specifically notified to them, upon which they will do well to protest against such violation of their rights.

"4th. They are also commanded to prepare secretly legal statements of the instructions of their successors, of which I subjoin a model; and to give this act all possible validity, it should be signed by the curate, his vicar, and, if there is one, by a neighbouring priest, or by two or three pious and discreet laymen, all precautions nevertheless being observed to keep it secret.

"5th. Those of the clergy whose functions may be suppressed without the intervention of the legitimate bishops, must regard themselves always as the only legitimate pastors of their parishes, and should it be impossible to remain in those parishes, they should endeavour to procure a lodging in the neighbourhood, so as to be enabled to attend to the spiritual necessities of their parishioners.

"6th. Should the civil power deny the use of the common burial-ground to the faithful, or should the parents of the deceased manifest any great repugnance to his being interred in any particular spot, though specially consecrated, the legitimate pastor having solemnized the service of the ritual in his house, the body of the defunct may be carried to the door of the church; but should the false pastor interfere, the procession must retire instantly, to avoid contamination.

"I beg of you, sir, and those of your brethren to whom you may think fit to communicate my letter, to have the goodness to inform us of the moment of your removal, and of the installation of your pretended successor; of the most remarkable circumstances which may attend it; of the dispositions of your parishioners; of the steps you may think it your duty to take for the service of your parishioners; and of your abode, if you should be absolutely forced to quit your present residence. You must be aware that all these details are particularly interesting to us; your troubles and ours are the same, and we ardently desire to lighten your sufferings by bearing our share in all that may befall you.

"I have the honour to be, with the most respectful and inviolable attachment, your most obedient humble servant."

"These attempts to excite disturbances have been powerfully seconded by the missionaries established in the town of St. Laurent, in the district of Montaign. It is to their activity and zeal, to their plots and secret exhortations, that we chiefly ascribe the troubled state of the department, and we feel it our duty to call the attention of the assembly to the conduct of these zealots, and to the spirit by which they seem to be actuated.

"This establishment was founded about sixty years ago; it is supported by charity, and the only business of the priests who are the objects of this bounty, is preaching. These missionaries, who have acquired the attachment of the people by distributing indulgences, and such like practices, have lately become sufficiently numerous to found other establishments in several parts of the kingdom. There are now hordes of them to be found in Poitou, Anjou, Brittany, and Annis; but their principal place of abode is St. Laurent. In this last town, they have built a spacious and beautiful meeting-house, and have acquired, it is said, other territorial property.

"This institution is allied to another, an establishment of sisters of the grey order. These latter give up their time to the service of the poor, and are constant in their attendance upon hospitals: they afford a medium of general correspondence to the missionaries to all parts of the kingdom, and on some occasions, when the intolerance of their zeal has provoked their expulsion from the hospitals, they have taken refuge in the religious asylum of their brother fanatics, the priests.

"To enable you to form an opinion of the conduct of these zealous missionaries, and of the religious morality which they profess, it will be sufficient, gentlemen, to present you with an abridged summary of the maxims contained in several manuscripts which have been seized in their houses by the national guards of Angers and Cholet.

"These manuscripts, drawn up in the form of instructions for the country people, establish it as a principle, that none can communicate with the constitutional priests, denominated intruders, for the administration of the sacraments, without incurring the guilt of a mortal sin; that those who are married by these intruders are not really married, and that the Divine curse is both upon them and their children, begotten in such unlawful wedlock; that the validity of marriages solemnized by the recusant priests is incontestable; that their children are legitimate, however they may be stigmatized by the faithless; that, on the contrary, the children of those married by false pastors are really bastards; that it is forbidden to the faithful to have their relatives buried by the new curates; that if a legitimate pastor cannot perform that service without endangering his life, the parents and friends are permitted to solemnize it secretly and privately themselves.

"Such, gentlemen, are the absurd and seditious instructions which these manuscripts contain, and of which the public voice accuses the missionaries of Saint-Lambert of being the most zealous propagators.

"The tardy removal of the recusant priests from their cures, has greatly contributed to the success of this coalition. M. Rodrigue, the present bishop of the department, was not nominated to that bishopric till the beginning of May. At that time an uniform system of resistance had been planned; an open and active opposition was at work; the grand vicars and curates were closely allied together; the jealousies, rivalries, and quarrels of the ancient hierarchy had had time to subside, and all their interests had become united in one common cause.

"The removal of the recusant clergy has only as yet been partially effected; a great majority of these ecclesiastics still remain in their parishes, invested with their former functions; the last nominations have hardly had any effect, as the new priests, alarmed at the prospect of a dangerous conflict, refuse to officiate.

"This schism among the clergy has also produced disunion among the people; religious feuds destroy the peace of private families; wives daily separate from their husbands, and children abandon their parents.

"The municipalities are also in a state of great disorganization; very few of them concur in the removal of the priests who have not taken the oath.

"A great number of citizens have renounced the service of the national guard, and those who remain in it cannot without danger be employed in any affair in which religion is concerned, because the people would then see in the national guard, not a neutral instrument of the law, but the agents of a party opposed to them.

"In many parts of the department, a public functionary, a judge, or a member of an electoral body have become objects of aversion to the people, from their exertions to enforce the laws relative to the civil constitution of the clergy.

"Nothing is more common, than in a parish of five or six hundred persons, to see only ten or twelve attend the mass of the new priest; the proportion is the same in all the places of the department. On Sundays, or festivals, the whole population of villages and towns may be seen deserting their own church to go one, and sometimes two leagues, to hear mass from their old priests. These habitual migrations have appeared to us the most powerful cause of that fermentation, which sometimes secretly works, and sometimes openly breaks out in nearly all the parishes which are occupied by the new priests: it may easily be conceived with what aversion a multitude of individuals, who believe themselves obliged by their conscience to go so far to seek spiritual aid, must behold, on their return, five or six persons with the priest of their election at their door.

"It is to this general cause, more active perhaps at this moment than the secret exhortations of the recusant priests, that we think the interior discord, which we have observed in most of the parishes occupied by the new priests should be especially attributed.

"Many of these parishes have presented to us, as also to other administrative bodies, petitions begging for permission to hire private houses to be set apart for their religious worship; but as these petitions, which we knew to have been most actively promoted by persons who did not sign them, appeared to us to be part of a more general and secret system, we thought it our duty by no means to encourage a religious separation, which we regarded, considering the situation of the department, as possessing all the characteristic marks of a civil schism between the citizens. We thought, and said publicly, gentlemen, that it was your part to determine precisely how, and by what means a liberty of religious opinions on the present subject, under the actual circumstances of affairs, could be practicable, and compatible with the maintenance of public tranquillity.

"It will undoubtedly excite surprise that the former priests who remain in their parishes, do not take advantage of the liberty which the law gives them of saying mass in the churches occupied by the new curates, and do not avail themselves of this permission, to spare their adherents the loss of time, and the inconvenience of numerous and disagreeable journeys. To explain this conduct, apparently so extraordinary, it is necessary to bear in mind, that one of the instructions most strongly recommended to the recusant priests, is to abstain from all communication with those whom they call intruders or usurpers, lest the people, struck only by external signs, should see no difference between priests who perform the same worship in the same church.

"Unfortunately, this religious division has produced a political separation among the citizens, and this separation is still widened by the denomination affixed to each party: the small number of persons who frequent the churches of the new priest sars called patriots; those who adhere to the old ones are called aristocrats. Thus, in the estimation of these poor rustics, the love or hatred of their country does not consist in obedience to the laws, and respect to the lawful authorities, but in the frequenting or avoiding the mass of the new priests; ignorance and prejudice have taken, on this subject, such deep root, that we found great difficulty in explaining that the political constitution of the state was not the same as the civil constitution of the clergy; that the law imposed no shackles on conscience; that every one was at liberty to go to that mass which he liked best, and to that priest in whom he placed the most confidence; that all were equal in the eyes of the law, and that it imposed upon them no other obligation than that of living in peace, and mutually tolerating the differences of their religious opinions. We have neglected nothing to efface from the minds, and banish from the discourses of these poor rustics, those absurd denominations, as we clearly perceived all the evil consequences of such distinctions in a department where the pretended aristocrats form more than two-thirds of the population.

"Such, gentlemen, are our opinions on the facts which have come to our knowledge in the department of La Vendée, and the reflections to which they have given rise.

"We have taken in regard to this subject all the measures that we were enabled, whether it were to maintain general tranquillity, or whether it were to prevent or repress the outrages against the public peace: as ministers of the law we have caused her voice to be heard. At the same time that we were ensuring the means of preserving public peace and protection, we were engaged in explaining or rendering intelligible to the administrative bodies, the tribunals, or to individuals, the difficulties that arose either in the instructions given by the decrees, or in the mode in which they are to be carried out; we have invited the administrative bodies and the tribunals to increase their vigilance and zeal in the execution of the laws that protect the persons of individuals and the rights of property; in one word, to use with that firmness which constitutes a primary duty the authority the law has delegated to them; we have stationed a part of the public forces which was at our command at places where the most imminent or greatest danger was apprehended; we have ourselves visited all places immediately they were declared in a state of disturbance; we have obtained evidence upon the state of things with the utmost calmness and precision; and after having either by words of conciliation and sympathy, or else by the firm and uncompromising action of the law tranquillized the momentary disturbances of individual misconduct, we consider that the mere presence of legal authority is quite sufficient to repress tumults. It belongs to you, gentlemen, and to you alone, to take those measures that will be assuredly efficacious in regard to an object which from the relation in which it stands with the constitution of the state, exercises at this moment upon this same constitution far greater influence than ordinary or simple notions unacquainted with the existence of facts would induce one to believe.

"We have recently terminated, gentlemen, our mission in the department of the Vendée, inasmuch as the decree of the national assembly of the 8th August, which upon the requisition of the local authorities of the department of the Deux-Sèvres, has authorised our visitation of the Chatillon district, has reached us as well as the directory of this department.

"We had been informed on our arrival at Fontenay-le-Comte that this district was in the same state of disturbance, from religious causes, as the department of the Vendée. Some few days before the receipt of our commission, numerous citizens, electors, and public functionaries of this district, came in order to make a written denunciation in respect of the disturbances which they stated to exist in different parishes; they gave intelligence of an insurrection ready to break out: the most sure and summary plan, and which they urged very strongly upon us, was to drive from the district within three months all nonjuring and ejected curates, as well as all nonjuring rectors or vicars. The directory, after having been long extremely disinclined to adopt a measure that did not appear consistent with the principles of even-handed justice, at last conceived that the public character of the relators was quite sufficient to prove both the absolute existence of the evil, and the urgent necessity for the remedy. Consequently, an ordinance was issued on the 5th of September; and the directory, at the same time that they ordered all the ecclesiastics to leave the district within three days, recommended them to resort within the same period to Niort, the capital town of the department, assuring them that there they would find personal protection and safety in every respect.

"The ordinance had been already printed, and was about to be put into execution, when the directory received an official transcript of the commission that it had been soliciting; at that very moment, the directory issued a new ordinance suspending the execution of the former, and left it to our discretion as to whether we should ratify, qualify, or suppress it altogether. Two members of the directory were by the same ordinance named commissioners for the purpose of making us fully acquainted with all that had taken place, to repair to Chatillon, and there take in conjunction with us all those measures we should deem necessary.

"When we got to Chatillon, we caused the fifty-six municipalities, of which the district is composed, to be summoned to meet us; they were all of them, singly, called into the hall of directory. We consulted with each of them as to the state of his parish: all the municipalities were of one mind; those whose curates had been ejected, demanded at our hands the return of those priests; those whose nonjuring curates were still in office, required of us that they should be retained. There is still one more point on which all these country people are agreed; that religious freedom which had been formerly accorded them, and which they desired to enjoy. The same and the following day the surrounding country sent us numerous deputations of the inhabitants, to repeat the same earnest request. 'We seek no other favour,' said they all with perfect unanimity, 'than to have those priests on whom we can rely.' Many of them even attached so much importance to this indulgence, that they assured us that w obtain it, they would willingly pay a double assessment.

"In that place by far the greater number of the public ecclesiastical functionaries of that district had not taken the oath; and while their churches could hardly contain the crowd of citizens resorting thither, the churches of the conforming clergy were almost deserted. In regard to this, the state of this district seemed to us the same as that of the department of La Vendée; there as elsewhere we found the common term of patriots and aristocrats completely established with the people, in the same sense, and perhaps even more generally. The inclination of public opinion in favour of nonjuring priests has seemed to us still more openly declared than in the department of La Vendée; the attachment that is demonstrated in their favour, the confidence that is reposed in them, bear every mark of a lively and deep-sented affection; in some few of these parishes the conforming clergy or citizens attached to these priests have been exposed to threats and insulting language, and although there, as in other places, these acts of violence may in some instances have appeared to us highly magnified, we feel assured (and the simple exhibition of public opinion enforces our conviction) that the greater part of these complaints were made with just cause.

"At the very time that we are recommending to the magistrates and local authorities the greatest vigilance upon this matter, we shall omit nothing that can tend to inspire the people with ideas more in conformity with respect to the law and the rights of private individuals.

"We ought further, gentlemen, to state, that these same men who have been represented to us as downright furious, deaf to every kind of reasoning, have left our presence perfectly conciliated on our making them understand that one of the principles of the new constitution was freedom of conscience; they were deeply affected by emotions of repentance and sorrow on account of some improprieties a few of them had been induced to commit; they have promised us with submission to follow the advice we have given them, to live in peace, notwithstanding their religious differences, and to respect the officer appointed by the law. They were heard, as they went along, to congratulate each other on having seen us, to tell one another what we had stated to them, and to fortify each other in their resolutions of peace and mutual good understanding.

"The same day some persons came to inform us that several of these country folks on their return home had posted handbills, by which they gave notice that every one of them was determined to accuse and procure the arrest of the first person who should injure the other, and especially the conforming priests.

"We ought to remark that in this same district, so long disturbed by difference of religious opinions, the taxes in arrear for 1789 and 1790, amounting to seven hundred thousand livres, had been nearly all paid; we were satisfied of this by the director of the district.

"After having attentively observed the state of public feeling and things in general, we were of opinion that the ordinance of the directory ought not to be put in execution, and the commissaries of the department as well as the administrators of the directory of Chatillon were of the same opinion.

"Setting aside all the matters on which we could form a judgment, either from facts or from individuals, we have carefully considered whether the measure adopted by the directory was in the first instance just in itself, and in the next place efficacious in its execution.

"We thought that priests who had been ejected could not be considered as in a state of rebellion against the law, because they continue to dwell in the place where they have performed their duties, and the more so as it is a notorious fact that these priests bind themselves to live as peaceable and charitable individuals, and do not identify themselves with any public or private contentions on religious matters, we thought that in the eye of the law they could not be adjudged to be in a state of rebellion until they committed some overt act of a definite and specific character; lastly, we conceived that acts of disobedience against the laws relating to the clergy, and against all other the laws of the kingdom, ought like all other misdemeanors to be punished according to form of law.

"In the next place, looking at the efficaciousness of this measure, we saw that if faithful Christians do not place reliance on the conforming clergy, it is by no means a reconciling measure to take from them the priests of their own selection.

"Such, gentlemen, is the general result of the facts we have collected, and the observations we have made during the course of the mission which has been confided to us. The most heartfelt reward of our labours will be, to have afforded you the means of confirming the tranquillity of these departments upon the most solid foundations, and to have responded by our zeal to the confidence with which we have been honoured."

NOTE 20. Page 81, col. 2.

I have already had occasion to refer more than once to the inclinations of Leopold, of Louis XVI. and the emigrants; I am now going to quote various passages, which will give the reader the clearest insight into their feelings. Bouillé who was abroad, and whose reputation and abilities had caused him to be sought for by sovereigns, had better opportunities than any one else of making himself acquainted with the sentiments of foreign courts; and his testimony is beyond all doubt. The reader will observe how he expresses himself in various parts of his memoirs.

"It may be seen by this letter that the king of Sweden was very uncertain concerning the true projects of the emperor and his co-allies, which certainly at this time were not hostile to France. Undoubtedly the empress knew this, but had not yet communicated it to him. I know that at this time she employed all her influence with the emperor and the king of Prussia to engage them to declare war against France. She had even written a very strong letter to the first of these sovereigns, in which she represented to him that the king of Prussia, for a simple act of rudeness offered to his sister, had marched an army into Holland, whilst he himself patiently suffered the insults and affronts which were heaped upon the queen of France, the degradation of her rank and dignity, and the overthrow of the throne of a king, his brother-in-law and ally. The empress urged the same arguments upon Spain who had also adopted pacific intentions. Nevertheless the emperor, after the acceptance of the constitution by the king, received an ambassador from France, whom he had before forbade appearing at his court. He was even the first to admit the national flag within his ports. The courts of Madrid, Petersburg, and Stockholm alone dismissed the French ambassadors. All circumstances tend to prove that the views of Leopold were pacific, and that these views were the fruit of his correspondence with Louis XVI. and the queen."—Memoirs of Bouillé, p. 314.

In another place, Bouillé again says,—

"However several months elapsed before I saw any thing come of the plans the emperor had designed for collecting armies on the frontier, forming a congress, and opening a negotiation with the French government. I presumed that the king had expected that his acceptance of the new constitution would have restored him his personal liberty, and restored peace to his kingdom, that an armed negotiation would have confused matters, and that consequently he had settled with the emperor and the other sovereigns, his allies, not to take any course that might induce hostilities, which he had constantly sought to avoid. I was confirmed in this opinion by the silence of the court of Spain on the proposal to furnish the king of Sweden with the fifteen millions of livres tournois which she had undertaken to give him in aid of the charges of this expedition. That prince had got me to write on his behalf to the Spanish minister, from whom I got nothing but vague replies. I then advised the king of Sweden to open a loan with Holland, or with the free maritime cities of the north upon the security of Spain, whose inclinations however seemed to me to be changed with respect to France.

"I learnt that anarchy was daily making progress in France, which was too truly demonstrated by the shoal of emigrants of all conditions who fled to the foreign frontiers. Arms were given them, they were embodied in regiments on the banks of the Rhine, and they formed in that quarter a little army, which threatened the provinces of Alsatia and Lorraine. These measures revived the popular fury, and assisted the destructive designs of the jacobins and the anarchists. The emigrants had even desired to make an attempt upon Strasburg, where they conceived they possessed certain communications and parties on their side who would have opened them the gates. The king, who was apprised of this, used both commands and even entreaties to stop and prevent them from doing any act of hostility. For this purpose he sent to the princes, his brothers, M. the baron of Vioménil, and the chevalier de Cogny, who on his part testified his disapproval of the hostile arming of the French nobility, to which the emperor interposed every possible impediment, but it still continued to take place."—Ibid. p. 309.

Lastly, Bouillé relates from the words of Leopold himself his plan for a congress :—

"At last, on the 12th September, the emperor Leopold summoned me to attend him, and to bring with me the scheme of the arrangements which he had previously demanded of me. He took me into his closet, and told me that he had not been able to speak to me sooner upon the subject for which he caused my attendance, because he had waited for answers from Russia, Spain, England, and the principal sovereigns of Italy; that he had received them, that they were conformable to his intentions and his designs, and that he was assured of their assistance in the carrying them into execution, and of their concurrence, with the exception however of the cabinet of St. James, which had declared its intention of preserving the most strict neutrality. He had taken the resolution of assembling a congress, in order to treat with the French government, not only upon the subject of redressing the grievances of the Germanic body, whose rights in Alsatia, and in other portions of the frontier provinces, had been violated, but at the same time to consider upon the means of restoring tranquillity to the kingdom of France, whose anarchy disturbed the peace of all Europe. He further informed me that this negotiation would be seconded by formidable armies with which France would be surrounded, that he hoped that this design would prove successful, and prevent a bloody war, the last resource to which he wished to have resort. I took the liberty of asking of the emperor if he was informed of the real intentions of the king. He had been made acquainted with them, and he also knew that the prince was strongly averse to the employment of hostile measures. He also stated to me that he was from other sources informed that the charter of the new constitution was to be presented to him in a few days, and that he considered that the king could not but accept it without any restriction, by reason of the risks he would run of his own life, and those of his family, if he should make the least difficulty, or suffered himself to make the slightest remark; but that his sanction, rendered compulsory by the circumstances, could not avail any thing, it being practicable to undo all that had been done, and to confer a good government upon France, such as should satisfy the people, and should yet reserve to the authority of the crown a latitude of power sufficient for the purposes of maintaining tranquillity at home, and to ensure peace abroad. He asked me for the plan of arranging the armies, and at the same time assured me that he would examine it at leisure. He further added, that I might return to Mentz, whither the count de Brown who was to have the command of his troops, and who was then in the Low Countries, would communicate with me as well as with the prince Hohenlohe, who was going into Franconia, in order for a general conference, when occasion should serve.

"I considered that the emperor had not resolved upon this pacific and extremely reasonable scheme since the conference of Pilnitz, without first consulting Louis XVI., whose inclination had always been for an arrangement, and to use the medium of negotiation, rather than have recourse to open hostilities."

NOTE 30. Page 83, col. 2.

The following is a relation of this fact by Bertrand de Molleville :—

"I informed the council on the same day of the visit the duke of Orleans had paid me, and of our conversation. The king determined upon receiving him, and held with him the next day a conversation of more than half an hour's length, with which his majesty appeared to be perfectly satisfied. 'I believe as you do,' said the king to me, 'that his return to his duty is sincere, and that he will do all which depends upon himself to repair the evil which he has occasioned, and in which it is possible he has not had so much to do as we believed."

"On the Sunday following the duke attended the loves of the king, where he met with a most humiliating reception from the courtiers, who were ignorant of what had passed, and from the royalists, who were accustomed to visit the chateau on that day to pay their court to the royal family. Every one crowded about him, elbowed him, pushed him towards the door, and prevented his re-entrance. He then went to the queen's apartment, where the table was laid for dinner; the moment he appeared, the exclamation of Gentlemen, take care of the dishes! was heard from all sides, as if he had been suspected of carrying poison in his pockets.

"The insulting murmurs which his presence excited, forced him to retire without having seen the royal family. He was followed to the queen's staircase, and whilst descending, some spat on his head, and others on his coat. Rage and revenge were painted on his countenance, and he left the chateau, convinced that the king and queen were the instigators of the insults he received, whilst, on the contrary, they were perfectly ignorant of what had happened, and exceedingly grieved when they learned it. He swore at the moment an implacable hatred against them, and has shown himself too faithful to his horrible oath. I was at the chateau on that day, and witnessed the facts I here relate."—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. vi. p. 200.

NOTE 31. Page 87, col. 2.

Madame Campan gives a different account of the conversation of Dumouriez with the queen.

"All parties," says she, "endeavoured either to ruin or to save the king. One day I found the queen extremely agitated; she said that she felt perfectly distracted by the difficulties of her situation; that the chiefs of the jacobins had offered themselves to her through the medium of Dumouriez, or that Dumouriez, abandoning the party of the jacobins, had come voluntarily to offer her his services; that she had given him an audience; and, that being alone with her, he had thrown himself at her feet, and placed as it were the red bonnet on her head, but that she could not consent to become a jacobin; that the revolution had been delivered up into the hands of a rabble of demagogues, who, seeking only pillage, were capable of the most desperate enterprises, and might furnish a formidable army to the assembly, sufficient to overthrow all those remnants of regal authority which were already in a most tottering condition. She added, that whilst speaking with extreme warmth, he had seized her hand, and kissing it, exclaimed with vehemence: 'Suffer yourself to be saved.' The queen said that she could not believe the protestations of a traitor; that his character was well known, that the wisest conduct was certainly to distrust him; and that, besides, the princes had recommended her to place no confidence in any proposition which came from the interior, &c."—vol. ii. p. 202.

NOTE 32. Page 88, col. 1.

Bouille, whose memoirs I have already cited, and who was placed in a situation which enabled him to form a correct judgment of the intentions of the foreign powers, did not believe in the zeal or sincerity of Catherine. He expresses himself as follows on this subject:—

"It is very perceivable that this prince (Gustavus) placed great confidence in the zeal of the empress of Russia, and on the active part she would take in the coalition, which has nevertheless been confined to promises. The king of Sweden was deceived; and I doubt whether Catherine would ever have given him the eighteen thousand Russians she promised. I am persuaded besides, that neither the emperor nor the king of Prussia communicated to him their own views. They had both, personally, more than a dislike to him, and did not wish him to take any active part in the affairs of France."—Bouille, p. 319.

NOTE 33. Page 88, col. 2.

Madame Campan informs us in the same passage of the construction of the iron closet, and of the existence of a secret protestation made by the king against the declaration of war. This manifests an extraordinary fear of war on the part of Louis, and accounts for his endeavours to cast the odium of its announcement on the popular party.

"The king had a prodigious quantity of papers, and unhappily conceived the idea of having a secret hiding-place constructed by his locksmith behind the corridor of his apartment, in which to conceal them. This hiding-place, had it not been for the information of the locksmith, might have remained long unknown. The wall, in the place where it was constructed, was covered with large coloured stones, and its opening was perfectly concealed by the brown grooves which the dark part of these coloured stones formed. But before the locksmith had informed the assembly of this concealment, which has since been called the iron closet, the queen gained intelligence that he had spoken of it to some of his friends; and that this man, to whom the king had habitually granted too much confidence, was a jacobin. She imparted to the king this discovery, and persuaded him to fill a large portfolio with all his most important papers, and to give them into my charge. She begged him, in my presence, to leave nothing in the closet, and the king, to tranquillize her, assured her that nothing was left there. The portfolio being then delivered over to me, I attempted to lift it, and carry it into my apartment, but it was too heavy. The king said he would carry it himself; I went before him to open the doors. When he had placed the portfolio in my cabinet, he said to me, 'The queen will tell you what it contains.' When therefore I returned to the queen, I asked her to inform me of its contents, judging from the words of the king that it was necessary I should know it. 'They are,' replied the queen, 'the papers which would be most fatal to the king in case matters went to the extent of a trial. But what is of more importance still, that portfolio contains the proceedings of a state council, in which the king has given his advice against the war, and which, being signed by all the ministers, he hopes to make, in case of extremity, extremely useful to him.' I asked the queen to whom I should confide the portfolio. 'To whom you will,' replied she, 'but you are alone responsible for it. Do not take it from the palace, even in your months of retirement, for there are circumstances in which it may be extremely useful for us to lay our hands on it without any delay.”—Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 222.

NOTE 34. Page 189, col. 2.

Explanation of the motives of the National Assembly, in decreeing on the formal proposition of the King, that there is a necessity for declaring war against the King of Bohemia and Hungary, by M. Condorcet. (Sitting of the 22nd of April, 1792.)

“Being forced by the most imperious necessity to declare war, the national assembly are fully aware that they will be accused of having accelerated or provoked it.

“They clearly perceive that the insidious conduct of the court of Vienna has had no other object than that of giving a semblance of probability to this imputation, foreign powers finding it so necessary to hide from their people the real motives of their unjust attack upon France; and they are aware that this reproach will be repeated by the enemies of our constitution and laws, in the criminal hope of depriving the representatives of the nation of the good opinion of the public.

“A simple exposition of their conduct is their only reply; and they address themselves with equal confidence both to foreigners and Frenchmen, knowing that nature has implanted in the hearts of all men the same sentiments of justice.

“Every nation has, alone in itself, the power of making its laws, and the unalienable right of changing them. This right belongs to it on no occasion, or on all equally. To attack it in one instance is to acknowledge it in none; to wish to destroy it by the interposition of a foreign power is to declare a disregard for it, in that state of which the assailant may be the chief or the citizen; this is to betray our country; this is to proclaim ourselves the enemy of the human race! The French nation were willing to believe that these simple truths were understood by all princes, and that in the eighteenth century none would venture to oppose them by the exploded maxims of tyranny; but their hopes have been deceived; a league has been formed against their independence, and they had no other alternative but that of expostulating with their enemies on the justice of their cause, or of opposing them by force of arms.

“Being informed of the menacing league, the national assembly, in the first instance, demanded the object of the concert of those powers, which had so long been rivals, and were answered that they had no other motive than the maintenance of general tranquillity, the safety and honour of thrones, and the apprehension of the renewal of those disastrous events of which some epochs of the French revolution had furnished such sad examples.

“But how can it be proved that France, who entered into a solemn resolution to undertake no conquest, and to attack the liberty of no nation, did menace the general tranquillity? How did she, who, during the long and sanguinary struggle between the government and the citizens, maintained a strict neutrality, endanger the stability of thrones?

“Without doubt, the French nation has proclaimed aloud, that sovereignty belongs solely to the people, who, limited in the exercise of their supreme will by the rights of posterity, cannot invest any individual with irrevocable authority; without doubt, she has loudly declared, that no custom, no express law, no consent, no convention, can subjugate a society of men to any authority which they have not the right of resuming. But what idea of the legitimacy of their power, or of the justice with which they exercise it, must foreign princes entertain, if they regard the proclamation of these rights as an enterprise against the tranquillity of their states?

“Will they say that this tranquillity can be disturbed by the publications and speeches of Frenchmen? This would be suppressing the liberty of the press, and declaring war against the progress of reason by an armed force; and when it is universally known that the French nation has been insulted with impunity, and that the presses of neighbouring countries have not ceased to inundate our departments with works exciting treason, and counselling revolt; when the instances of protection which their authors have met with are recollected, will it be believed that a sincere love of peace and not a hatred to liberty has dictated these hypocritical accusations?

“The attempts made by the French nation to excite neighbouring nations to break their chains and reclaim their rights have been urged in defence of foreign powers. But their ministers who have repeated these imputations, without venturing to cite a single fact which supports their assertions, know how void they are of all foundation; and even if these attempts had really taken place, those courts who have countenanced conspiratory assemblages of our emigrants, who have given them assistance, who have received their ambassadors, who have publicly admitted them to their conferences, who have not blushed to invite Frenchmen to take part in a civil war, have no right to complain; or it must be confessed that it is allowable to extend servitude, and criminal to propagate liberty, that every undertaking against the people is legitimate, and that kings alone have real rights. Never has the pride of thrones insulted with more audacity the majesty of nations!

“The French people, free to fix the form of their own constitution, could not endanger, by exercising this right, either the safety or honour of foreign thrones. Do the chiefs then of other countries consider it among the number of their prerogatives to oblige the French nation to give a head to their government invested with power equal to that which they exercise themselves? Would they, because they themselves rule over slaves, extirpate freemen from the earth? How is it that they do not perceive that by sanctioning every thing which has for its object what they call the safety of thrones, they declare every enterprise which one people may undertake in favour of the liberties of other nations legitimate?

“If outrages, if crimes have been attendant on some epochs of the French revolution, it belongs alone to the representatives of the nation to punish or bury them in oblivion; no citizen, no magistrate, whatever may be his title, has a right to demand or look for justice from any other source than the laws of his country. Foreign powers, however much their subjects may have suffered from the disastrous events of the French revolution, can have no just motive either to complain of them, or to enter into any hostile measures to prevent their recurrence. Personal alliances between kings are nothing to nations; whether enslaved or free, common interests unite them : nature has made their happiness to consist in peace, and wills that they should live associated in the bonds of brotherhood : the idea of putting the fate of twenty millions of men, and the caprices or pride of a few individuals in the same balance, is abhorrent to every dictate of humanity. Must we be condemned then again to see the voluntary servitude of nations pile human victims on the altars of the false gods of the earth !

"Thus these pretended motives of the league against France are only new outrages against its independence. The French nation had a right to demand a renunciation of their hostile preparations, and to regard the refusal of it as a declaration of war, and such have been the principles which have directed the conduct of the national assembly. They still continue to desire peace, but think war preferable to an endurance of measures dangerous to liberty; they cannot conceal from themselves that alterations in the constitution, and violations of that equality which lies at its foundation, are the only objects of the enemies of France; and it is, therefore, that the national assembly have bound themselves by an oath, repeated throughout France, to perish rather than suffer the slightest attack to be made on the liberty of their fellow-citizens, the sovereignty of the people, and above all, that equality of rights, without which society can neither obtain justice nor enjoy happiness.

"But the French nation has been reproached with not having sufficiently respected the rights of other countries, in offering only pecuniary indemnities to the pope and to the German princes, who possessed territory in Alsace.

"The sovereignty of France over Alsace has been acknowledged by treaties, and peacefully exercised for more than a century. The rights which these treaties reserve for the German proprietors are merely privileges; the sense of this reservation is, that the possessors of fiefs in Alsace shall retain, with their ancient prerogatives, the several rights of feudality : this reservation signifies, besides, that if these feudal prerogatives should be overwhelmed in one common ruin, the nation shall pay an equivalent to their possessors, in consideration of the real advantages it reaps from their abolition; for this is all that the rights of property can demand, when they are in opposition to the laws of the country, and militate against the public interest. The citizens of Alsace are Frenchmen, and the nation could not, without shameful injustice, suffer them to be deprived of the smallest share of those common rights which are due to all who live under her protection. Will it be said that, to indemnify these princes, a portion of territory should have been given up to them ? No; a free and generous nation sells, not men, condemns none to slavery, and delivers not over to masters those whom it has once admitted to a share of its liberty.

"The citizens of Alsace were free to give themselves a constitution; they might have declared themselves independent; but they have preferred to remain Frenchmen, and France will never abandon after having adopted them. Even if she had refused to accede to their desires, their country is embosomed in her territory, and she would never have permitted their oppressors to traverse the land of liberty for the purpose of punishing men for having dared to render themselves independent, by resuming their rights. That which the pope possessed in their country was only the salary arising from the exercise of his spiritual authority : the people, in depriving him of some portion of this authority, have merely exercised a power which a long servitude had suspended, but could not destroy; and the indemnity proposed by France was not even demanded by justice.

It has been said that the views of the French people for the maintenance of their equality and independence are those of a faction; but the French nation has a constitution; this constitution has been acknowledged, and adopted by the majority of the citizens; it cannot be changed but by the people, and according to the forms prescribed by itself : whilst it exists, the authorities established by itself have alone the right of expressing the national will, and it is by them that this will has been declared to foreign powers. It is the king who, at the instigation of the national assembly, fulfilling the functions with which the constitution has invested him, has complained of the protection granted to the emigrants, and demanded, in vain, that it should be withdrawn; it is he who has required the dissolution of the league of foreign potentates; and it is surely surprising to hear the solemn expression of the will of the people, publicly declared by their legitimate representative, branded as the clamour of a faction. By what title as respectable as this can those kings support themselves who force deluded nations to fight against their own interests, to arm themselves against rights which they possess in common with us, and to crush under the wrecks of the French constitution, the germs of their own felicity, and the common hopes of the human race !

"But the king of France, say they, is not free — Alas! is he not free because he is obliged to observe the laws of the country? The liberty of disobeying or opposing them by an armed force, indeed, is not a right, but a crime!

"Thus, rejecting all insidious propositions, and despising all injurious declamations, the national assembly have shown themselves as anxious for peace as they are jealous of the liberty of the people : thus, the continuation of tolerating our emigrants,—the open violation of promises to disperse their assemblages,—the refusing to dissolve a league evidently offensive,—the injurious motives of this refusal, tending to the destruction of the French constitution, are sufficient to authorize, on the part of the French nation, hostile measures, which have never proceeded further than acts of legitimate defence; for it is not an offensive proceeding to deny our enemies time to exhaust our resources by long preparations, to set all their snares—to assemble all their forces—to strengthen their old alliances—to form new ones—to carry on a system of espionage in the midst of us, and to multiply conspiracies and plots in our provinces. Does he deserve the name of an aggressor who, menaced and provoked by an unjust and perfidious enemy, takes the advantage of striking the first blow ? Thus, far from provoking war, the national assembly have done all in their power to prevent it. In demanding new explanations of intentions which might be doubtful, they have shown that they renounced with grief the hopes of a return to principles of justice on the part of their enemies; for if the pride of kings is prodigal of the blood of their subjects, the humanity of the representatives of a free nation is sparing even of the blood of their foes. Insensible to all provocations, to all injuries, to the contempt of former engagements, the violation of new promises, to the shameful dissemination of secret plots against France, to that perfidious condescension, under the guise of which the aid and encouragement given to Frenchmen who have betrayed their country has been concealed, the assembly would still have accepted peace, if the terms offered had been compatible with the maintenance of the constitution, the independence and sovereignty of the nation, and the security of the state.

"The veil which has long hidden the intentions of our enemy is finally torn away! Citizens! which of you could submit to their degrading propositions? Feudal servitude, and a humiliating inequality, bankruptcy, and taxes to be paid by you alone, tithes, and the inquisition, your properties, bought in the confidence of the public faith, to be restored to their ancient possessors, the re-establishment of the destructive game-laws, your blood to be spilt in the ambitious enterprises of an enemy; these are the conditions of the treaty between the king of Hungary and perfidious Frenchmen!

"Such is the peace which is offered to you! No; you will never accept it! All the pusillanimous of the kingdom have fled to Coblenz, and France contains none now in her bosom but men worthy of liberty!

"The king of Hungary announces in his own name, and the name of his allies, the project of making the French nation abandon its rights, and he gives us clearly to understand that he will demand sacrifices which the fear alone of destruction can make the nation submit to . . . and to these it will never submit! This insolent pride, far from intimidating, will only rouse its courage. Time is necessary to discipline the slaves of despotism; but every man is a soldier when he combats tyranny; gold will issue from its obscure retreats when called for by the country in danger; those ambitious and base men, the slaves of corruption and intrigue; those vile calumniators of the people, from whom our enemies have ventured to hope for shameful assistance, will lose the support of the deluded or pusillanimous citizens whom they have deceived by their hypocritical declamations, and the empire of France, in all its vast extent, will present a front to our enemies animated by one will, that of conquering or perishing with the constitution and the laws!"

NOTE 35. Page 92, col. 1.

Madame Campan explains, in the following manner, the secret of the papers burnt at Sèvres.

"At the commencement of the year 1792, a priest of a very venerable character requested me to grant him a private interview. The existence of a manuscript of a new libel of madame Lamotte's had come to his knowledge. He said, that he had remarked in the persons who brought it from London, to have it printed at Paris, a great desire of gain, and that he doubted not, they would deliver up the manuscript to him for a thousand louis, if he could find any friend of the queen disposed to make that sacrifice for her tranquillity; that he had thought of me on this occasion, and that if his majesty would give him the eighty thousand francs, he would procure the manuscript immediately.

"I communicated this proposition to the queen, but she refused to accede to it, and ordered me to reply, that, at the time when she had power to furnish the authors of these libels, she had judged them to be so atrocious and distant from any shadow of truth, that she had disdained having recourse to any means of impeding their circulation; that if she was weak or imprudent enough to buy a single one, the active inquisitiveness of the jacobins would soon discover it; that the libel in question, even if it was bought, would nevertheless be published, and would only become the more dangerous from her endeavours to keep it from the eye of the public, which they would soon be informed of.

"The baron d'Aubier, one of the gentlemen of the king's household, and my particular friend, possessed the talent of relating, in a concise and clever manner, the substance of the deliberations, debates, and decrees of the national assembly. He used daily to bring me whatever news was stirring, and it was my custom to detail it every day in the queen's apartment, which made the king exclaim, as I entered, 'Here comes the Calais postilion.'

"One day, M. d'Aubier came and said, 'The assembly has been occupied about some information given by the workmen of the manufacture of Sèvres. They have brought to the president a file of papers, calling them the life of Marie-Antoinette. The director of the manufacture has been called to the bar, and has declared that he received orders to burn them in the furnace prepared for the fabrication of porcelain.'

"Whilst I gave this account to the queen, the king blushed, and stooped his head over his plate. The queen said to him, 'Monsieur, have you any knowledge of this affair?' The king made no reply. Madame Elizabeth demanded the signification of his silence, but he still persisted in his taciturnity. I retired immediately. A short time after, the queen came to my apartment, and told me that the king, out of consideration for her, had bought the whole of the printed edition of the libel of which I had formerly spoken to her, proposing to her the same measure, and that M. de Laporte had thought that burning them at Sèvres, in the midst of two hundred workmen, of which eighty were jacobins, was the most mysterious, and least suspicious method of getting rid of them. She added, that she concealed her grief from the king, although she was overwhelmed with consternation, but could not complain, as his tenderness was the cause of this accident."—Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 196.

NOTE 36. Page 96, col. 2.

The mission given by the king to Mallet-du-Pan is a most important fact, and its evidence is rendered unquestionable by the memoirs of Bertrand de Molleville. Being minister at that period, de Molleville must have been perfectly acquainted with this event; and being a counter-revolutionary minister, he would rather have concealed than avowed such a fact. This mission proves the moderation of Louis XVI., but also his communications with foreign powers.

"Far from partaking of this patriotic security, the king saw, with profound grief, France engaged in an unjust and bloody war, which the disorganization of her armies seemed to render her incapable of sustaining, and which exposed her provinces, more than ever, to the danger of an invasion. His majesty feared, besides, every species of civil war, and was convinced it would break out on the news of the first advantage gained by the emigrants, who formed part of the Austrian army, over the French troops. It was, in fact, greatly to be feared that the jacobins and infuriated populace would retort sanguinary vengeance on the priests and nobility who still remained in France. These apprehensions, which the king expressed to me in a daily correspondence which I held with his majesty, made me determine to propose to him to send a person of confidence to the emperor and king of Prussia, for the purpose of obtaining from their majesties, promises not to act on the offensive, except in a case of the last extremity, and to publish a manifesto, before their armies entered into the kingdom, declaring the following sentiments: 'That the emperor and king of Prussia, forced to resort to arms by the unjust aggression which has been made on them, attribute the declaration of war, notified to them, neither to the king nor the nation, but to the criminal faction which oppresses both; that, consequently, far from renouncing the sentiments of friendship which unite them to the king of France, the object of their majesties is merely to deliver him from the yoke of the most criminal tyranny which has ever existed, to aid him in the establishment of his legitimate authority, which has been violently usurped, and to restore order and tranquillity; all which they propose to effect without meddling, in any manner, in the form of the French government; but, on the contrary, for the very purpose of giving the nation the liberty of choosing that which will best suit it; that every idea of conquest is far from the thoughts of their majesties; that the property of individuals will not be less respected than that of the nation; that their majesties take under their special protection all peaceable and faithful citizens; and declare that their only enemies, which are those of France, are the factious, and their adherents, on whom alone they wish to make war.' Mallet-du-Pan, whose character and talents the king highly esteemed, was charged with the execution of this mission. Being never seen at the palace, having no connexion with those attached to the court, and being accustomed to make frequent journeys to Geneva, which prevented the suspicion that would otherwise have been awakened by his taking that road, he was every way adapted to undertake the commission with which he was intrusted."

The king gave Mallet-du-Pan his instructions, written with his own hand, which are thus specified by Bertrand de Molleville.

1st. "The king joins his prayers to his entreaties to persuade the princes, and the French emigrants, not to give to the present war the character of one carried on between foreign powers, by an hostile and offensive conduct on their part.

2nd. "He urgently entreats them to leave to him, and the other courts who have interfered on their behalf, the discussion of the security of their interests, when the time proper to treat of those questions shall have arrived.

3rd. "It is necessary that they should appear parties and not arbitrators in this affair, all arbitration being reserved to his majesty, when he is restored to his freedom, and those foreign powers who have interfered in their behalf.

4th. "Every other conduct will produce a civil war in the interior, expose the life of the king and his family, overthrow the throne, be fatal to the royalists, cause all the revolutionists, who are now divided, and become more so every day, to rally round the jacobins, rekindle the flames of discord now about to expire, and give strength to that resistance, which will yield to the first success, when it shall be perceived that the fate of the revolution is not committed exclusively into the hands of those against whom it was first directed, and who have become its victims.

5th. "It is necessary to represent to the courts of Vienna and Berlin the utility of a manifesto, expressing the common sentiments of themselves, and all the other states in concert with them; this manifesto is important, because it will separate the jacobins from the rest of the nation, give confidence to those who are inclined to return to the paths of duty, or who, disapproving of the present constitution, desire the suppression of abuses, and the enjoyment of a moderated liberty, under a monarch of authority, limited by the restrictions of the law.

6th. "It is requisite also to express in this manifesto that fundamental truth, viz. that the war is waged merely against an anti-social faction, and not against the French nation; that it is undertaken in defence of legitimate authority, and the people, against a furious anarchy, destructive of every social bond, and every conventional establishment, under the shade of which, liberty, peace, and security can alone repose; that its object is, not disorganization, or the imposition of laws, but to declare energetically to the assembly, the administrative bodies, the municipalities, and to the ministers, that they are personally and individually responsible for all outrages committed against the sacred person of the king, the queen, and royal family, and the persons and properties of all citizens whatsoever.

7th. "Furthermore, it is necessary to express the wish of the king, that the foreign powers, on entering the kingdom, should declare their readiness to make peace, but that they neither can nor will treat with any but the king; that, consequently, they require that he be restored to perfect liberty; that, then, a congress be assembled, in which the several interests of the nation may be discussed, on the basis already proposed, the emigrants being admitted as a party, and the general plan of indemnities being negotiated under the auspices and guarantee of the combined powers."—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. viii. p. 39.

NOTE 37. Page 96, col. 2.

Bertrand de Molleville, from whom I have selected the facts relative to Mallet-du-Pan, mentions the reception he met with, in the following terms:—

"On the 15th and 16th of July, Mallet-du-Pan conferred, at great length, with the ministers of the emperor and the king of Prussia, count Cobentzel, count Haugwitz, and M. Heyman. These ministers first examined his authority, and his tened with an extreme attention as he read his instructions and his own memoir, and immediately recognised his views to be perfectly the same as what had been previously signified by his majesty to the courts of Vienna and Berlin. They, consequently, placed great confidence in him, and approved, in every respect, of the manifesto he proposed. They positively declared that they entered into the war with no ambitious motives, that they sought no personal interest or augmentation of their territories, and that their majesties desired nothing but the re-establishment of order throughout France; because, as long as that country remained in a state of anarchy, they were obliged to keep up, at a very great expense, extraordinary bodies of troops, and adopt many precautions to protect the frontiers of their territory from the disorders of their neighbours, and that so far from wishing to impose on the French nation a particular form of government, they would not even interfere in the negotiations with their king on that subject. He was asked to give a detailed account of the state of France, and to speak particularly as to the public opinion relative to the ancient order of things, viz. the parliament, and the nobility, &c. They told him, in confidence, that the emigrants had volunteered to form themselves into a body, and enter into the king's service, whom they expected would be shortly released from his present state of confinement. They insinuated, in a humorous manner, their dislike to the royal princes, who, it was supposed, entertained quite opposite opinions to the king's, and were busy in forming a party of their own, and had secret intentions of appointing a regency. (Mallet-du-Pan could not concur in this supposition for an instant, and observed that it was impossible to judge of the intentions of princes rightly, from the frivolous and extravagant views of their courtiers.) After a minute discussion of the several demands and propositions which were contained in his memorial, which Mallet-du-Pan was not at liberty to alter, and the subject of his mission was well understood, the three ministers united in acknowledging the wisdom and justice of his instructions, and formally declared their assurance, that their majesties would most zealously co-operate with the French monarch."—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. viii. p. 320.

NOTE 38. Page 96, col. 2.

"The princes' party," says madame de Campan, "were very much alarmed when they heard of the negotiations of the constitutionalists on behalf of the queen. Her majesty always apprehended much danger, not only from the strength of the party that declared for the princes, but from the pretensions of the French noblemen who formed it. She justified the count d'Artois, and often repeated that his party would discover their intentions to be quite opposite to his sentiments, which were favourable to the king and her majesty, but that she thought he would be made to participate in the criminality of the conduct of his party by the efforts of Calonne, who exercised an uncontrolled ascendancy over the minds of his advisers. She severely reproached count Esterhazy, who had received very considerable favours from her for his attachment to Calonne's party, which ranked him in the number of her enemies."—Memoirs of Madame de Campan, vol. ii. p. 193.

NOTE 39. Page 97, col. 1.

"The emigrants dreaded the thoughts of a reconciliation between the court and the constitutionalists, which they imagined would be merely nominal, and afford to the government no assistance towards the reparation of their faults. They thought it was more advisable that the king and his family should remain in the hands of the jacobins till such time as they were prepared to rescue them, by which means he would avoid the necessity of acceding to the stipulations they should dictate."—Madame de Campan's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 194.

NOTE 40. Page 100, col. 1.

A very curious paper was found among the documentary evidence that was produced on the trial of the authors of the riots of the 20th June. It is the deposition of one Lareynie, and contains a summary of the testimony that was procured from various witnesses; the whole of which proceedings have been published.

"Personally appeared before us, John-Baptiste-Marie-Louis Lareynie, a volunteer in the battalion of the Isle-Saint-Louis, decorated with the military order of the Cross, residing in Paris on the quay Bourbon, No. 1—

"Who, professing sentiments of abhorrence at the excesses which have prevailed throughout the capital, and conceiving himself bound in duty, as a good citizen, to elucidate every circumstance connected with these excesses, and so detect the delinquents and authors of all seditions directed against the public tranquillity, and sapping the foundation of the constitution—

"Declareth, that he was informed by his correspondent, in the faubourg St. Antoine, that the citizens of that faubourg were incited to rebellion by M. Santerre, who commanded the battalion of the Enfants-Trouvés, and by various other persons, of which number was M. Fournier, an American, and who had been an elector of the department of Paris in 1791; that M. Rotondo, an Italian; M. Legendre, a butcher, residing in the rue des Bucheries, in the faubourg St. Germain; M. Cuirette Verrières, residing in the story immediately over the coffee-house of the Rendezvous, in the rue du Théâtre Français, held nightly meetings at M. Santerre's house, and sometimes in the hall of the committee of the section of the Enfants-Trouvés, where they deliberated in the presence of a few individuals belonging to that faubourg, to whom they communicated their sentiments; that M. Rossignol, formerly a journeyman jeweller; M. Nicholas, miner in the above-mentioned battalion of the Enfants-Trouvés; M. Brierre, a wine-merchant; M. Gonor, commonly called Conqueror of the Bastille, and others whom he could cite, proposed various questions to be agitated by the groups frequenting the Tuileries, the Palais Royal, the Place de Grève, and especially the vicinity of the Porte St. Antoine and the Place du Bastille; that they were the authors of the placards that were affixed from time to time in the faubourgs, as also of the petitions that were delivered in by deputations to the patriotic societies of Paris; and that, in fact, they were the authors of the celebrated petition, and concerted the plot which was carried into execution on the 20th of June. That, on that day, a secret committee was held in the house of Santerre at midnight; in proof of which he could produce witnesses as soon as they returned from the country, whither they had been sent on a mission by Santerre, and by whom he was assured that they saw M. Pétion, the mayor of Paris; Robespierre; Manuel, the solicitor-general; Alexander, commandant of the battalion of St. Michael; and Sillery, ex-deputy of the national assembly, present at such meeting. That on the 20th, Santerre, perceiving that many of his party, and particularly the chiefs, were intimidated by the decree that had been issued by the directory of the department, and in consequence actually refused to attend in arms, on the pretext that they would be fired at, assured them that no such order would be given to the national guard; and moreover, that Pétion would himself be present. That at eleven o'clock in the morning of that day, the concourse did not, at most, amount to more than fifteen hundred persons, including many who attended out of curiosity; and that it was only when M. Santerre placed himself at the head of a detachment of invalids, and marched to the passage of the Feuillans that the spectators were excited to join; that not daring to force the post that guarded this passage, he continued his march to the court of the Capuchins, and there planted the may-bush which had been destined for the palace; that he, the witness, himself asked several individuals of the troop that was following the said Santerre, why the may-bush was not reserved for the terrace of the Tuileries, to which they replied, that they knew very well what they were about, they were aware that several pieces of cannon were placed in the gardens, a snare into which however desirous the Feuillantines might be to plunge them, they knew very well how to avoid. The declarant also observed that at this time the populace had nearly dispersed, and when the music and drums were heard in the interior of the assembly, several small clusters which were standing about here and there collected together, and joining themselves with all the spectators on the spot, marched into the assembly, and crowded one upon another three deep; he further observed that no outrage was committed as they passed through the Tuileries, and no attempt was made to force the palace. That when they were all assembled and drawn up on the 'Place du Carrousel,' they did not manifest the least hostile intention towards the palace, till the arrival of M. Santerre, who, being in attendance at the national assembly, did join them till it was adjourned. That when M. Santerre arrived in company with several others, among whom the deponent remarked M. St. Huruge, he addressed himself to his troops, who, till then, had observed the greatest tranquillity, and asked, Why they had not already entered the palace? that they must forthwith proceed thither; that he had brought them for no other purpose! That he immediately ordered the engineers to follow him with a piece of cannon, and said, if the gates were not opened voluntarily, he would force them. Thus provided, he arrived at the gate, where a slight resistance was offered to him by the 'gendarmerie,' but he met with a steady opposition on the part of the national guard; and so great was the tumult occasioned by this, that the people were, perhaps, on the point of proceeding to violence, when two men, in scarfs of the national colours, one of whom the deponent recognised to be M. Boucher Rong, and the other who was named, as he learnt from the spectators, M. Sargent, addressed the guards, and ordered them, in an imperious, if not insolent tone, to open the gates, prostituting the sacred name of the law in support of this demand; adding that no person had authority to close the gates, and that every citizen had the right to enter the court; that the gates were, in fact, opened by the national guard, and Santerre and his troop immediately rushed into the court; that M. Santerre, who had ordered a body of his men to follow him to the king's apartments with the piece of cannon to break open the door, should it be necessary, or for the purpose of meeting any resistance that might be offered by the national guard in his progress, was stopped as he was passing the last court to the left, at the foot of the staircase, by a group of citizens, who addressed him with great moderation, and endeavoured to appease his fury; they threatened to render him responsible for every thing that might occur during this fatal day, because, said they, you are the sole author of this unconstitutional assemblage; you alone have been instrumental in misleading these brave fellows; you are the only one of the number that is actuated by evil intentions. The manner in which these worthy citizens discoursed, caused a paleness to spread over his countenance. But M. Legendre, the butcher, perceiving the state of Santerre's mind, came to his aid, and re-animating him in a moment; Santerre then, evading all opposite reply to the citizens who had expostulated with him, devised a most hypocritical course of conduct. He addressed himself to his followers in the following words: 'Gentlemen, be witness of my refusal to march into the king's apartments at your head; that the troops, who were accustomed to divine Santerre's meanings, immediately fell upon the honest citizens, forced a passage, conveyed their cannon into the interior of the palace, and burst into the apartments, breaking open all the doors, and shattering the windows in their passage.'

NOTE 41. Page 113, col. 2.

The terror into which this alarm had thrown the royal family, is thus described by madame de Campan:—

"M. de Laporte, the comptroller of the civil list, was informed by the police, towards the end of the year 1791, that a jacobin of the most violent opinions, who had been heard to say that it would materially assist the cause of the French nation if the days of the king were shortened, and kept a pastry-cook's shop in the Palais Royal, had succeeded to the hereditary situation of an attendant in the king's household, into the duties of which office he was about to enter. His business was to attend to the pastry details. He was closely watched by the superintendents of the kitchen who were devoted to his majesty; but to avoid the danger which they incurred by eating of made-dishes, the royal family were always provided with roast joints. M. Thierry, of Ville d'Avry, superintendent of the apartments, supplied them with bread. The king, who was very fond of pastry, requested me to purchase some, as if for myself, one day at one shop, and another day at another. The sugar I always kept in my own room. The king and queen, and madame Elizabeth, took their meals together, and always dismissed the servants, each helping himself from a mahogany waiter, which was placed at his side, and when the servants' presence was required, they rang the bell. M. Thierry always brought the bread and wine himself, and I immediately locked it up in a cupboard in the king's cabinet, on the Rez-de-Chaussée, of which I always kept the key. Immediately the king was seated at table, I took out the pastry and bread and concealed it under the table, that it might not be observed by any of the servants. It was not only impolitic, but very disagreeable to the king, to let his attendants see that he suspected them. As he only drank part of a bottle of wine at a meal, and as the princesses only drank water, he poured the contents of the bottle that was supplied him by his butler into his private bottle, which I carried away every day after dinner. Although the king and his family tasted of no other pastry than such as I bought, care was taken to make it appear that what was served at table by the servants was eaten. The lady who was my successor in this office had no occasion to make any alterations in my plan, of which no one but the family were in the secret."—Madame de Campan's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 188.

NOTE 42. Page 113, col. 2.

When M. Lafayette was imprisoned at Olmutz, M. de Lally-Tolendal addressed a most eloquent letter to the king of Prussia in his behalf. He enumerated the various instances of the general's devotion to the king, which he produced documents to prove. In them may be discovered the projects and efforts of the constitutionalists at this period.

M. Lally-Tolendal's Letter to the King.

"Paris, Monday, July 9, 1792.

"I am requested by M. Lafayette to repeat the proposal made already by himself, and which your majesty did not accept at that time, because your majesty had engaged to appear at a ceremony that was to take place on the 14th, two days after the date when it was to have been carried into effect.

"Your majesty could not have missed seeing M. Lafayette's project, it having been presented to M. Duport, to hand to M. Monhiel, for your majesty's inspection.

"M. Lafayette proposes to be here on the 15th, accompanied by general Luckner, with whom he has entered into the necessary engagements, in which both will co-operate to obtain the proposed end.

"They propose that your majesty quit the capital, escorted by them through the public streets, and that your majesty announce such to be your intention to the national assembly, to whom you should also state that you will not go beyond the constitutional line, and that you have fixed on Compiègne for your retreat.

"It is proposed to convey your majesty and family in one carriage, and a hundred chosen cavalry guards may be easily provided to attend you. Should any attempt be made to oppose your departure, your majesty will be strongly protected by the Swiss, and even by a part of the national guard, should their aid be required. The two generals will remain by your side. At Compiègne a strong detachment will be furnished by that town, a choice guard will there join you from the capital, and a third detached from the army to effect your majesty's escape.

"M. Lafayette will provide ten squadrons of supernumerary troops, and the horse artillery, which may in two days be brought up by forced marches to Compiègne.

"Should your majesty's departure be prevented, in defiance of all this protection, the two generals will march their troops against the capital, and avenge so gross a violation of the laws.

"The object of this project is evident.

"Peace would, in the event of its success, be established throughout Europe, through the mediation of your majesty.

"Your majesty would, in that case, be established in your legitimate powers.

"Your majesty would also have your prerogatives, which are now too limited, enlarged; the nation would be governed by a monarch whose authority would be strongly upheld, and under whose reign the liberty of the people would be maintained inviolate.

"The nation would be duly represented, and your majesty would preside over their representatives, for without you, that body is void of authority.

"An executive power would be established.

"The representatives of the nation would be elected from among the landed proprietors.

"The constitution would be revised, some parts of it abolished, and others improved and secured on a better basis.

"The new legislative body might sit three months in the year; and,

"The privileges of the nobility, such as titles, arms, livery, &c., would be revived.

"I shall not venture an opinion, or make any comment on this plan, but shall content myself with simply performing my duty. My imagination depicts the rage of the jacobins, at the news of a town falling into our hands, in colours too vivid for words to describe. The light in which I view the scene that was exhibited on Saturday, so far from tranquillizing my mind has increased its inquietude. All these kisses remind me of that of Judas.

"I ask to be one of the eighty or hundred cavalry to escort your majesty, and should this my sole request be granted, I dare promise your majesty, that the blow aimed at your majesty's life must take mine first.

"But one more word and I have done. Before the revolution I was intimately acquainted with M. Lafayette. On the 22nd of March, in the second year of the revolution, we ceased to communicate; at that epoch I endeavoured to prevail upon him to follow that line of conduct which he is now pursuing. I appealed to his honour; I urged it on the score of his duty and even his interest. He made promises which he did not perform. His motives for so acting I will not inquire; whether his resolution failed him, or he chose to pursue the contrary course. I declared to him my reasons, and our mutual friends joined me in setting before him the most disagreeable truths. My correspondence with him has been referred to by these mutual friends. The object and style of these letters are well known to your majesty. I have read his letters, and conversed with him for two hours the evening he departed. He acknowledged his mistakes, and is now devoted to the cause of liberty, but under a monarchical government. If necessity required it, he would sacrifice his life in defence of his country and his king, which are in his mind inseparable. These are his principles. He embraces them with enthusiasm, he is thoroughly convinced of their truth; his heart is engaged in the cause, and he breathes sentiments of fidelity towards your majesty. In his engagements to promote these views, he has entirely lost sight of himself. Of all this I can solemnly assure your majesty upon my conviction as an honest man.

"I had almost forgot to say, that he desires that no communication may be held with any of the officers who may be in the capital at this period. All may suspect that there is some project in agitation, but none can know the real one. It is sufficient if they know the part they are to act the morning previous to its execution, for some may be indiscreet enough to speak of it.

"P.S. May I say that this communication appears to me to merit the consideration of that illustrious individual who heroically overcame an army of assassins in a cause, the memory of which must live for ever, who dictated on the subsequent day a proclamation as sublime as his conduct had been great the evening before.

"M. Lafayette does not admit the idea that your majesty having once quitted the capital, is obliged to pursue any line of conduct not dictated by your own conscience and free will. He thinks that your majesty should first attend to the formation of a body guard; he thinks that his project might be modified in twenty different ways; he prefers a retreat to the north, as he could more conveniently afford the assistance required; and, besides, he is afraid of the factious spirit of the south. In fact, the object which he most sincerely desires, is to see the king enjoy his liberty, and all the factions by which France is agitated, dispersed. After which he hopes, himself, things will go on in their natural course."

Copy of a Letter from M. Lafayette.

"8th July, 1792.

"I had disposed of my army, so that the best squadrons, the grenadiers and the horse artillery, were under the orders of M—— of the fourth division; and had my proposition been acceded to, I would have marched up fifteen squadrons, and eight pieces of cannon, in two days to Compiègne, the rest of the army being divided into detachments, and separated the distance of one day's march from each other, and each regiment having orders to proceed in due succession, in case their commanding officers should be engaged.

"I had so completely overcome Luckner as to obtain from him the promise that, if the king's safety required it, he would march with me against the capital. I had the absolute disposal of five squadrons of this army and of that of Languedoc and ——; I had also the exclusive command of the horse artillery; I had determined that these latter troops should also march to Compiègne.

"The king engaged to attend the ceremony of the confederation. I regret that my plan was not adopted.

"The preparations which I have made, supported by many departments and communities, the co-operation of M. Luckner, the confidence my troops and the whole army feel in me, and my popularity throughout the kingdom, which has augmented rather than decreased, although it is very limited in the capital; all these circumstances together have excited the suspicions of the factious, and doubts in the minds of many honest men. I hope that the danger attending the ceremony of the 14th of July will not be so great as is expected. It is my opinion, that were the king accompanied by myself and Luckner, and surrounded with a select battalion of troops, this danger would be entirely obviated.

"We shall, there is no doubt, lose the first battle; but, in return, we shall triumph over this temporary defeat.

"I again repeat that the king must quit Paris. I know that if he was one in whom I could not confide, that I should expose myself to imminent hazard; but the king being an honourable man, I cannot hesitate an instant, nor can I extinguish my desire of seeing him at Compiègne.

"My present project is directed to these two objects: First, if the king has not yet summoned Luckner and myself, he must lose no time in doing so. We have gained over Luckner! He will tell you that we are together; I will tell you the rest. Luckner can come to me, and we can both of us be in the capital the same evening. The 13th and 14th may perhaps furnish an occasion for some popular tumults, and your presence, you may be sufficiently confident, will, at least, counteract any violence; and who knows what will be the effect of mine on the national guard?

"We will accompany the king to the altar of the country. The two generals will represent the two armies, whose devotion to them is well known, and this will prevent any indignities that might be otherwise offered to the king. I think I can enforce obedience to my commands, as I formerly used by my presence alone. The terror with which I have always inspired some, ever since they joined the factious party; and, perhaps, some abilities that I may have of turning the channel of events, at the very crisis, may render me useful if it be only in avorting dangers. To judge of the interest I have in making this demand, it is sufficient to compare the situation I shall be placed in with the object of the confederation; but I regard it as a sacred duty to accompany the king during this ceremony; and so obstinately am I bent on this, that I absolutely require the minister of war to command my attendance, so that this first part of my proposition may be adopted; and I beg of you to announce this proposal by means of some common friends of the king, to the royal family, and their advisers.

"Second. As for my second proposition, I think it equally indispensable, and this is the way in which, I conceive, it can be carried into execution. Many of those who are inclined to be factious would be quieted and silenced, at least for the time, if the king were solemnly to declare that the invasion of the foreign armies was contrary to his wishes, and if we, conjointly with him, were also to take an oath to the same effect. I would then have the king write a note to Luckner and myself in secret, which would meet us on the road on the evening of the 11th or the next day, to the following effect: viz. "That intending to manifest to foreign powers his sincerity in his oath just taken, for the satisfaction of his people, and thinking a visit to Compiègne the most effectual manner of doing this, he orders us to add some squadrons to the national guard of that place, and the detachment accompanying him from the capital, requesting our attendance to Compiègne, from whence we might rejoin our respective armies, and enjoining us to be careful in selecting such squadrons for this service as are commanded by persons of known attachment to the constitution, the general officer in charge of the whole being an unquestionable constitutionalist.

"Luckner and I will then charge M—— with the command of this expedition; he shall take with him four pieces of horse artillery, eight pieces if requisite, but the king must by no means speak of this, because the odium of that measure ought to fall upon us. On the 15th, at ten o'clock in the morning, the king may proceed to the assembly in company with Luckner and myself, we being followed by a whole battalion, or, at least, fifty horsemen devoted to the king; or, even if only a few friends of mine accompanied us, we should all be free from any danger of arrest.

"Supposing even that we were arrested, Luckner and myself would immediately complain to the assembly, and threaten it with our armies. The king's position, too, would not be more critical, for he, not having infringed upon the constitution, would be justified by all who were not the enemies of that constitution, and Luckner and I could easily bring up some detachments from Compiègne. This manner of proceeding would not compromise the king so much as the plan of conduct which he is now concerting.

"The immense funds that have been lavished by the aristocrats in their wild plans, have left the king but very diminished pecuniary resources at his command. But if it is necessary, some loans must be obtained, to be rendered subservient to our purposes during the three days of the festivity in commemoration of the federation.

"There is only one thing more which I wish to guard you against; should the assembly issue a decree forbidding the presence of the generals in Paris on this occasion, let the king immediately refuse to give it his sanction.

"If, by an inconceivable fatality, the king has already given it his sanction, let him immediately appoint a rendezvous where we may meet at Compiègne, and even though he may fully expect to be arrested in quitting Paris, we will rescue him, and carry him off in triumph. It is useless to observe that when he shall have arrived at Compiègne, in either case, he may there form his body-guard, such as he is allowed by the constitution.

"Really, when I contemplate my situation, surrounded as I daily am by inhabitants of all parts of the country who flock to see me, some coming from ten leagues, or more, for this purpose, and who declare their cordial participation in the sentiments by which I am guided, I cannot consider all as lost; but more especially, when I perceive the firm attachment of the army to my cause, over whom the jacobins have no influence; and reflect upon the numerous testimonies of approbation I receive from all parts of the kingdom, I cannot but think that it is in my power to render myself essentially useful to his majesty."

NOTE 43. Page 114, col. 1.

Answer in the King's own hand.

The following reply is extracted from the same collection of documents referred to in the preceding note. "I cannot but acknowledge my gratitude towards one who has shown himself so devoted to my service as to venture his life to procure my freedom; but the project of M. Lafayette appears to me impracticable. Although I have no personal fears, I do not think it prudent to hazard all at once. In case of failure, we should be a prey to the demagogue faction. Fontainebleau appears to me too near, and besides its southern situation is objectionable; a northern direction would have the appearance of flying towards the Austrians. The attendance of the generals at the confederation might be useful; they might pretend that they came to Paris for the purpose of conferring with the new minister of war on military affairs. The best advice that I can give M. Lafayette is to continue to be a terror to the factious by fulfilling his duties as a general; the army will thus become more and more attached to him, and he may eventually be enabled essentially to serve the king and constitution by the influence he may, in this manner, obtain."

NOTE 44. Page 115, col. 2.

A minute relation of the Proceedings of the 10th of August.

(They are taken from a paper signed Carra, and entitled, An Historical and very exact Account of the Origin and Authors of the celebrated Insurrection of the 10th of August, which saved the Republic. The Author assures the public that the Mayor had not the least share in its success; but that it was providentially fortunate to the cause of the Patriots, that he was at that time in office. This article is extracted from the "Annales Politiques," of the 30th of November.)

"Those men," says Jerome Pétion, in his excellent speech on the accusation that was directed against Maximilien Robespierre, who claimed the glory of that day, "are the very men the least deserving of it. The glorious consequences of that insurrection are solely attributable to those persons who prepared the measures for the fit execution of the plan, and to the threatening appearance which the situation of affairs at that time presented; to the brave confederates and their secret directory, that had for some time concerted the plan of insurrection; and lastly, to that protecting genius which has presided over the interests of France since the first meeting of its representatives.

"This is the same directory of which I shall speak by and by, and in which Jerome Pétion was an active member. This secret directory was established in the hall where the jacobins carried on their correspondence, in the quarter St. Honoré, and was appointed by the central committee of confederates; it was composed of five members selected from the forty-three who had daily met since the commencement of July. These five members were Vaugeois, chaplain to the bishop of Blois; Debessé, an inhabitant of the department of Drome; Guillaume, professor at Caen; Simon, an editor at Ersburg; and Galissot, an inhabitant of Langres, I was elected one of the committee, and after some days the number of the members was increased by the addition of Fournier, an American; Westermann; Kienlin, a resident at Strasburg; Santerre; Alexander, commandant of the faubourg St. Marceau; Lazonski, a captain of engineers in the faubourg St. Marceau; Antoine, an ex-constituent of the town and department of Metz; Lagrey, and Garin, an elector of 1789.

"These insurrectionists held their first session at a small tavern at the sign of the Golden Sun, rue St. Antoine, near the Bastille, on the night of Thursday, till Friday morning the 26th July, after the fête that was given by the citizens to the confederates on the ruins of the Bastille. The patriot Gorsus attended at this tavern to conduct us at two o'clock in the morning, when our sessions adjourned, to the column of liberty, that had been erected on the ruins of the Bastille, in defence of which we were all determined to die. The American, Fournier, also, at my suggestion, brought us the red flag, upon which I inscribed these words, the martial law of the sovereign people against the rebellion of the executive power. It was in this very tavern that I produced five hundred copies of a placard on which were inscribed these words, whoever fires upon the columns of the people shall be put to death on the spot. This placard had been printed by the librarian Buisson, and given to Santerre, from whom I obtained it. Our project failed on this attempt, in consequence of the great prudence of the mayor, who probably thought that we were not yet sufficiently prepared; and the second session, in which active measures were to be adopted, was postponed till the 4th of August.

"The same individuals that composed the last session sat also at this, with one additional member, Camille-Desmoulins. It was held at the sign of the 'Cadran bleu,' on the Boulevards; and, at about eight o'clock, it removed to the apartments of the ex-constituent Antoine, in the rue St. Honoré, opposite the 'Assumption,' the very house in which Robespierre resided. The landlady of this house was so alarmed for Robespierre, that she begged of Antoine to let her know whether he desired to see Robespierre murdered. 'If any one is to be murdered, we ought to be the victims,' said Antoine; 'our deliberations do not concern Robespierre, and all that he has to do is to keep himself out of sight.'

"At this second session, in which we proceeded to consider what measures were to be adopted, I drew up, myself, the whole plan of the insurrection, and marked out the manner in which the palace was to be attacked. Simon copied out this plan, which was sent to Santerre and Alexander at midnight; but our second attempt also failed, because Alexander and Santerre were not ready, and there were many dissentient voices among the members, who thought it ought to be put off till after the discussion that was to take place at the assembly, on the 10th of August, relative to the suspension of the king.

"The third and last session which this directory held, was on and during all the night of the 9th of August, when it separated into three divisions, which was announced by the sounding of the tocsin. The chiefs of these divisions were posted as follows: Fournier, the American, in the faubourg

St. Marceau; Westermann, Santerre, and some others, in the faubourg St. Antoine; Garon, the editor from Strasburg, and myself, in the barracks of the Marseillois, and in the very apartment of the commander, where we were seen by all the battalion.

"In this account, which agrees exactly with the truth, and the details of which I challenge any one to refute, no mention is made either of Marat, of Robespierre, or of many others, who would claim to themselves the merit of having acted in this affair; but the only persons who really gained the glory of that day, are the members that composed the secret directory, of which I have just spoken."

NOTE 45. Page 120, col. 2.

Copy of a Letter from Guadet, Verrynaud, and Gensonné, to the citizen Boze.

"You ask us, sir, our opinion respecting the present state of France, and what measures we would advise in order to protect the country from the imminent dangers with which it is threatened, which is a continual source of anxiety to all good citizens, and the object which most incessantly occupies their attention.

"Being asked a question of such high importance, we will explain our sentiments most candidly.

"It is too late to conceal the truth that the misconduct of the king is the immediate cause of the evils that afflict France, and of the dangers that environ the throne. Those deceive the king who attempt to persuade him that certain exaggerated opinions, the violent proceedings of the clubs, and the machinations of the factions, gave rise to, and keep up the present disorders in the country, which are daily becoming worse; and what the consequences may be no one can say.

"If the nation had been satisfied with the success of a revolution which cost them so dearly; if the liberty of the people had been securely established; if by his conduct the king had obtained the confidence of the people, the great body of the citizens would think only of enjoying the benefits derived from the constitution; and if any factions should still exist, acting, as they would, without any pretext, or even any object to gain, no danger could be feared.

"But as long as the liberty of the people is at stake, as long as the citizens are kept in a state of alarm by the conduct of the executive power, and that the conspiracies which are continually carrying on both by domestic and foreign enemies shall appear to be more or less encouraged by the king, the peace of the country must necessarily be disturbed. In the most ancient and best constituted states, this is always and must be the seminal principle of a revolution; and the effect of this principle will, in this instance, follow with greater rapidity, inasmuch as the agitations that preceded the former revolution have scarcely subsided, when we are now again threatened with a second.

"It is, then, but too evident that the present state of affairs must produce a crisis, which, as appearances strongly indicate, will be attended with dangerous consequences to royalty. The interests of the king and of the nation are actually considered as two distinct things; the first public functionary of a free nation is become the chief of a party; and by this crooked policy, the odium of all the evils with which France is afflicted reflects upon him.

"And what success would he reap from ~~the~~ assistance of the foreign powers, should they go so far even as to augment the royal authority, and remodel the form of government? Is it not evident that those men who first proposed this congress have sacrificed the interest of the monarch to their personal interests and prejudices? Should their schemes succeed, will not their institutions be considered as an usurpation of the authority of the nation, to which it will never submit by restraint? Is it possible that they did not perceive how requisite it would be, after they had effected this change, to maintain it by a force equivalent to that which it originally employed, in order to succeed, and by that means they would disseminate throughout the kingdom the spirit of civil discord, which the lapse of many centuries would scarcely eradicate.

"Sincerely and steadily attached to the interests of the nation, from which we will not separate those of the king, as long as he allows them to be united, we are of opinion that the king should desist from all such conduct as may create suspicions in the minds of the people, and prove what are his real sentiments, openly and unequivocally; till then, no sufficient measures can be adopted to protect the empire from the evils with which it is threatened, and to re-establish order throughout the kingdom; and till then, the king cannot expect to recover the confidence of his people, on which alone he depends for his power and happiness.

"It is not sufficient to have recourse again to fresh protestations, which, at this period, would be deemed insulting and ironical; and so far from allaying the alarm of the country, would rather increase the imminent danger.

"The only protestation from which any good effect can be expected, would be a solemn declaration on the part of the king, that he will accept of no augmentation of his powers whatsoever, but what may be voluntarily accorded to him by the nation.

"This has been observed to the king; and many of the national assembly know that it was proposed to him, when he declared war with the king of Hungary, but he thought proper to reject it.

"He might, perhaps, regain the confidence of his people by recognising the independence of the French nation, by ordering the coalesced powers to desist from all hostilities, and by insisting upon the removal of their troops from our frontiers.

"It is impossible to convince the nation that the king has not the power of breaking up that coalition; and so long as he endangers the public security, he ought not to flatter himself with the idea of retaining the affections of the people.

"But if the king's means of effecting this dispersion of the enemy are insufficient, he ought, at least, to co-operate with the nation in repulsing their attack, and to prove the groundlessness of the popular suspicions, by the adoption of measures of vigour.

"To see the nation menaced with immediate danger, of which he cannot be ignorant, and to declare that it originates in the crimes of factions, is calculated to excite the most odious suspicions. To complain that the popular passions are extravagant, to abuse the clubs, to attribute the ferment and agitation that exists in the minds of the people to the factious spirit of a few demagogues, only serves to aggravate their miseries, and urge them to violence.

"As long as any efforts are made to prevent the people from obtaining their liberty, resistance, on their part, is inevitable.

"The tranquillity of the state can only be brought about by the previous removal of all dangers; and until this most fortunate period arrives, it is most important to the nation and the king to provide against the continual aggravation of these calamities by an unequivocal conduct on the part of the agents of the executive power.

"1. Why does not the king select his ministry from among those who decidedly favour the revolution? Why is he at the most critical moments surrounded by unknown or suspected characters? If it was the king's object to increase the suspicions of the people, would he proceed otherwise than he has done?

"The choice of the ministry has been at all times one of the most important prerogatives with which the king is invested; it is, as it were, the thermometer according to which the disposition of the court is ascertained; and it is easy to conceive what must now be the effect of such a choice, which at another time would have occasioned the most violent murmurs.

"To select a patriotic ministry would be the most effective measure which the king could adopt to regain the confidence of the people. But he would be strangely deceived if he believed that a single proceeding of this kind would produce this effect. It requires time and continual efforts to efface impressions which have been too deeply engraved to be forgotten in an instant.

"2. At a moment when the country stands so much in need of every means of defence which it can obtain, why has not the king offered the horses and arms belonging to his guard?

"3. Why does he not request the enactment of a law subjecting the expenses of the civil list to a public scrutiny, by which the nation would be assured that it is not converted to an improper use, or otherwise employed?

"4. Another great measure by which the people would be tranquillized, inasmuch as it would evince the predisposition of his majesty, would be to move himself for the enactment of a law regulating the education of the royal prince, then immediately consigning that precious pledge to the care of a person in whose principles the nation could repose confidence.

"5. Another circumstance of which the people complain, is, that the decree enforcing the disbanding of the general staff has never been sanctioned. The reserve which his majesty evinces in according his sanction to decrees of the legislature which are so eagerly desired by the public, with whose anxiety thereupon the king is not unacquainted, cannot fail to provoke the discussions relative to the constitutional question, whether the king has the right of exercising the authority of the veto in extraordinary cases, and is not of a nature to quiet the alarms and discontent that prevail.

"6. It is a matter of importance in the public opinion, that the command of the troops should be confided to other hands than those of M. Lafayette.

It is most evident that that officer can no longer be of service to the public.

"We conclude with one general observation: viz., that whatever can allay the suspicions of the people, and promote their confidence in the king, should not be omitted. If the king adopts this resolution, and acts up to it cordially and with perseverance, the constitution is saved."

A copy of Thierry's Letter to Doze.

"I have been again censured for receiving the letter which you transmitted me, and which in my zeal for the king's interest I was determined to lay before him.

"He has, however, permitted me to reply:

"1. That he never neglected the choice of his ministers.

"2. That the declaration of war was made by the very ministers who called themselves the patriots.

"3. That he had tried his utmost at the proper time to prevent the coalition of foreign powers, but that now they had collected on the frontiers; that he possessed no other means of dispersing them than those which he had already put in force.

"4. That he had ever observed the constitution with the strictest scrupulosity, but that many who accused him had, on the contrary, violated it continually."

NOTE 46. Page 124, col. 1.

The following paper is one of those referred to by M. Lally-Tolendal in his letter to the king of Prussia.

Copy of the Minutes of the Sitting held the 14th of August, 1722, written in the handwriting of Lally-Tolendal.

"4th August.

"In the presence of M. Montmorin, formerly minister for foreign affairs; M. Bertram, minister for maritime affairs; M. de Clermont Tonnerre; M. de Lally-Tolendal; M. Malouet; M. de Gouvernet, and M. de Villers. After three hours' deliberation, we each communicated whatever had come to his knowledge with respect to the impending insurrection. I had received an anonymous letter, in which I was informed, that conferences had been held on this subject at Santerre's house, in which it was agreed that an attack should be made on the Tuileries, the king should be assassinated, the dauphin carried off, to be dealt with afterwards as circumstances might require, or in case the king should not be killed, the whole royal family should be made prisoners. We then unanimously resolved upon his majesty's departure from Paris under an escort of the Swiss, and accompanied by ourselves and our friends, who were very numerous. We reckoned upon M. de Lamoignon, who had offered to come up from Rouen to our assistance, and also upon the co-operation of M. de Lafayette. Just as our deliberations concluded, M. de Malherbes arrived; he came to beg of madame de Montmorin and madame de Beaumont, her daughter, to quit Paris immediately, as he foresaw the approaching storm. M. de Malherbes gave us further intelligence respecting the insurrection, and we unanimously agreed that M. de Montmorin should go immediately to the palace, to inform the king of the events which had come to our knowledge, and to communicate to him the resolutions we had come to. The king apparently acceded to all our requests that evening. On the following morning we all again assembled at the Tuileries, and I conversed a long time with M. the duke de Choiseul, who perfectly coincided in our opinions, and urged the king at all hazards to fly; but he was astonished to find that the king had altered his determination, and was resolved rather to expose himself to every danger than commence a civil war. The decree of dethronement was to be pronounced on the Thursday following. The troops of Lafayette were now the only resource. I immediately sent off a despatch to him, containing a project which I desired him to communicate to the duke of Brunswick, on the first tidings he might receive of the dethronement."

NOTE 47. Page 149, col. 1.

The following contains some valuable information as to the September murders, which exhibits those frightful scenes in their true light. The most important of these disclosures were made at the Jacobins, and were published by the disputes which arose in the Convention.

(Sitting of Monday, 29 October, 1792.)

"Chabot. This morning Louvet has noticed a fact which it is highly essential should be set right. He has told us that the events of the 2nd of September were not brought about by the same men as those of the 10th of August; but I, from ocular testimony, assert that they were. He has told us that there were not two hundred persons engaged therein, but I, for my part, tell him that I passed under an arch of ten thousand sabres. I appeal to Bazire, Colon, and other deputies who were with me for the truth of what I say: from the court of the monks up to the prison of the Abbaye, it was hardly possible for us to pass. I myself counted among them one hundred and fifty federalists. It is possible that Louvet and his adherents were not present at these popular executions. However, while any one can coolly utter such a speech as Louvet has just done he cannot possess much humanity; for my part, since I have heard his speech I should not like to sleep by the side of him for fear of being assassinated. I call upon Pétion to declare if there were not more than two hundred men at this execution, but it is nothing more than consistent that the intriguers should shirk the recollection of the events of that day of which France has received so little information . . . Their object is to cut off the patriots one by one. They want to impeach Robespierre, Marat, Danton, and Santerre. They will soon have Bazire, Merlin, Chabot, and Montaut, and even Grangeneuve, unless he takes up with them; they will next propose a decree against the entire faubourg Saint-Antoine, against the forty-eight sections, and we shall be . . . in all eight thousand men under accusation; they must, however, entertain some doubt of their strength since they now call for an ostracism."

(Sitting of Monday, the 5th November.)

"Fabre d'Églantine made some observations upon the events of the 2nd September: he positively states that it was the men of the 10th of August who had broken open the prisons of the Abbaye, Orleans, and Versailles. He said that at this critical period, he had seen the same men come to Danton, and express their satisfaction by rubbing their hands; that one among them desired that Morande should be sacrificed: he adds, that he has seen Roland in the garden of the minister for foreign affairs, pale, downcast, supporting his head against a tree, and calling for the transference of the convention to Tours or to Blois. He also added, that Danton was the only one who showed the greatest energy on that day; that Danton never despaired for the safety of the country; that by stamping on the earth he could cause tens of thousands of its defenders to issue forth, and that he had sufficient moderation not to abuse the species of dictatorship with which the national assembly had invested him, by decreeing that those who thwarted the ministerial operation should suffer death. Fabre next declares that he has received a letter from madame Roland, in which the wife of the minister for the home department begs him to lend his assistance to some contrivance devised for carrying some decrees of the convention. The speaker requires that the society should order the preparation of an address which should contain all the minute historical facts of the events that had taken place from the acquittal of Lafayette up to this very day."

"Chabot. These are the facts that are necessary to be known. On the 10th of August the people then being in a state of insurrection wanted to sacrifice the Swiss; at this period the Brissotins did not consider themselves the men of the 10th August, for they came to implore us to have mercy on them: those were the expressions of Lasource. I was a god on that occasion; I saved one hundred and fifty Swiss; I myself at the gate of the Feuillans stopped the people who wished to make their way into the hall to sacrifice these unfortunate Swiss to their vengeance: the Brissotins then were afraid that they would also be included in the massacre. After what I had done on the occasion of the 10th August, I expected that on the 2nd September I should be sent on deputation to the people: well! the extraordinary commission then presided over by Brissot, then supreme, did not elect me! who did they choose? why, Dusaulex, to whom they actually associated Bazire. They did not at that time know what men were fit to influence the people and stop the effusion of blood. I happened to be on my way to the deputation; Bazire asked me to join him, he took me there . . . Had Dusaulex any special instructions? I know not, but what I know is that Dusaulex would not allow any one to speak. In the midst of an assemblage of ten thousand men, among whom were one hundred and fifty Marseillais, Dusaulex got upon a chair; he felt considerably at a loss; he had to address men armed with daggers. When he had at last obtained silence, I promptly spoke to him these words, 'If you can manage things well you will stop the effusion of blood; say to the Parisians that it is for their own interest that there should be an end put to these massacres, in order that the departments should not conceive any apprehension as to the safety of the national convention now about to assemble at Paris . . .' Dusaulex heard what I said; and whether it were had faith, or the testiness of all age, he did not do as I had told him; and this is the M. Dusaulex who is now held up as the only man worthy of the deputation of Paris . . . ! A second fact not less important than the former is, that the massacre of the prisoners at Orleans, has not been committed by the Parisians. This . . . massacre must necessarily appear more detestable, since it was committed at a later period than the 10th August, and by a smaller number of persons. Yet the intriguers have never alluded to it, they have never said a single word on the subject; it is that an opponent of Brissot had perished, the minister of foreign affairs, who had driven away his protégé Narbonne . . . As for myself, if I at the gate of the Feuillans have stopped the people who wanted to sacrifice the Swiss, how much more could not the legislative assembly have prevented the effusion of blood. If then it be a crime, it ought to be laid to the charge of the legislative assembly, or rather to Brissot who then devised it."

NOTE 48. Page 167, col. 2.

The following is a description of the two sides of the Convention, from the pen of the minister Garat *, the only person who has formed a just conclusion upon the characters who figured in this revolution.

(Extracted from Garat's Memoirs.)

"Nearly all the men of whom I have just spoken belonged to the right side of the assembly, and I could perceive no other disposition among them than that which they manifested in their private lives. I observed in them a republican spirit, which disdained to obey any man but one who spoke in the name of the nation and conformably to law, and that republicanism of intellect, much more rare, which decomposes and recomposes the whole organization of a society of men equal in rights as in nature, and which discovers, by a happy art, the profound secret of associating together, in a great republic, things apparently the most unsocial, equality and submission to magistrates; that agitation which keeps the spirit of a people ever active, and a constant and invariable maintenance of order; a government absolute in authority over individuals and the multitude, and always subject to the nation; an executive power effective, imposing in its forms, and ever displaying the majesty of the republic, but banishing the idea of any individual or personal superiority.

"On the same side of the assembly, I observed also those men who best understood the doctrines of political economy, who endeavoured to open and enlarge all the channels of individual and national wealth; to amass a public fund from the properties of the citizens, scrupulously mindful of the proportion each should contribute, according to the extent of his means; to create new sources of riches by making a judicious use of the property which had been thrown into the treasury of the republic; and to protect and maintain the freedom of every species of industry without partiality or favour; regarding extensive possessions not as stagnant lakes, which receive and absorb the mountain streams, but as necessary reservoirs, destined to spread fertility over spots which would otherwise remain parched and unfruitful. These were admirable doctrines, calculated to give liberty to arts and commerce, even before it was introduced into governments, but particularly adapted to republics, and alone capable of laying a solid foundation of equality, not in a system of frugality, which is always violated, and which restrains the passions much less effectually than industry, but by producing a general competency, and by encouraging those pursuits and occupations whose ingenious variety, and constant and unfailling renovation, can alone employ, happily for liberty, the turbulent activity of democracies, which, after having long agitated, finally shattered and annihilated all the ancient republics in a volcano of storm and tempest, the atmosphere in which they were always enveloped.

* I have considered it my duty to add such notes as seemed likely to prove serviceable, either as illustrations of facts little known and not duly appreciated, or as records of a style and language altogether consigned to oblivion, but yet highly characteristic. These scraps are for the most part derived from sources utterly neglected, and particularly from the debates of the Jacobins, a very rare and curious political record.

"In the right side were five or six men of a genius sufficiently capacious to grasp the extensive theories of social order and political economy, and several others capable of comprehending and engraving new branches on these principles; there were also, belonging to this party, many who had formerly been carried away by impetuosity and violence, and who, having run through the whole circle of demagogue extravagances, now desired to counteract those evils they had previously propagated; finally, on these benches sat those gentle and amiable characters who were possessed of competent fortunes and respectable mental acquirements, and were disposed to honour all the virtues of a republic which left them in the undisturbed enjoyment of their repose, their benevolence, and their domestic happiness.

"Turning from my survey of this side, and fixing on the left side, and the Mountain, how great was the contrast! There I beheld the aspect of a being agitated by tumultuous passions, livid in complexion, and having the air of one just emerged from the carcase-strewn caverns of the anthropophagi, and breathing the atmosphere of hell; whose convulsive, startled, and frantic gait declared the assassin escaped from the executioner, or the fury bent upon the destruction of the human race, to avoid the terror which the countenance of man inspired in his guilty soul. Under the reign of despotism, which he had not been able to stain with blood as he had done liberty, this man had endeavoured to make a revolution in sciences, and had attacked, by his daring and flimsy systems, the greatest discoveries of modern times, and of the human intellect. Studying the history of centuries back, his attention had been arrested by the lives of those exterminators who had transformed cities into deserts, to repopulate these deserts again with beings formed after their own image, that is, of tigers; this is all that struck him in the annals of the human race, and these monsters were the objects of his imitation. By an instinct similar to that of the ferocious beasts of the forest, rather than by any profound perversity of intellect, he observed into how many and great extravagances and crimes it was possible to seduce a people, whose religious and political chains had been just broken; to bring about these horrors was the object of all his writings, words, and actions. He fell under the dagger of a woman! But more, fifty thousand, agitators, conformed to his own image, soon sprung up from the bosom of the republic!

"By the side of this man were others who were not capable of conceiving similar atrocities, but who, being thrown with him, by an act of extreme audacity, into the midst of events whose precipitous elevation made them giddy, whilst the dangers which surrounded them made them tremble, although disavowing the maxims of this monster, which they had nevertheless already acted upon, were not sorry to be considered capable of proceeding to the same lengths. Detesting Marat, they were yet willing to make use of him. They placed him in the midst of them, or even put him in the foreground, and might be said to carry him in their bosom, as the head of Medusa. The repulsion and terror which such a character inspired was universal; his image was ever before all eyes; he was considered as composing the whole Mountain, and the whole Mountain was thought to be personified in him. Among its chiefs many, indeed, resembled Marat more in the undisguised boldness of their speech, than in any near approximation to his ferocity.

"But of these (and here I differ in opinion with many respectable men) were many who, allied to their party more by events than inclination, regretted their renunciation of wisdom and humanity, and would have displayed many virtues, and have rendered many services to the republic, had they not been looked upon as outcasts. All those who were passionate enthusiasts of liberty, flocked to the Mountain, as to a military post, but understood little of its theory; all those who considered equality menaced, or even violated by lofty ideas or elegant language; all those who, educated in cottages or work-shops, could only recognise a republican in the costume which they themselves wore; all those who, entering for the first time into the career of the revolution, sought to signalize themselves by impetuosity and violence, their only road to celebrity; and all those who, in the ardour of youth, and more adapted to serve the state in our armies than in the sanctuary of the laws, seeing that the birth of the republic took place amidst the noise of thunder, believed that its decrees should be promulgated, and its spirit preserved in the same manner. In the left side of the assembly also, many of those deputies sought an asylum rather than a place, who had been educated in the proscribed ranks of the nobility and the priesthood, who, though pure in principle, were always exposed to suspicions, and fled to the height of the Mountain to escape from accusation: there too those grave and melancholy beings, who, having too often perceived duplicity united to politeness, recognised virtue only in a habit of gloom, and liberty in a garb of ferocity, thronged together to nourish their suspicions, and to surround themselves with phantoms of their own creation: there sat also some individuals who had attained some knowledge of the sciences, and proud of possessing acquirements immediately applicable to the mechanic arts, disdainfully separated themselves from the men of letters and philosophers, whose attainments were not so directly useful to the common trades of life, and are, consequently, not appreciated till a people become generally enlightened, and, finally, with the Mountain all those took their seats, who were disposed to go beyond, rather than fall short of the energy necessary to propel the career of the revolution.

NOTE 49. Page 173, col. 2.

Address of Collet D'Herbois to Dumouriez after the Campaign of Angonne, extracted from the Journal of the Jacobins.

(Sitting of Sunday, the 14th of October, the first year of the Republic.)

"In speaking of our armies, I am happy it is in the presence of the soldier whom you have just heard. I disapprove of the reply of the president: I have already frequently said that no president should answer for the members of a society, but his reply has been addressed to all the soldiers of our army. His speech, however, has given a lively testimony of our satisfaction; Dumouriez will partake of it with all his brothers in arms, for he knows that without them he could not have acquired any glory. We must accustom ourselves to this language. Dumouriez has done his duty, and this is his greatest recompense. It is not because he is a general that I praise him, but because he is a French soldier.

"Is it not true, general, that it is glorious to command a republican army? Have you not found a great difference between this army and one of despotism? Your soldiers have not only the bravery natural to Frenchmen; they are not content with despising death, for who fears death? But those inhabitants of Lille and Thionville, who brave in cold blood the attacks of the enemy, who are unmoved in the midst of the roar of cannon and the destruction of their houses, do they not display all the virtues? Oh! yes; and these virtues are more honourable than all their triumphs. A new manner of making war is now invented, and our enemies will never find it out; tyrants can do nothing when freemen rise up in their own defence.

"A great number of our brethren have fallen in the cause of liberty; they are dead, but their memory is dear to us; they have left us examples which survive in our hearts; but do those live with whom they have contended? No; they have sunk down, and their cohorts are mere animated carcasses, become putrid on the very ground where they fought, and so thoroughly infected, that the sun of liberty would scarcely purify them. This cloud of moving skeletons resembles the skeletons of tyranny, and like it, must soon fall. What have become of their generals of great renown? Their very shadows have vanished before the omnipotent genius of liberty; they fly, and have only dungeons for their retreat; for dungeons will shortly be the palaces of despots; they fly, because the people rise up.

"It is not a king who has appointed you, Dumouriez, but thy fellow-citizens: recollect that the general of a republic should never negotiate with tyrants: recollect that a general like yourself should be the servant only of liberty.—You have heard of Themistocles; he had saved the Greeks by the battle of Salamis; he was calumniated (you have enemies, Dumouriez, you will be calumniated, and it is therefore that I speak to you). Themistocles was calumniated; he was punished unjustly by his citizens; he sought an asylum with tyrants, but was always Themistocles. It was proposed to him to take arms against his country: My sword shall never serve tyrants, said he, and plunged it into the heart of the proposer. Recollect also the history of Scipio.—Antiochus endeavoured to seduce this great man, by offering him his son as a hostage. Scipio replied, 'All your riches are insufficient to buy my conscience, and my love of my country is above all bribery.'

"Many people groan in slavery; you will soon deliver them. What a glorious mission! Success is not doubtful: the citizens of those nations wait for you, and those who are here urge you on . . . Yet you must be blamed for an excess of generosity towards your enemies: you have let the king of Prussia off rather too much in the French fashion, that is the ancient French fashion, understand (applause). But we hope that Austria will pay double for this lenity; she is deeply in our debt: you cannot make her pay too dearly for the outrages she has committed against the human race.

"Thou art going to Brussels, Dumouriez (cheers); thou wilt go through Courtray. At that place the French name has been profaned: a general has abused the expectation of the people; the traitor Jarry has been firing dwelling-houses. I have not hitherto addressed myself to thy courage, I now appeal to thy heart. Bear in your mind those unfortunate inhabitants of Courtray; do not deceive their hopes this time; promise them the nation's justice, the nation will justify thy promises.

"When thou shalt be at Brussels . . . I have taught to observe on thy conduct there . . . if thou shouldest there find an execrable woman, who, under the walls of Lisle, has come to satisfy her ferocity with the spectacle of unsanguined cannon balls; . . . but this woman does not expect thee . . . shouldest thou find her she will be thy prisoner: we have others also of the same family . . . ; thou wilt send her up here . . . ; and cause her to be shaved so close that she shall never more wear a wig.

"At Brussels liberty will revive under thy auspices. A whole nation will be transported with joy; thou wilt restore children to their fathers, husbands to their wives, and wives to their husbands; the sight of their happiness will divert thee after thy toils. Children, citizens, girls, and women shall press around thee; all of them shall embrace thee as their father; . . . What felicity thou art going to enjoy, Dumouriez . . . ! my wife . . . she is a Brussels woman; she will also embrace thee."—This speech was frequently interrupted by loud applause.

NOTE 50. Page 174, col. 2.

Narrative of the Visit that Marat paid to Dumouriez at Mademoiselle Candeille's, extracted from the French Republican Journal, (Journal de la République Française), and written by Marat himself in his number of Wednesday, 17th October, 1792.

Declaration made by the People's Friend.

"Not so much astonished as indignant at witnessing the old servants of the court placed by the course of events at the head of our armies; and since the 10th August, kept in office by influence, intrigue, and folly, carry their audacity to such lengths as to degrade and treat as criminals two patriot battalions under the ridiculous, and most probably the false, pretence that some individuals had massacred four Prussian deserters, I offered myself at the tribune of the Jacobins to unveil this odious conspiracy, and to ask that two . . . commissaries distinguished by their civism, should accompany me to Dumouriez, and bear witness of his answers to my interrogatories. I repaired to his house with the citizens Bentabolé and Manteau, two of my colleagues in the convention. The answer was, that he was at the play, and that he would sup in town.

"We ascertained that he had returned from the Variétés [theatre]; we then went to find him out at the club of D. Cypher, where it was said he had an appointment; we missed him by a moment. At last, we learnt that he was engaged to supper in the rue Chanteraine at Talma's little box there. A long train of carriages and brilliant illuminations pointed out to us the temple where the son of Thalia was entertaining a child of Mars. We were surprised to find the national guard of Paris inside the house, and also outside. After having passed through an ante-chamber full of servants, mingled with attendants in Hungarian liveries (heiduques), we came to a withdrawing room filled with a large company.

"At the door was Santerre, general of the Parisian army, performing the office of a footman to announce the names. He announced my name in a loud voice the moment he noticed me, a piece of indiscretion that exceedingly annoyed me, inasmuch as it enabled some deceitful personages with whom I should have been glad to have been better acquainted, on their guard. Nevertheless, I saw quite enough to trace the course of the intrigues in that quarter. I shall say nothing about ton furies or so who were to add to the gaiety of the entertainment. Political matters in all probability did not bring them there. Neither shall I say any thing of some national officers who paid their respects to the great general; nor yet of some old servants of the court who accompanied him under the disguise of aids-de-camp. And to conclude, I shall say nothing of the master of the house, who stood in the midst of all, dressed like a common stage-player. But I can't help stating, for the benefit of the conventional operations, and as a piece of intelligence for those who have the dealing out decrees, that in this august assembly were Kersaint, that great man of all-work, Lebrun, and Roland, and Lasource; . . . and Chenier, all of them hirelings of the federalist republic; as well as Dulaure and Gorsas their libellous whippers (galopins). As all was noise and confusion, I could distinguish no more than these conspirators; in all probability they mustered strong; and as it was by no means late, it is highly probable they had not all arrived; for the Vergniauds, the Camuses, the Rabauds, the Lacroixs, the Guadets, the Barbaroux, and other parties to the plot, were no doubt engaged to this entertainment, inasmuch as they belong to the association.

"Before giving an account of our conversation with Dumouriez, I pause for an instant, to make with the judicious reader some few observations by no means pointless in this place. Can any one conceive that this generalissimo of the republic, who has suffered the king of Prussia to escape him at Verdun, and who has capitulated with the enemy, whom he could have stormed in his own camp, and made him lay down his arms instead of allowing his retreat, should choose so critical a moment as this to abandon the armies under his command to run about to plays, to get homage and attention paid to himself, and to engage in profligate debauches with an actor and with the nymphs of the opera.

"On entering the withdrawing room, where the entertainment was prepared, I saw plainly enough that my presence was a restraint upon the gaiety, which can very easily be conceived when it is considered that I am a scarecrow to the enemies of my country. Dumouriez, in particular, appeared extremely disconcerted; I begged him to walk with us into another room, in order to have a few minutes' conversation with him. I began first, and here is our conversation word for word: 'We are members of the national convention, and we are come, sir, to beg of you to afford us some explanations upon the real facts of the affair of the two battalions, the Maconnais and the Republican, accused by you, with having in cold blood murdered four Prussian deserters. We have gone over the papers of the military committee and those of the war department; and we have not therein found the least proof to warrant conviction, and no one can give us better information on the subject than yourself. . . . Gentleman, I have sent all the papers to the minister. . . . We assure you, sir, that we have in our hands a statement made in his offices, and under his name, purporting that there are no facts whatever to warrant a conviction for this pretended offence, and therefore we must address ourselves to you to see if there be any. . . . But, gentlemen, I have made my statement to the convention, and I refer you to her. . . . Allow us, sir, to observe to you, that the information you have given is not sufficient, inasmuch as the committees of the convention, to whom this affair has been referred, have declared in their report that they were unable to come to any conclusion for want of evidence and proofs of the offence as charged. We therefore beg you to tell us whether you are acquainted with the real facts. . . . Certainly. I know them of my own knowledge. . . . And is not that by a private accusation made to you on the word of M. Duchascau? . . . But, gentlemen, when I say a certain thing, I think I ought to be believed. . . . Sir, if we were of the same opinion on that matter with yourself, we should not have taken the course that brings us here. We have great reasons for doubting it; numerous members of the military committee declare to us that those pretended Prussians were four French emigrants. . . . Well, gentlemen, when that shall be. . . . Sir, that will entirely change the state of the affair, and without being in haste to approve the conduct of these battalions, although they may be perfectly innocent; there are circumstances which have induced this massacre, which it behoves us to know; again, letters from the army declare that these emigrants have been discovered to be spies sent by the enemy, and that they themselves were in mutiny against the national guards. How is this, sir, do you then approve of insubordination by soldiers? . . . No, sir, I by no means approve of insubordination by soldiers; but I abhor the tyranny of commanders: I have strong grounds for believing that this same is a mere machination of Duchascau against the patriot battalions, and the way in which you have treated them is revolting. Mr. Marat, you are too sharp, and I cannot enter into any explanation with you.' At this point, Dumouriez finding himself hard pressed, freed himself from his awkward situation by leaving us: my two colleagues however followed him, and in the conversation they had with him, he confined himself to saying that he had sent the papers to the minister. During their interview I perceived myself surrounded by all Dumouriez's aids-de-camp as well as by the officers of the Parisian guard. Santerre did his best to conciliate me; he spoke to me as to the necessity there was that subordination should be maintained in the military. 'I know that as well as you,' I answered; 'but I am quite disgusted at the manner in which the soldiers of the country are treated. I still have at heart the massacres of Nancy and the Champ-de-Mars.' Here some of Dumouriez's aids-de-camp began to declaim against the agitators. 'Cease these idle declamations,' I then cried; 'the only agitators in our armies are the infamous officers, their spies and their perfidious courtesans, that we are so foolish as to leave at the head of our troops.' What I said was pointed at Moreton, Chabrilant, and at Bourdoin, of whom one was an old court servant, and the other a spy of Lafayette's.

"I was indignant at all I had heard, and of every fresh atrocity exhibited in the odious conduct of our generals. Not being able to stay longer, I quitted the party, and saw with astonishment in the neighbouring room, the doors of which were open, a great many liveried servants of Dumouriez with naked swords. I do not know what could have been the object of this ridiculous farce; if it had been done with the idea of intimidating me, it must be admitted that Dumouriez's footmen have great notions of liberty. Have patience, good sirs, we shall teach you what liberty is. In the mean time, believe that your master has a far greater dread of the tip of my pen, than I have for the broad-swords of his German bandits (chenapans)."

NOTE 51. Page 203, col. 2.

Amongst the most cool and impartial spirits of the revolution, must be named Pétion. No one has so judiciously commented upon the two parties that divided the convention. His natural love of justice was so well known, that both sides consented to be bound by his decision. The accusations that took place from the opening of the assembly caused great dissensions among the Jacobins. Fabre d'Églantine proposed their being referred to Pétion's judgment. The following is the mode in which he expressed himself.

(Sitting of the 20th October, 1792.)

"There is another measure that I consider of use, and which will produce a greater effect: in almost every instance, when a vast intrigue is in concoction, it has wanted the assistance of a greater power; it has therefore to make every exertion to obtain a great personal influence. If there existed a man who had observed every thing, and fairly appreciated the merits of either party, you would never hesitate to declare that this man, friend to truth, ought to make them known. Well, I propose that you invite this man, a member of your own club, to give his judgment upon the crimes that are imputed to the patriots; and charge his virtuous disposition to enunciate his conclusions from all that he has seen: this man, then, is Pétion. Whatever allowance that the man may make for his friends, I venture to say that the intriguers have not corrupted Pétion; he is always pure, he is always sincere; I say it here, I often go to the convention to speak to him at troubled periods, and though he does not tell me that he groans, I see that he groans in spirit; this morning he wanted to ascend the tribune. He could not refuse to write what he thought, and we shall see that in spite of what I get out of him by this means, the intriguers can make him change his mind. Mind this, citizens, that this course will of itself prove that all you want is truth; it is a token of respect that you will pay to the virtue of a good patriot, with this additional motive, that the leaders are so wrapped up in the idea of his integrity as to be something. I require the motion to be put to the vote" (cheers).

"Legendre. The blow was ready to fall, that is clear enough: the circulation of Briesot's speech, the home secretary's report, the speech of Louvet in his pocket, all shows that he had made up his mind definitively as to what he should do. Briesot's speech upon the erasure question, contains all that Louvet has said; Roland's report was only made for the purpose of giving Louvet an opportunity of speaking. I approve of Fabre's motion: the convention will give Robespierre priority of motion on Monday: I ask that the club suspend its opinion till then; it is impossible that virtue should be trampled upon by malice in a free country.

"After this quotation, I think I ought to set before the reader the piece that Pétion wrote, in reference to the dispute between Louvet and Robespierre; this, with the citations from Garat, is one which reflects the greatest light upon the character and behaviour of the men of that day, and are those that history ought to preserve as being the most capable of diffusing correct ideas as to this period.

"Citizens! I had made up my mind to maintain perfect silence with regard to the events that have taken place since the 10th of August; I was induced to adopt this reserved line of conduct from a sense of delicacy, and from a desire to serve the public.

"But it is impossible to remain silent any longer; from all sides my testimony is called for; I am urged by every one to deliver my opinion, and I shall candidly declare all that is come under my knowledge concerning individuals, and what I think of the present state of our affairs.

"I have been a close observer of the scenes of the revolution; I have seen cabals, intrigues, and fearful struggles between tyranny and liberty, between vice and virtue.

"When the passions of men appear without disguise,—when the secret springs which have directed the most important operations are made manifest,—when events are traced clearly to their causes,—when all the perils which liberty has encountered are recollected, and when we look down into that abyss of corruption which threatened every moment to engulf us, we may well ask ourselves with astonishment, by what train of wonderful circumstances we have made so rapid a progress in the cause in which we engaged.

"Revolutions should be seen from a distance; through the vista of ages their stains are not perceptible; posterity only considers their results; our grandsons will look back upon us as great men: may they be better than we are!

"I shall pass over all events which were anterior to that day ever memorable for the elevation of liberty on the ruins of tyranny, and which converted a monarchy into a republic.

"The men who attribute to themselves the glory of that day, are those to whom it least belongs ; it is due to those who prepared the way for it ; to the imperative necessity which made it inevitable ; to the brave confederates, and those who concerted long before the plan of the insurrection, to the people, and to the tutelary genius which has presided over the destinies of France since the first assembling of its representatives !

"It must, however, be confessed that, at one moment, its success was dubious ; and those who are truly informed of the details of this day, know who were the intrepid defenders of their country, who dispossessed the Swiss and other satellites of despotism of the field of battle, and who were those who rallied our citizen phalanxes when they wavered.

"The events of this day would nevertheless have equally taken place without that concurrence of the emissaries of several sections, who met together at the house of the commune : the members of the ancient municipality, who had not separated during the night, were in sitting at half past nine o'clock in the morning.

"Yet these emissaries, it must be granted, entered into a bold measure, by investing themselves with all the municipal power, and putting themselves in the place of the council-general, whose corruption and weakness they feared, and thus exposing themselves to the greatest dangers, should the insurrection have proved unsuccessful.

"If the emissaries had had the wisdom to lay down their authority afterwards, and return to the rank of simple citizens after the noble action they had performed, they would have acquired great honour ; but they could not resist the attractions of power, and the lust of dominion overpowered them.

"In the first intoxication of conquest, and liberty, and after so violent a commotion, it was impossible that order and tranquillity should be instantly restored ; it was unjust to expect it ; the reproaches, therefore, which have been addressed to the council-general of the commune were perfectly uncalled for, and sprung from ignorance of their position ; but the emissaries then began to merit censure, when they prolonged the insurrection beyond its necessary term.

"The national assembly had pronounced their will ; they had acted greatly ; they passed decrees which saved the nation ; they had suspended the king ; they had effaced the line of demarcation which separated the citizens into two classes, and had convoked the convention ! The royalist party was down. All should, therefore, have rallied round the assembly,—have fortified it by public opinion, and have imparted confidence to its members ; both duty and policy pointed out this line of conduct.

"But the commune preferred setting up as a rival to the assembly ; she entered into a struggle which only served to throw disgrace upon all which had happened, and represented the assembly as acting under the imperious yoke of necessity ; she obeyed or resisted its decrees, according as they favoured or thwarted her views ; she laid her representations before the legislature in a domineering and irritating manner ; she affected power, and knew neither how to enjoy her triumphs, nor to procure pardon for her usurpations.

"The members of this commune succeeded in persuading some, that whilst the revolution lasted, all power should return to its first source,—that the national assembly was destitute of any decisive character,—that its existence was precarious, and that the assemblies of the commune were alone possessed of potency and legality.

"To others it was insinuated that the leading men in the national assembly harboured perfidious projects, and designed to overthrow liberty, and deliver up the republic into the hands of foreign powers.

"By these persuasions, many members of the council believed themselves in the exercise of a legitimate right when they usurped authority, thought they were resisting oppression when they opposed the law, and considered themselves acting as good republicans when they failed in all the duties of a citizen ; yet in the midst of all this anarchy, the commune, from time to time, took salutary measures.

"I had been continued in my office, but it was no more than a vain title ; I sought in vain to fulfil its functions ; they were divided among many, and every one exercised them at his pleasure.

"I resorted to the council ; I was dismayed by the disorder which reigned in this assembly, and especially by the spirit which seemed to prevail there ; it was no longer an administrative body deliberating on the affairs of the commune, but a political assembly, invested with full powers, discussing the interests of the state, examining the laws already in existence, and promulgating new ones. Then I heard of conspiracies against the public liberty ; citizens were accused, summoned to the bar, heard in their defence, summarily sentenced, acquitted, or retained prisoners ; all ordinary regulations were dispensed with ; the heat and hurry by which all things were precipitated along rendered every attempt at restraint impossible ; all deliberations were carried on with precipitation and enthusiasm ; they succeeded each other with terrifying rapidity ; day and night, without any intermission, the council were always in sitting.

"I was unwilling that my name should be attached to these multitude of irregular acts, so contrary to my principles.

"I felt that it would be prudent not to approve of them, nor give them my countenance by my presence. Those who feared to see me in the council, those whom my presence displeased, were willing, nevertheless, that the people, whose confidence I preserved, should believe that I presided over their operations, and that nothing was done without my consent ; my reserve, therefore, increased their dislike, but they dared not show it too openly, fearing to alienate the people, whose favour they courted.

"I appeared rarely among them, and the conduct I observed in this delicate position, between the ancient municipality, who complained of their dismissal, and the new one who pretended that they were legally instituted, was not unserviceable in restoring public tranquillity ; for if I had pronounced an opinion for or against either party, it would have produced a rupture which might have been attended with the most fatal consequences.

"The administration was neglected; the mayor was no longer a centre of unity; every hold of authority slipped from between my fingers, all power was divided among a multitude of competitors; every thing was left without superintendence; and all means of repression failed.

"Robespierre then took the ascendant in the council, and considering the situation of affairs, and the cast of his disposition, it would have been surprising if he had not. I heard him make a speech which saddened my heart: the question referred to the decree by which the barriers were ordered to be opened, and on this subject he declaimed in the most animated manner; he perceived nothing but precipices under his feet, and snares laid on every side for liberty; he pointed out the supposed conspirators; he addressed himself to the populace, heated their imaginations, and wrought profoundly on the passions of those who heard him.

"I replied to this speech, with the intention of tranquillizing those whom he had thrown into agitation, of dissipating his dark suspicions, and bringing back the attention of the assembly to the subject before them.

"Robespierre and his partisans drew the commune into inconsiderate measures, and urged them to extortions.

"But I did not on this account suspect his intentions; I blamed his head more than his heart; but the possible consequences of his gloomy apprehensions gave me great alarm.

"The galleries of the council daily echoed with the most violent propositions; its members could no longer persuade themselves that they were magistrates charged to watch over the execution of the laws and the maintenance of order; they regarded themselves as forming a revolutionary association.

"The assemblies of the sections were actuated by the same influence, and communicated it in their turn to others, so that, in a short time, all Paris was in a state of fermentation.

"The committee of superintendence filled the gaols with prisoners, and it cannot be denied that if many of these imprisonments were just and necessary, some were ordered on very slight grounds. But the blame of this is less to be laid on the leading men of the commune than their agents; the police was badly constituted; one man among others, whose very name makes all peaceable citizens shudder, seemed to direct all its measures; assiduous in all conferences, he mingled in all affairs; he harangued and commanded as a master; I complained loudly of this to the commune, and expressed my opinion in these words; Marat is either the most insensate or the most wicked of men. I have never since alluded to him.

"Justice delayed to pronounce the fate of the prisoners, and the prisons became thronged to excess. One section sent a deputation to the council of the commune on the 23rd of August, and declared formally, that the citizens, weary and indignant at the dilatoriness of justice, had determined to force open the gates of the gaols, and sacrifice to their vengeance the criminals who were confined there. This petition, which was drawn up in the most frantic style, received no censure, and was even applauded.

"On the 25th, from a thousand to twelve hundred citizens, in arms, quitted Paris to carry off the state prisoners who were detained at Orleans, and confine them elsewhere.

"On the 27th, the national assembly called upon the department of Paris to furnish thirty thousand men to be despatched instantly to the frontiers; this decree gave rise to a new idea among the people, which concurred with those already excited.

"On the 31st, the acquittal of Montmorin roused the indignation of the populace; the report spread that he had been saved by the perfidy of a messenger of the king's, who had led the jury into error.

"At the same time, the discovery of a plot, revealed by a criminal, was published; this plot had for its object the escape of all the prisoners, who were then to spread through the city, commit every kind of excess, and, finally, carry off the king.

"The public agitation was now at its height. The commune, to excite the zeal of the citizens, had resolved to assemble them together, in military array, at the Champ-de-Mars.

"Finally, the 2nd of September arrived; the alarm gongs were fired; the tocsin sounded. Oh, day of mourning! On this signal, the people assembled, rushed into the prisons, and slew and assassinated! Manuel, and many deputies of the national assembly resorted to these scenes of carnage; their efforts were ineffectual; victims were slaughtered, even in their arms! Alas! I was enjoying a false security; I was ignorant of these massacres, for I had not lately mixed much in public business. Finally, I was informed of them, —but how! in a vague, indirect, and partial manner; it was added, at the same time, that all was then over. The most heart-rending details afterwards came to my knowledge; but I was convinced that these horrors would not be again repeated. Nevertheless they continued. I made urgent applications to the commandant; I required him to protect the prisons by an armed force. At first he made me no reply. I applied again. He then told me that he had given orders. These orders did not appear to be executed; the massacres continued. I went to the council of the commune; I hastened to the 'Hôtel de la Force,' with many of my colleagues. The citizens, apparently peaceably disposed, obstructed the street which led to this prison; a very weak guard was posted at its gates. I entered. No, never can the spectacle I there witnessed be effaced from my heart; I saw three municipal officers hanging in their scarfs; I saw two men quietly seated at a table, the prison registers open before them, and calling over the names of the prisoners; others interrogated them; others acted as jurymen and judges; about a dozen executioners, their naked arms covered with blood, some with clubs, others with sabres and cutlasses, executed instant sentence on the wretched victims; the citizens waited impatiently without, receiving with mournful silence the sentences of death, and with exclamations of joy those of acquittal.

"Both the judges and executioners seemed to enjoy the same security as if they had been called upon by the law to exercise these functions. They boasted of their justice, of their attention to distinguish the innocent from the guilty, of the services they had rendered to the republic, and they demanded,—can it be believed!—they demanded payment for their time spent in these butcheries! I was really confounded at their audacity!

"I addressed them in the austere language of the law. I expressed the deep indignation which I felt. I made them go out before me. But scarcely had I departed, when they returned to their work. I again drove them out. But during the night they completed their horrible butcheries.

"Were these assassins commanded or directed by other men? I have had several lists of names in my possession, I have received reports, I have collected some facts, but if I had to pronounce my opinion as a judge, I could not say of any one, Behold the instigator.

"I think, however, that these crimes would not have had such a free course, and that they might have been arrested, if those who possessed the means of putting a stop to them, had beheld them with horror; but, I must say, for it is the truth, that many public men, many defenders of their country, believed these disastrous and dishonouring scenes necessary to free the nation from dangerous characters, and strike terror into the hearts of the conspirators; they believed that crimes odious to morality were necessary to policy.

"This idea relaxed the energies of those to whom the law has confided the maintenance of public order, to whom it has committed the defence of persons and property.

"It is easy to conceive how the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th of September have been connected with the immortal day of the 10th of August, and how the scenes of the former have been represented as the natural consequences of those of the latter; but, for my own part, I cannot confound glory with infamy, nor consent to dishonour the 10th of August by imputing to it the crimes of September.

"The committee of superintendence issued on the 4th, whilst the massacres still continued, an order of arrest against Roland. Danton being informed of it, hastened, with Robespierre, to the mayoralty; he expressed the warmest indignation against this arbitrary act of madness, which would have ruined, not Roland, but those from whom it proceeded. On his representations, it was recalled.

"I had an animated explanation with Robespierre. I reproached him, to his face, in terms which friendship would have softened in his absence; I said to him: 'Robespierre, you are the cause of much evil. Your denunciations, your alarms, your hatreds, and your suspicions, throw the people into a ferment. But explain yourself; have you facts, have you proofs? I myself contend with you; I love only truth; I am only at the establishment of liberty.'

"'You allow yourself to be prejudiced. You allow yourself to be imposed upon,' replied he, 'you are set against me; you see my enemies daily, you see Brissot and his party.'

"'You deceive yourself, Robespierre, no one is more free from prejudices than myself. I judge of men and things with the utmost impartiality.'

"'It is true I see Brissot, but it is rarely; you do not know him, but I have known him from his childhood. I have seen him at moments when he has been perfectly free from reserve, and has discovered his heart to me in all the confidence of friendship. I know his disinterestedness, I know his principles, and I protest to you they are pure. Those who make him the head of a party, have a most incorrect idea of his character; he is enlightened, and talented, but he has neither that reserve, nor that dissimulation, nor that power of captivation, nor that methodical mind which are necessary for the leader of a party, and what will astonish you more is, that, far from being able to lead others, he is very easily led himself.'

"Robespierre insisted on the truth of his suspicions, but confined himself to generalities. 'For Heaven's sake,' said I, 'explain yourself. Tell me frankly all that is upon your heart, all that you know.'

"'Well!' replied he, 'I believe that Brissot belongs to Brunswick!'

"'How deeply you are in error,' cried I; 'this is really madness. How does your imagination mislead you! Would not Brunswick be the first to take his head? Brissot is not senseless enough to doubt it. Which of us can seriously capitulate now? which of us has not our life at stake? Let us banish these groundless suspicions!'

"I return to those events of which I have endeavoured to give a slight sketch. These events, and a few of those which preceded the celebrated day of the 10th of August, and the occurrence of many facts and circumstances, about the same time, have given rise to an opinion that some intriguing characters aimed, by these means, at possessing themselves of the physical force of the people, and of thus seizing on absolute authority; Robespierre has been openly pointed out; his connexions have been scrutinized, his conduct minutely examined; the expressions which have escaped from his friends have been caught up, and it has been concluded that he entertains the insensate ambition of making himself dictator of his country.

"But the character of Robespierre satisfactorily explains all his actions. He breathes in an atmosphere of gloom and suspicion; he perceives, on all sides, plots, treasons, and precipices; his bilious temperament, and splenetic imagination, present every object to him in dark colours; imperious in his opinion, perversely attached to his own ideas, impatient of contradiction, never acknowledging his errors, or pardoning the wounds inflicted on his self-love, accusing others on the slightest grounds, worried by doubts, believing himself the object of universal attention, considering himself persecuted, devoured by egotism, a stranger to all prudential motives, by which he often injures the causes he defends, aiming, above all things, at the favour of the people, courting them incessantly, and valuing, beyond price, their affection and applause; these are the causes which have made him suspected of aspiring to the dictatorial power.

"For my own part, I cannot persuade myself that this imagination has ever entered into his thoughts, has ever been the object of his desires, or the aim of his ambition.

"Nevertheless, it is certain that he is singularly attached to this idea, that he ceases not to call for a dictatorship, which he represents as the only thing which can save us from the anarchy of which he himself is a prime cause. But for whom does he solicit this tyrannical power? You would never believe it; you know not to what a pitch of extravagance his delirious vanity carries him. He solicits it for Marat; for a being, who, if his folly was not surpassed by his ferocity, would be the most ridiculous object on the earth; but nature seems to have set upon him a seal of reprobation."

NOTE 52. Page 228, col. 1.

Amongst the most curious opinions expressed with regard to Marat and Robespierre, we must not omit that which was uttered by the Jacobin club on the sitting of Sunday, the 23rd December, 1792. I know nothing that can better delineate the spirit and the bias of the moment, than the discussion which arose upon the character of these two personages. The following is an extract:—

"Deslieux reads the correspondence. A letter from one club, whose name has escaped us, gave rise to a great discussion well calculated to cause important reflections. This club declares to the parent society that it is unalterably attached to the principles of the jacobins: it observes that it does not suffer itself to be blinded by the calumnies so profusely uttered against Marat and Robespierre, and that it preserves its entire esteem and veneration for these two incorruptible friends of the people.

"This letter has been loudly applauded, but it has been followed by a discussion, which Brissot and Gorsas, who are assuredly prophets, had announced the preceding day.

"Robert. It is very surprising that the names of Marat and Robespierre are always indiscriminately used. How much must the public mind have been corrupted in the departments, since no distinction is made between these two defenders of the people! They both possess rare virtues, 'tis true; Marat is a patriot, he has estimable qualities, I admit, but how different he is from Robespierre. The latter is discreet, moderate in his measures; while Marat is exaggerated, and does not possess that discretion which is so characteristic of Robespierre. It is not enough to be a mere patriot; we must, if we wish to be of real service to the people, be reserved in carrying out our measures, and Robespierre far excels Marat in the mode in which he carries out his designs.

"It is high time, citizens, to pluck away the veil that conceals the truth from the eyes of the departments; it is indeed time that they should be taught to make some distinction between Robespierre and Marat. Let us write to the corresponding societies what we really think of these two citizens; for, I must avow it, I am a great partisan for Robespierre. (Groans from the galleries, and from a party in the hall.)

"Bourdon. We ought long since to have plainly stated to the corresponding societies our opinion of Marat. How could Marat and Robespierre be ever confounded! Robespierre is a man truly virtuous, against whom no censure can be made from the commencement of the revolution; Robespierre is temperate in his measures, whereas Marat is an intemperate writer, who does considerable mischief to the jacobins (murmurs); and moreover, it is quite as well to observe, has done us much harm at the national convention.

"The deputies conceive that we are partisans of Marat; they call us Maratists; if they perceive that we know how to appreciate Marat, then you will see the deputies come nearer the Mountain where we sit, you will see them come into the body of this society, you will find the corresponding societies return from their wanderings, and rally themselves once more around the cradle of liberty. If Marat be a patriot, he ought to acquiesce in the motion I am about to make. Marat ought to sacrifice himself to the cause of liberty. I require that his name be erased from the list of the members of this club.—This motion called forth some few cheers, violent marks of displeasure from one party in the hall, and a great disturbance in the galleries.

"It will be recollected that eight days previous to this novel scene, Marat had been covered with applause in the club; the people of the galleries who had not lost their memory remembered it well; they could not be brought to believe that such a quick change had taken place in public opinion, and as the moral instinct of the people is invariably correct, they were highly indignant at Bourdon's motion; the people rose in defence of their virtuous friend; the people had not believed that in eight days Marat could have forfeited the esteem of the society, for although it has been said that ingratitude was a virtue in republics, it will take some trouble to familiarize the French people with that description of virtue.

"The union of the names of Marat and Robespierre presented no revolting association to the people; their ears had been for some time now accustomed to see them joined in correspondence; and after having several times seen the club indignant when the clubs of other departments requested the erasure of Marat's name, they did not think that they ought on this occasion support Bourdon's motion.

"A citizen belonging to a corresponding club has observed to the present society how practically dangerous it is to join the names of Marat and Robespierre together. 'In the departments,' said he, 'a great distinction is made between Marat and Robespierre, and one is surprised to see the present society silent upon the subject of the differences existing between these two patriots. I propose to the society, after having declared what is to be done with Marat, to discontinue the use of the term affiliation, (this word ought not to be named in a republic,) but to employ the word fraternization.'

"Dufourmy. I oppose the motion to erase Marat's name from the list of this society. (Low cheering.) I shall not wrangle upon the difference that exists between Marat and Robespierre. These two writers, who resemble each other in their patriotism, yet exhibit remarkably different traits of character; they have both of them served the cause of the people, but by very different means. Robespierre has defended the true principles of action with suitable method, firmness, and wisdom; Marat, on the other hand, has not unfrequently overstepped the limits of sound reason and discretion. Nevertheless, in admitting the difference that does exist between Marat and Robespierre, I am by no means in favour of the motion for erasing his name: one might be just without being ungrateful to Marat. Marat has been highly serviceable to us, he has served the revolution courageously. (Loud cheering from the club and the galleries.) It would be an act of ingratitude to erase his name from the list. (Yes, yes, from all sides.) Marat has been an indispensable person; in revolutions there must be such strong-minded men, capable of conciliating all sorts and conditions, and Marat is one of those remarkable men who are indispensably necessary to overthrow despotism. I conclude by moving, that the motion of Bourdon be rejected, and that we content ourselves with writing to the corresponding societies, apprising them of the distinction that we make between Marat and Robespierre.

"The society resolves that she will no longer use the term affiliation, considering it as injurious to republican equality; the society, therefore, substitutes the word fraternization. The society lastly resolves that the name of Marat shall not be erased from the list of its members, but a circular letter shall be sent to all the societies which enjoy the rights of fraternization, in which shall be expressly defined the points, resemblances, dissimilarities, conformities, and contraries which exist between Marat and Robespierre: so that all those who fraternize with the jacobins may be able to declare themselves with precision upon those two defenders of the people, and that they may be at last enabled to disunite two names, that it has been erroneously conceived ought to have eternally associated with each other.

NOTE 53. Page 246, col. 1.

The following is another extract from the Mémoires of Garat, not less curious than the preceding: it is considered the best portrait that has ever been drawn of Robespierre, and the suspicions which were his tormentors. The following is a conversation.

"As soon as Robespierre understood that I was about to speak to him of the quarrels of the convention, he exclaimed, 'All the deputies of the Gironde, Brissot, Louvet, and Barbaroux, are all counter-revolutionists and conspirators!' I could not help laughing at this exclamation, and this laugh hurt him extremely. 'You were always the same,' he replied; 'in the constituent assembly you were disposed to believe that the aristocrats were attached to the revolution; but I have not always been the same. In the constituent assembly I believed there were some nobles who were not aristocrats; I thought so of many, and you yourself still think so of a few. I believed, also, that we might have made some conversions among the real aristocrats, if, of the two means which were at our disposal, reason and force, we had more frequently employed reason, in which we had the exclusive advantage, whereas the tyrants might have used force. Believe me: let us forget those dangers which we have overcome; they have no connexion with those which at present threaten us. War was carried on then between the friends and the enemies of liberty; but, at present, it is waged between the friends of the republic. If an occasion should present itself, I shall tell Louvet that he is entirely mistaken in thinking you a royalist; but I must tell you, also, that Louvet is no more a royalist than yourself. You resemble, in your quarrels, the Molinists and Jansenists, whose whole dispute turned upon the manner in which divine grace operates in the soul, and who reciprocally accused each other of not believing in God. If they are not royalists, why were they so anxious to save the life of the king? It appears that you, also, are for pardon and clemency. . . . What signifies it on what principles the death of the tyrant was just and necessary; your Girondists, your Brissotins, your appealers to the people, opposed it. They wish to leave to tyranny all the means of re-erecting itself. I do not know that the intention of the appealers to the people was to spare the life of Capet: an appeal to the people always appeared to me imprudent and dangerous; but I can well conceive how those who voted for it might believe that the life of the prisoner Capet would be more serviceable to the republic than his death: I can well conceive that they thought this appeal would be doing honour to the nation in the eyes of the whole world, by affording it an opportunity of exercising a great act of generosity by an act of sovereignty. This is surely putting fine constructions on a measure you disapproved of in favour of men who are conspiring on all sides. Where then are they conspiring? Every where. In Paris, throughout France, and throughout Europe. In Paris, Gensonné is carrying on conspiracies in the faubourg St. Antoine, going from shop to shop and persuading the tradespeople that we patriots wish to plunder their goods; the Gironde have long since formed a design of separating themselves from France, and uniting themselves to England, and their chiefs themselves are the authors of this project, which they are determined to execute, whatever may be the price; Gensonné does not conceal it; he declares aloud that they are not the representatives of the nation, but the plenipotentiaries of the Gironde. Brissot carries on his conspiracies by means of his journal, which is a tocsin of civil war; it is known that he went to England, and the reason why he went is also known; we are not ignorant of his intimate connexion with the minister for foreign affairs; with that Lebrun, who is the creature of the house of Austria: the most intimate friend of Brissot is Clavière, and Clavière conspires wherever he breathes; Rabaud, a traitor, both as a Protestant and a philosopher, cannot conceal from us his correspondence with that traitor and courtier Montesquieu; for the last six months they have both been endeavouring to open Savoy and France to the Piedmontese; Servan has been nominated general of the army of the Pyrenees to deliver up the keys of France to the Spaniards; and, finally, behold Dumouriez, who no longer menaces Holland, but Paris; and when that quack of a hero was here, where I wished to have him arrested, it was not with the Mountain, but at the houses of the Girondists that he dined every day: three or four times at my house, for instance. I am weary of the revolution: I am ill: the country never was in greater danger, and I doubt how all will end. Well! do you feel inclined to laugh now; do you still believe these Girondists honest men and good republicans? No, I am no longer inclined to laugh, but I can scarcely restrain my tears, when I see the legislators of my country a prey to such unfounded suspicions. I am sure that nothing which you suspect is true; but I am sure, also, that your suspicions themselves are really and deeply dangerous; nearly all the men whom you have mentioned are your own enemies, but not one, with the exception of Damouriez, is an enemy to the republic; and if you could stifle your animosities, the country would be no longer in any danger. You are going to propose to me to renew the motion of the bishop Lamouret; no, I have sufficiently profited by the lessons which you have given me, and by my experience in the three national assemblies, to know that the best patriots hate their enemies better than they love their country; but I have one question to put to you,—I beg you to reflect before you answer it; ‘Have you no doubt of the truth of all you have said to me?’ ‘None,’ I then quitted him in astonishment, and trembled at what I had just heard.

“Some few days afterwards, as I was leaving the executive council, I chanced to meet Salles, who was quitting the national convention. Circumstances were every day assuming a more threatening aspect. All those who possessed any regard for one another could not see each other without finding themselves urged to converse upon politics.

“Well I said I to Salles, as I lighted upon him, is there no way of putting an end to these horrible disagreements?—Oh! yes, I do hope so; I hope that I shall expose those terrible wretches and their frightful conspiracies to the world. But as for you, I know that you always possess a blind confidence; I know your way is never to believe any thing.—You are in the wrong there; I believe as much as any one else; but I found my credence upon presumptions, and not upon mere suspicions; upon attested facts, and not on imaginary circumstances. Why, then, do you suppose me so incredulous? Is it because in 1789 I would not believe upon your assertion, that Necker was embezzling the public capital, and that mules had been seen laden with gold and silver, which was his mode of transferring millions to Geneva? This hardness of belief, I must confess, is a thing I cannot restrain; for to this day I am persuaded that Necker has left here more millions for himself than ever he carried off with him to Geneva.—Necker was a rascal, but nothing to compare with the rascals by whom we are surrounded, and it is of these latter I wish to speak if you will but hear me. I would have you say all, for I know all; I have unravelled all their plans. All the conspiracies, all the crimes of the Mountain have had their commencement with the revolution: it is the duke of Orleans who is at the head of this band of robbers; and it is the author of that detestable romance called Licoune dangereuse who has settled the plan of all the enormities they have been committing for five years past. The traitor Lafayette was their accomplice, and it is he who, by making it appear that he had detected the plot from its birth, sent Orleans to England to arrange every thing with Pitt, the prince of Wales, and the cabinet at Saint-James’s. Mirabeau was also there with them: he received the king’s money in order to conceal his connexion with the duke of Orleans, but he received a far greater sum of the duke of Orleans to serve him. The great affair for the Orleans party was to get the Jacobins to identify themselves with his designs. They had not dared to undertake this in a direct manner; it was first to the Cordeliers that they paid their court. Now mark, the Cordeliers have always been not only so numerous, but have made less noise than the Jacobins: it is because that they want every body to be their tool, but will not let every body into their secret. The Cordeliers have always been the nursery of conspirators: it is there that Danton, the most dangerous conspirator of all, brings them up, and adapts their minds to impudence and lying, while Marat renders them fit agents for murder and massacre: it is there that they are getting up the part they must next play at the Jacobins; and the Jacobins, who conduct themselves as if they took the lead in France, are themselves led by the Cordeliers without their at all suspecting it. The Cordeliers, who have the appearance of being concealed in some hole and corner in Paris, negotiate with Europe, and have their envoys at every one of those courts that have sworn to effect the destruction of our liberty: the fact is certain; I can prove it. In short, it is the Cordeliers who have plunged the throne in waves of blood, in order that a new throne should issue therefrom. They well know the right side, where all the virtues preside, is also the side where all the true republicans are to be found; and if they accuse us of royalism, it is because they want this pretext for unloosing upon us the fury of the populace: it is because they can find daggers more easily than answer our arguments. In a single conspiracy there are three or four. When the right side shall be altogether butchered, the duke of York will come to seat himself upon the throne, and Orleans, who has promised it him, will then assassinate him, and then Orleans in his turn will be assassinated by Marat, Danton, and Robespierre, who have made him a like promise; and the triumviri will then divide France, covered with ashes and blood, till the man of the greatest ability, and that will be Danton, assassinate the others, and reigns alone; at first, under the style of a dictator, and next, without disguising the term, under the style of king. Now don’t you see their plan? don’t doubt it: I have considered it so long that I am convinced of it. See how all the circumstances combine and tally with each other: there is not a single fact in the revolution which is not a part and an evidence of these shocking conspiracies. You are astonished, I see it; will you still distrust me?—Indeed, I am astonished; but tell me, are there many amongst you, that is to say of your side, who are entirely of your opinion on this subject?—All, or nearly so. Condorcet once made some objections; Sieyès has but little communication with us; as for Rabaut he entertains another scheme, which sometimes is similar, and sometimes is unlike my own: but all the others have no more doubt than I have upon what I have been telling you; they all feel the necessity there is for acting with promptitude, and to lose no time in putting the wrongs into the fire, in order to prevent so much crime and misery, and that we should not lose the fruits of a revolution that has cost us so dear. On the right side, there are members who do not repose sufficient confidence in you; but as for me, I who have been your colleague, who know you for an honest man, and as a friend of liberty, I assure them that you will be on our side, and that you will assist us by every possible means your situation will admit of. Is there any thing that can tinge with the slightest degree of uncertainty what I have said of these wretches?—I should be certainly unworthy the regard you manifest towards me, if I left you to believe that I entirely accord with your notions as to this plan, which you conceive is your enemies' device. The more you compare facts, things, and men, the more will appear probable to you, and the less so to me. The greater part of the facts, out of which you frame the tissue of this plan, have had an object with which there is no necessity to charge them; they speak for themselves; and you are assigning an object which does not speak for itself, and which must have a reason assigned for it. Now, we must have proofs before we can throw aside a natural inference, and other proofs are next required before an inference, which cannot be supported in a natural way, can be adopted. For instance, every one believes that Lafayette and Orleans are enemies, and that Paris, France, and the national assembly would be quit of great uneasiness, if Orleans could be prevailed upon or compelled by Lafayette to remove himself from France for some time to come. Now, it must be settled, not by assertion, but by proof—1. That they were not enemies; 2. That they were coadjutors; 3. That the journey Orleans took to England was for the express purpose of carrying their conspiracies into execution. I know that by adopting such a strict course of reasoning, one exposes oneself to see crimes and miseries committed before one's eyes, without being able to reach them, and without the means of preventing them by foresight; but I also am aware that by indulging one's own imagination, one creates systems out of past and future events, and one lets slip the means of duly discerning and appreciating the present state of things; and by dreaming of thousands of enormities which no one ever devises, one deprives oneself of the faculty of perceiving with certainty those that threaten us. We force our enemies, who want but little encouragement, to commit acts of which they would have no idea but for our suggesting them. I have no doubt whatever that we have about us a pack of wretches: the unrestrained action of their bad passions produces such men, and the gold of the foreigner keeps them in pay. But believe me, if their schemes are horrible, they are neither so vast, or so great, or so complicated, nor conceived and brought from such a distance. There is in all this much more of the robber and murderer than the deep conspirator. The real conspirators against the republic are the kings of Europe and the bad feelings (passions) of the republicans. Our armies are well able to keep off the kings of Europe and their regiments, and more than enough: there is one mode of preventing our party feelings from destroying us, and only one—lose no time in organising a government that has supreme power, and is deserving of confidence. In the state in which your bickerings leave the government, even a democracy of twenty-five millions of angels would soon become a prey to all the furious passions and hates to which offensive pride gives rise: as Jean Jacques has said, there must be twenty-five millions of gods, and no one can ever bring himself to imagine so many. My dear Salles, men and great assemblies are not so constituted that on one side all are gods, and on the other all devils. Wherever you will find men whose interests and opinions are conflicting, even the good are subject to bad feelings, and even those that are bad, if you will take the pains to dive into their hearts, are susceptible of honest and good impressions. I discover in the depths of my own soul an evident and convincing proof of at least one-half of this truth: I am good, and am as much to be relied upon as any one of you; but when instead of combating my opinions with argument and liberality, you repel them with suspicion and contumely, I am ready to throw argument overboard, and see whether my pistols are well loaded. You have on two occasions, made me minister, and twice you have rendered me any thing but a service; it is only the perils that environ you and surround myself which can induce me to remain in the post I now occupy. A brave man does not ask for leave of absence on the eve of a battle. The battle I see is not far off; foreseeing that both the two sides will discharge themselves upon me, I am determined to remain. I shall on every occasion tell you what I, in my reason and conscience, consider true or false; but mind and take warning that I shall be guided entirely by my own conscience and reason, and not by the conscience or argument of any other man upon earth. I shall not have laboured thirty years of my life in making myself a lantern, for the purpose of lighting myself on the road by another's lantern.

"Salles and myself parted, and shook hands, and embraced each other, as if we had still been each other's colleagues in the constituent assembly."

NOTE 54. Page 267, col. 2.

The true feelings of Robespierre with regard to the 31st May, are plainly evidenced by the language he used at the Jacobins, where he spoke with greater freedom than at the assembly, and where the work of conspiracy was more overtly conducted. Extracts from his speeches at different important periods will evidence the course of his ideas with regard to the grand catastrophe of the 31st May and 2nd June. His first speech uttered on the occasion of the pillages and spoliation of the month of February, affords us an early indication of his sentiments.

(Sitting of February 25, 1793.)

"Robespierre. As I have always been a friend to humanity, and have never sought to flatter any one, I shall declare the whole truth without any reserve. A snare has been laid for the patriots. The intriguers wish to ruin them, and the people experience a sentiment of just indignation. I have always maintained, even when in the midst of persecution, and without any support, that the people can never be in the wrong; I dared to proclaim this truth at a time when it was not generally acknowledged, but the course of the revolution has fully developed it.

"The people have so often heard those call out for the law who wished to bring them under their yoke, that they now distrust that language.

"The people suffer; they have not yet reaped the fruit of their labours; they are still persecuted by the rich, and the rich are now, what they ever have been, unpitiable. (Applause.) The people observe the insolence of those who have betrayed them; they see wealth accumulate in the hands of these traitors; they feel their own misery, and the necessity of taking decisive measures; and when they are addressed in the language of reason, they can listen to nothing but invectives against the rich, and allow themselves to be misled by those who only court their favour to abuse it.

"There are two causes for this: the first, a natural disposition to seek the means of solacing their sufferings, by obtaining by their own exertions that protection which the laws do not afford them.

"And the second, the perfidious designs of the enemies of liberty, who were convinced that the only means of delivering us up to foreign powers, is to alarm the people on the subject of subsistence, and make them the victims of those excesses which must naturally arise from their distress. I myself have been a spectator and witness of many popular risings. By the side of honest citizens I have seen foreigners and opulent individuals disguised in the dress of sans-culottes. I have heard them thus speak: We were promised abundance after the death of the king, and we have only become more wretched since then. We have heard violent declamations, not against that intriguing and counter-revolutionary portion of the convention, who are seated where the aristocrats of the constituent assembly formerly sat, but against the Mountain, against the deputation of Paris, and against the Jacobins.

"I do not say that the people are culpable. I do not say that these commotions are insurrectional; but I ask, when the people rise up, should not the object in view be worthy of a great nation? Should they continually occupy themselves in pitiful trafficking? No advantage has been derived from it, for the sugar-loaves have been gathered up by the hands of the valets of aristocrats; but suppose it had profited, in exchange for this petty advantage, what manifold grievances might have resulted! Our adversaries wish to frighten you away from all moderation and propriety; they wish to persuade you that our system of liberty is subversive of all order and security.

"The people should rise, not to provide themselves with sugar, but to overthrow the robbers. (Applause.) Must I recall to your recollection your past dangers? You were on the point of becoming a prey to the Prussians and Austrians; a negotiation was entered into; and those who had before trafficked away your liberty, who had incited you to the commission of outrages and excesses, I proclaim it aloud in the face of the friends of liberty and equality, and in the face of the nation, that in the month of September last, after the affair of the 10th of August, these very men had made every arrangement for the arrival of the Prussians at Paris."

(Sitting of Wednesday, 8th May, 1793.)

"Robespierre. We have to fight a battle which rages externally and internally. A civil war is maintained by the enemies of the interior. The army of La Vendée, the army of Brittany and the army of Coblenz are turned against Paris, that stronghold of liberty. People of Paris, tyrants arm themselves against you, because you are the most worthy portion of human kind; the great powers of Europe arise against you, all that corruptionists can perform in France seconds their exertions.

"After having conceived this vast scheme of your enemies, you ought not to be at a loss as to the means of defending yourselves. I did not communicate my secret to you; I have disclosed it to the convention.

"I am now going to reveal this secret to you, and were it possible that this duty of the representative of a free people could be considered as a crime, I should know how to brave every peril, in order to confound the tyrants and preserve liberty.

"I have this morning stated at the convention that the light troops of Paris would go and meet the wretches of La Vendée, that they would take along with them in their route all their brethren of the departments, and that they would exterminate all, yes, all the rebels at once.

"I have said that all the patriots at home should rise and utterly incapacitate the aristocrats of La Vendée, and the aristocrats disguised under the mask of patriotism, from doing us further harm.

"I have said that the insurrectionists of La Vendée possessed an army at Paris; I have said that that generous and exalted people, who for five years has borne the weight of the revolution, ought to take the necessary precautions, lest our wives and children should be subjected to the counter-revolutionary knife of those enemies that Paris still retains within her precincts. No one has dared to dispute this principle of action. These massacres are of a most emergent and pressing nature. Patriots! fly to meet the brigands of La Vendée.

"They are no more to be dreaded, other than as they have taken the precaution to disarm the people. Paris must send her republican legions; but when we shall cause our enemies at home to tremble, our wives and our children will no longer be exposed to the fury of the aristocrats. I have proposed two measures: the first, that Paris do send two legions sufficient to exterminate all the wretches who have dared to raise the standard of rebellion. I have demanded that all the aristocrats, that all the feuillans, and that all the moderatists should be banished from those sections they have contaminated with their impure breath. I have demanded that all suspected citizens should be placed in confinement.

"I have demanded that the appellation of a suspected citizen should not be restricted to the title of former nobles, procurators, financiers, and merchants. I have required that all citizens who have given proof of incivism, should be imprisoned until the war be at an end, and that we should assume a commanding attitude before our enemies. I have said that the people must be furnished with some means of meeting in their sections without injuring their means of subsistence, and that for this purpose, the convention should declare that every mechanic living by his daily labour should be paid during all the time that he should be compelled to keep himself under arms for preserving the tranquillity of Paris. I have demanded that some necessary millions should be appropriated for the purpose of making arms and pikes, so as to arm all the sans-culottes of Paris.

"I have demanded that workshops and forges should be erected in the places of public resort, so that all the citizens should be witnesses of the fidelity and activity with which these works should be conducted. I have also demanded that all public officers should be dismissed from their employments by the people.

"I have demanded that the municipality and the department of Paris, which enjoy the confidence of the people, be no longer placed under restraint.

"I have demanded that the factions who are in the convention, should cease to vilify the people of Paris, and that those newspaper editors who prevent public opinion should be silenced. All these measures are necessary, and in resuming my discourse, see the acquittance of the debt I have contracted with the people.

"I have demanded that the people make an extraordinary effort to exterminate the aristocrats who exist every where. (Applause.)

"I have demanded that an army should be in the precinct of Paris; an army not like that of Dumouriez, but a popular army, which should be continually under arms to overawe the feuillans and the moderatists. This army ought to be composed of paid sans-culottes; I demand that there be assigned millions enough to arm the mechanics and all good patriots; I demand that they be stationed at every post, and that their commanding majesty should make every aristocrat turn pale.

"I demand that after to-morrow forges be erected in all places of public resort, where arms shall be made for arming the people. I demand that the executive council have the charge of carrying out these measures on its own responsibility. If any one oppose these measures, if there should be any one who should incline to the enemies of liberty, they should be driven away after to-morrow.

"I demand that the constituted authorities be charged with the superintendence of the execution of these measures, and that they be ever mindful that they are the delegates of a city that is the bulwark of liberty, and whose existence is sufficient to render a counter-revolution impossible.

"In this moment of emergency it becomes the duty of all patriots to save the country, by adopting the sternest expedients; if you will allow the patriots to be butchered one by one, all that is virtuous on earth will be extinguished; it remains for you to see whether you will be the saviours of the human race.

[All the members simultaneously rise with one burst of feeling, and cry out while waving their hats: "Aye, aye, be it so!" (Oui, oui, nous le voulons!)]

"All the vile wretches in the world have concocted their plans, and all the defenders of liberty are marked out for their victims.

"It is because the question concerns your glory and your welfare, and this is the sole motive for which I so earnestly adjure you to keep a watchful eye over the safety of the country. Perhaps you think that you have to cause a rising, and that you must assume the appearance of an insurrection: by no means, it is by the law that we must exterminate our enemies.

"It is a most scandalous piece of impudence that perfidious delegates have wanted to make a distinction between the people of Paris and the departments, that they have desired to make a distinction between the people of Paris and the people of the galleries, as if we were in fault, we who have made every possible sacrifice to open our galleries for the entire population of Paris, and if that population were assembled within these walls, if that population heard me plead its cause against Buzot and Barbaroux, there is no doubt whatever but that it would come over to my side.

"Citizens, the perils are magnified, the foreign armies united with the rebels of the interior are objected against us; what can their efforts avail against millions of valiant sans-culottes? And if you follow up this proposition, that one free man is as good as twenty slaves, you ought to calculate that your force is far beyond all the combined powers.

"You possess by the laws themselves the faculty of legally exterminating our enemies. Have you aristocrats in the sections; drive them forth. Have your liberty to be saved; proclaim the rights of liberty, and use all your energy. Have you a vast population of sans-culottes, very honest and very sturdy, they must leave their work, get them paid by the wealthy. You have a national convention, it is very possible that the members of this convention are not all alike friendly to the cause of liberty and equality, but the far greater number have made up their minds to maintain the rights of the people and to save the republic. The gangrened portion of the convention will not be able to prevent the people from fighting the aristocrats.

"Do you think then that the Mountain of the convention will not be strong enough to repress all the partisans of Dumouriez, of Orleans, and Coburg? In good sooth you cannot entertain the idea.

"Should liberty fail, it will not be so much the fault of the delegates as of the sovereign power. People, do not forget that your destiny is in your own hands; it is your duty to save Paris and the human race; if you do not do this, you are highly to blame.

"The Mountain requires the aid of the people; the people rest their support upon the Mountain. Every method is taken to cause you alarm; they want to make you believe that the southern departments are opposed to the jacobins. I declared to you that Marseilles is the eternal friend of the Mountain; that at Lyons the patriots have gained a complete victory.

"I resume my proposition, and I demand, 1. That the sections raise an army sufficient to form the nucleus of a revolutionary army, which should include all the sans-culottes of the departments, in order to exterminate the rebels. 2. That an army of sans-culottes be raised at Paris for the purpose of repressing the aristocracy. 3. That dangerous intriguers and all aristocrats be placed under arrest; that the sans-culottes be paid out of the public funds which shall be supported by the wealthy, and that this measure be extended to the entire republic.

"I demand that forges be established in all places of public resort.

"I demand that the commune of Paris do, with all its might, administer to the revolutionary zeal of the people of Paris.

"I demand the revolutionary tribunal do its duty; and that it do punish those who, in these latter days, have blasphemed against the republic.

"I demand that this tribunal do, without delay, inflict exemplary punishment upon certain generals taken flagrante delicto, and who ought to be condemned.

"I demand that the sections of Paris unite themselves with the commune of Paris, and that they countervail by their influence the perfidious writings of newspaper editors, supported by foreign powers.

"By taking all these measures, without affording any pretence for saying that you have committed a breach of the laws, you will give an impulse to the departments, who will with you unite in endeavouring to save liberty."

(Sitting of Sunday, May 12th, 1793.)

"Robespierre. It has always appeared to me astonishing that, in critical moments, so many propositions are made tending to endanger the friends of liberty, whilst they themselves are left destitute of all support. Until it shall be proved to me that it is not necessary to arm the sans-culottes, nor to pay them for mounting guard, and preserving the tranquillity of Paris; until it shall be proved to me that we should not convert some of our public buildings into workshops for the manufacturing of arms, I shall think, and I shall say to those who reject these measures, that they know not the only way to save their country; for extreme measures should never be resorted to till all others have failed. It is not a single effort of enthusiasm that can save the republic; we have for our enemies men of the most subtle minds, who have all the resources of the state at their disposal.

"The measures that have been proposed cannot produce any decisive result; they have only served to propagate calumny; and have furnished the public journalists with a pretext for representing us in the most odious colours.

"When we neglect the most simple dictates of reason, which always offer themselves first to the mind, we may be sure that we are not on the right road. I shall say no more, but I protest against all those measures whose object may be to injure this society, without promoting, in any way, the public interests. Behold my profession of faith!

"When I perceive many anxious to make enemies for the society, and lending a willing ear to all calumnies against it, I cannot but conclude that these men are either blind, or harbour bad intentions.

"I move that the society passes the measures I have proposed, and I shall regard those men as very culpable who prevent their execution. How can a compliance with these measures be refused? How is it that their necessity is not felt? How can any one hesitate for a moment to support and adopt them? I propose that the society enters into a discussion of the principles of the constitution which has been prepared for France; for it is necessary to scrutinize all the projects of our enemies, and if the society should discover their perfidy and fraud, it will not have lost its time. I demand, therefore, permission to read my observations on the constitution."

(Sitting of Sunday, 26th May, 1793.)

"Robespierre. I have told you that the people ought to repose calmly in its strength; but when the people is oppressed, when nothing is left save itself, that man would be a coward who would not call upon it to rise. It is when all laws are violated, when despotism is at its height, it is when good faith and modesty are trampled under foot that the people ought to rise. This moment has now come: our enemies openly oppress the patriots; they want under colour of law to once more plunge the people into a state of misery and slavery. I shall never be the friend of those corrupt men whatever bribes they may offer me. I rather prefer dying with republicans than triumphing with those wretches. (Loud applause.)

"I know but of two ways in which a people can exist: either where it governs itself, or where it confides that trust to delegates. We, deputies of the republic, are desirous of establishing the government of the people by its delegates, with responsibility; it is to these principles that we refer our opinions, but the more we do so the less inclination is exhibited to hear us. A sudden signal given by the president, strips us of the right of voting. I consider that the sovereignty of the people is violated, since the delegates of the people give to their creatures the places that belong to the people. In accordance with these principles, I am grievously affected . . ."

The speaker was interrupted by a deputation being announced. (Disorder.) "I am going," shouted Robespierre, "to continue my address, not to those who interrupt me, but to the republicans."

"I exhort every citizen to preserve a respect for his rights; I invite him to rely upon his own strength, and upon that of the nation; I invite the people to put themselves in the national convention in insurrection against all corrupt deputies. (Applause.) I declare that having received from the people the right of defending its rights, I regard him who interrupts me, or refuses me any right of speech, as my oppressor; and I declare that I myself now place myself in insurrection against the president and against all those members who sit in the convention. (Applause.) When a culpable affectation of contempt is exhibited against the sans-culottes, I declare, that I place myself in insurrection against the corrupt deputies. I invite all the Mountain deputies to rally, and to engage hand to hand against aristocracy, and I say that there is but one alternative left for them: either to oppose with all their might and main the efforts of the intriguers, or else to give in their resignation.

"At the same time the French people must be made acquainted with its rights, for faithful deputies cannot act without instructions.

"Should treason call the foreign enemy into the bosom of France; if when our cannoneers hold in their hands the thunder that must exterminate tyrants and their satellites, we see the enemy approaching our walls, then I declare that I myself will punish the traitors, and I promise you that I will look upon every conspirator as my enemy, and treat him as such." (Applause.)

INDEX.

* * The figures denote the page ; if followed by ii the second column of the page is signified, and if an n be added, a note by the translator is indicated.

A.

- ABBAYE, prison of, broken open, and prisoners liberated, 19 ; murder of twenty-four priests in the court of, 144 ; suspected persons imprisoned at, 358
Abercromby, general, lands at the Helder, 841
Aboukir, battle of, 860, 851
 ———, naval battle of, 793, 794 ; disastrous consequences of, 795
Actors released from prison, after the reign of terror, 519
Adams, John, his influence with Washington in favour of the English, 698 Adélaïde, Mine., aunt of the king, 41, ii ; her address to Lafayette, id. ib.
Administrative committees appointed in the convention, 168, ii
Affiliated societies, 75, ii ; abolished, 499
Agra, pretended bishop of, his proceedings in La Vendée, 288, ii Agricultural committee, 244, n.
Agriculture, deranged state of, at the end of the reign of terror, and its causes, 491, ii ; 492
Airolo, defeat of Rosenberg at, 855
Ajax, the French, Beurnonville so called, 217
Alarm gun fired, 269, 274, ii
Albani, cardinal, ambassador from Rome to Vienna, 670, ii
Aldermen abolished, 30
Alexandre, his influence with the populace, 98, ii ; joins the insurrectional committee, 115, ii
Alexandria captured by Bonaparte, 764
Allard, proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
Allies, situation and strength of the armies of, in 1792, 189 ; against France ; retrospect of the military operations of, which were anticipated by Dampierre, who was killed in the attack, 284 ; their several motives in combining against France considered, 289, ii ; the state of confusion in which they were, Sept. 1794, 489 ; policy of, 1794, 515
Alps, occupation of, by the French, 434
Alquier endeavours to save the prisoners at Orleans, 158
Alsace, army of, see Military Affairs, passim
Altar of the country, oath of the federation taken on, 56
Alvinz, marshal, appointed to the command of the Austrian army in Italy, 669, ii ; his operations there, 672, ii ; his defeat at Rivoli and La Favorita, 684—687 ; his plan of attack of the plateau of Rivoli, 684, 685
Amar draws up the act of accusation against the Girondists, 362, ii ; joins the intrigue against Robespierre, 446 ; is denounced in the convention, arrested, and ordered to be sent to Ham, 534, ii ; is apprehended, 620
Ambassadors from foreign powers received in Paris, 547, ii ; ceremonial of their reception, 547, ii ; their firmness during the attack on the convention, 1st Prairial, year III., 554, ii
America, United States of, ambassador from, arrives in Paris, 547, ii ; policy regarding France in 1797, 698
Amnesty declared for all acts connected with the revolution, excepting the revolt of 13th Vendémiaire, 593
Amsterdam, entry of the French army under Pichegru into, 513, ii ; bank of, state of its affairs at the conquest of Holland, 514, ii
Anarchists Clootz, his preaching of universal republicanism, and the worship of reason, 372 ; his account of his travels and trials, id. ; attack upon him by Robespierre ; he is expelled the Jacobin club, 378, ii ; 379 ; arrested, 411 ; tried and executed, 412, 413
Ancar, trial and execution of, 412
Ancients, council of the, decreed, 582 ; see also Council of the Ancients
Anconian republic formed, 772, ii
Andonin sent before the military commission, 560
André Dumont appointed one of the committee of general safety, 474, ii ; proposes the transportation of Barrère and his colleagues, 534
Andréossy takes part in the fête given by the directory, 765 ; quits Egypt with Bonaparte, 651, ii
Anglo-Prussian league, 50, 51
Anjou, refusal of enlistment at, 253, ii
Anselme takes Nico, 171
Anthestheria, meaning of the term, 407, ii n.
Antihoul tried and condemned, 362—364 ; and executed, 365
Antonelle, foreman of the jury at the trial of the Girondists, 364, ii ; he is apprehended, 620
Antwerp entered by Labouderrière, 187, ii ; citadel of, taken by Miranda, 187, ii ; abandoned, 240
Appealers proposed, expulsion of, from the convention, 228 ; arrest of, proposed, 232
Arcole, battle of, 675, 676
Aréna joins the Jacobins at the Old Ride, 841, ii
Argonne, campaign of the, 149—152
Aristocrats supposed to be the secret promoters of the insurrection of 10th March, 1793, 234, ii
Arles, archbishop of, murdered, 144, ii
Army, insubordination of, 57, ii ; revolutionary, appointed, 339, ii ; of the Alps ; of Alsace ; of the centre ; of the north ; of the Sambre and the Meuse ; of the west ; of Rochelle, &c. see Military Affairs, passim
Arnheim, the court of the Count d'Artois at, 494, ii ; entered, 513, ii
Arras, sanguinary executions at, by Lebon, 454
Articles for abolition of feudal rights, tithes, &c. accepted by the king, 31
Artigoye, proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
Artois, see D'Artois
Assignats or paper money issued, 53 ; opposed by the clergy, id. ii ; 54 ; further issue of, 56, ii ; not current in Belgium, 184, ii ; Dumouriez refuses to compel their circulation, 188 ; eight hundred millions of, ordered to be issued, 223 ; forced currency of, its effect in creating public discredit and private distress, 310 ; depreciation of, and its cause, with reference to their being a government security, 312, 313 ; the various sorts of, and their relative value, 312, ii ;

stock-jobbing in, id. ib.; issue of, at various times; number destroyed, and number in circulation, in August, 1793, 321, ii; 322; modes adopted to keep up their value, 323; rise to a par with specie, 368; immense depression of, after the reign of terror, 481, ii; their issue proved by Cambon to have been the only resource of the revolution, 501, ii; extreme depression in their value in 1795, 520; various expedients proposed to the convention as to their being called in, and a disquisition upon the nature of this species of public security, 524; financial measures occasioned by their increased depression, 551; debates and plans for bringing them to a certain standard, in order to facilitate the sale of the national property, 552; further debates on the withdrawing or reducing their value, 562, 563; number of in circulation at the accession of the directory, and the extreme depression in their value, 600, ii; mandates issued as a substitution for, 617; amount of the assignats issued in two months of 1796, 617, ii; royal assignats bought up, 822

Association of the friends of the constitution, 28, n.

Ath, interviews at, between Dumouriez and the Jacobin envoys, 240, ii

Aubert Dubayet proceeds to La Vendée, 325; aids in the defence of Metz, 205, ii; commands the troops there, 306, ii; his successful operations in La Vendée, 333, ii; appointed minister at war, under the directory, 597, ii

Aubry, with two others, appointed to command the armed force after 1 Prairial, Year III., 559

Audouin, his influence in the war ministry of Pache, 190; proposes at the Jacobins a levy en masse, 318

Augereau, his victorious operations in Spain, 515; notice of him, 625; he enters Bologna, 641; advises against retreat from the Adige, 655; enters Brescia, 656; his defence of the heights of Castiglione, 656, ii; attacks and throws back Qunadanovich upon Bassano, 678; his services at the battle of Arcola, 675; his heroism on the bridge of Arcola, 677, ii; his services at Favisita, 687; he is a candidate for the directory, 723; carries the addresses of the army of Italy to the directory, 738, ii; he takes the command of the military in Paris, 789; his preparations for the events 17, 18 Fructidor, 749; again a candidate for the directory, 753; appointed to the command of the army of Germany, 765; deprived of the same, and sent on a mission to Perpignan, 770, ii; elected deputy, 822, ii

August, heads the section of Grenelle to assist the convention on 1 Prairial, Year III., 554, ii

August 4th, 1793, events of the night of, 29;—9th, 1792, night of, its preparations, 125, ii;—10th, 1792, insurrection of, 125—130; consequences and termination of the events of, 130, 131; tribunal formed for the trial of persons engaged in, 136;—10th, 1793, the third federation of, and particulars of the ceremony, 316, ii; reflections on the federation of 1793, 317

Aural, remainder of the emigrant army removed to, 578; the same overcome by Hoche, id.

Austria, Joseph II., emperor of, dies, 51; Leopold, emperor of, 51; its lukewarmness against France in 1794, 430, ii; refuses to acknowledge the regency of Monsieur, 494; state of, in 1795, 544, ii; 545; the daughter of Louis XVI. given up to, in exchange for the deputies betrayed by Dumouriez, 605; indirect overtures for peace; the answer of the republic, 611, ii; preparations of, about the end of 1796, 652, ii; preliminaries of peace with, signed, 709; treaty of peace with, signed at Campo-Formio, 762; war declared with, 813

Austrian committee, 91, 244, n.

—Netherlands, second campaign in, and scheme of same, 222, ii; 223; Dumouriez's campaign in, 228, 229

Austrians defeated at Jemmapes, 183; they bombard Lille, 169; gain the battle of Neerwinden, 235, ii;

236; attacked at Vicogne by Dampierre, who is repulsed, 204, ii; their retreat after the raising of the blockade of Landau, 384; retreat after the battle of Flonius, 460; defeat of at Savona, 492; defeated by Vandamme on the Wesel, 510, ii; number of their army under Beaulieu, in 1796, 625, ii; they are defeated at Montenotte, 626; the object of the campaign of Bonaparte is to drive them out of Italy, 631, ii; defeated at Lodi, retreat upon the Tyrol, 633, ii; defeat of, at Ronchen, 644, ii; they fall back to the Danube, 646; under Wurmser, they arrive on the Adige, 654, ii; repulse general Saurret, 655; force the position of La Corona, id.; defeated at Salo and Lonato, 655, ii; 656; under Wurmser, defeated at the battle of Castiglione, 657, 658; gain the battle of Neresheim; defeat Bernadotte, and beat Jourdan at Wartensleben, 659, ii; 660; under Alvinzy, defeated at the battle of Arcola, 675, 676; total defeat of, at the battles of Rivoli and Favisita, 684—687; defeated at Tarvis, 703, ii; 704; renewal of the campaign against, 702, ii; defeated at Tagliamento, 703, ii; 704

—and Prussians besiege and capture Mentz, 306, 307

—and Russians gain the battle of Novi, 339, 340

Autun, bishop of, opposes the second issue of assignats, 58, ii; is member of the directory of the department, 79

Anvergno, revolt against the convention extends to, 286

Avignon, massacres of the patriot prisoners at, 564

Aymé, Job, debates on his proposed exclusion from public offices, 613; he is expelled the council of five hundred, id. ii.

B.

Babouf, account of him and of his paper "Tribun du Peuple," 615, ii; several numbers of it seized by order of the directory, id. ib.; he is one of the secret directory of public welfare, 619; he is apprehended, 620; his letter to the directory, id.; tried, condemned, and executed, 696, ii

Bailliage, meaning of the term, 5, n.

Bailly nominated an elector and deputy, 9; senior, of the tiers état, his interview with the king, 12, ii; his advice in tiers état, 13, ii; he is met at the door of the assembly by the guard, 14, ii; presides over the national assembly in the Tennis Court, 14, ii; takes the oath before the assembly, 15; administers same to the members, id.; his reply to the marquis de Brézé, 16; his presidency of the national assembly disputed by the nobility, 17; appointed mayor of Paris, 24; his address to the king on visiting Paris, 24, ii; receives the king at the Hôtel de Ville, 42; proposes martial law, 44; with Lafayette, he forms the club of '89, or Feuillans, 50, ii; his proposition on the plan of selling the Church property, 53; proclaims martial law, 71; resigns the office of mayor of Paris, and is succeeded by Pétion, 76; he is confined in the Conciergerie, 359; appears compulsorily as a witness against the queen, 360, ii; his courage in giving evidence, 361; he is tried before the revolutionary tribunal, condemned, and executed, 365, ii; barbarous conduct towards him, id. ib. 365; his reply on being charged with fear, id.

Bakers' shops, regulations made for the sale of bread in, 311, ii; their frauds in consequence of the maximum, 366, ii

Bâle, the negotiations at, between Prussia and France, 515, ii; the same continued, 536

Ballard, General, cannonades the city of Verona, 713, id. ii.

Bancal sent to arrest Dumouriez, 241; is made prisoner, 242; on his return from captivity in Austria, takes his seat, 614, ii

Bank, national, established, 612, ii; of England suspends cash payments, 720

- Bankruptcy of the republic becomes inevitable; remarks on financial difficulties of states, 691
- Bantry Bay, expedition to, and its failure, 680
- Baptiste aids Dumouriez in his defence against volunteers, 241, ii
- Barboux, the Marsillais, his character, 99; confers with Roland as to a refuge if Paris were invaded, id. ii; in correspondence with the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; averse to the appointment of a dictator, 118; meets the Marsillais, 120; elected to the convention, 160, ii; his character, id. ib.; asks whether the convention is a judicial body, 169, ii; proposes an export duty on corn, 198; takes his place in the convention in spite of his friends' persuasions, 274, ii; refuses to resign his functions, 275, ii; gives Charlotte Corday a letter to Duperret, 295; is a fugitive in Normandy, 293
- Barbù, Marbois, banished, 751, ii
- Barbute, their destructive proceedings against the French, 640; many shot by order of Bonaparte, 641
- Barentin, keeper of the seals, 10, ii
- Barnave, his speech to the national assembly, 16; his speech on the right of the king to make peace and war, 52, ii; visits Mirabeau in his last moments, 64; deputed to bring the king back to Paris, 68; becomes attached to the family, id.; endeavours to serve the throne, 68, ii; his letter to the queen, 91, ii; is confided in by her, 97
- Barvas massacres federalists at Toulon by grape shot, 454; with other representatives appointed to command troops, 9 Thermidor, 470; his successful efforts in stopping insurrection in favour of Robespierre, id. ii; he is appointed general of the army of the interior to reduce the sections to obedience, 587, ii; his brilliant reception by the convention; refers to the services of Bonaparte in his operations against the sections, 590, ii; he is confirmed in his command of the army of the interior, id. ib.; elected one of the original five directors; discussion on his services and fitness for the office, 595, 596; his social life at the Luxembourg, 616, ii; his character, 689, ii; 690; his hatred of Carnot and Rewbell, 690; his profligate life and extravagance, 691; orders Hoche to bring the troops round Paris, 735—737; his speech at the fête, given in honour of Bonaparte, 765; further remarks on his character and habits, 821, ii; gains the confidence of Sieyès, 831; his proceedings in the events preceding the 18th Brumaire, 859—862; his entire corruption, 861; resigns his seat in the directory, 864, ii; 865; he quits Paris, id.
- Barrère, one of the committee to form a constitution, 169; his speech on Louvet's accusation against Robespierre, 179, ii; his conduct as president at the trial of the king, 201, ii; 202; proposes to call Pache and Santerre to the bar of the assembly, 226, ii; demands the institution of juries, 231, ii; member of the committee of public welfare, 245; proposes a commission of twelve, 260, ii; proposes its abolition, 271, ii; appointed one of the committee of public welfare, 298, ii; re-instated, 303; his speech in defence of that committee, 338, ii; advises the destruction of La Vendée, 341, ii; prepares the decree of extermination against Lyons, which is adopted, 348; his speech on the attempt of Admiral, 433; his hatred of Robespierre, 446; by his report exonerates Lebon from blame in his executions at Arras, 454, ii; 455; reports in favour of Robespierre, Couthon, and St. Just, against the attacks made on them by the committees, 457, ii; his desire to appease Robespierre, 461, ii; his report to the convention on the comparative state of France in 1793 and 1794, 462, ii; his hesitation and want of courage 9 Thermidor, 467, ii; proposes to replace the three executed members of the committee of public welfare, 474; his speech on the liberation of prisoners, 475, ii; decree of accusation against him, 508, ii; decreed to be transported, 534, ii; sent before the military commission, 560; id. ii; his sentence of transportation confirmed and carried into effect, 593 ii; he is elected deputy, 721; the election annulled, 722, ii
- Barthélemy, minister of France in Switzerland, 620, ii; elected a director in the room of Letourneur, 723; his character and abilities, id.; he is arrested and taken to the Temple, 750; banished, 751, ii
- Bassano, battle of, 663
- Bassières appointed to the corps of guides, 638
- Bastille, storming of, 22, ii
- Bataglia, his endeavours to save the old government of Venice, 717
- Battalion de Jemmapes, 183
- of Orleans, see Orleans
- Batz, baron de, his conspiracy with Julien and Delaunay to affect the value of the East-India Company's bonds, 313, ii; particulars of the same, 368, ii; 369
- Baudin (of Ardennes), one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii; one of the clerks of the council of the ancients, 595; dies for joy at the arrival of Bonaparte, 857
- Baudot, proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
- Bazire, denounced as a moderate, 375, ii, is arrested, 381, ii; tried and executed, 417—420
- Beauharnais, Mme., widow of general Alexander Beauharnais, some account of her, 497; her influence in society, 617
- Beaulieu, minister of finance, 95, ii; repulses Laharpe at Voltri, 626; surprises and takes Valenza, and recrosses the Po, and entrenches himself there, 632; repulsed there, 632, ii; seizes on Peschiera, 637, ii
- Beaupoil, his bravery and devotion at Verona, 718, ii
- Beaupuy, has two horses killed under him at the battle of Cholet, 354; defeated at Laval by the Vendéens, 387, ii; desperately wounded there, 388
- Belgian clergy, decree for the sale of their property, 603, ii
- Belgic campaign, 181—188
- Belgium, invasion of, 90; consequences of the revolution in regard to, 181; conquest of, up to the Meuse, 181—188; condition of parties in, at the time of the campaign, 1792, 184; state of, after the first successes of France, 221; overrun with Jacobin agents, 221; state of, in 1793, id. ii; evacuated, 238; occupation of, by the French, 460, 461; united to France, and divided into departments, 593
- Bellegarde captured by Dugommier, 492
- , general, sent from the emperor to treat with France, 709
- Belle-Isle summoned to surrender in the name of the king of France, 569, ii
- Belly party, 75
- Belmonte-Pignatelli, Prince, sent by the king of Naples to make submission to Bonaparte, 640, ii
- Bendor, general, orders given to, by the emperor Leopold, 82
- Benefices, equalization of, 54, ii; 55
- Benevolence opened; its nature and security, 822
- Benezec, minister of the interior under the directory, 597, ii; 598; advises the discontinuance of the system of rations to certain classes, 612, ii; 613; tenders his resignation, which is refused, 616; his character, ability, and unpopularity; he joins the counter-revolutionary party, 692, ii; he is dismissed, 734, ii
- Bentabolé reads the report to the Jacobins of the sitting of the convention, 231, ii; 232
- Bergamo taken possession of by the French, 683, ii; revolution in, 705
- Berlier, one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii
- Bornadotte defeated after the battle of Neresheim, 660; his services at Tagliamento, 703, ii; his indiscreet behaviour at Vienna, 781; he repairs to Rastadt, id. ii; refuses the command at Naples, 810; is appointed to the command of the army of the Rhine, 812, ii; appointed minister of war, 836; his vigorous efforts to organize the conscripts, 837, ii; he proposes

- a complicated scheme for the new campaign, id. ib.; intrigues of Barras to procure his resignation, 844, id. ib.; he is dismissed, id. ib.
- Bernard, of Saintes, one of the committee of general safety, 474, ii; is arrested, 560, ii
- Bernardus, murders at the prison of, 147
- Berne captured by the French, 776
- Bermeron carries the fort of Klundart, 223, ii
- Bernier, abbé, the adviser of the council in La Vendée, 492, ii; advises the formation of a regular army, 516; his further proceedings, 622, ii
- Berruyer, general, his command in La Vendée divided, 248
- Berthier defeated and wounded before Saumur, 289; summoned to Paris after the defeat at Vihiers, 305, ii; notice of him, 625; his services at Rivoli, 604—686; with Monge, carries the treaty of Campo-Formio to Paris, 792; his proceedings in the Italian republics, 771, ii; 772; appears before Rome; he proceeds to the capitol, 773, ii; joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii; quits Egypt with Bonaparte, 851, ii
- de Sauvigny, murder of, 26, ii
- Berthois murdered at Lille, 90, ii
- Bertholet sent to Rome to select the works of art intended for the museum, 641, ii; joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii; quits Egypt with Bonaparte, 851, ii
- Bertrand de Molleville opposes the constitution, 80; is dismissed, 84, ii; prosecutes Carra, 91, ii
- Besouval, baron de, commands the troops round Paris, 19, ii; his note to Delaunay, 23; having been imprisoned, is ordered to be liberated, but the order countermanded, 27, id. ii; discharged by the Châtelet, 46
- Beurnonville at Jemmapes, 183; the French Ajax; minister of war, 217; his character, id.; the Jacobins demand his impeachment, 224, ii; heads the battalion of Brest to suppress the insurrection of 10 March, 1793, 233; sent as emissary to arrest Dumouriez, 241; is made prisoner, 242; on his return from captivity in Austria takes his seat, 614, ii; commands the army in Holland, 621, ii; superseded by Hoche, 685
- Boysar, general, tried and executed, 421
- Biberach, battle of, 665
- Bicetre, murders at, 147
- Bigot, M., proposes a law against armed petitions, 104
- Bilboa taken by Moncey, 578, ii
- Billard-Varennes assists at the murder of twenty-four priests at the Abbaye, 144; his address to the murderers, 147; elected to the convention, 159, ii; proposes that the manner of dating shall be altered, 163; opposes the adjournment of the discussion on the king's trial, 192, ii; defends Dumouriez in the Jacobins'; declares Varlet, Pournier, and Desfieux suspicious characters, 233, ii; appointed one of the committee of public welfare, 341, ii; prepares the report of the committee on the decree for instituting a new revolutionary government, 380; his hatred of Robespierre, 466; repels his attack, 464, ii; his efforts against him and his confederates on 9 Thermidor, 466—468; his energy in the convention on that day, 469, ii; takes part in the debate on Lecointre's accusation, 486, ii; resigns his post in the committee, 485, ii; accused of being an accomplice of Robespierre, 485, ii; his speech at the Jacobins' in favour of Carrier and of the patriots, 505; decree of accusation against him, 508, ii; he is attacked by Tallien, 509, id. ii; decreed to be transported, 534, ii; sent before the military commission, 560, id. ii; his sentence of transportation confirmed, 593, ii
- Binasco burned by order of Bonaparte, 636
- Biron seizes Quivérain, 90; is deserted by his troops, id. ii
- , general, his command in La Vendée, and state of his army, 288; his plan of military operations, id. ii; his critical position in Lower Vendée, 289; de-
- nounced in the final letter of Marat, 296, ii; tenders his resignation, 293; injustice of the republic towards him, 306; ordered to be put on his trial, 326
- Biroseau taken and executed, 357, ii
- Blad sent extraordinary commissioner to Hoche in Britanny, 571
- Blois, (Gragoire, bishop of, refuses to join in the abdication of Gobel, 373
- Bloss killed before Laval, 388
- Blô, his arrest decreed, 581, ii
- Bocage, description of the, 252; the habits and manners of the people, and the causes of civil war in, against the revolution, 253
- Bodenthal, port of, operations at, 333
- Bohemia, war declared against, 89
- Boileau reads a paper of Marat to the convention, 166, ii; tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
- Bois-Hardi, negotiates for an accommodation in La Vendée, 518; is defeated and killed, 568
- le Duc surrendered, 491
- Boissy d'Anglas, proposes that the inhabitants of Paris be put on a daily allowance of bread, 526; his perilous situation on 1st Prairial, Year III., 555; is one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii; is banished, 751
- Bologna, entered by Augereau and by Bonaparte, 641; obtains its provisional independence from Bonaparte, 641; and its acknowledgment by the Pope, id. ii
- Bommel unsuccessfully attacked by the French, 511; taken by Pichegru, id. ii
- Bon, general, wounded at Arcola, 675
- Bonaparte, early history of; attracts notice at the siege of Toulon; directs the battery at Port Malbosquet; surprises the English, 385; a brigadier-general; his suggestion for forcing the camp of Fourches, 434; he drives the Austrians out of Oneglia, and enters Ormén, id. ii; defeats the English and Austrians at Savona, 492; accused of being an accomplice of Robespierre, id.; further account of him, 587, ii; appointed second in command by Barras against the sections, 588; repels the attacks of the sectionists, 13 Vendémiaire, 589, 590; his reception by the convention; credit given to him by Barras; he is confirmed in his command as second to Barras, id. ii; appointed to the command of the army of the interior; he organizes the "police legion," and the "constitutional guard of the directory, and of the councils," 604, ii; 605; marries; his influence in Parisian society, 617; recommends the military operations of the republic to be further directed towards Italy, 620; succeeds Schérer in the command of the army of Italy, 621, ii; sets out for Nice, id. ii; his personal appearance, 625, ii; his address to the army of Italy; removes his head-quarters to Albenga; his plan for the campaign in Italy, id. ib. 626; defeats the Austrians at Montenotte, and the Piedmontese at Millesimo and Dego, 626, 627; is master of the valley of Bormida, 627; makes Lannes colonel, id.; punishes the act of spoliation committed by his soldiers; from the heights of Monte-Zemote shows them "the land of promise," id. ii; defeats Colli at Mondovi; arrives at Cherasco, 628; agrees to an armistice with Colli on behalf of the king of Sardinia, and signs the same at Cherasco with Lacoste and comt Latour, id. ii; his proclamation to the soldiers, 629; advances immediately after the armistice of Cherasco, 631, ii; his plan of operations described, id. ib. 632; receives the envoys of the duke of Parma at the passage of Trebbia; grants an armistice; demands a tribute, and twenty pictures, and refuses a million as a ransom for that of "St. Jerome," 632; arrives at Placentia, and passes the Po; defeats Liptin's division at Fombio, id.; captures the town of Lodi, and passes the bridge; obtains the title of "the little corporal," 633, id. ii; enters Milan in triumph, and lodges in the Serbelloni palace, 634; commences the siege of the citadel; grants an armistice to the duke of Modena, obtains a tribute and pictures; sends a million of the tribute to Moreau for his army on the Rhine, id. ii.; tenders his resignation of the army of Italy; publishes a proclamation to the soldiers, 635; marches towards Lodi, but returns to Milan, and suppresses a revolt, id. ii.; represses a revolt at Pavia, and burns the village of Binasco, 633; enters the Venetian territory; publishes a proclamation at Brescia; arrives before the Mincio, 637; attacks and takes Borghetto, and passes the Mincio; forces his cavalry into action; his perilous position at Valeggio, id. ii., 638; he encourages his cavalry, and shows favour to Murat; forms a corps called Guides, and appoints Bassières to command it; his conduct to the Venetian envoys; he enters Verona, 638, id. ii.; opinion entertained of him by the Venetian envoys; he is master of the line of the Adige, 639; proceeds to Milan; causes the trenches to be opened round the citadel, 640; grants an armistice to Naples; the terms of the same, id. ii.; his conduct and policy in Italy, id. ib., 641; enters Modena; his enthusiastic reception; he summons Urbino, which surrenders; arrives at Bologna, and is warmly received; addresses a letter to the senate of Genoa, 641; enters Tuscany; receives the envoy of the grand duke; marches to Lohorn, and takes possession of the English factory; seizes the governor, and sends him with a letter of explanation to the grand duke; repairs to Florence; is received by the grand duke; recrosses the Po, and returns to Roverbella; terms of submission proposed to the Pope submitted to; he writes to Orsini, id. ii.; letter of Hoche concerning him; letter of the government to, on the rumoured intention to supersede him, 647, ii.; continuation of his campaign in Italy, 653—658; his first adverse position; calls a council of war, 658; enters Lonato; his manœuvres at that battle; obtains a victory over the Austrians; breaks general Vallette at the head of his army for his conduct at Castiglione, 656; his enormous exertions at Castiglione, id. ii., 657; goes to Lonato; his successful deception on the bearer of a flag of truce, 657; gains the battle of Castiglione, id., 658; enters Verona, id.; he is promoted "Sergeant," id.; he summons the Pope's legate before him, and detains him; remonstrates with d'Azara, and the duke of Tuscany, and with the king of Sardinia, id. ii.; marches to the Brenta, 660; defeats Wukassovich at San Marco; drives the Austrians out of Roveredo; takes the castle of La Pietra, and gains the battle of Roveredo, 661; enters Trent; proceeds through the passes of the Brenta, and defeats the Austrians under Wurmser at Bassano, id. ii., 662; the various opinions entertained by military men of his merit compared to that of Moreau, 666, ii.; urges a treaty with Naples, Rome, and Genoa, 669, ii.; 670; his policy in the treaty with Rome, 670; releases cardinal Mattei, and sends him to Rome, id. ii., 671; declares the duke of Modena deposed, and the provinces of Reggio and Modena free; he unites these states with Bologna and Ferrara into the Cispadane republic, id.; causes the emancipation of Corsica, id. ii.; writes to the directory that he is in danger of losing Italy, 672; repairs to Rivoli and La Corona, and declares that the 39th and 85th demi-brigades no longer form part of the army of Italy, 673; writes to the directory before the battle of Arcola, complaining of the want of reinforcements, 674; beats the Austrians at Arcola, 675, 676; enters Verona; his army occupies the Adige from Dolco to the sea, 677; he becomes an object of jealousy with the directory, who commission Clarke to watch his proceedings; the result of the same, 678, id. ii.; state of his health; his habits and discipline, 1797, 683, ii.; recrosses the Po; defeats the Austrians at the battles of Rivoli and Favaria; causes the surrender of Mantua by Wurmser, 684—688; completes the conquest of Italy, 688, ii.; 689; his noble conduct to Wurmser, 687, ii.; a plot to poison him disclosed by Wurmser, 688; arrives at Bologna, 699, ii.; he marches against the Papal states, 700; passes the Senio; discharges the prisoners taken in the passage of that river, id. ii.; reaches Forlì, Cesena, Rimini, Pesaro, and Sengaglia, id. ib.; his humane conduct to the exiled French priests, 700; he writes to the directory concerning them; returns to the Adige; marches to Loreto; arrives at Tolentino; sends offers of peace to Rome, id. ii.; signs the treaty of Tolentino, 701; executes a treaty offensive and defensive with the king of Sardinia, id. ii.; ineffectually treats with Venice, 702; rewards the bravery of a female sutler, 703; defeats the Austrians at Tagliamento, id. ii., 704; and at Tarvis; reaches the summit of the Alps, 704, ii.; receives the deputies of the Venetian government, his address to them, 706, ii.; 707; threatens the Venetian senate in a letter sent by the hands of Junot, 707, ii.; 708; proceeds in his march towards Vienna; writes a letter to the archduke Charles, 708, ii.; advances to Saint Veith and Freisach, and defeats the Austrians, id. ib., 709; drives the archduke beyond the passes of Niemark; marches to Unzmark, defeats the Austrians, and enters Léoben, where he signs preliminaries for a treaty with the emperor Francis II, 709, id. ii.; his capacity as a negotiator, 709, ii.; he refuses to allow the "acknowledgment" of Austria of the French republic, id. ib.; although not empowered, he signs the preliminaries of the treaty of Léoben, 711, ii.; his reception and treatment of the Venetian deputies after the massacre of Verona, and outrage at Lido, 714, ii.; 715; declares war against Venice; orders Lallemand, the French minister, to quit Venice; takes down the Lion of St. Mark in all the Venetian cities he enters, 715; signs the treaty at Milan with the new authorities at Venice, 717, ii.; orders the occupation of Corfu and other islands belonging to Venice, 718; reflections on his rapid career in Italy, id. ii., 719; his extreme authority and popularity at Milan; the surname of Italicus proposed to be conferred on him, 719, ii.; discovers the treason of Pichegru, 728, ii.; 729; his hatred of the royalist faction; he writes to the directory offering the services of his army to repress the counter-revolutionists, 731; gives a fête at Milan to the army of Italy; his speech, 737, ii.; 738; his letter to Lavalette concerning Carnot and Angereau, 738, ii.; complains of the ingratitude of the government, 757, ii.; he organizes the Cisalpine republic, id. ib., 758; the arbitration between the Valteline and the Grisons referred to him, 759; his schemes as to the formation of a navy, and a naval establishment in the Mediterranean, id. ii., 760; conducts the negotiations for, and signs the treaty of Campo-Formio, 761, 762; concludes his revolutionary arrangements in Italy; appointed plenipotentiary at Rastadt; his proclamation to the Italians; appointed commander-in-chief of the army of England, 763; exchanges the ratifications of the treaty of Campo-Formio at Rastadt; returns to Paris; is magnificently received, and appears at a triumphal fête given in his honour, 764; his speech, 765; his conduct at Paris, and his situation with the directory, who distrust his rising greatness, 766; consideration of his character and genius; his retired habits; his conversation with Madame de Staël; is elected a member of the Institute, id. ii.; his suspicion of one of the directors, 767; deference of Barras to him, id.; he projects the expedition to Egypt, 768, ii., 769; his motives for supporting the Egyptian expedition, 779; speaks of resignation, and is reproved by Laréveillière, id. ii.; his vigorous efforts in preparing the Egyptian expedition, 780, 781; his proclamation to the army at Toulon; departure for Egypt, 782; lands at Alexandria, and captures the city, 784; his policy in Egypt, 786; his oriental proclamations at Alexandria, and affectation of Mahometanism, id. ii., 787; defeats Murad Bey before Cairo, 790; enters Cairo, 791; his political bearing after the battle, and his relations with the countries around, id. ii.; his politic affectation of Mahometan worship, 792; founds at Cairo "The Institute of Egypt," 792; orders sent

- by the directory for his return, 845, ii; further account of his operations in Egypt, id. 851; he captures El-Arisch, Gaza, and Jaffa, 846, 847; lays siege to St. Jean d'Acre, 847, 848; raises it, 848, ii; his expression concerning Sidney Smith; burns the town of St. Jean d'Acre; blows up the fortifications of Jaffa, id. ib.; orders the sick and wounded to be poisoned; returns to Egypt, 849; starts from Cairo towards Alexandria; reaches Aboukir, defeats the Turks at that place under Mustapha Pacha, 850, 851; hastily leaves Egypt for France, 851; lands at Préjus, 850, 857; enthusiastic reception; he proceeds to Paris; repairs to the directory, 857; his apparently cordial reception, and his declaration to defend the republic; numbers of generals wait on him, and become his adherents; Bruix and Talleyrand join his assemblies, id. ii; Roderer and Regnaud de Saint Jean d'Angely also attach themselves; his personal appearance and habits after his return to Paris, 858; he is sent for to the directors; his interview; he declines for a time a military command, 860; interviews with Siyès and Roger-Ducos; his aversion to Barras; the same overcome; other proceedings towards a suppression of the directory, 860—862; banquet to, by members of the councils in the church of St. Sulpice, 861, ii; appears before the council of the ancients; his speech, 863, ii, 864; swears to the republic, 864; he is chosen one of the three consuls, 865
- Bonaparte, Madame, her brilliant society, 719, ii
- Joseph, strives to repress the disorders of the revolutionists at Rome; Dupleix is shot by his side; he demands his passports, and quits Rome, 773; returns to, and lives in Paris in much state, 777, ii
- Lucien, elected a member of the council of five hundred; his abilities, 777, ii; opposes the motion to declare the country in danger, 844; president of the council of five hundred, 861, ii; his efforts in favour of his brother 18th and 19th Brumaire, 866, 867
- Bonchamps chosen one of the Vendean leaders, 255; extent of his military command in La Vendée, 835, ii; mortally wounded at Cholot; obtains mercy for republican prisoners, 354, ii; he dies, 389
- Madame, decree of death against her reversed, 517, ii
- Bonds or assignats issued, 53, ii; see Assignats
- "Bonheur commun," the object of the Jacobins, 619
- Bonnaud enters Getruydenberg and Dordrecht, 513, ii
- Bonnier sent to confer at Lille, 757; he is assassinated, 819
- Bordeaux, archbishop of, joins the national assembly, 16, ii
- insurrectionary movements at, 257, ii; preparations at, against the convention, 280; popular commission of public welfare constituted at, id. ii; put in a state of defence against the convention, 283; proscription at, 257; the same removed, 503
- Borghetto attacked and taken by Bonaparte, 637, ii
- Borie arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559
- Botideux, the instrument for effecting an accommodation in La Vendée, 517, ii; 518
- Bouches-de-Rhône, commencement of the insurrection at, 167, ii
- Bouchotte, his popularity, 300; entrusted with the formation of the revolutionary army, 340; admitted one of the ultra-revolutionists, 404; his accusation referred to the committee of general safety, 520; his arrest decreed on the motion of Tallien, 557, ii; sent before the military commission, 560; he is liberated, 581; joins the Jacobins at the Old Ride, 841, ii
- Bouillé, character of, 47, ii; his jealousy of Lafayette, id. ib.; in vain tries to check the insurrection of the troops, 57, ii; represses the revolt of the troops at Nancy; receives the thanks of the king and of the assembly; his command extended, 58; and again abridged, 59; aids the king's flight, 65, ii; attempts to rescue him, 67, ii; his letter avowing the king's flight to be at his suggestion, 69
- Boulard commands at Sablos, 287, ii
- Boulon, victory over the Spaniards at, 433, ii
- Bourbons, the banishment of, proposed, 204, ii; the decree passed, 205; demand for the restoration of, in La Vendée, 238, ii; Robespierre's suspicions against them excited by the succession of Dumouriez, 239; the murder of the family proposed in the Cordeliers, 262; remaining in France, except those under the sword of the law, banished, 326
- Bourbotte arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559; condemned to death; stabs himself, and is afterwards executed, 561
- Boudon of the Oise, his speech for the change of the committee of public welfare, 303, ii; suspicions entertained of him, 446, ii; his remarkable speech to Robespierre at the fête of the Supreme Being, 447; opposes the law 22d Prairial, 448, ii; proposes the modification only of the government, 474, id. ii; opposes the recognition of the liberty of the press, 479, ii; his speech against the corresponding and affiliated societies, 500; his proposal for the sale of the national property, 552, ii; 553; he is banished, 751
- Leonard, his energy in the convention 9th Thermidor, 469, ii; opposes the commune on that day, 471; decree for his arrest; he is sent to Ilaux, 534, ii
- Bourguignon appointed minister of police, 836; id. ii; he is dismissed, 842, ii
- Bouvet, rear-admiral, second in command of the squadron to Bantry Bay, 680, ii
- Boyer, Fonfrède, one of the commission of twelve, 261; tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
- Bozé, painter to the king, his overtures to the Girondists, 119, ii
- Brasch, duke of, treats with the French at Tolentino, 701
- Bread, regulation of the sale of, 311; price of, 1795, 552, ii
- Bréard, one of the committee of public welfare, 246; 298, ii; 474, ii; one of the clerks of the council of the ancients, 595
- Breda entered by the French, 223, ii; lines of, carried, 511, ii
- Brescia entered by Augereau, 656; revolution in, 705
- Brest, squadron of, mutiny in, 433
- Bruteuil, M^c, 20, ii; advises the king's flight, 65, ii
- Breton club, 28, n.; 75, n.
- Brézé, marquis de, delivers the orders of the king to Bailly, 16
- Bridport, lord, commands off Ushant, and protects the convoy on the Quiberon expedition, 569, ii; captures three ships from admiral Villaret, 569, ii
- Brienne, M. de, archbishop of Toulouse, succeeds Calonne as minister; his ministry, 3; his financial difficulties, 4, ii; he retires, 5, ii; is made archbishop of Sens and a cardinal, 6; his enormous wealth, id.
- Briez, his complaints of the delays in the war, 338, ii
- Brigands, 20, ii; 29; they attack Versailles, 41; murder François, 44; are executed, id.; the Vendéans so called, 254, ii
- Brissac, duke de, commander of the guard, impeached, 92; he is murdered, 158
- Brissot, his speech against the emigrants, 77, ii; his talents and acquisitions, 159, ii; his character, 160, ii; appointed a secretary of the convention, 162; associated by Lebrun in his diplomatic labours, 190, ii; tried before the revolutionary tribunal and condemned, 362, ii; 364; and executed, 365
- Britany, troubles in; some of its nobility imprisoned, 8, ii; hostile to the convention, 252; meetings and insurrectionary armies in, 280, ii; central committee of resistance to oppression formed in, 232; returns to its allegiance to the convention, 294, ii; commencement of the war of the Chouans in, 438; further account of

- that war, 453; Hoche appointed to the command in, 503; state of, at the end of 1794, and beginning of 1795, 516; negotiations with, 539, 540; intrigues of the royalist agents in, 542, ii; simulated peace of the insurgent leaders, 543, ii; treaty finally signed, and its terms, 544; state of, and proceedings of the royalists in, after the pacification, 566, ii; 567; schemes of the English upon, in favour of the royalists, 568; measures taken by Hoche for the preservation of, against the Quiberon expedition, 571; defeats of the royalists in, 571—574; their entire destruction, 575, 576; expedition of the emigrants, aided by the English, defeated, 575, 576; resumption of hostilities in, 599; complete reduction of, by Hoche, 624
- Broghe, marshal de, appointed to the chief command of the military, 19, ii; 20, ii
- Brotier, his intrigues with the French princes, 494, ii; he is acquitted, 605; becomes the chief agent of the royalists, 619; his further intrigues as royalist agent, 693, ii; 696; he is arrested, 696; tried and condemned to death, but imprisoned, id.; and afterwards banished, 751, ii
- Bruix, with Talleyrand, procures the resignation of Barras, 864, ii
- Bumaire, meaning of the term, in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.
- 3rd, law of, re-enacted, 613, ii; again debated and maintained, 631
- 18th and 19th, the events that immediately preceded the revolution of, 382; the events of the 18th abolishing the directory, and the constitution of the year III., and forming the basis of a military dynasty, 383—389
- Burne appointed to the command of the army of Holland, 312, ii
- Brunel, forced at Toulon to sign an order for the release of the patriots, shoots himself, 560
- Brunet confined in the Conciergerie, 359; tried before the revolutionary tribunal, condemned and executed, 366
- Brunswick, duke of, his manifesto, 121, ii; 122, 123; defeats the republicans at Pirmasens, 333; resigns his command, 334
- Brussels entered by the French, 135; united to France, 221, ii; occupation of, by the French, 460, 461
- Bruys, admiral, defeated at Aboukir by Nelson, 793, 794; he is wounded and subsequently killed, 793, ii
- Bry, John de, proposes that the king and Marat be tried together, 180, ii
- Budovich, absurd movement of the allies at, 519
- Bureau de Puzy called to the bar of the assembly, 124
- Burial ceremonies regulated by the commune of Paris, 371, ii
- Burke, Mr., his speeches against the revolution, 218
- Busca dismissed by the pope, 700, ii
- Butchers, their frauds in consequence of the maximum, 366, ii
- Buzot in favour of a republic, 79; elected to the convention, 159; his speech in the convention on the murders in the provinces, 163, ii; his speech on the subject of provincial disturbances, 199; proposes the penalty of death on all who endeavour to restore monarchy in France, 200; proposes the banishment of the whole of the Bourbons, 204, ii; his speech against Marat for inciting the people to pillage, 227; his speech against the extraordinary criminal tribunal, 231
- C.
- Cabanis, Mirabeau's dying directions to, 64, ii
- Cadoudal, Georges, joins the Quiberon expedition; his services; account of him, 570, 572, ii; 573
- Cesar's camp threatened by the allies, 315, ii; army of the North, retreat from, 316
- Caffarelli, Dufalga, his witty remark on the capture of Malta, 783, ii
- Cahier de Gerville, minister of the interior, 80; resigns, 85
- Cairo, battle of, 789, 789
- Caldhero, Bonaparte attacks Alvinzy at, but is repulsed, 673, ii
- Calendar, new revolutionary, established, 370; particulars of, id., n.
- Calonne, ministry of; succeeds Necker; his character; is dismissed, 2, ii; 3; minister of the fugitive court, 43, ii; in negotiation with the emperor Leopold, 65; advises the king's stay, id.; impeached, 84; his remarks on national bankruptcy quoted, 601
- Calvert, his address to the assembly, 101, ii
- Camaldulenses, general of the, sent to Rome by Bonaparte, with offers of peace, 700, ii
- Cambacérés demands the formation of the extraordinary criminal tribunal, 231; one of the secretaries of the council of five hundred, 505; appointed minister of justice, 336
- Cambon states the condition of the finances, 163; his opposition to the commissaries, 186; his speech on the expenses of religion, 198, ii; one of the committee of public welfare, 245, 290, ii; proposes to consolidate the national debt, and to institute the "Great Book" of the public debt, 320, ii; 321, 322; his amendment on the East India Company's dissolution bill, 369; procures a decree for funding life annuities, 441, ii; defends his financial schemes against the attack of Robespierre, and attacks him in turn, 464, ii; proposes the entire re-organization of the government, 474; opposes the recognition of the liberty of the press, 479, ii; attacked for his financial measures by the Thermidorians, 501; his defence and attack on Tallien, id.; decreed to be arrested and sent prisoner to Ham, 536; proposed by the patriots to head the intended insurrection of 1 Floréal, Year III.; his transportation decreed by the convention, 549
- Cambray, sanguinary executions by Lebon at, 454, ii
- Camille, Jordan, elected deputy, 721; his report on religion; and in favour of the permission of religious ceremonies for the dead, 724, ii; 725
- Campaigns, see Military Affairs, passim
- Campo-Formio, treaty of, 761, 762
- Canus takes part in the schemes for equalizing benefices, 54, ii; 55; appointed a secretary to the convention, 162; a commissary to Belgium, 188, ii; sent to arrest Dumouriez, 241; he is made prisoner, 242; on his return from captivity in Austria takes his seat, 614, ii
- Canclaux commands at Nantes, 287, ii; his command in La Vendée, 288; his able assistance in defence of Nantes, 293, ii; his military operations in the war of La Vendée, 334, 335; retreats to Nantes, 337; his judicious plans in La Vendée in January, 1795, 516, ii; 517; superseded in the command of the army of the West, 599, ii
- Candeille, Mademoiselle, incident at her house between Dumouriez and Marat, 174, ii
- Canstadt, battle of, 646, ii
- Carlette, count, his affectation of republicanism; he is ordered by the directory to quit France, 605; id., ii
- Carmagnole, meaning of the term, 315, n.
- Carmelites, murder of priests in the church of the, 144, ii
- Carnot appointed a member of the committee of public welfare, 325; his plan of operations for the war in Flanders, 331; joins Jourdan in his operations against La Vendée, 342; his improvements in the administration of the war department; his influence with the convention, 349, ii; concert measures with Jourdan for the relief of Maubeuge, 350, 351; presides over military affairs, 435; his judicious arrangements of operation on the Sambre and Meuse, 436; his reputation increased, 461; the originator of the successes of the French in Holland, 514; his speech to the convention on the accusation against Barrère and others, 530; denounced; proceedings against him stayed, 560, ii; elected one of the original five directors; his services and illness discussed, 595, 596; advises the division of the army of Italy into two parts; Bonaparte tenders his resignation, 634, ii; 635; observations on his plan of the campaign of 1794, and on his plan for that of 1796, 642; his character; his dislike of Burras, 689; and of Rowbell, 690; his political intrigues, 731, ii; makes his escape from the Luxembourg, 750; is banished, 751, ii

Carousel, Place de, described, 102

Carra, the journalist, prosecuted, 91, ii; his influence with the populace, 98, ii; joins the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; tried and condemned, 362-364; and executed, 365

Carrier, his horrible massacres at Nantes, 453; his trial demanded, 503, ii; presents a pistol to the agent of the committee of general safety, 504; he is apprehended, decreed to be under accusation, and sent for trial before the revolutionary tribunal, id. ii; is tried and condemned, 508, ii; and executed, 509

Carteaux takes Marciellos, 328, ii; superseded by Doppet, 384

Carthusian Friars attacked for arms, 21

Cassano, battle of, 826

Cathelineau, his resistance of the enlistment at St. Florent; he takes Chemille and enters Chollet, 253, ii; 254; is mortally wounded at Nantes, 293, ii

Catherine, empress of Russia, dies, 698, ii

Catholic religion proposed to be that of the state, 49; abjured, 371

Catholics, collision of, with the Protestants, 50; the churches restored to them, 561, i

Cavvry, Bonaparte's endeavours to make it useful in war; it is commanded by Murat, 638

Cazales, 28; his proposal to examine the national debt, 43, ii; his speech against the ministry, 59

Cazotte saved from murder by his daughter, 146

Cenotories, all religious emblems in, removed, 371, ii

Central club of Lyons, 251, ii

— committee of resistance to oppression formed in Normandy and Brittany, 282

— revolutionary club, the insurrection of 31st May, 1793, organized at, 267, ii

— revolutionary committee, its meeting, 261

Centro, army of the, see Military Affairs, passim

Chabot, a Girondist, 75; his proposed suicide, 115, ii; proposes the trial of the Swiss guards, 133, ii; his speech at the Jacobins on Louvet's accusation against Robespierre, 177, ii; his speech for the renewal of the committee of public welfare, 302, ii; engages in stock-jobbing with the two Freys; enters into partnership as banker with them, 313, ii; his evidence against the Girondists, 363; his part in the conspiracy against the East India Company, 368, ii; bribes Fabre d'Eglantine to join it, 369; suspicions against him; he marries the sister of the Freys; he is denounced as a moderatist, 375, id. ii; betrays his accomplices in the conspiracy against the East India Company, 381, ii; is arrested, 381, ii; tried and executed, 417-420

Chabos appointed to the chief command against the Vendéans, 308, ii

Chalier of Lyons demands a revolutionary tribunal for that city, 251, ii; is put to death there, 309, ii; particulars of his execution, 396, n.

Challans, resistance to the recruiting at; the town taken by Gaston, 254

Chambon elected mayor of Paris; his character, 190; his reasoning on the resources of France, 220; his opinion of the duties of revolutionary France, 221; resigns his office of mayor of Paris, 224, ii

Chambonas appointed a minister, 96

Chambre Ardente at Nantes closed by Hoche, 622, ii

Champion de Cicé wounded, 121

Championnet gives refuge to Mack in the French camp, 307, ii; cashiered and ordered to be tried by a military commission, 810; set at liberty, and appointed to the command of an army to be formed in the Upper Alps, 836

Champ de Mars, conflict in, 71; martial law proclaimed id.; fête of the first federation in, 55, 56; this anniversary of the federation in, 111

Champs Elysées, dinner at, and sanguinary scene in, 120, 121

Chantonay, battle of, 335

Chapelier, his amendment on the act for making peace and war, 53; presents the emigration bill, 63

Chappuis defeated at Landrecies, 435, ii

Charbonnier arrested, 560

Charette chosen leader of the Vendean insurgents of the Marais, 254, ii; account of him, id. ib. 255; commands in Lower Vendée, 287, ii; seizes Machecome, 292, ii; besieges the camp of Naudières, but is repelled, 335; defeats the republicans at Chantonay, id.; extent of his military command in La Vendée, id. ii; his command in La Vendée, 492, ii; declares the articles between the Vendean leaders at Jalsis annulled, 516; solicits relief from England; consents to an interview with Canclaux, and enters into negotiation, 517, ii; his further proceedings towards the pacification of La Vendée, 539, ii; 540; submits on the part of the Vendéans to the republic on terms, 540; his reception at Nantes on his submission to the republic, and description of him, 541; his proceedings in La Vendée after the pacification, 567; he has the confidence of Louis XVIII., id.; appointed by the emigrant court at Verona, commander-in-chief of the catholic districts, 599, id. ii; is defeated at St. Cyr, 600; his expiring efforts in the royalist cause, 608; is reduced to extremities, 610; his desperate position, 622, ii; applies for leave to go to England, 623, ii; flies to the woods; is entrapped by Travot, and captured; he is conveyed to Nantes; examined; his noble bearing and death, id. ib. 624

Charlatoi, bombardment of; St. Just refuses to treat with the garrison, and the fortress is surrendered, 459

Charles, archduke of Austria, his successes beyond the Meuse, 228, ii; supersedes Clerfaut in the command of the army of the Lower Rhine, 621; has the supreme command of the Austrians on the Rhine; forces the left of Jourdan to retreat, 643; retires from the Rhine to the Danube, 646; defeats the French under Jourdan at Neresheim, 659, ii; attacks and defeats Bernadotte, id. ib.; and again defeats Jourdan at Wertensleben, 660; gains the battle of Wurzburg, and forces Jourdan to retreat to Armstein, 668, ii; 664; gains a high reputation in Europe by the campaign of 1796, 666; refuses an armistice proposed by general Clarke, 677, ii; reduces the fortress of Kohl, 682, ii; defeated at the battle of Tagliamento, 703, ii; 704; defeated at Tarvis, 703, ii; 704; his answer to the letter of Bonaparte, 708, ii; advises peace, 709, ii; the amount of his forces at the opening of the campaign of 1799, 812, ii; 813; defeats Jourdan at the battle of Pfullendorf, 814; and at the battle of Stockach, 815; attacks Masséna on the line of the Linth, but is repulsed, 827, ii; marches to the Rhine, 852

Charrier, head of the rebels in the department of Lozère, captured, 293, ii

Chartres, duke de, at Jemmappes, 183; his command and conduct at the battle of Neerwinden, 236, 237

Chase, exclusive rights of, suppressed, 80

Charles demands the declaration of rights shall be exposed to view, 528, ii; accusation against, in the convention, 534; he is placed under arrest, id. ii

Châtelet, the, passes a decree against the edicts, 5, ii; extraordinary jurisdiction of, 44; report of, ordered to be laid before the assembly, 57

— prison of, the massacres at, 147

Chatillon, defeat of the republicans under Westerman, at, 305

Chandon, Rousseau, his arrest decreed, 581, ii

Chaumette, his speeches on the misery of the people,

- 257; as procurator of the commune, declares it permanent till tidings should be received of Hébert, 263; his speech at the commune, 266, ii; frames the scheme of its municipal authority, 299; his notice to the various sections, defining who are to be considered suspected persons, 357, ii; 358; his evidence against the Girondists, 363; his speech against the traders, 367; his speeches at the commune against the Catholic religion, 371, ii; his speech at the festival of reason, 373, ii; 374; proposes that the Catholics may have their public worship, 379, ii; arrested, 411; tried and executed, 421, ii
- Chauvelin received in England only as envoy of a de-throned king, 219
- Chaveau-Lagarde defends the queen on her trial, 361
- Chemillé elected deputy, 721
- Chemillé taken by Cathelineau, 253, ii
- Chénier, his report on the state of France, 1795, 549, ii; one the secretaries of the council of five hundred, 595
- André, editor of the Paris Journal, 109, ii, n.; is executed, 465, ii, and n.
- Chevaliers du Poignard, conspiracy of the, 62, ii; 119
- Choiseul, M. de, his notion of the occupation of Egypt, 779
- Chollet taken by Cathelineau, 254; evacuated by the Vendéens, 353, ii; battle before, and defeat of the Vendéens, 354
- Chouans, commencement of the war of the, 439; what they were; their war in Brittany, 493; their secret leader M. de Puisaye, id.; submission of, 543, ii; 544; their proceedings after the pretended treaties in Brittany, 567; rising of, in favour of the Quiberon expedition, 570; their deplorable condition at Quiberon, 573; slaughter of, at Saint-Barbe, 574, ii; 575; brought to trial and acquitted, 605; their brave defence and ultimate destruction, 624; fresh outrages, of, 836, ii; 837
- Choudieu, accusation against, 534; he is placed under arrest, id. ii; again apprehended, 620
- Christianity abjured by the communes and sections of Paris, 878
- Church property, appropriation of, 48, ii; sale of, 53
- Churches restored to the Catholics, 561, ii
- Cisalpine republic founded, 757, ii; 758; anarchy and confusion in the, 800
- Cispadane republic created, 671; republic gains Bologna and Ferrara, 701; its proceedings in 1798, 771, 772
- Cities, privileges of, annulled, 30
- Citizen, the only term allowed in the old army of Italy, 731
- Citizens admitted to civil and military employments, 30; active and passive citizens, 45
- Citizenship, qualification for, 45
- Civic oath taken by the assembly, 47
- Civil constitution of the clergy referred to the pope, 60; employments, all citizens admitted to, 30; list, amount of, settled, 54, ii; was announced from the tribune by the Viscount de Mirabeau, 50; prospect of, 238, ii
- Civism, oath of, 31, ii; directed to be taken by the clergy, 60, ii; taken by the clergy, 61; ordered to be again taken by them, 78, ii
- Civita Castellana, Mack repulsed at, 806
- Clarke, general, his mission to Vienna, 672, ii; at the head quarters of the army of Italy in his way to Vienna, 677; confers at Vicenza with the baron de Vincent; he proceeds to watch Bonaparte by orders of the directory, 678; further proceeds with the negotiations for peace with the emperor, 739, 740; recalled from the conferences in Italy, 757
- Clavière, minister of finance, 86, ii; dismissed, 95, ii; restored as minister of finance, 132; his characteristics and opinions at the time of the king's trial, 190, ii; the Jacobins demand his impeachment, 224, ii; confined in the Conciergerie, 359
- Clemence sent before the military commission, 560
- Clerfuit defeated at Jemmapes, 183; and at Neerwinden, 235, ii; defeated by Moreau and Souham at Moncerçon, 435, ii; 436; defeat of, at Courtrai, 436, ii; defeats the republican armies on the Rhine, and gains the lines of Mentz, 598; id. ii; obtains some of the republican ports on the coast, 599, ii; attacks Pichegru, and drives him back to Landau, 603; his triumphal reception at Vienna, 611, ii; superseded by the archduke Charles, 621
- Clergy, conduct of, in the states-general, 11; several join the commons, 13; payment of, provided by the state, 31; possessions of, seized on by the assembly, 44, ii; they join the provincial parliaments against the assembly, 45, ii; oppose the appropriation of church property, 48, ii; their hatred of the revolution, 49; oppose the issue of assignats, 53, ii; civil constitution of, 54, ii; appeal to Rome against the same, 55; take the oath of civism, 61; ordered again to take the same, 78, ii
- Clermont, bishop of, threatens to leave the assembly, 49
- Clermont-Tonnerre, 15; his speech on joining the national assembly, 16, ii; meditates establishing the English constitution, 19, ii
- Clery, valet to the king, his faithful services in the temple, 191; his mode of obtaining news for the royal family there, 192, ii; his faithful attention to them, 201; attends the king up to the morning of his death, 215, ii
- Clichy club, 75, n.; account of, 693; discussions in, on the choice of a new director, 697; its increased numbers and influence, 721, ii; its proceedings in favouring the counter-revolution, 723; dissolves, with other societies, 737
- Clichyens, 75, ii, n.; their opposition to the directory, and assistance to the cause of the counter-revolution, 723, 724; their measures of opposition against the directory, 735, 736; their club is extinguished, 737; all the acts they had supported in the councils repealed, 751, ii; see also Clichy Club
- Clisson taken by Canclaux, 386; the mansion of Leacure burnt by Westermann, 305
- Clootz, see Anacharsis Clootz
- Club de la Propagande, 75, n.; of the '89 formed by Lafayette and Bailly, 50, ii
- Clubs, formation of, 8; notice of the several, 75, ii, n.; they increase in violence, 50, ii; they desire to abolish royalty, 134; their influence in the elections to the convention, 159; abolished, except the Jacobins, 424; re-established by the patriots and the sectionists, 605, ii; limited to sixty members, 615, ii; 616
- Cobentzel, monsieur de, his demands from the court of Vienna, 88; negotiates the treaty of Campo-Formio, 760—762; envoy from Austria at Seiz, 796, ii
- Coblentz, intrigues of the emigrants at, 61; warlike preparations of the emigrants at, 77
- Coburn, prince of, commands the Austrians and Hessians, 228, ii; defeats the French at Neerwinden, 235, ii; 236; receives Dumouriez, 243; his measures concerted with the other generals, 284; commander-in-chief of the allies, 1794, 436
- Cochon appointed minister of police, 616; his plan to suppress the conspiracy of 20th Floréal, 620; his hatred of the patriots, 650, ii; his unpopularity with the Jacobin party, 692, ii; takes steps to suppress the royalist plot, 695, ii; a candidate for the directory, 723; he is dismissed, 734, ii; and banished, 751, ii
- Cockade of the national guard, 21; 26; cockades of black worn, 38; of one colour forbidden, id. ib.; all but the tri-coloured declared emblems of sedition, 108, ii
- Coffinhal endeavours to release Robespierre, 469; throws Henriot out of window, 471; he is arrested, 471, ii
- Coin, scarcity of, occasioned by emigration, 53, ii
- Cologne, admiral de, allusion to his murder, and note thereon, 261, n.

Colli repulses Serrurier at the bridge of St. Michael, 627, ii; his retreat, 628; is surrounded at Ancona; he retires with his officers to Rome, 700, ii; wounded and captured by the Russians at Novi, 840

Colloredo, general, defeated at Savona, 492

Collet d'Herbois elected to the convention, 159, ii; harangues Dumouriez at the Jacobins, 172, ii; 173; president of the Jacobins; his speech against the moderate party, 292; supports the constitution of 1793, 291; appointed one of the committee of public welfare, 341, ii; one of the commissioners for the extermination of Lyons, 357; his efforts in favour of Ronsin, 395, 396; his violent speech at the Jacobins against the indulgents, 415; the organ of the new government at the Jacobins, 422; attempted assassination of, 442, ii; 443; the same attributed to the English ministry, 443; his hatred of Robespierre, 446; his energy in the convention of 9 Thermidor, 469, ii; accused of being an accomplice of Robespierre, 468, ii; resigns his post as one of the committee of public welfare, 485, ii; decree of accusation against him, 508, ii; decreed to be transported, 534, ii; he is sent before the military commission, 560; id. ii; his sentence of transportation confirmed, 593, ii

Cologne taken by Jourdan, 491

Colonies, debates on, after the election of the year V., 724

Commanderies abolished, 80, ii

Commerce, effect of terror upon the operations of, 368; derangements in, consequent on the forced value of assignats, the maximum, and the requisitions of purveyance, 481, ii

Commissariat of the army in Belgium, mis-management of, 166; 188

Commissaries appointed by the convention to go to Belgium and examine the state of supplies to the army, 188; to the army in La Vendée; their obstruction to the generals, 288, ii; form the primary assemblies; arrival of, in Paris, to accept the constitution of 1793, 314; fraternal meeting of, by the convention, 315; of primary departments present a petition demanding the levy en-masse, 316

Commission of twelve appointed, 260, ii; 261; present a decree of general safety, 262, ii; 263; arrest Marino, Michel, and Hébert, 263; send the latter to the Abbaye, id. ii; arrest Varlet, 263, ii; their powers annulled, and their prisoners set at large, 265, ii; they are restored, 266; again suppressed, 275, 276; and its chief members ordered to be arrested, 276

— of six, appointed by the Jacobins, 286, ii; they organize the insurrection of 31 May, 1793, 266, 267

— for arming the coasts of the Mediterranean, 780

— for the promulgation of laws decreed by the committee of public welfare, 380

— of representatives, its injurious meddling with the army, 293

Commissions appointed with respect to emigrants, religion, colonies, education, and other matters, 724

Committee, agricultural, 244, n.

— Austrian, 244, n.

— central, of public safety established, 245

— revolutionary; its meeting, 261 — educational, 244, n.

— of electors, 244, n.

— finance, 244, n.

— of general defence established by the assembly, 142; again appointed; its object, 222

— of general safety, 244, n.; its functions and duties, 298, ii; its jealousy of the powers of the committee of public welfare, 446; inquires into the proceedings at the house of Catherine Théot; and arrests nearly the whole of the sect of Mère de Dieu, 450; some members of, removed and replaced by others, 474, ii; its number, functions, and authorities, 478, ii — insurrectional, 244, n.

— of public safety; the causes of alarm referred to, 108, ii

Committee of public welfare established; its number, powers, duties, and authorities, 244, 245; 298, ii; its proceedings unpopular, 299, ii; new members added to it, 300; often prorogued; debates on its renewal; it is re-instated, 302, ii; 303; the proposal of a levy en masse referred to, 318; called to account for the reverses of the army, and remodelled, 338; its policy, 376; prepares the commission for the promulgation of laws, 380; commissions Robespierre to report on a new revolutionary government, and to prepare measures of severity against certain prisoners, 399; orders the arrest of Fabre d'Églantine, Chabot, Baziré, Delamain, and Julien of Toulouse, 403; though inclined to the moderatists, adopts measures for destroying the dominant parties, 406; invested with the sole power over the prisoners, 408, ii; calls to its assistance the committee of general safety and the committee of legislation, and orders the arrest of Danton and the Dantonists, 415; endeavours to enforce universal submission, 422, 423; it distributes the practical part of government among twelve commissions, 423; all power and administration divided among the members of, 423; triumphs over all parties, and invested with all authorities, 428, ii; encourages the manufacture of saltpetre, 432; administrative labours of, 439—441; public sympathy excited for, in consequence of the attempts at assassination by Ladmiral and Renaud, and the threats of Saintanax, 443, ii; 444; proposal that there should be a guard for its protection at the convention and Jacobins; but declined by the members of the committee, 448, ii; 444; discussions in, and intrigues with some of its members and those of the committee of general safety against Robespierre, St. Just, and Couthon, 446; Robespierre quarrels with, and secedes from it, 450; its letter of approbation to Lebon on his executions at Arras and Cambrai, 454, ii; six members chosen to replace the dead or absent ones, 474, ii; its number, functions, and authority, 478, ii; enumeration of the results of its efforts for the republic, 494, ii; 495; refuses to treat with the stadtholder, 512, ii; appearance of four of its members before the convention, 530; additional powers conferred upon, 537 — revolutionary, 244, n.

— royal, its members and their operations, 619

— of the section of the four nations, 144, ii, and n. 145

— of subsistence, 25

— of supply, suggested, 186

— of surveillance, 135; justifies the September murders, 149; takes charge of the property of the victims of September, 158, ii; its powers abridged by the convention, 168; re-established, 224

— of sustenance appointed by the national assembly, 18, ii

— to form a constitution, formed, 168, ii

— for carrying on the executive government, 289, ii

Committees, names and objects of the several, in Franco, 244, n.; renewal of, after the insurrection of 31st May, 1793, 279; re-organization of, 474, ii; of government re-organized, 478; their several functions stated, id. ii; further alterations in the jurisdictions exercised by, 550, ii

Commons, the name assumed by the tiers état, 12, ii

Commune of Paris presided over by Robespierre, 134, ii; its powers, encroachments, and schemes, 134, ii; arrests by, 135; intimidates the assembly, 136; adopts revolutionary measures, 141, ii; arms the citizens before the September murders, 143, ii; excesses of, and their self-appropriation of plunder, 158; sells all the furniture taken in the insurrection, 158, ii; its power abridged by the convention, 168; its harsh treatment of the royal family in the Temple, 192 orders the suspension of all plays, 211, ii; its contests with the assembly, 249; its increase of its power id.; passes a resolution for a conspiracy and a forced

- loan, 256; orders the levy of an army of sans culottes; and determines on a general imprisonment of suspected persons, 258; Hébert, procurator-substitute of, arrested, 253; and sent to the Abbaye, id. ii; several members of, arrested by the commission of twelve, 263; sends impetuous petitions to the convention, requiring his deliverance, 263, ii; its report on the funeral of Marat, 297, ii; construction, duties, and authorities of, since the establishment of the constitution of 1793, 299; makes police regulations as to the sale of bread, and the modes of its being dealt out, 311, ii; its regulations to defeat the frauds of the traders, and to enforce the maximum, 367; speeches at, against the publicity of the Catholic religion, 371, ii; regulates ceremonies at funerals, 371, ii; abjures Christianity, and worships reason, 373; its equivocal behaviour 9 Thermidor, 468, ii; its endeavours to procure an insurrection in favour of Robespierre and his confederates, 469; the officers of, seized by Dulong and others, 471, ii
- Commune-Affranchie, the new name given to the city of Lyons, 340, ii
- Communes, France divided into, 45; authority of, untouched by the constitution of Herault Séchelles, 290, ii
- Complementary days, meaning of the term, 579, ii, n.
- Conciergerie, murders at, 147; suspected persons imprisoned in, 358; state of; Mme. Roland and others confined there; the queen transferred to, 359
- Concorde, Place de la, its name changed for Place de la Révolution, 598
- Condé blockaded by the allies, 284, ii; reduced, 285; recaptured, 460, ii; surrender of, 468, ii
- Prince de, separates from the emigrants, 62; his counter-revolutionary movements, 80; impeached, 84; collects adherents on the Upper Rhine, 494; his intrigues for seducing Pichegru at the instigation of the English, 565, ii; 566; his royalist plans, 693, ii; corresponds with Pichegru in favour of the royalists, 694; their correspondence given up by Moreau, 734
- Condorcet, writer for the Girondists, 75; his statement of the motives of war with Hungary, 89, ii; reconciled to Pastoret, 112; his character, 160, ii; appointed a secretary of the convention, 162; one of the committee to form a constitution, 168, ii
- Congress at Rastadt, 769, 770
- Conscription, levy of a Parisian army by, 256; of 1793, parties subject to, id.; introduced on a methodized plan, 803, ii; the same put in force, 804; further levy of soldiers by, 810; levy of all classes of conscripts ordered, 836, ii
- Conspiracy of 10 March, 1793, to assassinate the moderate members of the convention, 232—234; of De Batz and others to depreciate the bonds of the East India Company, 313, ii; particulars of, 368, ii; 369; of the Jacobins or patriots against the directory; the same discovered, and the promoters apprehended, 619
- Constant, Benjamin, his pamphlet, "De la Force du Gouvernement," 617; a member of the constitutional circle, 730, ii
- Constituent assembly, 13—71; composition of, 27, n.; reflections on, 73; see further National Assembly
- Constitution, national assembly swear they will not separate without settling, 15; reformation of, 16; review of the difficulties in this matter, id. ii; English, meditated establishment of, 19, ii; committee appointed by the convention to form a, 168, ii; 169; draft of, ordered to be prepared by the committee of public welfare, 279; plan of one, proposed by Herault de Séchelles, 290, ii; of 1791, proposed restoration of, by Dumouriez, 237, ii; heads and particulars of one, 290, ii; 291; of 1793; observations on, and on the absolute authority of the convention, 298, 299; the same very generally accepted, 304; fête ordered in its celebration, id.; arrival in Paris of commissaries of the primary assemblies to accept the same, 314; demand of the sections for its re-establishment, 528; conspiracy of the patriots to proclaim it, 549; insurrection of 1st Prairial, Year III., in favour of, 553, ii; 558; directorial, of the Year III., discussed and agreed to, 581, ii; 582; its provisions, id.; the same accepted by the primary assemblies of France, 583; the same abolished, 862—868
- Constitutional circle, 75, ii, n.; formed, 730
- guards of the directory, and of the two councils, organized by Bonaparte, 604, ii; 605
- Constitutional priests, meaning of the term, 371
- Consulate, plans and proceedings towards the formation of, 859—862; the same formed, 868
- Conventionalist deputies omission recalled, 616
- Conventionalists, their mode of securing the choice of directors of their own party, 595, 596; propose a fête to celebrate the death of Louis XVI.; and an oath of hatred to royalty, 614; become discontented, 650, ii
- Corday d'Armanns, Charlotte, account of her, 294, ii; 295; determines on the assassination of Marat, 295; executes her design, 296; is tried and executed, 297
- Cordeliers, their club, 75, n.; petition presented to, demanding a constitutional ministry, 338; nominated to the principal appointments of the staff of the revolutionary army, 340; present a petition against the constitution of 1793, 291; but at the instigation of the Jacobins, withdraw it, id.; their regret at the death of Marat, 296; he is buried in their garden; his heart deposited with them, 297, ii; violent proceedings at, in consequence of the distress, 225; declare that the moderate party in the convention should be destroyed, 232; carry daggers, 258, ii; violent meeting at, to cause insurrection and the arrest of suspected persons, 262; obtain a decree for bringing the queen, duke of Orleans, and the Girondists to trial, 359, ii; petition in favour of Ronsin and Vincent, 395; severe proceedings of the convention, id.; their club expires, 424, ii; they continue to meet at the Evêché, 480
- Cormatin, baron de, the successor of Painsaye in Brittany; some account of him, 516, ii; his duplicity with the republican generals, 618, id. ii; his further proceedings in the negotiation, 539, ii; signs his submission to the republic, 540, ii; his entry into Rennes, 544; his intrigues with the Breton chiefs, and Chouan leaders; the same detected by Hoche, 567, ii; he is apprehended, and sent to Cherbourg, 568; brought to trial, and transported, 605
- Corn, scarcity of, 197, ii; debates on the same, id. ib.; export duty on, proposed, 198; scarcity of, 310; free importation of, considered, 522, ii
- market, entertainments to the recruits in, 230, ii
- Cornaro, J. B., sent deputy to Bonaparte, from the Venetian government, 706, ii
- Coron, defeat of the republicans at, 336, ii
- Corraza coffee-house, meetings of the Cordeliers at, 234, ii
- Corresponding societies, 75, ii, n.; abolished, 499; prohibited, 582, ii; in England suppressed by Pitt, 429; members of, brought to trial and acquitted, id. ii
- society, the, established in London, 610, ii
- Corsica, trees in, ordered to be felled for ships of war, 223; declares against France, 286; emancipated through the exertions of Bonaparte, 671, ii
- Corvées, suppression of, consented to, 3; meaning of the term, id. ii, n.; again resorted to, 356
- Cossaun, a commissary to Belgium, 188, ii
- Costume of the women adopted from David, (1794,) 496, ii
- Côté Droit and Côté Gauche, relative strength of, in the assembly, 27, ii, n.
- Coubé, his speech on Lafayette's letter, 98
- Council of the ancients decreed, 583; appoints Larévillière president, and Baudin, Lanjuinais, Breard, and Charles Lacroix, secretaries, 595; their

- dissatisfaction at the list sent for selection of five directors, 596; speech of Dupont (of Nemours) against it, id.; the list agreed to, id.; the vote put on the resolution of the council of five hundred adopting the financial scheme of the directory, 602, ii; the proposal of a forced loan from the wealthier classes agreed to, 603; the laws against nonjuring priests confirmed, 614; oath of hatred to royalty taken, 614; decrees that the flags borne by Bonaparte and Augereau on the bridge of Arcola be presented to them, 677; opposes the establishment of an official journal of the government, 681, ii; examine the message of the directors, but censure its publication, 682; elect Barthélemy a director, 723; its alarm at the concentration of the military round Paris, 735; remonstrates with the directors on the military movements taking place by their orders, 743; Lafond-Ladebat driven from the chamber; presides at a meeting of members at his house; the same dispersed, and he and several others arrested, 750, id. ii; and sent to the temple; he is banished, 751, ii; new meeting of, at the school of medicine, 750, ii; Bonaparte appears before; his address, 863, ii; 864; he appears again on the following day, 19th Brumaire; his address, 866, 867; meets and passes the decree for the appointment of three consuls, and commissions for drawing up a constitution, 868.
- Council of five hundred decreed, 582; elect Daunou president, and appoint Rowbell, Chénier, Cambacérès and Thibaudeau, secretaries, 593; adopt the scheme of finance proposed by the directory, but the same is rejected by the council of the ancients, 602, ii; agree to the forced loan from the wealthier classes, 603; Job Aymé expelled; the law 8rd Brumaire again sanctioned; debate on the seizure of the property of the emigrants, 613, ii; oath of hatred to royalty taken, 614; resolution called for and adopted, that popular societies shall not be composed of more than sixty members, 615, ii; 616; decrees that the flags borne by the generals Bonaparte and Augereau on the bridge of Arcola be presented to them, 677, ii; assent to the proposal of establishing an official journal of the government, 681, ii; examine the message of the directory, but censure its publication, 682; candidates returned by, to the ancients for their choice of director, 723; its alarm at the concentration of the military round Paris, 735; violent debates in, on the movement of the troops, 736, id. ii; proposal for re-organizing the national guard, id. ib.; remonstrates with the directory against the military movements taking place by their orders, 743; Siméon, president, refused admittance; he presides over a number of deputies elsewhere; they are dispersed, and he and several arrested, 750, id. ii; he is banished, 751, ii; new meeting of, at the Odéon, 750, ii; Bonaparte appears before; his address; is attacked; he is driven out; sends his grenadiers to clear the hall, 857; driven out of their hall by the soldiers of Bonaparte, 867, ii; 868; meet, and pass the decree for appointing three consuls, and commissions for drawing up a constitution, 868.
- Counter-revolution apprehended by the Jacobins, and by the Girondists, 232, 233; plot for creating, 694; the same discovered, 695.
- Counter-revolutionists, in favour of royalty, Puisayo and Wimpfen, 282, ii.
- "Country in danger," declaration of, 108, ii; decree of, 111, ii; declaration of, 113.
- Courtois denounces the new Jacobins, 842, ii.
- Courtray, battle of, 333; captured, 435, ii.
- Constard, his attack on Saumur and retreat to Angers, 289; executed with the duke of Orleans, 365.
- Couthon appointed a member of the committee of public welfare, 300; and re-instated, 303; causes the recall of Dubois-Crancé, takes the command at, and completes the siege and reduction of the city of Lyons, 347, ii; 348; his speech against the Atheists, 428, ii; forms with Robespierre and St.-Just a party separate from their colleagues of the committee, 447; his speech at the Jacobins against the opponents of Robespierre, 450, ii; 451; denounces Dubois-Crancé at the Jacobins, 456, ii; moves a petition at the Jacobins to the convention, 462; decree of accusation passed against him by the convention, 468; sent prisoner to Port-Libre, refused admittance; and carried to the Mairie, 469, ii; executed, 472.
- Cozère, revolt against the convention extends to, 286.
- Crancé, Dubois de, opposes the maximum, 225, id. ii, see also Dubois-Crancé.
- Crassous decreed to be arrested and sent prisoner to Ham, 536.
- Crema, revolution at, 707, ii.
- Crespo, surrender of Ville-Francho to, 333, ii; 334.
- Crelin, colonel, his works at the fortifications of Alexandria, 850.
- Creuzé-Latouche, one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii.
- Crillon, count de, proposal of, 20.
- Cromwell Grandison, a nickname given to Lafayette by Mirabeau, 42, ii.
- "Cronicle," the presses, &c. of, destroyed, 230, ii.
- Crown, hereditary descent of, declared, 35, ii.
- Cuesmes taken by the French, 183.
- Currency affected by the emigration, 53, ii; fluctuations in, by the forced circulation of assignats, 310, ii; modes adopted to keep the assignats of an equal value with money as a means of, 323.
- Custine takes Worms and Mayence, 169, ii; 170; his oversights and injudicious operations, 170; takes Frankfort on the Main, 170, ii; his military proceedings near Frankfort and the Main, 188, ii; his discontent, id. ib.; appointed general of the army of the North, 238; his gross oversights, 245; the army of Moselle and Rhine placed under his command, id. ii; denounced in the final letter of Marat, 295, ii; proceedings against, ordered to be concluded, 320; his trial, 342, ii; 343, 344; and execution, 344, ii; review of his campaign on the Rhine, 312, 343.
- D.
- D'Abancour murdered, 158.
- Daendels, his proceedings in Holland against the democrats, 793, ii.
- Dagobert, general, commands before Perpignan, 287; his exertions in the victory in the Roussillon, 294; proceeds to command the army in Upper Pyrenees; attacks the Spaniards at Mas-d'Eu, but is repulsed, 334; fires cannon on his revolting battalion; returns to his former command at Cerdagne, id. ii; dies, 438, ii; 434.
- D'Agout-Vincent arrested in parliament, 5, ii.
- D'Aiguillon, duke, proposes the abolition of feudal rights, 29, ii; president of the committee of finance, 36, ii; opposed to the court, 58, ii.
- D'Albarode, minister of marine, becomes unpopular, 300; further accusations against, 303, ii.
- Damécourt, M., 20, ii.
- Damian, general, associated with the tribunal appointed by the sections, 538, ii.
- Dampierre at Jemmapes, 183; honoured at Mons with a crown of victory, 184, ii; attacks the Austrians at Vicogne and St. Amans, and is repulsed and mortally wounded, 284, ii; killed, 257.
- D'André ordered to receive the declarations of the king, 68, ii.
- D'Angers, M. proposes to vest the sovereignty in the chambers, 109.
- D'Anglais, see Boissay.
- Dangromont executed, 140, ii.
- Danton, orator of the mob, 71, ii; one of the founders of the Cordeliers' club, 75 ii; its leader, id. ii; influence in, 98, ii; joins the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; his character and appearance, 118; id. ii;

paid by the court, id. ib.; his speech on 9th August, 125, ii; takes part in the insurrection of 10th August, 125—131; appointed minister of justice, 132; proposes extreme measures in the commune, 141, ii; suggests the September murders, 142, ii; his speech in the assembly before the murders, 144; his reply to the president Alquier, 158; one of the first elected from the Jacobins to the convention, 159; he proposes death to any one who suggests a dictatorship, 164, ii; resigns his place as minister of justice, 168, ii; member of the committee to form a constitution, 169; his speech to Dumouriez at the Jacobins, 173; moves the consideration of Roland's report on the state of France, 175, ii; is involved in Louvet's accusation against Robespierre, 175, ii; 176; moves a declaration, that the convention does not intend to abolish religion, 198, ii; 199; proposes an immediate declaration of war against Spain, 218, ii; evidence against him relating to the September murders discovered, 224; his speech in favour of the extraordinary criminal tribunal, 231, ii; he is suspected of exciting the riots of 10th of March, 1793, 234; his leading influence with the Cordeliers, id.; endeavours to persuade Dumouriez to withdraw his letter to the convention, 237, ii; 238; his proposition to unite the two great parties, 238, ii; proposes and procures a decree for disarming suspected citizens, 239, ii; is accused by, and declares his implacable hatred to the Girondists, 242, ii; committee appointed to examine his conduct in Belgium, id. ib.; appointed one of the committee of public welfare, 245; is silent on the association of L'Évêché, id. ib.; opposes the impeachment and arrest of Marat, 248; his suggestion which led to the employment of the sans-culottes, 257; suspected to be the author of the insurrection of 31st May, 1793, 267, ii; his conversation with Meilhan, id. ib.; his speech in the convention on the proposal to call Henriot before it, 269, ii; 270; agrees to self-banishment as proposed by Marat, 273, ii; he is suspected of being in the pay of England, or of the Duke of Orleans, 284; account of his influence after the death of Marat, 288; one of the committee of public welfare after the constitution of 1793, id. ib.; becomes an object of distrust and suspicion at the Cordeliers, 300, ii; examination into his motives of action, id. ib.; his frequent absence from the Jacobins' club, 302; his speech in favour of a levy en masse, 318; obtains leave of absence, and goes to Arcis-sur-Aube, 341; he declines to become a member of the committee of public welfare, id. ib.; returns; suspicious excited against him, 375; he becomes the head of a portion of the Mountain party, thenceforth called Dantonists, id. ib.; attacked by Hébert at the Jacobins, 377, ii; he replies, id. ib. 378; is vindicated by Robespierre, 378; admitted to the Jacobins at the purification, 279; his indolence and over-confidence, 414, ii; arrested at the suggestion of St. Just, 415; arrested and sent to the Luxembourg, id. ib.; he is refused a hearing before the convention, and disclaimed by Robespierre, 415, ii; 416; removed to the Conciergerie; his conduct at that time, 416, ii; 417; his trial before the revolutionary tribunal, and etergetic defence, 417, ii; 418; the means taken by the committee of public welfare to ensure his condemnation, 419; his firmness on the way to and at his execution, 420; reflections on his character and career, 421; the deep interest entertained by the people at his trial, 419.

Dantonists arrested, tried, and executed, 415—420

D'Aranda, count, minister of Spain, dismissed, 218, ii

D'Arcon takes Breda and Gertruydenberg, 223, ii

D'Armanns, see Corday

Darhé tried, condemned, and executed, 696, ii

D'Artois, count, unpopularity of, 4; quits France, 24, ii; his projects contrary to those of Calonne, 65, id. ib.; impeached, 84; visits St. Petersburg; is received by the empress Catherine; returns to the head quarters of the duke of York in Holland, 494; assumes the title of Monsieur, 566, ii; joins the expedition to Isle Dieu, 599, 600. 607, 608; retires to Scotland, 693

Dating, mode of, altered, 163

Daubigny sent before the military commission, 560

D'Auch, Martin, his protest in the national assembly, 15

D'Aumont, duke, refuses the command of the citizen militia, 24; liberated under a fictitious name, 475, ii

Daunou, one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii; president of the council of five hundred, 595; sent commissioner to Rome, 774

Dauphiné, commandant of the, interrogates his colonels, 5, ii; states of, ib. 6, ii

David the painter elected to the convention, 159, ii; arranges the plan of the fête of the Supreme Being, 446, ii; removed from the committee of general safety, 474, ii; placed under arrest, 475; his pictures of the death of Marat and of Lepelletier removed from the hall of the convention, 522; arrested, 560, ii

Davidovich driven back into the Tyrol, after the battle of Arcola, 677

Davieuhout, his speech on the events of 20th June, 104

Davoust defeats the Spaniards at Salces, 334; defeated at Mas-d'Eu, id.

Days, alteration of the names of, in the revolutionary calendar, 370

D'Azara negotiates terms with Bonaparte for the Pope, 641, ii

Death in Paris; its origin attributed to the maximum; its consequences and means of prevention, 405

Death, punishment of, abolished in the French republic, to commence from the time of the general peace, 593

Debentures or assignats, issue of, 53, ii

Debous, his gallant but ineffectual defence of the fortress of Gravel, 513

Debry, Jean, one of the committee of public welfare, 245; appointed one of the committee of general safety, 474, ii; at the congress at Rastadt, 776, ii; 797, ii; attacked and wounded at Rastadt, 819

Decadary fêtes established, 520

Decadi, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 370, ii

Decimals, system of, adopted, 369, ii; 370

Declaration of the parliament of Paris, 5 — of rights issued by the national assembly, 13, 14; resumption of the debate on, 32; partially accepted by the king, 39, 40; wholly accepted, 40, ii

— of the rights of man, 29, ii

Desfers, general, commands in the Eastern Pyrenees, 287

Degelmann negotiates the treaty of Campo-Fornio, 760—762

Dego, capture of, by the French, retaken by the Austrians, and again captured by the French, 627

Degouy, D'Arcy, his declaration on financial distress, 36, ii

Degraves succeeds Narbonne, 86; resigns, 90, ii

Delacroix appointed to negotiate with Lord Malmesbury, 668, ii; his character and defects, 692, ii; dismissed; his character, 733; sent envoy to Holland; his conduct there, 771, id. ib.; recalled from Holland, 798, ii

Delarochefoucauld, cardinal, protests against the mode of voting in the national assembly, 17; see Laroche-foucauld, also Rochefoucauld

Delauay, his speech on the public danger, 109

— of Angers, his stock-jobbing transactions, 313, ii; and conspiracy with De Batz, id. ib.; particulars of the same, 368, ii; 369; denounced as a modernist, 375, ii; arrested, 381, ii; tried and executed, 417—420

— commandant of the Bastille killed, 23

- D'Elbéo chosen one of the Vendean leaders, 255; generalissimo of the Vendéans, 335; mortally wounded at Cholet, 354, ii; removed to Noirmoutiers, 389
- Delbrel, his speech on 19th Brumaire, 866
- Delcloi, his exertions to rescue the convention 1st Prairial, Year III., 556, ii
- Delessart, minister of foreign affairs, 79, ii; impeached, 35; his plan of a new military guard for the king, 92; is murdered, 158
- Delmas, one of the committee of public welfare, 245, 290, ii; proposes that members of committees shall not return to it within a month, 474, ii; with two others appointed to command the armed force after 1st Prairial, Year III., 559
- Democratic constitution proposed by Herault Séchéelles, 290, ii
- Denmark neutral as to France, 1794, 431; ambassador from, arrives in Paris, 547, ii
- D'Entraigues, count, agent of the emigrants at the court of Verona, 494, ii; seeks refuge in Venice; is delivered up to Bonaparte; he discloses the treason of Pichegru; is sent to Milan, 728, ii; 729
- Departmental guard proposed, 167, ii
- Departments, France divided into, 45; insurrection of the, 107, ii; tendencies of, after the insurrection of 31st of May, 1793, 279
- Deputies, the seventy-three proscribed deputies released, 508
- Desaix, his services before Kohl, 632, ii; his passage of the Rhine, 712; joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii; gains the battle of Sediman, and conquers Upper Egypt, 845, 846
- Desertion from the army in Belgium, 188; punishment for, 604
- Desèze chosen as third counsel for the king, 205; he completes the preparation of the defence, id. 4; his speech, 206; claims an appeal to the people against the sentence on the king, 213
- Desfieux promotes the insurrection of 10th March, 234, ii; denounced as a moderate; some account of him, 375, ii; 376; expelled the Jacobin club, 377, ii; trial and execution of, 412
- Desforgues appointed minister of Foreign affairs, 279
- Desgenettes, the physician, joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii; his reply to Bonaparte at Jaffa, 849
- Desilz defeated by the republicans and killed, 568
- Desmoulins, Camille, heads the people in the Palais Royal, 20, ii; his harangues at the Palais Royal, 34; orator of the mob, 71, ii; one of the founders of the Cordeliers' club, 75, n.; writes for the Cordeliers, 75, ii; presents a petition to the legislative assembly against the petition of the directory of the departments, 79, ii; joins the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; elected to the convention, 159; accused of being a moderate, 301; he justifies general Dillon from the charge of conspiracy, id.; his exclamation on the verdict against the Girondists, 364, ii; returns to Paris from La Vendée; joins Danton against the violent Mountaineers, 375; is admitted to the Jacobins at the time of the purification of the club, 379; publishes his "Vieux Cordelier," a newspaper written against the ultra-revolutionists, 297; expelled from the Cordeliers, 399; publishes "my defence" in the "Vieux Cordelier," 399, ii; extract of the same, 400, 401; called to account by the Jacobins, 402; further extracts from his "Vieux Cordelier," id. ii; his comparison between Athenian and French democracy, 407, ii; 408; he alludes to the fate of Socrates, 408, and n.; arrested and sent to the Luxembourg, 415; id. ii; tried and executed, 417—420
- Madame Camille, condemned and executed, 421, ii
- Desotieux, Sieur, appointed to the command in Brittany during the absence of Puisaye; account of him, 516, ii
- Despagnac employed by Dnmouriez, 185; finds funds for De Batz's conspiracy, 313, ii; particulars of his part in the conspiracy, 368, ii; 369; tried and executed, 417—420
- Despernelles, one of the royal committee, 619
- Despommelles, Chevalier, his intrigues as royalist agent, 693, ii; 695; he is arrested, 696; tried and condemned to death, but imprisoned, id.
- D'Espréménie, his character, 3, ii; 4; counteracts the scheme of Lamoignon, 5; is arrested in Parliament, id. ii; proposes a decree against the tiers état, 16, ii; is wounded, 121
- Dessaulx and the others of the seventy-three proscribed deputies again take their seats in the convention, 508, ii
- Destaing, his services at the battle of Aboukir, 850, 851
- D'Estaing, admiral, his letter to the queen, 37, ii; appears as a witness against her, 360, ii; his brave and generous behaviour, 361
- Destounelles appointed minister of finance, 279; his evidence against the Girondists, 363
- Deux-Ponts, duke de, his acts cause the decree of fraternization, 189, ii
- De Voisin murdered, 50
- D'Harcourt, duke, agent of the French princes at London, 494
- D'Harville at Jemmapes, 182, 183
- D'Havre, duke, agent for the princes at Madrid, 494
- D'Herbois, see Collot
- D'Hervilly, count, his enlistment of emigrants, 568, ii; differences between him and Puisaye in the Quiberon expedition, 570, 572; wounded at Saint Barbe, 574, ii; 575; mortally wounded, 576
- Dictator, Marat's proposal of one, 116, ii; objected to by Barbaroux, 118
- Dictatorship, consisting of the convention and committee of public welfare, appointed, 339, ii; 340
- Diederichs, tried and executed, 417—420
- Dijon, opposition at, to the administrative reforms after the end of the reign of terror, 495
- Dillon, general, administers the oath of fidelity to the king and constitution to the troops, 137; suspected of a conspiracy; is justified by Camille Desmoulins, 301; his unwary proposal to Lafayette, 419; tried and executed, 421, ii; his pretended conspiracy made a pretext for various executions, 451, ii
- Theobald, murdered at Lille, 90, ii
- Directorial constitution of the Year III. discussed and agreed to, 581, ii; 582; its provisions, 582; the same accepted by the primary assemblies of France, 583
- Directory re-appointed, 168
- of five decreed, 582; its first acts in reference to government and finance, and their appointment of ministers, in which a preference is shown for the patriots, that is, the remains of the Jacobins, 597; the want of accommodation for them, and their difficulties on entering on their functions described, 597, ii; 598; their proposed financial schemes, which terminate in a forced loan, 600, ii; 603; confirmed in their power; occupied with various reformations, which are pursued with republican vigour, 604; particulars of its financial scheme, 601, 602; submitted to and adopted by the council of five hundred, but rejected by the council of the ancients, 602, ii; proposes a forced loan from the wealthier classes, 603; the same agreed to by the councils, id. the Luxembourg fitted up from the Garde Meuble, 604, ii; continuation of the administrative labours; requisitionists ordered to rejoin the armies; the forced loan promptly raised; issues of rescriptions, 612; procures decrees for taking horses for the army on certain terms, 613; oath of hatred to royalty taken, 614; order for the seizure of several numbers of the "Tribun du Peuple," for closing the Society of the Pantheon, the Société des Ecclésiastiques, Salon des Princes, and Salon des Arts, 615, ii; conspiracy of Babœuf and the Jacobins against the same discovered, and the promoters apprehended, 619; its firm answer to the overtures of Wickham, 620, ii; Murat presents twenty-one colours taken by the army of Italy, 629; sends orders by the advice of Carnot to divide the army of Italy into two parts, and directs their destination, 634, ii; refuses to accept Bonaparte's resignation; approves of his plans, and imposes on him the condition that he make Rome and Naples sensible of the power of the republic, 639, ii; appoints Delacroix to meet lord Malmesbury, the English ambassador, 668, ii; 669; refuses to treat with lord Malmesbury until he has the sanction of all the powers for whom he alleges that he appeared, 669; allows Bonaparte to renew his negotiations with Rome; concludes treaties of peace with Naples and Genoa, 670; id. ii; sends general Clarke to Vienna to negotiate an arrangement with the emperor, 672, ii; sends to propose an armistice with Austria, which is the object of general Clarke's mission, 677; its suspicions excited with regard to Bonaparte's conduct in Italy, 678; orders lord Malmesbury to withdraw within forty-eight hours, 679, ii; proposes the establishment of an official journal of the government, 681, ii; address of, to the two councils, 681, ii; 682; it improves the finances; its administrative occupations in the winter of 1797, 682; character of, and differences among the five directors, 689, 690; all but Barras reside in suites of rooms at the Luxembourg, 690, ii; proposes to the two councils an oath to be taken by representatives of hatred to royalty, 696, ii; sends circulars to the electors, recommending republicans to their choice, id. ib.; opposition to, in the elections of the Year V., 696, ii; opposition to, in the two councils, id. ib.; discussions in the Clichy club, and among parties on the election of one of the, to go out of office in 1797, 697; intrigues in, respecting the retirement of one of the members in the Year V., 721, ii; 722; the disagreements among its members, 729; its military preparations round Paris, 735; assumes a threatening attitude to meet the expected insurrection of the royalists, 743; its energetic reply to the councils, 744; sends a message to the two councils, proving the royalist plot, 750, ii; 751; its resolutions of 18th Fructidor agreed to by the ancients, and made law, 752; ratifies the treaty of Campo-Formio, and the circumstances under which it does so, 763; gives a triumphal fête to Bonaparte at the termination of the campaign of Italy, 764, 765; its opposition to the Egyptian expedition, 779, ii; assents to it, id. ib.; 780; its operations in reforming the abuses practised in the republics of Italy, 800—802; puts the law of conscription in force, 804; the effect produced against, by the first reverses in military affairs; by the murder of the French ministers at Rasdadt; numerous imputations levelled against, by the opposition, 819, ii; 820; justification of, from the attacks made upon it for incapacity and mal-administration, 820—823; pecuniary arrangement among the members for the benefit of each one as he retires, 822, ii; misappropriation of a portion of the secret-service money, the only instance of its collective impropriety, 823; violent proceedings against, the revolution of 30th Prairial; two of the directors displaced, and a new directory formed, 832—834; formation of a new one; Cahier succeeds Treillard, and Rogor-Ducos and Moulins are elected in lieu of Larévellière and Merlin, 832—834; sends orders for the return of Bonaparte, 845, ii; the various schemes of the directors with regard to Bonaparte, 859, 860; they send for him; his interview; he declines for a time a military command, 860; abolished, 862—868

— of the department, petition of, 79

Districts, France divided into, 45

Djezzar, pacha, commands the army in Syria, 846, ii; his services in the defence of St. Jean d'Acre, 847

Dobson arrested by order of the commission of twelve, 264; president of the central revolutionary committee; his part in the insurrection of 31st May, 268, 269

Dol, bishop of, joins in the Quiberon expedition, 568, ii

Dolomieu joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii

Dom-Genle proposes that the Catholic religion shall be that of the state, 49; one of the prophets of Mère de Dieu, 445, ii; arrested, 450

Domiciliary visits again established, 239, ii; visits during the night allowed against suspected prisons, 340, ii

Donat, Francis, deputed to Bonaparte from Venice, 712, ii; his endeavours to save the old government of Venice, 717

Doppet, general, supersedes Kellermann at the siege of Lyons, 347; his proceedings at the siege of Lyons, 347, 348; is superseded by Dugommier, 364

Dordrecht entered, 513, ii

Doutest de Pontecoulant is re-instated in the convention, 526

Dove-houses, exclusive rights to, suppressed, 30

Drosnay, count du, his enlistment of emigrants, 568, ii

Drenthe subdued, 514

Drouet stops the king at Varennes, 67; on his return from captivity in Austria takes his seat, 614, ii; one of the secret directory of public welfare, 619; apprehended, and ordered to be impeached, 620; escapes from prison, 650, ii; joins the Jacobins at the Old Ride, 841, ii

Drowning, execution by, practised by Carrier at Nantes, 453, ii

Dubarran arrested, 560, ii

Dubayot, see Aubert

Dubois joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii

—, general, his death at San Marco, 661

— do Crancé opposes the violence of the Jacobins, 232; at Grenoble, 283; bombards Lyons, 329; though a representative, continues the siege of Lyons, 315, 346; he is recalled, 347; accusations against, by Clouthon and others, 348; denounced and expelled the Jacobin club, 456, ii; proposes the periodical renewal of committees, 474; proposes the purifying of the popular societies, 490; opposes the reduction of assignats to the rate of exchange, 552, ii; one of the five commissioners to preserve the revolution on its transition to the new government, 592, ii; appointed minister at war, 844, ii; denounces the intended revolution of 18th Brumaire to two of the directors, 862, id. ib.

Dubuisson, Jacobin envoy to Dumowicz, 240; denounced as a moderate; same account of him, 375, ii; 376; expelled the Jacobin club, 377, ii; trial and execution of, 412

Duchastel tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365

Duchatel taken at Bourdeaux, and sent to Paris for trial, 357, ii

Duchatelet, his address to the French nation, said to be composed by Thomas Paine, 70, ii

Ducos tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365

—, see Rogor-Ducos

Dueroquet, trial and execution of, 412

Dufourny attends the assembly at the Mairie, 259; calls for a commandant-general of the Parisian guard, 267

Dufrique-Valazé presents the report to the assembly of the charges against the king, 192, ii

Dugommier, commander of the army before Toulon, 384, id. ii; commands against the Spaniards, 433, ii; defeats them at Boulou, id. ib.; captures Bellegarde, 492; is killed, 515

Duhem denounces "The Spectator of the Revolution;" he is committed to the Abbaye, 521; decree for his arrest; he is sent to Ham, 594, ii

Duhoux, general, associated with the tribunal appointed by the sections, 588, ii

Dulac causes the dispersion of the troops of the commune, 9th Thermidor, 471; his firmness in arresting the municipal officers, id. ib.

Dumas, his speech on Lafayette's letter, 96; his speech on the subject of the public danger, 111; president of the revolutionary tribunal after its re-organization,

- 451; his mode of conducting the trials, 452; becomes deranged, 453; is arrested, 467; 471, ii
- Dumolard, the royalist; his motion on the subject of the events in Italy, 727, ii; 728
- Dumoulard, his address on the insurrection of the faubourgs, 101, ii
- Dumouriez offers his services to the assembly, 70; his character, genius, and designs, 85; his interview with the queen, 87; informs the assembly of the demands of Austria, 88, ii; is attacked by public opinion, 91; opposes the formation of a camp near Paris, 92, ii; his interview with the king and queen, 95; made minister of war, id. ii; his reception in the assembly, id. ib.; resigns, 96; his position with the army after the events of August 10, 136—138; refuses to administer the oath of fidelity to the king and constitution to the troops, 137; his position with the assembly, 138, ii; he is unpopular with the army, 140; his military plans, 150; his campaign of the Aronne, 151—153; reaches Grand Pré, 151; retreats, 153; he is at Valmy; his tactics, 154; his military character vindicated, 157, ii; his oversights, 170; his plan of warfare against Belgium, Savoy, and Nice, 171; Savoy and Nice taken, id. ii; he visits Paris to concert plans for the invasion of Belgium, 172; his good reception at the convention, id.; and at the Jacobins, 173; incident between him and Marat at the house of Mlle. Candaille, 174, ii; he quits Paris, id. ib.; his plan of military operations, id. ib. 175; sequel of his campaign, 181—189; sets out for Belgium, 181; marches to Valence, 182; battle of Jemmapes, 183; Quesnes taken, id.; he enters Mons, 184, ii; his management of the Belgic campaign, 185; enters Brussels, id. ii; he remonstrates with the ministry on the want of support for his troops, 186; he enters Liege, 187, ii; refuses to force the French paper-money on the Belgians, 188; he becomes unpopular, but his army is re-inforced, and he commences a second campaign in the Austrian Netherlands, 223; scheme of the same, which is nominally carried on against the Stadtholder and English influence, 223; enters Holland and issues a proclamation, id. ii; proceeds to the army at Tielmont, 229; is recalled by the convention from the command of the army against Holland, and ordered to return to the grand army on the Meuse, id.; he arrests two commissaries of the assembly and sends them to Paris, id.; dismisses general Moreton, id.; a decree of accusation demanded against him, 233; writes a letter of remonstrance to the convention, 234; further account of his military operations, 235; he is defeated at Neerwinden, id. ii; 236, 237; the commencement of his negotiations with the allies, 237; he has an interview with colonel Mack, id.; he meditates restoring the constitution of 1791, id. ii; has an interview with Danton and Lacroix at Louvain, id. ib.; he refuses to retract his letter, 238; he discloses his sentiments to colonel Mack, id.; proposes to overturn the convention, id.; armistice agreed on, and its terms, id.; his military plans with regard to Belgium and Holland wholly frustrated, 240; he has an interview with the Jacobin envoys at Ath, id.; he declares his independence of and contempt for the convention, id. ii; he is summoned to the bar, 241; commissioners sent to arrest him, id. ii; political ferment in his army, id. ib.; he refuses to go to Paris, id. ib.; the emissaries sent to arrest him are made prisoners, 242; he quits his army, and the circumstances under which he does so, 243; he retires to Switzerland, id. ii; reflections on his defection and its consequences, id. ib.; he lives for a time in Germany, and dies in England, id. ib. n.; considerations on his character and on his political actions, id. ib.
- Dumuy appointed by Kellermann to continue the siege of Lyons, 345
- Duperret implicated in the assassination of Marat, 297; tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
- Du Petit-Thouars is wounded and subsequently killed at Aboukir, 794
- Duphot shot at Rome, 773
- Dupin, meetings of the adversaries of Robespierre at his house, 456, ii; his arrest devised, 531, ii
- Duplain, member of the committee of surveillance, 142, ii
- Duplessis, college of, made a prison for suspected persons, 358
- Dupont, of Nemours, his opposition to the list of directors sent from the council of five hundred, 596; his mode of swearing hatred to royalty, 614, ii
- Duport, his character, 4, 15, 20; keeper of the seals, 59; ordered to receive the declarations of the king, 63, ii
- Duportail, minister of war, 59
- Duprat tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
- Duquesnoi arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559; condemned to death; stabs himself, 561
- Durand-Maillane proposes the recognition of the liberty of the press, 479, ii; one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii
- Duranthon minister of justice, 86, ii
- Durfort, Alexander de, envoy from the emperor Leopold, 65
- Duroi arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559; condemned to death; stabs himself, and is afterwards executed, 561
- Dussaulx elected to the convention, 159, ii
- Dutch fleet in the Texel frozen in, surrenders to the troops of Pichegru, 513, ii; 514
- Duveine de Presle, his mission to Brittany, 543, ii; one of the royal committee, 619; his intrigues as royalist agent, 693, ii; 695; he is arrested, 696; tried, condemned to death; makes a confession; and his sentence commuted to imprisonment, id.; banished, 751, ii
- D'Yrizar, chevalier, envoy to Ballo, to negotiate a treaty of peace for Spain, 578, ii

E.

- East India Company's bonds, conspiracy to depreciate, 313, ii; dissolution of; particulars relating to the conspiracy against, 368, ii; 369; Chabot betrays his accomplices in the conspiracy against, 381, ii
- Echassériaux nominated member of the committee of public welfare, 474, ii
- Edgeworth, de Firmont M., is chosen by the king as his attendant in his last moments, 214, ii; his arrival at the temple, id. ib.; his address to the king on the scaffold, 216
- Education, regulations made for promoting, after the reign of terror, 519; debates on, after the elections of the year V., 724
- Educational committee, 244, n.
- Egalité, see Orleans, duke of
- Eglantine, see Fabre
- Egypt, expedition to, projected by Bonaparte, 768, ii; 769; the expedition to, in preparation; the reasons that induced Bonaparte to support the design, 779; account of the military leaders of, and of the scientific men engaged in, id. ii; departs from Toulon, 782; description of the country, 784—786; Institute of, formed at Cairo by Bonaparte, 792; continuation of the operations of Bonaparte in, 845—851
- Egyptian expedition, summary of, 851
- Ehrlen Rhine, attack on the Austrians at, 643, ii
- El-Arisch captured, 846, ii
- Elders of the departments attend the third federation of August, 1793, 116, ii
- Election of deputies to the national convention, 159
- Elections of the Year V., 696; 721; of the Year VI., 777, 778; of the Year VII., 822
- Electoral assemblies, 582, ii
- club, how composed after the reign of terror, 480; its address to the convention, 497, ii; expelled from the Evêché, holds its sittings at the Museum, 499; dissolved, 527

Electors of Paris meet at the Hotel de Ville, 18, ii; 20, ii — committee of, 244, n.

Elie, 23

— Lacoste proposes the suspension of the revolutionary tribunal, 473, ii; is arrested, 560, ii

Elizabeth, Madame, her flight to Varennes, 66; her conduct before the mob, 103; ordered to be banished, but detained as a witness against the queen, 326, ii; cruel treatment of, in the Temple, 360

Ellis, Mr., sent to Lille, with lord Malmesbury, 740, ii

El-Mohdy, insurrection of the impostor, so called, captures Damanhour, and slaughters the garrison; he is killed, 849

Emigrants, their intrigues at Turin, Lyons, and Colblontz, 61; purposes of, 69; their warlike preparations, 77; debates on their proceedings, 80; war threatened against them, 81; speech of the king to the assembly on the subject of, 81; intrigues of, and of the princes, 494; flight of, on the entry of the republicans into Amsterdam, 573, ii; great congregation of, on the frontiers, 548, ii; many return to France, 563, ii; intrigues of, with the English, and attempt to seduce Pichegru from the republic, 565, ii; 566; enlistment of, 568, ii; their disgust at the Chouans of Brittany, 570; their army is defeated at Saint-Barbe, 574, ii; 575; totally destroyed at Quiberon, 576; those taken at Quiberon shot, 578, ii; all banished, 582, ii; moveable property of, ordered to be sold, 603; great numbers again return to France, 728, ii; ordered again to quit France, 751, ii

Emigration of the nobles, 42, ii — effect of, on the currency, 53, ii; increase of, 61; attempts made to stop the progress of, 62; bill against, debates on, 63; 78

Emigrés, see Emigrants

Encyclopedists, the particular signification of the term, 427, n.

England, her policy in joining Prussia stated, 51; suspected by the French of having excited riots, 51, ii; charged with creating the discontents, 51, ii; naval preparations in, 51, ii; conduct of statesmen in, regarding the revolution, 218; ambassador of, withdrawn from Paris, 219; preparations for war in, 219, ii; war declared against, 220; intrigues of its emissaries at Toulon, 300, ii; military spies sent from; their proceedings, 325, ii; letters of, found, id. ib.; decree of the convention passed condemnatory of the government of, 325, ii; 326; invasion of, spoken of by Barrère, 333, ii; attack upon the vices of its government in the Jacobins, 403; her advantages to be derived from a war with France, 429, 430; refuses to recognise the regency of Monsieur, 494; cabinet of, its policy, 515, ii; treaty against, by France and Holland, 537, ii; state of, and her means aggressive against France, 545; schemes and intrigues in, by Fulsaye in favour of the royalists, 568; accused by the royalists of having caused the failure of the Quiberon expedition; the same denied, 577, ii; indirect overtures of, towards treating with the republic, 620, ii; difficulties of, in 1796, 652, ii; sends lord Malmesbury ambassador to treat for a general peace, 668, ii; conference between him and the French plenipotentiary, 669; 672; negotiations with the directory abruptly terminated; lord Malmesbury takes his departure, 678, ii; 679; project of Heche and Truguet for injuring the power of, in India, 680; embarrassing position of, after the preliminaries of peace with Austria, 719; critical state of the Bank; it suspends cash payments, 720; proposes negotiations for peace, 720, ii; preparations for the invasion of, 767, 768; preparations of, in consequence of the supposed intended invasion, 781; its efforts to form a new alliance in Europe against France, 796

— and Russia join in the expedition against Holland, 841

English agents, transactions of, in the betrayal of Toulon, 328, ii; proposed surrender of Toulon to, to be held for Louis XVII., 329; further employment of spies by, in La Vendée, 330, ii; evacuate Toulon after burning the arsenal, dockyards, and ships, 335, ii; 386; violate the neutrality of Genoa, 434; defeat of, at Savona, 492; evacuate Nimoguen, 510; under Walmoden, retreat upon Deventer, 511, ii; intrigues of, with the emigrants; attempt to seduce Pichegru from the republic, 565, ii; 566; intrigues of, with the Breton chiefs, 567; again aid the royalists in Brittany and La Vendée, 599; squadron appears in the bay of Isle Dieu, 599, ii; the departure of the French prince from Isle Dieu attributed to, 608, ii; take Leghorn, 640; factory at Leghorn seized by Bonaparte, 641, ii; their insults to the government of Spain, 651, ii; 652; their further intrigues in favour of the royalists, 694, ii; their failure in the attack on Ostend, 804 — constitution, meditated establishment of, 19, ii; referred to in debates of the assembly, 32, ii

— fleet off the coast, 282, ii

— ships press American seamen, 480

— and Russians capitulate at Zyp, 855, ii; they evacuate Holland, id. ib. 856

Enlistment opposed in La Vendée, 253, 254

Epauletiers, their petition in favour of Vincent and Ronsin, 399

Equality decreed in the convention, 163

Era, now, established as the commencement of the republic, 163

Erlach, general of the Bernese troops, murdered, 776

Escudier arrested, 560

Ettingen, battle of, 645

Europe, state of politics in; and inclinations of the powers of, in 1790, 50, 51; state of, at the beginning of 1794; and policy adopted by the English minister, Pitt, which M. Thiers defends, 429; state of the various powers of, with regard to France at the opening of the campaign of 1797, 697, 698

European powers, their alliance against France, 218, ii

Evreux, the federalists repulsed at, 201, i

Exchequer, parliament at Rouen so called, 4, n.

Executions at Lyons, 357

— of whole families, by order of the revolutionary tribunal, 442; vast numbers of, caused by the revolutionary tribunal under the law of 22nd Prairial, 451, ii; 453, 454

Executive council formed, 132; ordered to see to the execution of the king, 214, ii

— directory of five decreed, 582; see Directory

Extermination, war of, carried on by the republicans in La Vendée, 324; continuation of, 334, ii; 336; further progress of, 492, ii; 493

Extraordinary criminal tribunal created, 230; riots and disorders in consequence, 231; its constitution, 233

F.

Fabre D'Eglantine, one of the founders of the Cordeliers' club, 75, n.; elected to the convention, 159, ii; his motion at the Jacobinson Louvet's accusation of Robespierre, 177; causes the submission of thirty thousand rebels in the department of Lozère, 293, ii; engages in stock-jobbing transactions, 313, ii; opposes the dissolution of the East India Company, 369; he is bribed by Chabot, id.; suspicions excited against him; he is denounced as a moderate, 375; id. ii; admitted to the Jacobins at the purification, 379; denounces Maillard, Ronsin, and Vincent, before the convention, 381; questioned by the Jacobins, 403; tried and executed, 417—420

Facna entered by the French, 700, ii

Faithful, the society called the, formed, 684

Famars, camp of, attacked by the Austrians, 284, ii

Family compact, renewal of, with Spain, 651, ii; 652; purposes of the compact, 667, n.

- Faseses formed of the pikes of the elders of the departments, 317
 Fashion, revival of, by the Thermidorians, 496, ii
 Fashions, the costumes of, adopted from David, 496, ii
 Faubourg St. Antoine, fire in, at the factory of Réveillon, 9, ii; siege of, 559, id. ii
 Faubourgs, insurrection of, 101; the mob attack the Tuileries, 102; attack of, on the Tuileries, 127, ii
 Fauche-Boree, agent in the intrigue for seducing Pichegru from the republic, 566
 Fauchet, his arguments upon the infliction of capital punishments with regard to the king, 196, ii; 197; implicated in the assassination of Marat, 297; tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
 Faure, his speech in favour of the king, 196
 Favourin, battle of, 687
 Favrus, Marquis de, trial of, for conspiracy against the assembly, 46; proceeds; his condemnation and death, 48
 Faypoult, minister of finance under the directory, 597, ii; sent commissioner to Rome, 774; his improvements in the taxation at Rome, 801
 February 4, 1790, reconciliation of, 46, ii, its effect destroyed, and how, 48
 Federalism in Normandy and Brittany against the convention, 292 — overthrown, 294, ii
 Federalist oath, 283, ii
 Federalists, punishment of, by Carrier in his massacres at Nantes, and by Maignet, Lebon, Fréron, and Burras, at Bordeaux, Marseilles, and Toulon, 454; repulsed at Evreux, 291, ii; wholly defeated, 293
 Federation, fête of the first, 55, 56; third anniversary of, 114; the third, of the 10th of August, 1793, and particulars of the ceremony, 316, ii; reflections on the same, 317
 Féraud, his bravery on 1st Prairial, Year III.; is killed in the hall of the convention, 555; his head carried into the convention, id. ii; his murderer condemned to death, but rescued by the patriots, 559; funeral sitting of the convention in his honour, 560, ii; monument ordered to his memory, 560, ii
 — general, separates from Dumouriez, 241, ii; surrenders Valenciennes, 309
 Ferrara, legation of, obtains from Bonaparte its provisional independence, 641; and its acknowledgment by the pope, id. ii
 Ferzon, drives the king's carriage to Varennes, 66
 Festival of Reason, 373, ii; 374
 Fête of the Supreme Being, 446, ii; 447
 — to commemorate the death of Louis XVI. held, 614
 Feudal rights abolished, 30
 Feuillans club formed, 50, ii; 75, n.
 Feytaud theatre, concerts at, 496, ii
 Figuieras, entrenched camp at, abandoned by the Spaniards, 515; fortress of, surrendered, id.
 Finance committee, 244 n.
 Finances, order in, re-established by Necker, 2, ii; debates on, in the notables, 3, ii; bad state of, at the retirement of Bienne, 5, ii; 6; Necker's report on; the desperate state of, 31, ii; distress of, 36, ii; Necker submits a new scheme of, 36, ii; deranged state of; the depreciation of the assignats, and its causes, with reference to their being a government security; influence of stock-jobbing; transactions on the value of assignats, and on the public credit, 312, 313; new system of; consolidation of the old national debt, and institution of the "Great Book," 320—322; reflections on the arbitrary measures for improving the, 322, ii; situation of the, of France in Nov. 1793, and effect of terror on the commerce of the country, 368; state of, in 1794, and the means taken to prosecute the plan of consolidating the public debt, 441; funding of the life annuities, id. ii; state of, after the reign of terror; depression in the value of assignats; difficulty in collecting, and deficiency of taxes, 481, ii; measures occasioned by the increased depression of the assignats, 551; measures in consequence of the excessive jobbing to which the repeal of the maximum gave rise, 551, ii; debates and plans for bringing down the assignats to a certain standard, and thereby facilitating the sale of the national property, 552; labours of the convention, and debates on; and on the sale of the national property, with regard to withdrawing or reducing the value of assignats, and the sliding scale adopted for this purpose, 561, ii; 562; reflections on the financial schemes of the republican government, 563, 564; the deplorable condition of, at the accession of the government of the directory, 597; creation of treasury orders or mandats as a substitution for the assignat, and a disquisition upon this new financial operation, which does not remove the embarrassment so soon as was expected, 617, 618; renewed distresses; the mandats abolished, and paper money discontinued, 648, ii; 650; state of France in consequence of the depression of the, 681, ii; improvements in, by the directory, 682; state of, in the Year V., and their proposed regulation, by the opposition to government, 725—727; review of the financial schemes of the Year VI., by which a third of the national debt was to be paid off, 755, 756; derangements in the; taxes on doors and windows decreed, and on salt referred to a report, 803; decree for the sale of national domains, 804; the derangements are a source of difference among the directors, 831; another forced loan decreed, 836, ii
 Fires at Douay, Valenciennes, Bayonne, Chemillé, and Saumur, supposed to be caused by the English spies, 325, ii
 Firmon, see Edgeworth
 Fish market section demand a decree of accusation against Dumouriez, 233
 Five hundred, council of, decreed, 592; see also Council of Five Hundred Flanders, military operations in, in 1794, 435—438
 — regiment, entertainment given by, in Versailles, 88
 Fleisselles, provost of the merchants, deceives the people, 21; is shot, 23, ii
 Fleuriot arrested, 471, ii
 Fleurns, battle of, and retreat of the Austrians, 459, 460
 Floréal, meaning of the term, in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.
 Florant Guyot, one of the five commissioners for preserving the revolution in its transition to the new government, 592, ii; sent commissioner to Rome, 774
 Fombio, defeat of Liptai's division at, 632, ii
 Fonfrède, his speech concerning his colleagues the commission of twelve, 279
 Fontarabia taken by the French, 492, ii; 515
 Fontenay attacked and captured by the Vendéans, 287, ii
 Forced loan, 256; 258; again decreed, 603; the same raised with promptitude by the directory, 612; another decreed, 836, ii
 Foreign powers, policy of, 77; rupture with, in consequence of the death of the king, 218 — securities obtained for assignats at an enormous sacrifice, 312
 Foreigners domiciled in France since July 14, 1789, ordered to be put under arrest, 326
 Forestallers, their proceedings, 562
 Forestalling, laws against, rigorously enforced, 366, ii; see Maximum Tax; Provisions; Scarcity
 Forestier acquitted by the military commission, 561
 Fort Eguillette at Toulon, suggestion concerning, by Bonaparte, at the siege, 385; bravery of captain Mulron in the attack on, id. ii
 Foscarelli sent to Bonaparte to prevent the entry of the French into Verona, 638
 Fouché appointed to the Hague, 836, ii; recalled and appointed minister of police, 842, ii; his arrest decreed, 581, ii

Fouché of Nantes, one of the commissioners for the extermination of Lyons, 357; denounced and expelled the Jacobin club, 457
 Pouli, battle of, 847, ii; 848
 Poulon, 20, ii; murdered, 26, ii
 Fountain of regeneration, 316, ii
 Fouquier-Tinville, his violent speech on the trial of Custine, 344; charged with the custody of the Girondists, 344, ii; collects the evidence against the queen, 360; devises the charges against Mameot, 366; his conduct on the trial of the Hébertists, 412; packs the jury for the trial of Danton, 417; his ferocity described, 451—453; accuser of the re-organized revolutionary tribunals, 451; his mode of conducting trials before, 452; his extreme terror, 453; causes Robespierre and his confederates to be carried to execution, 471, ii; denounced by Legendre, 474, ii; his trial demanded, 503, ii
 Four nations, meeting at, declares that the moderate members of the convention should be destroyed, 232
 Fournier joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii
 Fournier, the American, 90, ii; joins the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; arrested for presenting the fish-market petition, 233, ii; promotes the insurrection of 10th March, 234
 Foussois, accusation against, 534; he is placed under arrest, id., ii
 Fox, Mr. his view of the revolution, 218; his opposition to the war with France, 429; his arguments and those of the English opposition in answer to Mr. Pitt's policy in carrying on "a just and necessary war," 546, ii; 547; his indignant address in opposition to the restrictions on the press, 611; id., ii
 Fox, general, commands the artillery at Zurich, 853
 France, moral and political state of, towards the end of the 18th century, 1; 8; consideration of the state of, immediately preceding the revolution, 7, ii; 8; divided into departments, districts, and communes, 45; revolution in, excites the attention of the powers of Europe, 50, ii; general federation of, 55; object of, id., ii; state of, at the formation of the legislative assembly, 76; policy of foreign powers towards, 77; state of, with foreign powers in 1792, 88; its object in war to extend its dominions to their natural limits, 89, ii; government of, divided between the assembly and the commune, 131; military position of, in August, 1792, 139, 140; a republic, 163; state of society in, October, 1792, 173; offers to fraternize with oppressed nations, 189, ii; state of parties in, at the time of the trial of Louis XVI., 190; state of parties in, after the death of Louis XVI., 216; circumstances of, in relation to foreign powers, 1793, 216—218; alliance of European powers against, 218, ii; ambassador of, ordered to quit England in eight days, 219, ii; declares war against England and Holland, 220; state of public opinion, and increase of revolution in the provinces, and in some of the principal cities, 250, 251; state of, at the beginning of July, 1793, 283, ii; retrospect of the military operations of the allies against, 284; state of the war as regarded the allied powers, and the means of the convention to resist the combination against the revolution, 289; financial situation of, November, 1793, and the influence of terror on the commerce of, 368; state of, in October and November, 1793, 374; condition of the labouring classes, id., ii; government of, by commissions established, 423; state of; Robert Lindet's report on, to the convention, 487; state of; report of Clément upon, 549, ii; internal state of, towards the middle of 1796, 647; treaty of alliance offensive and defensive between Spain and, 652; internal and external state of, after the retreat of the armies from Germany at the end of 1796, 666, 667; situation of the government during the winter of 1797, 689; state of public opinion with regard to the directorial mode of government, 689—692; general review of the relative position of foreign powers at the opening of the campaign of 1797, 697, 698; continental relations of, in 1798, 769; plenipotentiaries of, at Rastadt assassinate, 819

 France and Belgium united, and divided into departments, 593
 Francis I., king of Hungary and Bohemia, war declared against, 99
 ——— II., emperor of Germany, treats at Léoben for peace, 709, ii
 François, a baker, murder of, 44 ——— of Neuchâtel, appointed minister of the interior, 734, ii; elected a director, 753; retires by lot from the directory, 778, ii; envoy to Solz, 796, ii
 Frankfurt on the Main, taken by Custine, 170, ii
 Frankfurt surrenders to Jourdan, 646, ii
 Fraternity, society of, 260
 ———, section of, denounces the conspiracy of the Cordeliers and others, 262; are joined in this by other sections, id., ii
 Fraternization, decree of, 189, ii; decree complained of, by England, 219, ii; the policy of the revolutionists in their system, and its consequences, as shown by the sudden rise of anarchy, 221
 Frederick William, king of Prussia, his policy, 50, 51
 Free trade opened as a means of providing against the scarcity of corn, 522
 Free warren, exclusive rights of, suppressed, 30
 French club, 118, ii, and n.
 ——— guards, causes of discontent among the; liberation of, 19; conflict with the German regiment, 20, ii
 ——— people, statue representing, in the Champ de Mars, 317
 Fréron elected to the convention, 159, ii; massacres federalists at Toulon by grape-shot, 454; argues in favour of a recognition of the liberty of the press, 479, ii; becomes the most distinguished of the Thermidorian journalists; he edits the "Ouvreur du Peuple," 496, ii
 Frétean banished, 4, ii
 Frey, the two brokers of that name join Chabot as bankers in Paris, 313, ii; they are tried and executed, 417—420
 Freytag, marshal, his command before Dunkirk, 331; wounded and made prisoner at Rospode, 332; rescued, id.
 Friedberg, battle of, 646, ii
 "Friend of the People," continued after the death of Marat, 296, ii Friends of the Constitution club formed, 50, ii, n.; 75, n.
 Friesland subdued, 514
 Frimaire, meaning of the term, in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.
 Frollé, his intrigues in Normandy, 698, ii
 Fructidor, meaning of the term, in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.; 5th and 13th of, in the year III.; decrees of, 582; insurrection of the sections of Paris against, 585, 586; 17th and 18th, events that preceded it, 746—750; events of those days, 750—753; 18th, reflections on the events of, 752; consequences of the same, 753
 Fugères wounded at Aboukir, 850, ii
 Funeral ceremonies regulated by the commune of Paris, 371, ii
 Furies of the guillotine, 497, ii

G.

Gaillard commits suicide, 396
 Galeppi treats with Bonaparte at Tolentino, 701
 Galliot, member of the insurrectional committee, 115, ii
 Gallo, marquis de, signs the treaty at Léoben, 709; negotiates the treaty of Campo-Formio, 760—762
 Game laws abolished, 30; ii
 Garat, editor of "The Paris Journal," made minister

- of justice, 168, ii; his characteristics and opinions at the time of the king's trial, 190, ii; minister of the interior, becomes unpopular, 300; announces to the king the decree for his execution, 214, ii; his difficult position, 264, ii; his speech on the arrest of Hébert, id. ib., suggests in the committee of public welfare the self-banishment of the leaders of the contending parties, 273; his accusation referred to the committee of general safety, 526
- Gardanne, general, at the head of the grenadiers, plunges in and passes the Mincio, 637, ii
- Garde-Meuble, plundered, 158, ii; robbery of, laid to the charge of the Girondists, 363
- Gardien tried and condemned, 362, ii; 364; and executed, 365
- Gaspain a member of the committee of public welfare, 303; resigns his place in the committee of public welfare, 325
- Gaston, the perruquier, heads a revolt, and takes Châlons and Machecoul, 254
- Gaudin, his speech on 19th Brumaire, 866
- Gaza captured, 846 n
- Gazan, his services at Zurich, 854
- Geffroy wounded in arresting Admiral, 442, ii
- General defence, committee of, appointed, 222
- safety, committee of, 244, n., see Committee of — decree of, 262, ii; 263
- Genova, situation of, in relation to France, October 1722, 172; incorporated with France, 800
- Genon, state of, in 1796, 629, ii; letter of Bonaparte to the senate of, 640, ii; 641; peace concluded with, 670; revolution at, 718, ii; insurrection at, 759, ii; the same constituted the Ligurian state, id. ib.
- Gersonnès sent commissioner, 78, ii; presents the report of the communications with the emperor Leopold, 84; letter to the king, 119, ii; his character, 160, ii; one of the committed to form a constitution, 169; tried before the revolutionary tribunal and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
- George III., attacked going to the parliament, 1795, 616, ii; 611
- Gerle, see Dom Gerle
- German regiment, conflict with the French guards, 20, ii
- Germanic legion formed by Westermann, 304, ii
- Germany, policy of, in 1794, 431; several of the states of, desire peace with France, 515, ii; and propose the same, 516
- Germinal, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 570, n.; events preceding and occurring on the 12th, of the Year III., 528—534
- Gortruydenberg taken, 223, ii; entered, 513, ii
- Gerville, Cahier de, minister of the interior, 80; resigns, 85
- Gilet and two others appointed to the command of the armed force to restore public tranquillity after 1st Prairial, Year III., 559
- Giray-Dupré, a fugitive in Normandy, 292
- Gironde, deputies from, 75; department of, commences insurrection, 107, ii
- Girondist ministry, seism in, 90; attacked by Vergnaud, and defended by Dumas, 109—111
- party, its principal members, 160
- Girondists described, 75; favour war, 83; their letter to the king, 119, ii; their plans to prevent insurrection, 120; objections to a dethronement, id. ii; their indignation at the popular outrages, 159, ii; prevail in the assembly, 162; become suspected; accusations against them; they retaliate on their accusers, 161, ii; accusation of treason against them in the convention, 168, their reception of Dumouriez in October 1792, 172; their conduct on Louvet's accusation against Robespierre, 176, 177; their conduct on the accusation against Robespierre, 179, ii; call for a trial against Marat, 180, ii; applaud the Belgic campaign, 183, ii; offended with Dumouriez, 187; their conduct on the debate of the king's trial, 199; carry a motion against the Jacobins in the assembly, 203; they require the expulsion of Marat and Robespierre, id.; their conduct as to the trial of the king considered, 207, ii; propose an appeal to the people by the king against his condemnation, 212; their reasons for sparing the king's life, 213, ii; their struggles with the Mountain party, 224—228; their fears after the death of the king, 217; propose to dissolve the convention, 227, ii; meet at the house of Valazé, 227, ii; their indecision, id. ib.; proposed union of, with the Jacobins, 238, ii; Robespierre's oration against, 246; their struggles in the assembly, 265, ii; final struggle with the Mountain, 267; the principal deputies prepare for their personal defence, 268; final overthrow of the, 275—277; twenty of them arrested in the convention, and sent to prison, 275, ii; the chief of the leaders take refuge in the house of Meilhan, 274; deputies, decree passed for their arrest, 276, ii; the proscribed deputies are in open opposition to the convention, 280; the proscribed deputies wander through Normandy and Brittany, 292; accused of instigating the assassination of Marat, 296; orders given for their trial before the revolutionary tribunal, 326; their impeachment ordered, 344, ii; seventy members placed under arrest, 344, ii; the fugitives seek an asylum in the cellars of St. Emilion, 357, ii; their mode of life, and diversions while confined in the prisons of Paris, 358, 359; charges against, 361, ii; 362; their defence considered, 362; twenty-one put on their trial before the revolutionary tribunal; their conduct, condemnation, and execution, id. ii; 363, 364; their conduct on their trial, after their condemnation, and at their execution, 364, ii; 365; the survivors demand their release, and to take their place in the convention, but not agreed to, 508, ii; re-insatatement of the deputies who escaped the scaffold, 516; a fête commemorative of them ordered, 560, ii
- Girondists and Thermidians entirely dominant in the convention, 1795, 564
- Gohol, constitutional bishop of the department of Paris, abdicates, and is followed by many of his clergy, 872, ii; arrested, 411; tried and executed, 421, ii
- Godoy, Manuel, appointed minister of Spain, 218, ii; his character, 218, ii, n.
- Gohier appointed a director, 833; his proceedings in the events preceding the 18th Brumaire, 859—862; refusing to resign as director, is placed by Bonaparte under guard, 865
- Golden age of youth, 496, ii; see also Jeunesse dorée
- Goltz, baron, envoy at Bâle from Prussia to negotiate peace, 516, ii; he dies, 536
- Gordon, general, driven back with the Piedmontese by Kellermann, 246, ii
- Gorras joins the insurrectional committee, 115, ii
- the Girondist journalist, arrested, 224; his press destroyed by the mob, 230, ii; a fugitive in Normandy, 292
- Gouges, Olympe de, executed, 365
- Goujou, his speech against the accusation of Lecointre, 484, id. ii; arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559; condemned to death; stabs himself, 561
- Goupil, his speech against Mirabeau, 63, ii
- Goupilleau, of Fontenay, appointed one of the committee of general safety, 474, ii
- Government by commissions established in lieu of ministries, 423
- commissioners sent to replace the deputies on mission; their powers, 616
- committees re-organised; their several functions, 478, ii
- Gradisca surrenders, 704
- Grammonts, father and son, tried and executed, 421
- Grand-Maison tried, condemned, and executed, for the massacres at Nantes, 508, ii
- Graudmaison proposes an oath to the constitution of the Year III. on the 19th Brumaire, 866
- Grand-Pré, Dumouriez at, 151; attack on, 152; taken by the Prussians, 153

Grangeneuve, his proposed suicide, 115, ii
 Granville, attack on, by the Vendéans, 389, ii; the same abandoned, 390
 Grave, fortress of, captured, 513
 "Great Book of the Public Debt," institution of, and consolidation of the old national debt, 320—322; completed by the funding of life annuities, 441
 Grégoire, abbé, joins the commons, 13, ii
 — bishop of Blois, refuses to join in the abdication of Gobel, 373
 Grenello, powder mills at, blown up, 485, ii; camp at, attack upon, by the patriots, 651; many of the insurgents shot by a military commission, id. ii
 — section of, its aid on the 1st Prairial, Year III., 554, ii
 Grenoble, troubles at, 5, ii
 Grisons and the Valteline, disputes between, referred to Bonaparte, 759
 Groningen subdued, 514
 Grouchy wounded, and taken prisoner at Novi, 840, ii
 Grouvelle reads the decree of death to the king, 214, ii
 Grunet, his speech against the modification of the constitution, 84; attacks Dumouliéz in the assembly, 95, ii; his speech on Lafayette's letter, 98; letter to the king, 119, ii; carries a motion against the Jacobins in the assembly, 203; his speech in answer to the attack of Robespierre on the Girondists, 247, ii; his historical parallel of Pride's purge, 259, ii; proposes a new convention, 260; his speech on the decree for annulling the commission of twelve, 266; a fugitive in Normandy, 292
 Guadin defeats Rosenberg at Airolo, 855
 Gueldres abandoned to the French, 513
 Guiffroy denounces Lefebvre to the convention for his enclaves at Arras, 454, ii
 Guides, corps of, formed by Bonaparte, 638
 Guillaume, member of the insurrectional committee, 116, ii
 Guillotine, erected by Fouquier-Tinville in the hall of the revolutionary tribunal, 451, ii
 —, furies of, 497, ii
 Guipuscoa, province of, occupied by the French, 515
 Guithon, one of the committees of public welfare, 245
 Gusman promotes the insurrection of 10th March, 234; denounced as a moderatist; some account of him, 375, ii; 376; tried and executed, 417—420
 Gustavus III. of Sweden assassinated, 83, and n.
 Guyton-Morveau, one of the committees of public welfare, 298, ii

H.

Hague, treaty of peace between Holland and France signed at, 537, ii; terms of the same, id. ib. 538
 Hardenburg, count, succeeds baron Goltz at Bâle, 537
 Harvest, badness of, in 1788, 8, ii
 Hassenfratz, his influence in the war ministry of Pache, 190; he is sent before the military commission, 560
 Hébert, procurator-substitute of the commune of Paris, arrested, 268; sent to the Abbaye, id. ii; appears at the commune, and is crowned with a garland, 266, ii; his early history, 360; infamous treatment of the royal family in the temple, 359, ii; 360; places Louis XVII. under the care of Simon and his wife, 360; appears as a witness against the queen; the odious nature of his testimony, id. ii; 361; his evidence against the Girondists, 363; his violence against the moderatists, 375; his efforts at the Jacobins in favour of Ronsin and Vincent, 395; proposes the expulsion of Camille-Desmoulins, Philippeau, and others from the Jacobins, 398; his past life exposed by Camille-Desmoulins in the "Vieux Cordelier," 400, 401; he is arrested, 411; tried and executed, 412; his wife condemned and executed, 421, ii
 Hébertiste, insurrectionary movement attempted by, 409, 410; St. Just makes a report against them, 410, ii; 411; trial and execution of, 412
 Heddersdorf, defeat of the Austrians at, 711, ii

Hédouville proposed by Barras as president of the republic, 860, ii
 Helder, expedition to the, 841; all the advantages gained at the, given up, 855, ii
 Helpe, defeat at the, 435
 Helvetic republic, conduct of the French with regard to, 799; treaty between the two republics, id. ii
 Henriot, orders the firing of the alarm-gun, 269; proposed to be called before the convention, id. ii; his arrest moved by Billaud-Varennes, 467; endeavours to raise the people in favour of Robespierre, 468, ii; causes the last execution of the reign of terror to take place, id. ib.; orders Merlin to be arrested, and is himself secured and sent, with Robespierre and his associates, to the hall of the committee of general safety, 469; is released by Coffinhal, id. ii; he is outlawed; he points the guns against the convention, but is abandoned by the cannoniers, and flies to the commune, 470; he is thrown out of window by Coffinhal, 471; is executed, 472
 Hentz decreed to be arrested, and sent prisoner to Ham, 536, ii
 Hérault, department of, commences insurrection, 107, ii; raises an army and money to repress the insurrection in La Vendée, 256
 Hérault-Séchelles, his speech on the petitions in favour of Hébert, 268; one of the committees of public welfare, 303; account of him; he is arrested, 411, ii; 412, 413; tried and executed, 417—420
 Hercule, chef de bataillon, his services at Arcola, 676, ii
 Herman, president of the revolutionary tribunal, packs the jury for the trial of Danton, 417
 Hermann placed under arrest, 475
 Heron placed under arrest, 475; sent before the military commission, 560; liberated, 581
 Hertzberg, minister of Prussia; author of the Anglo-Prussian league, 51, ii
 Horvillo, M. de, stops the Swiss guards from firing on the mob, 129, ii; see also D'Hervilly
 Hessians commanded by general Schanfield at the siege of Mentz, 306
 Hocho, his services at the defence of Dunkirk, 331, ii; 332; his manœuvres in the Vosges, 333; he raises the blockade of Landau, 384; imprisoned, 434, ii; released, 475, ii; appointed to the command in Brittany, 503; his measures for tranquillizing La Vendée, 517; negotiates with the Vendean leaders, id. ii; 518; his services in Brittany, and good faith with his adversaries, 541, ii; his policy in pacification, 542; his indignant letter on the outrage on the body of Bois Hardi, 568; his measures for the preservation of Brittany, 571; entirely destroys the royalist army, assisted by the English under commodore Warren, 575, 576; attacks and carries by assault Fort Penhévère, 575, ii; 576; refers the fate of the Quiberon emigrants to Tallien and the committee of public welfare, 578; denies the assertion that a capitulation was made with the royalists at Quiberon, 578, ii; appointed to the command of the army of the West, 599, ii; defeats Charette at St. Cyr, 600; his efficient preparations to repulse the Isle-Dieu expedition, 607, ii; his plans for reducing the Vendéans, and his subsequent measures for ensuring the tranquillity of La Vendée, 609, 610; his rapid advancement, and polished manners, 617; placed at the head of the army of the coasts of the ocean, 621, ii; completes the pacification of La Vendée, 622—624; tenders his resignation, which is refused by the directory, 623; present of two horses sent to him; his scrupulous honesty, id. ii; proceeds to Brittany, and reduces it to submission; receives the compliment of the directory, 624, id. ii; his letter to the minister of police respecting Bonaparte, 647, ii; suggests an expedition to Ireland, 652; his design upon Ireland carried into effect, and its total failure, 679, ii; 680; his project with Truguet for injuring the power of England in India, 680; appointed to the command of the army of the Sambre and the Meuse, 683; pro-

- jects the formation of the Cluskenano republic, 699; his successes on the Rhine; defeats the Austrians at Fiedersdorf, 711, ii; his early career, and devotion to the republic, 731, ii; 732; appointed minister of the war department, 734, ii; arrives in Paris; Carnot questions him on the marching of the troops on Paris; returns to head quarters; his disgust at the conduct of Barras, 737; appointed to the command of the army of Germany, 754; he dies; is supposed to have been poisoned; he is buried in the Champ de Mars; his character, id. ii; 755
- Holland, war declared against, 220; entered by the French, 223, ii; its enmity to France, 1794, 431, ii; political state of, in Decenſuer, 1794, 510, 511; reflections on the conquest of, by the French, 510, ii; 511; terms of neutrality offered by, 512; is wholly overrun by the French, 513; enthusiastic reception of the French; states of, determine that no further opposition be offered to the French, 513, ii; conduct of the French in, after the stadtholder left, and their reception by the Dutch, 514, id. ii; treaty of peace with, signed; its terms, 537, ii; 538; ambassador from, arrives in Paris, 547, ii; desperate situation of that country in 1797, 697; conduct of the French in; the country is revolutionized, 771; expedition of the English and Russians against, 841; evacuated by the Anglo-Russian army, 855, ii; 856
- Hompesch, Ferdinand de, refuses to permit the French fleet to water at Malta, 783
- Hondschoot, battle of, 331, ii; 332
- Hood, admiral, his fleet in the Mediterranean, 286; his intercourse with the agents at Toulon, 320, ii; 329; takes possession of the place, 329, ii; prevents the departure of the deputation of Toulon to the count de Provence, 334; (lord Hood) reluctantly receives the people from Toulon on board his ships, 386
- Hostages' act, 337
- Hôtel de Ville, electors meet in, 18, ii; mob of armed women attack it, 89
- Hetzko killed at the passage of the Linth, 854, ii
- Honat, iso of, the remnant of the emigrant army from Quiberon put ashore on, by commodore Warren, 578
- Honard takes command in La Vendée, 325; his military services in Flanders, 331, 332; is put under arrest, 342; tried before the revolutionary tribunal, 348, ii; confined in the Conciergerie, 359; condemned and executed, 360, id. ii
- Howe, lord, engagement between, and the French under admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, 438, ii; 439
- Huguet, decree for his arrest; he is sent to Ham, 534, ii
- Hulling, 28
- Humbert, general, his interview with Bois-Hardi and Cormatin on the accommodation in La Vendée, 518; his asserted promises to the emigrant soldiers at Quiberon, 577; invades Ireland, 804; is defeated by general Cornwallis, and lays down his arms, id. n.; his services at Zurich, 854
- Hungary, war declared against, 89
- I.
- Imbert-Colomés elected deputy, 721
- Impartial club, 75, n.
- Imperative mandates, discussion on, in the national assembly, 17, ii; mandates, meaning of the term, id. ii, n.
- India, project of Hoche and Truguet for injuring the power of England in, 680
- Company, see East India Company
- Indulgents, their joy at the execution of the Hébertists, 413; their party become the Thermidorians after the end of the reign of terror, 483, ii
- Inquisitors appointed by the commune, 141, ii
- Institute of Egypt formed, 792, ii
- Insurrection, plans of the Girondists to prevent, 120; of 12th Germinal, Year III., events preceding, 520—531; events of that day, 532—534; of the patriots, 1st Prairial, Year III.; irruption of the mob into the hall of the convention, and murder of one of the representatives; events of that and succeeding days, 553, ii, 558; second attempt; they are besieged in the faubourg Saint-Antoine, and eventually disarmed, 558, ii; 559; of the sections of Paris against the decrees of 5th and 13th Fructidor, 585, 586; of 13th Vendémiaire, and events preceding, 586; of the faubourgs, 101; of August, 1792, and its preparations, 124, ii; 125—130; causes of, considered, 133, ii; 134; of 10th March, 1793, 232, 233; prelude to, in La Vendée, 238, ii; in Bocage, Marnis, and La Vendée, 253, 251; of 31st of May, 1793, particular circumstances of, 268; of 2nd of June, 1793, 274; of May 31; reflections on the events of, and on the conduct of the Girondist deputies, 277; against the convention becomes more general, 283; extends to the Vosges, Jura, Auvergne, and Cozère, 286; in La Vendée, further progress of, 287, ii; 288
- Insurrectional assemblage at the Marais, 259; 261
- committee appointed, 115; organizes a plan to seize the palace, id. ii; seeks occasion to justify insurrection, 114; account of the, 244
- Insurrectionary petitions of the sections presented to the convention, 248, ii
- Invasion of Belgium, 90
- Ireland, design of an expedition to, 652; Hoche's invasion of, attempted, and its failure, 679, ii; 680; invasion of, by the French under Humbert, 804
- Iron Chest, reading of the papers in the convention found in, 200, ii
- Isabeau subjects Bordeaux to military law, 357; his report on the events of 12th Germinal, Year III., 533, ii; 534
- Isle-Neu, expedition to, 599, ii; 600; English expedition in favour of the royalists appears in the bay of, 599, ii; further proceedings of; departure of the English squadron; and reflections on this last effort of the emigrants, 607, ii; 608
- Isnard, his speech on the subject of the emigrants, 80; demands a decree of accusation against the president of the fish-market section, 233, ii; president of the convention, relates a plot ascribed to Mr. Pitt, to arm one part of the people against the other, 280; his address to the deputation of the communes, 263, ii; voluntarily resigns his functions, 275; again takes his place in the convention, 528
- Italian States, policy of, in 1794, 431; their policy, 539
- Italy, condition of the several states of, before the campaign of Bonaparte in 1796, 620—631; Bonaparte's campaign in, 628—640; his conduct and policy considered, 640, ii; 641; state of the French army in, under Bonaparte, 669, ii; 670; completion of the conquest of, by Bonaparte, 684—687; partition of by the treaty of Léoben, 710; justification of the policy of that step, 711; collision of the new republics with the unrevolutionized portion of Italy and Europe, 772, 773
- J.
- Jacobin club, its violence, 50, ii; account of it, 75, n.; see further, Jacobins
- Jacobins collect a mob at the Champ de Mars; conflict with the military, 71, id. ii; their importance, 75, ii; oppose the war, 83; their place of meeting the principal rendezvous of the new revolutionists, after 10th August, 134; their silence during the September murders, 147; number of members of, returned to the convention, 159; hatred of the Girondists, 160; their head in the convention is Robespierre, 162; reproached in the convention as the authors of the disorganization of the country, 164; their flattering reception of Dumouriez, October, 1792, 172, ii; 173; power arrogated by the club, id. ib.; most of the members of the convention join it, id. ib.; harangue of Collet d'Herbois to Dumouriez at, 173; debate in, on Louvet's accusation against Robespierre, 177; their triumph at his successful defence, 180; call daily for the condemnation of the king, 180, ii; applaud the Belgic campaign, 183, ii; offended with Dumouriez, 187; their encroachments on the ministry, 190; their influence in the war-ministry of Pache; their want of it, with the army, 190; their favour to Pache and hatred of Roland, 197, ii; their debates on the trial of the king, 195; their alarm at the motion of Guadet; propose the circulation of Robespierre's speeches; their violent measures against the king, 203, ii; 204; declare their sittings permanent, 215, ii; their conduct after the death of the king, 216, 217; their agents spread through Belgium, 221, ii; they stop the prosecutions of the September murderers; their prevailing influence, 224; demand the impeachment of Roland; procure Pache to be nominated mayor of Paris, id. ii; violence of the women in the galleries of, 225; proposed union of, with the Girondists, 230, ii; obtain the executive power, and how, 239, ii; 240; threats of Dumouriez against, 240, ii; crown Marat with chaplets after his acquittal, 250; their alarm at the disorders in the departments, 257; further contests with the Cordeliers in the convention, 258, ii; appoint a committee of six, 266, ii; their final triumph over the Girondists, 275—277; cause the withdrawal of the petition of the Cordeliers against the constitution of 1793, 291; their regret at the loss of Marat, 296; meeting of the commissaries of the primary assemblies at, 314, 315; speeches at, in favour of a levy en masse, 317, 318; compose the principal staff of the revolutionary army, 340; obtain a decree forbidding the queen, duke of Orleans, and the Girondists to trial, 359, ii; purification of the club proposed by Robespierre, 377; Prou, Dubuisson, Percyrn, Desfieux expelled, id. ii; exclusion of all nobles, priests, bankers, and foreigners ordered, 379; present a petition in favour of Ronsin and Vincent, 395; proceedings against Phillippeau and Desmonlaine, 398; all other clubs abolished, 424; attend the convention to give thanks for the decree, acknowledging the existence of a Supreme Being, 428; their enthusiastic reception of Robespierre and Collot d'Herbois after the attempt of Legendre and Renault, 444; ruled by Robespierre; enormous power and influence of, 455, ii; 456; Dubois-Crance and Pouché of Nantes denounced at, by Couthon and Robespierre, and expelled, 456, ii; 457; agree to Couthon's petition to the convention, 462; enthusiastic reception by, of Robespierre on 8th Thermidor; Collot d'Herbois driven out by force, 465; the club purified, 480; "the young men's league" against, 486, id. ii; in the provinces, the refuge of the revolutionists, 496; extreme violence of, at Dijon, Lyons, Marseilles, and other places; their alarm at the turn of popular opinion against them, 495, ii; 496; violent debates at, on the decree for purifying the popular societies, 498, ii; debates in, on the abolition of affiliated and corresponding societies; their proposed means of evasion, 500; speeches at, in defence of Carrier, 504, ii; openly at variance with the convention, whose members are prevented from attending the club, 506; attacked by the "jeunesse dorée," id. 507; the club closed by decree, id. ii; reflections on the history and conduct of the club, id. 508; hall of the club cleared by the committees, 507; after the closing of the hall, join the electoral club, and the society at the section of Quinze-Vingts, 508; after being attacked by the "jeunesse dorée," carry about the bust of Marat in triumph, 521, ii; their inflammatory speeches against the government cause outrage, 525; their agitation on the inhabitants of Paris being put upon rations, 526, 527; attempt to rescue Barrere and his fellow-prisoners, 534, ii; disturbances committed by them in the provinces, 535; their new plot of 1st Floréal, Year III., 549; insurrection of, 1st Prairial, Year III., 553, ii; 558; second attempt; they are besieged in the faubourg Saint-Antoine, and eventually disarmed, 558, ii; 559; arrest in the convention of many of the deputies of this party on 1st Prairial, Year III., 557, ii; decrees of accusation passed against them, 559; their club finally overthrown, 559, ii; create disturbances at Toulon and Marseilles, 559, ii; 560; their discontent and temporary revival of the party, 615; the club revived; its numbers and violent harangues, 615, ii; they form a secret directory of public welfare; their conspiracy against the directory; the same discovered and the promoters apprehended, 619; their proceedings at Nantes and Angers; their clubs closed by Hoche, 622, ii; their designs against the government, 650, ii; their attack on the camp at Grenelle, 651; the remnant of the party meets at the Old Rile, and form anew the club, though contrary to law; its demands, 841, ii, 842; their meetings at the Old Rile forbidden, 842, ii; they meet at the Rue du Bac; their further meetings prohibited, 843

Jaffa captured; and murder of the prisoners at, 847

Jugot joins the intrigue against Robespierre, 446; removed from the committee of general safety, 474, ii; arrested, 560, ii

Jalles, camp at, formed, 60, ii

Javognes, proceedings commenced against, 560, ii

Jemmapes, battle of, 182, ii, 183; joy of France at the victory of; Marat's comments on the victory of, id. ii

Jersey, the dépôt for French emigrant troops collected for the Quiberon expedition, 568, ii

Jesus, companies of, at Lyons, 548, ii; their massacre of the patriots in the prisons of Lyons, 549, ii; re-appear at Lyons and other places, 564

"Jeunesse dorée," attack of, on the Jacobin club, 506, ii; destroy the bust of Marat at the theatres, and attack the Jacobins, 521, ii; their attack on the patriots in the faubourg Saint-Antoine, 559, ii; their quarrels with the officers of the regular troops, 743, ii

Johannot proposes the formation of a bank, 551; proposes a return to metals as a measure of value, 552

Jonini, his history of the wars of the revolution referred to, 482

Joseph II., emperor of Austria, dies, 51

Joubert killed at Cassarin, 626, ii

— his services at Rivoli, 685, 686; Bonaparte's confidence in him, 702, ii; 704; beats Landolin and Kerpen, and clears the Tyrol, 704, ii; takes part in the fête given by the directory, 766; sent to command the army of Holland, 771; takes possession of the citadel of Turin, 800; appointed to the command at Naples; he resigns, 810; appointed general of the 17th military division of Paris, 831; appointed to the command of the army of Italy, 836; is defeated and slain at the battle of Novi, 839, 840

Jourdan appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the North, 842; commands the army of the Moselle, 435; his services at the battle of Fleurus, 459, 460; takes Bois le Duc and Cologne, 491; his just share in the credit of the conquest of Holland pointed out, 514; passes the Rhine, 579, ii; 643; takes Wurtzburg and Frankfort, 646, ii; returns to the Maine; is beaten at the battle of Wurtzburg, and retreats to Armstoin, 663, ii; 664; resigns his command, 681; elected deputy, 721; his report on the law of conscription, 803, ii; appointed to the command of the army of the Danube, 812, ii; defeated at Pfaffendorf, 814; and at Stokach, 815; elected a deputy, 822, ii; proposes a motion that "the country is in danger;" the same is negatived, 844

— of Aubagne quarrels with Talot in the council of five hundred, 614

Jourdeuil, member of the committee of surveillance, 142, ii

"Journal des Hommes Libres," its extreme violence, 842, 843

— of the Republic," effect of a paragraph in, as to the general scarcity of 1793, 226; a second paragraph in, 227

Journals of the several parties after the accession of the directory enumerated, 605, ii; the proprietors and editors of forty-two banished, 751, ii; extreme violence of; measures taken to repress it; eleven editors arrested, 842, 843

 Journaix saved from death by his courage, 146
 Judges appointed by popular choice, 54, ii
 Judicial organization, 54, ii
 Juigné, archbishop of Paris, joins the national assembly, 16, ii
 Julien of Toulouse, his stock-jobbing transactions; and conspiracy with De Balz, 213, ii; particulars of the same, 368, ii; 369; abdicates his title of Protestant minister, 372, ii; 373; his speculation discovered; he is denounced as a moderate, 375; escapes after the order for his arrest, 381, ii
 Juliers evacuated, 491
 July 12, 13, and 14, 1789, events of, 20—23; 14th, anniversary of, 55, 56; 53d anniversary of, 114
 June 2nd, 1793, insurrection of, 274; 29th, 1793, events of, 100, 101; events subsequent to, 104, 105
 Junot, his services at the battle of Lonato; he is wounded, 656, ii; sent by Bonaparte with a letter to the senate of Venice, 708; reads Bonaparte's letter to the senate; threatens to post up a declaration of war, 712; id. ii; attacks Abdallah; and kills back, 847, ii
 Jura, revolt against the convention extends to, 206; partially tranquillized, 294, ii
 Jurats, abolished, 30
 Juris, the institution of, demanded by Barrère; their institution agreed to, 231, ii; how to be chosen, 233
 Justice, uniformity in the administration of, 54, ii; important decrees for the administration of, passed after the reign of terror, 520
 Justiniani, Leopold, deputed by Venice to Bonaparte, 712, ii

K.

Kalkreuth commands at the siege of Metz, 265, ii
 Kayserlautern, success of the Prussians at, 491, ii
 Kohl besieged by the archduke Charles, 681; surrenders, 682, ii
 Kollermann succeeds to the command of the army of Luckner, 139; his military oversights, 170; recalled, 188, ii; quits the siege of Lyons, appointing Dumy his deputy, 345; drives back the Piedmontese under the duke of Montferrat, 346, ii; is superseded by general Doppet, 347
 Kont, alleged expression of the labourers of, made the ground by Pitt of stringent measures, 329
 Kersaint, his speech in the convention on the murders in the provinces, 163, ii; his speech on the proposed banishment of the duke of Orleans, 205; resigns, and sends a letter to the convention on the execution of the king, 214
 Kervelegan one of the commission of twelve, 261; a fugitive in Normandy, 292; wounded in the convention, 1st Prairial, Year III., 557
 Kilmarno, his masterly retreat at Caesar's camp, 316; recalled from La Vendée, 325; set at liberty, 475, ii; his precautions to prevent the peasantry in the Venetian States rising against the French or the revolutionists, 706, 707; takes possession of Verona after the massacre of the French, 714
 Kléber aids in the defence of Metz, 285, ii; commands the troops in defending it, 306, ii; proceeds to La Vendée, 325; his successes there, and reflections on the state of that country, 335, ii; 336; his moderation at Cholet and elsewhere in the Vendean war, 355; opposes the destruction of the country, 355; refuses the chief command against the Vendéans, 388, ii; his wise advice in the campaign against the Vendéans, 391, ii; causes the entire destruction of them, 392; his friendship for Marceau, 392; his opinions thwarted by the representatives; unsuccessful attempts to pass the Sambre, 436, ii; his achievement at the battle of Fleurus, 459, 460; commences the siege of Mentz, 492; his services at the passage of the Rhine, 643; a candidate for the directory, 723; joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii; his services at the battle of Pondi, 847, ii; 848; his admission of Bonaparte, 849; 851; is left to command the army in Egypt, 851, ii

 Klenau sent by Wurmser to treat with Bonaparte at the siege of Mantua, 687, ii
 Klundert taken, 223, ii
 Kock arrested, 411; tried and executed, 412
 Kiny repeatedly defeated by Hoche, 711, ii

L.

Labarolière defeated at Chatillon, 305
 L'Abbaye, suspected persons imprisoned at, 358
 Labourdonnaye, his conduct at Tournay, 105, ii; he enters Antwerp, 187, ii; advances into La Vendée, 238, ii
 Lacaze tried and condemned, 362—364; executed, 365
 Lacombe, her speech at l'Évêché, 267
 La Corona forced by the Austrians, 655
 Lacoste, minister of marine, 86, ii; proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
 Lacroix, a commissary to Belgium, 188, ii; persuades Dumouriez to withdraw his letter to the convention, 237, ii; 238; arrested, and sent to the Luxembourg, 415; id. ii; tried and executed, 417—420
 ——— d'Eure-et-Loire, one of the committee of public welfare, 245
 ———, Charles, one of the clerks of the council of the ancients, 595; minister of foreign affairs under the directory, 597, ii
 La Crosse, his brave defence of his ship in the expedition to Bantry Bay, 680
 Admiral attempts the assassination of Collet d'Herbois; some account of him, 442, ii; 443
 Lafayette, marquis de, 15, ii; proclaimed commandant of the national guard, 24, ii; character, &c. of, 25, ii; 26; resigns, and resumes the command of the national guard, 27; arrives at Versailles with the body guard, 41; proposes martial law, 44; with Bailly forms the club of '89, or Feuillans, 50, ii; his speech on the combined insurrection, 51, ii; appointed chief of the federation, 55, ii; disagrees with the Lameths, 62, ii; their enmity to him, 62, ii; his motives misrepresented by Mirabeau, 63; ignorant of the king's intended escape, 65; accused of conniving at it, 66; takes measures to bring the king back, 66, ii; proposes a general pardon, 72, ii; resigns all his commands, 76; appointed a field marshal of the army, 81; appointed to the army of the centre, 82, ii; proceeds towards Belgium, 90; is obliged to halt, id. ii; he endeavours to save the king, 86; his letter to the assembly, 97, ii; his unpopularity, 90, ii; arrives in Paris, and justifies his letter, 105, 106; visits the palace; is coldly received, and retires, id. ii; quits Paris, 107; proposals for the king's safety, 118, ii; proposes his flight, 114; offers to aid his escape, 124; proposed impeachment of, id. ii; his unpopularity, id. ii; acts in opposition to the new government, and is declared a traitor, 137; quits the army, but is arrested by the outposts of the Austrians, 138; his treatment, id. ii; he is enlarged from the prison of Olmütz on the treaty of Campo-Formio, 762
 Laflotte betrays Dillon, 419
 Lafond, his proceedings in the insurrection of 13th Vendémiaire, 588, 589; apprehended, and condemned, 590, ii
 "La Force," murder of the Swiss soldiers in, 145, ii; murder of the princess de Lamballe at, 148, ii; suspected persons imprisoned in, 358
 Laharpe, his harangues on philosophy and liberty, and against anarchy and terror, at the Lyceum, 519; id. ii; notice of him, 625; repulsed at Voltri, 626; killed, 632, ii
 ———, colonel, appointed a director of the Helvetic republic, 799, ii
 Lahoz carries the bridge of Senio, 700
 Laignelot apprehended, 620
 Lajard appointed a minister, 96

- La Jaumaye, conferences at, for the pacification of La Vendée, 539, ii; 540; secret article of the treaty of, denied by Charette before his death, 623, ii
- Lallemand, his correspondence with the Venetian government, 706
- Lally-Tolendal, 15; his proposition relative to free circulation, 18, ii; meditates establishing the English constitution, 19, ii; eulogizes Necker, 21, ii; his speech; is crowned with flowers, 24; proposes that the king should be styled, "Restorer of French liberty," 30; his loss of popularity, 44
- Lalot nominated member of the committee of public welfare, 474, ii
- Lamarche, retreats to Cesar's camp, 284, ii; ordered to be put on his trial, 326
- Lamarque sent to arrest Dumouiez, 241; he is made prisoner, 242; on his return from captivity in Austria takes his seat, 614, ii
- Lamballe, princess de, murdered, 143, ii
- Lambese, prince of, clears the garden of the Tuileries, 20, ii
- Lambrechts appointed minister of justice, 753, ii; resigns, 836
- Lambrusart, engagement at, and retreat of the Austrians, 459, ii; 460
- Lameth, Alexander, 15; 28; questions the right of the king to make peace and war, 52
 Charles, 15; 28; his speech against the priests, 49; he and his brother rule the Jacobin club, 50, ii; their name in the Red Book; compelled to refund, 54; they endeavour to save the throne, 68, ii; leave the Jacobins and join the Feuillans, 75, ii
- Lamoignon, keeper of the seals, 3; his scheme to humble the parliament, 5
- Lamourette, his address to the assembly on its dissensions, 111, ii; 112
- Land and timber tax carried, 3, ii; registered, 4; abandoned, id. ii
- Landau, blockade of, raised by Hoche, 384
- Landrecies, blockade of, 435; and operations before, id. ii; recaptured, 460, ii; surrender of the republicans, 488, ii
- Langara, admiral, his fleet in the Mediterranean, 286; receives the people of Toulon on board his ship, 386
- Langier killed at St. Jean d'Acre, 847, ii
- Langrelet, meetings of the patriots at the house of, 549
- Langjuinais, his speech on the proposed banishment of the Bourbons, 204, ii; his speech in favour of the king after his defence, 207; opposes the decree for annulling the commission of twelve, 265, ii; his courageous behaviour in the convention, 274, ii; 275; one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii; his expression concerning "the massacre" of 18th Vendémiaire, 592; he is denounced by Tallien, id. ii; one of the clerks of the council of the ancients, 595
- Lannes made colonel by Bonaparte on the field of battle, 627; commands the advanced guard at the passage of the Po, 632, ii; disperses insurgents at Binasco, 636; wounded at Arcola, 675; fords the Senio, 700; joins the Egyptian expedition, 700, ii; wounded at St. Jean d'Acre, 848, ii; his services at the battle of Aboukir, 850, 851; quits Egypt with Bonaparte, 851, ii
- Latot, his arrest decreed, 581, ii
- Lanusso, his services at the battle of Aboukir, 850
- Lapallus tried and executed, 421
- Laplanche, his speech to the Jacobins on his revolutionary exactions, 356; his arrest decreed, 581, ii
- Laporte, M. de, communicates to the assembly the motives of the king's departure, 66, ii; executed, 140, ii
- Lapoype, his attack on Fort Faron at the siege of Toulon, 385, ii
- Laqueuille impeached, 84
- Larévillière-Lepaux takes his place in the convention, 526; one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii; president of the council of the ancients, 595; elected one of the original five directors; his services and fitness discussed, 595, 596; his character, 690, ii; his religious opinions, 691; his reproof of Bonaparte when he speaks of resigning his command, 779, and z.; remarks on his character and habits, 822; resigns his place in the directory, and retires to Andilly, 834; Larivière impeached, 91, ii
 Henry, one of the commission of twelve, 261; his speech on the liberation of Hébert, 265; again takes his place in the convention, 526; his proposal for re-organizing the national guard, 736, ii; banished, 751, ii
- La Roberie, aide-de-camp to Charette, his mission to England, 517, ii
- Larochehoucauld, cardinal de, calls on the king to defend the rights of the clergy, 14 duke de, 15 see Delarochehoucauld, also Rochehoucauld
- Larochejacquelin, M. de, chosen one of the Vendean leaders, 255; attacks and captures Fontenay, 287, ii, extent of his military command, 335, ii; chief commander of the Vendéens, 389; having died, his command divided, 492, ii
- Larrey joins the Egyptian expedition, 789, ii
- Laselle, his services, 686, ii
- Lasource appointed a secretary to the convention, 162; his attack on Robespierre in the convention, 164; tried before the revolutionary tribunal, 362, ii, condemned, 364, ii; and executed, 365
- Lasouski heads a mob to destroy the press of Gorsas, 230, ii; promotes the insurrection of 10th March, 234
- Latour du Pin, retires from the ministry, 59; appears as a witness against the queen, 360, ii; nature of his evidence, 361
 Maubourg, deputed to bring the king back to Paris, 68 general, defeated at Rastadt, 644, ii; 645; defeated by Moreau at Biberach, 665
- Langier, killed at Lido, 714; his crew murdered, id.
- La Union, count de la, commander of the Spanish army defeated at Boulou, 483, ii
- Lavalette sent to Genoa to demand the release of French prisoners, 718, ii; Bonaparte's letter concerning Angereau and Carnot, 736, ii; his correspondence with Bonaparte; is threatened by Barras and Angereau; sets out for Italy, 753, ii
- La Vendée, prelude to the insurrection in, 239, ii; description of, 252; the habits and manners of the inhabitants, and the causes which induced civil war against the revolution, 253; progress of the war in, 287, ii; 288; retrospect of the war in, up to July, 1793, 288; council of government of, appointed, 288, ii; successes of the royalists in, 289; continuation of the war in, under Westermann, 304—306; state of, at the end of July, 1793, 306; resumption of the war of extermination in, by the republican armies, 324; continuation of the same, 334, ii; 336; proposed division of, into four military districts under four leaders, 335, ii; the armies ordered to conquer it before 20th October, 342; continuation of the war in Upper Vendée, 352; Westermann attacks Chatillon, 353; termination of the war in, 438; state of, in 1794; continuation of the war, 492, ii; 493; the commissioners of extermination recalled; Vinieux appointed to the command in, 503; a decree of amnesty passed for, 512, ii; state of, at the end of 1794, and beginning of 1795, 516; measures taken by Hoche, 1795, for tranquillizing, 517; negotiations for, continued, 539, 540; notice of the alleged secret article in the treaty of peace with, 544, ii; state of, and proceedings of the royalists in, after the pacification, 566, ii; 567; schemes of the English upon, in favour of the royalists, 568; resumption of hostilities in, 599; royalist expedition to, assisted by the English, 599, ii; further account of the Isle-Dieu expedition; departure of the English squadron; reflections on the last attempt of the emigrants, 607, ii; 608; the plan of Hoche for the reduction, and for ensuring the tranquillity of, 609, 610; pacification of, completed by Hoche, 622—624

- Lavicomterie removed from the committee of general safety, 474, ii; arrested, 560, ii
- Laville-Honnais, his intrigues with the French princes, 494, ii; one of the royal committee, 619; his intrigues as royalist agent, 693, ii; 695; he is arrested, tried, and condemned to death, but imprisoned, 696; banished, 751, ii
- Lavoisier condemned by the revolutionary tribunal, 442
- Law, primary and normal schools of, established after the reign of terror, 519, ii; important alterations in the several branches of, made after the reign of terror, 520
- Lazzaroni, their outrages at Naples, 807; their brave defence against the French, id. ii
- Learned societies re-opened after the reign of terror, 519, ii
- Lébas, decree of accusation passed against him by the convention, 468; sent prisoner to the common goal of the department; refused admittance and carried to the Mairie, 469, ii; shoots himself, 471
- Lebessé, member of the insurrectional committee, 115 ii
- Lebon, Joseph, his mission to the North, and sanguinary executions at Arras, Cambury, and other places; and some account of him, 454; id. ii; is denounced by Guffroy to the convention; he is called before the committee of public welfare; exonerated and sent back to Arras to continue his services to the republic, 454, ii; 455; denounced, 474, ii; his arrest decreed, 475; trial of, demanded, 503, ii; proceedings commenced against, 581, ii
- Le Brun, minister of foreign affairs, 132; entrusted provisionally with the war department, 168, ii; characteristics and opinions of, at the time of the king's trial, 190, ii; the Jacobins demand his impeachment, 224, ii; order for his arrest; he eludes it, 278
- Lecarpentier arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559
- Leclerc appointed to the command of the army of the West, 342
- Leclerc opposes the constitution of 1793; is expelled from the Cordeliers, 291; tried and executed, 412
- general, his services at Rivoli, 606, ii; clears the hall of the council of five hundred, 607
- Leconte appears as a witness against the queen, 360, ii
- the younger, arrested by Dumouriez, 241, ii
- of Versailles, opposes the law of 22nd Prairial, 448; he and others join in an intrigue against Robespierre, 456, ii; charges the old committees of being accomplices of Robespierre, and presents twenty-six articles against them, 484; they are declared scandalous, 495; decreed to be arrested, and sent prisoner to Ham, 536
- Lecourbe gains possession of St. Gothard, 838, ii; passes the Reuss, 855
- Lefebvre appointed to the command of Paris, 843
- Lefebvre, his arrest decreed, 581, ii
- Lefort, member of the committee of surveillance, 142, ii
- Legendre, his influence with the populace, 98, ii; his behaviour at the Tuilleries, 103; elected to the convention, 159, ii; his speech at the Jacobins on Louvet's accusation against Robespierre, 177; moves the consideration of the question for the trial of the king, 199, ii; his proposed reception of the king at his trial, 201, ii; opposes the violence of Varlet at the Cordeliers, 262; his threat against Lanjumein in the convention, 266; supports a petition against the constitution of 1793, 291; accused of being a "moderate;" his defence, 300, ii; 301; opposes the petition of Vincent, 338; his injudicious defence of the moderatists, 415; his address to the convention that Danton and others may be heard at the bar, 415, ii; exculpates himself at the Jacobins, 422; he wholly submits to the committee of public welfare, id. ii; his speech at the Jacobins after the attempt of Admiral, 444; id. ii; appointed member of the committee of general safety, 474, ii; denounces Fouquier-Tinville, 474, ii; locks up the hall of the Jacobins, 480; his exertions to deliver the convention 1st Prairial, Year III., 656, ii; his speech on the second attempt, 1st Prairial, Year III., 558, ii; denounces madame de Staël, 581
- Leghorn taken by the English, 640; English factory at, seized by Bonaparte; and the town garrisoned by French troops, 641, ii; discontent at, 653
- Legislative assembly, composition of, 74; comparison between it and the late assembly, id. ii; abolishes the titles of Sire and Majesty, 76, ii; decrees for same revoked, id. ib.; orders the return of Monsieur or deprives him of the regency, 78; veto of the king debated, id.; commotion in, on the king's favouring the clergy on the second non-jurors' bill, 79; three armies appointed, 83, ii; abolishes the ceremony of new year's day, id. ib.; in its communications with the king, suppresses the titles of Sire and Majesty, id. ib.; impeaches Monsieur, the count d'Artois, and others, 84; impeaches Delessart, 85; foreign powers make demands against, 88; declares war with the king of Hungary and Bohemia, 89; declares itself permanent, 92; impeaches the duke de Brissac, id.; debates in, on Lafayette's letter, 97, ii; 98; visit of the insurrectionary faubourgs to, 101, ii; their answer to the petition of the faubourgs, 101, ii; 102; alarm at the outrages of 20th June, 104; discussions on the subject, 106; issues a proclamation, 105; passes a decree in favour of the court, 107, ii; decrees the disbanding and re-election of the staffs of the national guard, id. ib.; refers the causes of alarm to the committee of public safety, 108, ii; decrees declaring the country in danger, 111, ii; the same not subject to the king's sanction, id. ib.; a reconciliation of parties takes place, 112; declares the country in danger, 118; orders the departure of all regiments out of Paris, 115; declares the sections of Paris permanent, 123, ii; proposal of dethronement discussed, id. ib.; justifies the conduct of Lafayette, 124, ii; speeches in, against the king, 125; invaded on 10th August, 129; provisionally dethrone the king and convokes a national convention, 130, ii; the government divided between the assembly and commune, 131; orders the formation of the camp near Paris, 132; intimidated by the commune, 136; agree to an extraordinary criminal tribunal, id. ii; passes a decree in consequence of the capitulation of Longwy, 141, ii; demands from the commune an account of the state of Paris, 147, ii; 148; dissolved, 162
- committee, 244, ii
- Legrand proposes that the title of National Assembly should be assumed by the tiers état, 13, ii
- Lehardi demands the arrest of Robert Lindet, 557, ii; tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
- Lejeune, proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
- Le Louroux, insurrection in, 252, ii
- Lemaître, his intrigues with the French princes, 494, ii; apprehended, 591; condemned to death, 605
- Lemanic republic formed, 775, ii
- Lenarais, his bravery at La Pietra and Rovepedo, 661, ii
- Leancier denounced, 729, ii
- Lenfant, member of the committee of surveillance, 142, ii
- Lenoir-Laroche appointed minister of police, 734, ii
- Léoben, preliminaries for a peace with the emperor Francis II. signed at, 709; particulars of the treaty, 710
- Leopold, emperor of Austria, accession of, 51; his pacific designs, id. ii; promises troops for the restoration, 65, ii; his appeal to the potentates of Europe, 69, ii; his object in negotiating, 82; dies, 88
- Lepelletier, Felix, joins the Jacobins at the Old Ride, 841, ii
- Saint-Fargeau, assassination of, 215, ii; busts of, replace the statues of the Virgin in the streets, 372; bust of, carried at the festival of Reason, 373, ii;

- his bust removed from the hall of the convention, 522
- Lepelletier, section of, its services on 1st Prairial, Year III., 556; section of, its resolute defiance of general Monou and the convention, 587; id. ii
- Lequen de Kerendal, advocates the abolition of feudal rights, 29, ii
- Le Quesney surrendered to the prince of Coburg, 332, ii; recaptured, 460, ii; surrender of, 488, ii
- Lequinto, his arrest decreed, 581, ii
- Lesage-Senault decreed to be arrested and sent prisoner to Ham, 536; one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii
- Leschelle, his cowardice before Laval, 388; he is suspended; retires to Nantes, and dies, id. ii
- Lescure, the family of, detained at Bressuire, but set at liberty by the Vendéans, 255; M. de, joins the insurrection, id. ii; his proclamation to the Vendéans, 287, ii; attacks and takes Fontenay, 287, ii; is wounded, 293; extent of his military command in La Vendée, 335, ii; is mortally wounded, 355; though wounded is carried with the army, 369
- Letestier Bauvais tied and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
- Létourneur elected one of the original five directors; his services and fitness discussed, 595, 596; his character; his esteem for Carnot, 690, ii; retires from the directory by lot, 723, ii; appointed minister of the interior, 753, ii; his character, id. ib.
- Letter-box of truth, 373, ii
- "Lettre à Dillon," published by Camille-Desmoulins, 301
- "Lettres-de-cachot," act against, 4, ii
- Letourcq killed at Aboukir, 850, ii
- Lévassour decreed to be arrested and sent prisoner to Ham, 536, ii
- L'Évêché, popular meeting at the society of, 245; association of, having been dissolved, is renewed, 257, ii; further meetings at, 266; women appear at, and are represented in the meetings held at, id.; swear to respect property, 267; sections meet at, and form themselves into the republican union, 268; resolves on the insurrection of June 2nd, 1793, 273; visit of the commissaries of the primary assemblies to, 313, ii; meetings of the old Cordeliers continue to be held at, after the end of the reign of terror, 480; the electoral club ejected from, 499
- Lévy en masse, prelude to the, 317, ii; decree of the national convention for the purpose, and the mode of enforcing its execution, id. 313, 319
- Rhmond re-instated, 606
- L'Huillier, his address to the convention, 271, ii
- Liancourt, duke de, 15; his interview with the king, 23, ii; his efforts for the king's safety, 119; offers his whole fortune for the king's use, id.
- Monsieur de, elected president of the national assembly, 25
- Liberty, statue of, unveiled by the president of the convention, 317
- of the press contended for in the convention, 479, id. ii
- Lido, attack on a French ship in the port of, 714
- Liege entered by Dumouriez, 187, ii; united to France, 221, ii
- Liautaud, his efforts in favour of royalty, 118, ii
- Life annuities, funding of, 441, ii
- Life-guards, entertainment given by the officers of, at Versailles, 38
- Ligneville commands the army of the Moselle; his over-sights, 285
- Ligurian state formed, 759; republic, its proceedings in 1798, 711, ii; commotions in, 800
- Lille bombarded by the Austrians, 169; conferences at, on the subject of peace with England, 720, ii; conferences at, between the republic and England, 740, ii; 741; the same abruptly terminated, 757
- Count de, see Louis XVIII.
- Limmat, passage of the, 853, 854
- Lindot, Robert, his reception at Lyons, 283, ii; one of the committee of public welfare, 298, ii; he is re-instated, 303; his report on the state of France, 487; his speech in the convention on the accusation against Barrère and others, 530; his arrest demanded in the convention, 557, ii; denounced, 560, ii; appointed minister of finance, 836; obtains temporary assistance from bankers to meet the public wants, 837, ii
- Lit do justice, meaning of the term, 1, n. ii; one held 1787, 4, 5; ii, again on May 23d, 1789, 15, ii, 16; "Little Corporal," name given to Bonaparte at Lodi, 633, ii
- Little Gibraltar, Fort Eguillette at Toulon, so called, 384, 385; the suggestion of Bonaparte concerning, at the siege, 385
- Loan of money forced by the commune of Paris, 256, ii
- Loano, battle of, 606, 607
- Loans forced; further ones decreed, 258
- Lodi, town of, captured by Bonaparte and the bridge passed, 633; id. ii
- Loire, drowning of the Vendéans and Nantais in the, 453, ii
- Loizerolles executed for his son by the revolutionary tribunal, 452
- Lombardy, state of in 1796, 630, ii
- Lonato, defeat of the Austrians at, 655, ii
- Longwy taken by the Prussians, 139, ii
- Loretto entered by the French; statue of the Virgin sent to Paris, 700, ii
- Loseau calls for the accusation against Robespierre, 467, ii
- Lottery proposed; establishment of, 551
- of St. Guilloine, 452, ii
- Louchet demands a warrant of arrest against Robespierre, 467, ii
- Loudun taken by the Vendéans, 287
- Louis XIV., proposed destruction of the statue of, 55
- XVI., accession of, 2; weakness of his character, 7; his speech on opening the states general, 10, ii; invites the three orders to confer together, 12; his speech in the states general, 15; his answer to the deputations for the national assembly, 22, ii; goes with his brothers to the assembly, 24; visits Paris, 24, ii; orders the return of Neckar, 25; dismisses his ministers, id.; entitled "the restorer of French liberty," 31; his person declared inviolable, 35, ii; partially grants the promulgation of the articles abolishing feudal rights, tithes, &c., 36; present at the entertainment given by the life-guards at Versailles, 38, ii; partially accepts the declaration of rights, 39, ii; female deputies of the mob introduced to him, 40, ii; accepts the declaration of rights, 40, ii; is removed to Paris with his family, 42; attends the assembly and receives its thanks, 46, ii; promises to maintain the constitution, id. ib.; his right to make peace and war debated, 53; conferred on him and the assembly conjointly, 53; writes to the pope in favour of the civil constitution of the clergy, 55; agrees to the abolition of hereditary titles, id. ii; takes the oath of the federation, 56; his horror of civil war, 59; resolves on flight, 63; insulted on his way to St. Cloud, 65; complains to the assembly, id. ii; flight of, with his family, 66; stopped and brought back to Paris, 67, 68; he is suspended from his functions, 68, ii; restrained of his liberty, id. ib.; his person declared inviolable, 70, ii; his restoration decreed, 71; accepts the constitution, and is restored to liberty, 73; refuses the advice of the Lametins and others, 74, ii; attends the legislative assembly, 76, ii; meditates foreign aid, id. ib.; his dread of civil war, 77; endeavours to recall the emigrants, id. ii; refuses his assent to the bill depriving Monsieur of the regency, 78; publishes a proclamation to the emigrants, id. ii; writes to his brothers to return, id. ib.; refuses his assent to the second non-jurors' bill, 79; goes to the legislative assembly, and speaks on the subject of the emigrants, 81; signifies his veto to the act against the clergy, 81; addresses the assembly on the war against Hungary, 89; his sincerity suspected by the assembly, 92; refuses to sanction a new act against the clergy, 96; his reproach on Dumouriez, id.; his dejection, id.; his motives for applying to foreign powers, id.; is attacked by a mob in the Tuileries; receives a petition and wears the red cap, 101—103; his reply to Pétion, 103, ii; issues a proclamation, 104, ii; visits the assembly on the reconciliation of parties, 112; alarmed by threatening petitions, 113, ii; his fears of assassination, id. ib.; attends the third anniversary of the federation, 114; advised to abdicate, 119; his flight to Normandy determined on, id.; plans for his escape, id.; his dethronement proposed, 123, ii; plans for his escape; he refuses the attempt, 124; reviews the troops on 10th August, 128; retires to the assembly, id.; provisionally dethroned, 130, ii; is detained at the assembly, 132, ii; is transferred with his family under guard to the Luxembourg, 133; transferred to the Temple, 135, ii; debates on his condemnation, 180, ii; 181; his private and domestic life while in the Temple, 191; his treatment there, id.; 192; his trial decided on by the convention, 200; he is summoned before it, 201; he is conducted thither, id. 201; his conduct there during the reading of the charges against him, 202; he demands a copy of the charges, and to be allowed counsel to defend him, which are allowed, id. ii; he begs permission to see his family, which is refused, id. ib.; accepts the services of Tronchet and Malesherbes as his counsel, id. ib.; his negotiation during his captivity, 203; his trial is hastened on by the Jacobins, 204; adjourned, 205; resumed, id.; the speech of Desèze, 206; his conduct at the trial, 206, ii; receives the news of his intended execution, 214, ii; asks for three days' delay, which is refused, id. ib.; appoints his confessor, id. ib.; interview between him and his family, 215; hears mass, id.; his last moments, id. ii; 216; and death, id. ii; fête instituted and celebrated to commemorate his death; condition of his children after the end of the reign of terror, 512; his daughter delivered to Austria in exchange for the deputies betrayed by Dumouriez, 605

XVII., his elevation to the throne suspected, 284; alleged conspiracy to seat him on the throne, 301; placed by Hébert under the charge of Simon and his wife to receive a sans-culotte education, 360; dies, 566, ii

XVIII., accession of, on the death of the son of Louis XVI., 366, ii; ordered to quit Verona, 631; bears the title of Count de Lille; he is shot at; required to quit the Venetian territory; retires to Blankenburg, 693

— (of the Bas Rhin) joins the intrigue against Robespierre, 446

Louvet opposed by Robespierre, 86, ii; editor of "The Sentinel," 99; supports Brissot, 160; accuses Robespierre of seeking sole dominion, 175—177; causes of his hatred of Robespierre, 175, ii; 176; his suspicions of the duke of Orleans, 204, ii; warned by his wife of his danger; warns his friends, 232, ii; a fugitive in Normandy, 292; again takes his place in the convention, 520; his speech against royalty, 550; his panegyric on Féraud, 560, ii; one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii

Lozère, submission of thirty thousand rebels in the department of, 293, ii

Luçon, various successes of the Vendean republicans before, 329, ii; 330

Luckner appointed a field marshal of the army, 81; proposed assistance of, to the king, 113, ii; joins the new order of things, 136, ii; appointed generalissimo, 139

L'Unité, tower of, the place where the only bell was to be, 527

Lusignan taken prisoner at Rivoli, 696

Lux, Adam, executed, 365

Luxembourg, surrender of, 565; the king and his family confined at, 133; made a prison for suspected persons, 358

— due de, calls on the king to defend the rights of the nobility, 14; his speech on joining the national assembly, 17

Luzerne, M. de, reported dismissal of, 20, ii

Lycæum re-opened after the reign of terror, 519

Lyons, intrigues of the emigrants at, 61; central club and Mountaineers of, 251, ii; insurrectionary movements at, 267, ii; violent proceedings of the sections at, 279, ii; 280; federalist oath taken at, 283, ii; refuses to yield implicit obedience to the convention, 294, ii; rebellion of, against the convention, 309, ii; bombarded by the republicans under Dubois-Chancé, 328; continuation of the siege and final reduction of, by the republicans, 345—347; decree of extermination pronounced against, by the convention, 348; its name decreed to be altered to that of "Commune Affranchie," 348, ii; proscription at, 357; the same removed; restored to its name and privileges, 503; massacre of patriots in the prisons of, 549, ii; decree passed for the disarming of, 564

Lys, engagement of the, 436, ii

M.

Mardonald, general, repulses Mack at Civita Castellana, 806; succeeds Championnet at Naples, 812, ii; his proceedings in Moreau's retreat, 828; fights the battle of Trebbia, and retreats beyond the Apennines, 829, 830

Macheroul, resistance of the recruiting at, 254; taken by Gaston, 254; seized by Charlotte, 292, ii

Mack, colonel, his interview with Dumouriez, 237; armistice agreed on between them, 238; prepares plans of warfare at London against France, 431, ii; repulsed at Civita Castellana, 806; his danger from the troops of Naples; seeks an asylum in the French camp, 807, ii; placed at the head of the army of Naples, and entitled, "The Liberator of Italy," 804, ii

Madellonettes, suspected persons imprisoned at, 358

Madonnas, all removed from the streets, 372

Magenthies, his absurd petition, 461, ii; he is handed over to the revolutionary tribunal, id. ib.

Maguano, battle of, 817

Maignet, his mission to Vaucluse, and bloody executions; he causes Bédouin to be burned, 454; decreed to be arrested, and sent prisoner to Ham, 536, ii

Mailho presents to the convention the report on the question of the king's trial, 192, ii; proposes the examination whether the execution of the sentence on the king should be deferred, 212

Maillard, his device to disarm the women, 39; prepares for the September murders, 142, 143; assists to murder priests; leads the rabble to the Carmelites, and murders priests there, 144, ii; heads the murders at the Abbaye; is made president at the proceedings there, 145; arrested by the convention, 381

Maily killed at St. Jean d'Acre, 847, ii

Mainvielle tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365

Mairie, insurrectionary assembly at, 259; adjourned insurrectionary meeting at the, 261; assemblies at, forbidden by the mayor, 266; suspected persons detained at, 353

Maison de Port-Libre, a prison for suspected persons, 358

— Lazare, a prison for suspected persons, 358

"Majesty," the title abolished; but decree revoked, 76, ii

Malesherbes advises the king to abdicate, 119; offers his services to defend his king; his interview in the Temple, 202, ii; his appeal after the condemnation of the king, 213; his whole family condemned by the revolutionary tribunal, 442

Malines taken by Stengel, 187, ii

- Mallarmé, proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
Mallet Dupan, his opinion of the influence of the directory, 689
Mally wounded in the convention, 1st Prairial, Year III., 555
Malmesbury, lord, ambassador to Paris, 668, ii; takes his departure on the failure of the negotiations, 679, ii; negotiates for a peace at Lille, 720, ii; proceeds with the conferences at Lille, 739—741; quits Lille, 757
Malo, commander of the 21st dragoons, defeats the attempt of the patriots on the camp at Grenelle, 651; denounces the royalist agents, 695, ii
Malouet causes an interview between Mirabeau and Lafayette, 43
Malta, knights of, account of them, and of their possessions, 782, ii; 783; island of, surrenders to the French, 789
Malus employed by Dumouriez, 186, ii
Mamulukos, description of, 784—786; defeated by Bonaparte at the battle of Cairo, 789
Man, declaration of the rights of, 29, ii
Mandat, his preparations for the defence of the Tuileries, 126; he is shot, 127
Mandats, or treasury orders, issued, 617; compulsory value of, secured, 618, ii; fall in their value, 619; abolished, 648—650
Manège, club de, 75, ii, n.
Manheim surrendered to Pichegru, 579, ii
Manifesto of the duke of Brunswick, 121, ii; 122, 123; public excitement caused by, 123, ii
Mans, rout and slaughter of the Vendéans at, 392
Mantua, commencement of the siege of, 639, ii; further prosecution of the same, 653, ii; siege of, abandoned, 655, ii; siege of, continued, 683; surrender of, by marshal Wurmser, 687, ii; 688; surrenders to the allies, 639, ii
Manuel suspended, 112, ii; elected to the convention, 159, ii; his proposition concerning the president of France, 162, ii; his motion before the reception of the king at his trial, 201, ii; appears as a witness against the queen, 360, ii; his fairness in giving evidence, 361; tried before the revolutionary tribunal, condemned, and executed, 366
Marais, description of the, 252, ii; the whole of, insist on being commanded by Charette, 254, ii; the insurgents of, choose Charette their leader, 254, ii; operations of Ille de la, 609, 610
Marat, author of "The Friend of the People," prosecuted, 91; his early history and sanguinary character, 116; his scheme of assassinating the aristocrats, and completing the revolution, 117; his introduction to Barbaroux, id.; proposes that the people should appear armed before the assembly, 134; he is chief of the committee of surveillance, 135; with Danton plans the September murders, 142, ii; 143; elected to the convention, 159, ii; orders the arrest of Brissot, 160; his reply to the accusation of seeking a dictatorship, 163, ii; 166; he defends the September murders, 166; is attacked, and impeachment proposed in the convention, id. ii; 167; conceives a hatred of Dumouriez, 174; he states his labours as a newspaper editor, id. ii; his interview with Dumouriez at the house of Mlle. Candelle, id. ii; the Girondists demand a trial against him, 180, ii; his speeches against the Girondists, 204; his calumnies against Dumouriez, 222; effect of one of his paragraphs in "The Journal of the Republic," in respect of the general scarcity of 1793, 226; replies to Salles' proposed accusation, id. ii; he justifies his former article in his paper by publishing another, 227; his speech against the fish-market petition, 239, ii; the central committee of public safety established on his principles at L'Évêché, 245; he complains of the association, id. ii; he is impeached and arrested, 248; he is tried before the revolutionary tribunal, and acquitted, 249; he is carried in triumph by the sans-culottes to the bar of the convention, id. ii; his speech from the tribune, 250; further honours bestowed on him at the Jacobin club, id.; his violent speeches against the aristocrats, statesmen, &c. 259, ii; 260; incites the insurrection of 31st of May, 1793, by his writings, 267, ii; refuses to perform any of his functions till after the trial of the Girondists, 279, ii; he is suspected of being in the pay of the English or the duke of Orleans, 284; his final letter to the convention against Couthon, 295; is assassinated by Charlotte Corday, 296; funeral oration on, id. ii; his funeral at the garden of the Cordeliers, 297, ii; his heart kept by that society, id. ii; concluding reflections on his life and character, id. ii; 298; his housekeeper, styled his widow, supported at the public charge, 297, ii; his busts replace images of the Virgin in the streets, 372; his bust carried at the festival of Reason, 373, ii; his remains conveyed to the Pantheon, 408; his bust destroyed by the "Jeunesse dorée," and his remains removed from the Pantheon, 521, ii; his bust removed from the hall of the convention, 522
Marbot dismissed, 843
Marcé, general, defeats the insurgent Vendéans at St. Vincent and St. Fulgent, 254, ii; is in turn defeated, id. ii.
Marceau, his exertions before Fontenay, 267, ii; his bravery at Chantonay, 335; his intrepid conduct at Cholet, 354, ii; appointed commander-in-chief of the army against the Vendéans, 392; his devotion to Kléber, id.; he attacks the Vendéans in the town of Mans, and routs them, id. ii; his humanity at Mans, id. ii; his efforts at the battle of Fleurus, 459, ii; is killed, 664
March 10, 1793, insurrection of, 232, 233
Marchenna joins the fugitive Girondists in Normandy, 292
Maret sent secret envoy into England, 219, ii; his interview with Mr. Pitt, id. ii; represents the republic at the conferences at Lille, 740, ii; 741; his habits, character, and abilities, 741; recalled from Lille, 757
Maribon Montant, one of the commissioners of extermination against Lyons, 357; his transportation decreed by the convention, 549
Marie Antoinette, her influence over the king, 7; present at the entertainment given by the life-guards at Versailles, 38, ii; her courage and unpopularity, 40, ii; 41, ii; vote of thanks to her by the assembly, 46, ii; flies with the king; is stopped at Varennes, and brought back to Paris, 65—67; her address to Bertrand, 74, ii; her last popularity, 82, ii; her interview with Dumouriez, 87; rouses the king from his lethargy, 96; confides in Barnave, 97; her address to Thionville, 103, ii; her courage on 10th August, 127, ii; her address to Roderer, 128, ii; sent with the rest of the family to the Luxembourg, 133; transferred to the tower of the Temple, 135, ii; private and domestic life there, 191; treatment of them, id. ii; 192; transferred from the Temple to the Conciergerie for trial before the revolutionary tribunal, 326, ii; her impeachment ordered, 344, ii; hatred of her by the Cordeliers and the Jacobins; its causes, 369, ii; severity of her treatment at the Conciergerie, id. ii; her trial before the revolutionary tribunal, 360; enumeration of the witnesses against her, id. ii; her execution, 361, ii
Marny, Monsieur de, shot by orders of Stofflet, 492, ii.
Marino arrested, 263
Marmont allows the landing of the Turks at Aboukir, 349, ii; is reprimanded by Bonaparte, 350; quits Egypt with Bonaparte, 351, ii
Marne, Prieur de la, one of the committee of public welfare, 303
Mars, school of, re-established, 433
Marcellais, petition of the, 100, ii; arrival of, at Paris, 120, 121; their barracks removed, 124, ii
"Marcellaise," the only air allowed to be sung in theatres, 605

- Marscillois, forts of, taken by the national guard, 50; insurrectionary movements at, 257, ii; strength of the central committee at, 279, ii; execution of some of the patriots, and opposition to the convention at, 283; rebellion of, against the convention, 309, ii; taken by the republicans, 328, ii; proscription at, 357; audacity of the Jacobins at, 495, ii; disturbances at, on account of the scarcity, 520, ii; riotous proceedings of the patriots at, 559, ii; 560; battle at, between the patriots and the government, and final overthrow of the former, 561, ii; massacre of the patriot prisoners at, 564
- Martial law authorized to be declared, 44; proclaimed, 71
- Martinique, loss of, 438, ii
- Mas d'Eu, the French army before, 287; unsuccessful attack of the republicans on the camp at, under Dagobert, 334, id. ii
- Masonic society, called the Philanthropists, formed to oppose the directory, 694
- Massacre of the French at Verona, 713; of priests, 144, 145; of September, 144—148; of St. Bartholomew, remark on, 261, n.; of the Swiss guards, 129, ii; of the patriots in the prisons of Lyons, 549, ii; of the republicans in the Bocage, 254
- Masséna, his operations in conjunction with Bonaparte in the Alps, 434, ii; his services at Loano, 605, 607; notice of him, 625; attacks Liptai and Provera, and drives them beyond the Brenta, 673; his services at the battle of Arcola, 675, 676; at Rivoli, 684, 686; at Tarvis, 704; sent to Paris with the treaty of Léoben, 711, ii; a candidate for the directory 723, 753; commands at Rome, 773; the city pillaged, 774; revolt of his troops; his officers demand his recall; he is recalled, 774; appointed to command the army of Helvetia, 812, ii; consolidates the command of the army of the Danube and the Helvetic army, and occupies the line of the Limmat, 823, 824; retires to the chain of the Albis, 827, ii; his brilliant operations, and defeat of Suwarow at Zurich, 853—855
- Massimi, marquis, treats with the French at Tolentino, 701
- Mathieu, his reception at Bordeaux, 263; one of the committee of public welfare, 293, ii
- Mattel, cardinal, summoned before Bonaparte, and detained, 658, ii; released, and sent by Bonaparte to Rome, 670, ii; 671; sent by the pope to Bonaparte to treat for peace; signs the treaty of Tolentino, 701
- Mauberge, blockade of, opened, 350, ii; 351
- Maurepas, ministry of, 2
- Maury, abbé, 28; his speech on the possessions of the clergy, 44, id. ii; his proposal tax on luxuries; proposed expulsion of, from the assembly, 48, ii; proposal to dissolve the assembly, 49, ii
- Maxieu, his arrest decreed, 581, ii
- Maximum tax, discussions as to the, 226; price of corn-law relating to, adopted, 311; price of all the necessaries of life regulated, 811, id. ii; operation of the, 366, ii; 367; a new law of the, decreed by the convention, particulars of the same, 367, ii; 368; the disastrous effects of the, 482, ii; the same modified, 502; abolished, 522; excessive jobbing to which the repeal of, gave rise, 551, ii
- May 15th, 16th, and 17th, 1793, violent contests in the convention on, 259; 31st, 1793, insurrection of, particular circumstances of, 268; seventy-three proscribed deputies released, 508
- Mayence taken by Custine, 169, ii; 170
- Mayoralty, see Mairie
- Mazuel arrested by the convention, 381; again arrested, 411; tried and executed, 412
- Measures, weights and, new system of, adopted, 369, ii; 370
- Meda assists in the arrest of the municipal officers, 9th Thermidor, 471, ii
- Medicine, schools of, established after the reign of terror, 519, ii
- Mediterranean, English and Spanish fleets in, 286; commission for arming the coasts of the, 780
- Meerfeld sent by the emperor to treat, 709
- Meerveldt negotiates the treaty of Campo-Formio, 760—762
- Meilhan, his conversation with Danton, 267, ii; gives shelter in his house to the Girondist deputies, 274; a fugitive in Normandy, 292
- Melzi, count de, meets Bonaparte to conduct him to Milan, 634
- Menin evacuated by the prince of Orange, 332, ii; abandoned by the republicans, 333, invested and taken, 435, ii; 436
- Menard, general, occupies the Lemanic republic, 775
- Menou, his joke on the stoppage of the king's mints, 62; summoned to Paris after the defeat at Vihiers, 303, ii; commands against the patriots in the faubourg Saint-Antoine, 559, ii; his conduct in the insurrection, 13th Vendémiaire, 586, ii; 587; his character, 587
- Montz besieged and captured by the Prussians and Austrians, 306, 307; distress of the republican garrison, 307, ii; 308; garrison of, put under arrest, 325; ordered to be conveyed to La Vendée, id.; the lines of, taken by Clerfaut from the republicans, 590, ii
- Mère de Dieu, sect of; account of, 445, ii; the principal leaders sent before the revolutionary tribunal, 450
- Merlin, his speech in the convention on a dictatorship, 164; his speech at the Jacobins on Louvet's accusation of Robespierre, 177; his bravery at Cholut, 354, ii
- of Thionville, appointed member of the committee of general safety, 474, ii; his speech against the corresponding and affiliated societies, 500
- of Douai, minister of justice under the directory, 597, ii; his character and unpopularity, 692, ii; appointed a director, 753; retires from the directory, 834
- Mersin denounced, 728, ii
- Mesnard, his services at Zurich, 654
- Messidor, meaning of the term, in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.
- Metch surrenders, 806, ii
- Metz, revolt of the military at, 57, ii; 58; invested by the Prussians, 285
- Meunier aids in the defence of Metz, 285, ii; killed there, and honours paid to him, 307
- Moose, passage of the, 490, ii; crossed by Piehognu, and Bommel seized, 511, ii
- Miaczinsky marches on Lillo, and is apprehended, 241, ii
- Mianlle proposes that the constitution of 1793 be engraved on marble tablets, and set up in all places of public resort, 528, ii
- Miehand commands the army of the Rhine, 435
- Michel arrested, 263
- Michonnis, his injudicious friendship to the queen, 359, ii
- Milan, reception of the French under Masséna at, 633, ii; triumphal entry of Bonaparte into, 634; revolt of the inhabitants against the French, 635, ii; fête to the army of Italy given at, by Bonaparte, 737, 738; citadel of, surrenders, 653, ii
- Milhaud, his speech at the Jacobins on the union between Savoy and France, 189, ii, n.
- Military affairs, war threatened against the emigrants, 81; preparations for war, 82; three armies appointed north, centre, Alsace, id. ii; number of the army in December, 1791, 83; division of parties on the question of war, id.; first military operations, 89, 97; desertion of Biron's army; murder of general Dillon, and halt of Lafayette and Rochambeau, 90, ii; consequence of these disasters, id. ib.; state of the armies after the events of 10th of August, 136, 137; Luckner's head quarters removed to Metz; Lafayette's to Sédun, 137; situations of the allied armies and those of France in August, 1792, 139; camps at Maulde, Mauberge, and Lille, id.; Longwy taken by the Prussiens, 139, ii; council of generals on military proceedings, 140; campaign of the Argonne, 149—152; military plans of Dumouriez, 150; at Grand Pré, 151; volunteer enlistments, 152, attack on Grand Pré, id. ii; Grand Pré taken by the Prussians, 153; retreat of Dumouriez; he is galled by the Prussians, id. ii; he is at Valmy; his tactics, 154; the cannonade of Valmy, id. ii; 155; retreat of the Prussian army, 156; reflections on the conclusion of the campaign, id. ii; 157; military situation of France at the end of October, 1792, 169; oversights of Dumouriez, Kellermann, and Custine, 170; Frankfort on the Maine taken, id. ii; army of the Alps, id. ib.; plan of warfare proposed by Dumouriez against Belgium, Savoy, and Nice, 171; Savoy and Nice taken, id. ii; the Swiss preserve an armed neutrality, id. ib.; neutrality of Switzerland, 172; visit of Dumouriez to Paris to concert a plan for the invasion of Belgium, 174; his plan of military operations, 175; sequel of Dumouriez's military operations, 181; Dumouriez marches to Valence, 182; battle of Jemmapes, id. ii; 183; Marat's comments thereon, id. ii; Dumouriez at Mons, 184, ii; his management of the Belgic campaign, 185; he enters Brussels, id. ii; changes in the commissariat department, 186; Malines taken by Stengel, 187, ii; Labourodaine enters Antwerp, id. ib.; Dumouriez enters Liège, id. ib.; Namur occupied, 188; disasters in the French army arising from inefficiency in the war and commissariat departments, id. ii; four commissaries sent to Belgium to ascertain the true state of the commissariat, 189; operations of Custine near Frankfort and the Maine, id. ii; situation of the army there at the end of 1792, 189; situation of military affairs at the same time at the Alps and the Pyrenees, id.; preparations for war in England and France, 218, 219; grounds of confidence of the revolutionists as consisting in national resources, 220; war declared against England and Holland, id.; state of the army of Dumouriez, id. ii; recapitulation of the previous military operations, id. ib. 221; commencement of the second campaign in the Austrian Netherlands, 222; scheme of the same, 223; the French enter the Austrian Netherlands, id. ii; Klundert, Breda, and Gertruydenberg taken, id. ib.; further proceedings of the second campaign in the Austrian Netherlands, 228, ii; 229; Austrians and Hessians commanded by the prince of Coburg, 228, ii; defeat at Tongres by the archduke Charles, id. ib.; immense desertion from the army, 229; Dumouriez's letter of remonstrance thereon, 234; detail of his further military operations, 235; battle of Neerwinden, and defeat of the French, id. ii; 236; evacuation of Belgium, 238; armistice agreed on between Dumouriez and Colonel Mack, id.; political ferment in the army of Dumouriez caused by an attempt to arrest him, 241; several generals separate from him while he goes over to the Austrians, 243; Dampierre appointed commander-in-chief of the north, 243, ii; an army of Paris of twelve thousand men raised by conscription, 253; the military proceedings against the insurrection in La Vendée, 253—258; Custine appointed general of the army of the north after the death of Dampierre, 258; Houchard appointed general of the army of the Rhine, id.; the army of the north defeated between Bouchain and Cambray; Pontenay captured by Lescaur, 266, ii; the Austrians attacked at Vicogne and Saint-Amand by Dampierre, who is repulsed and mortally wounded, 284, ii; Condé blockaded, and Valenciennes besieged by the allies, and both reduced, id. ib.; 285; general Lamarche takes the command in the place of Dampierre, and retreats to Farnars, and then to Caesar's camp, 284, ii; Custine shuts himself up in Mentz, 285; that place attacked by the king of Prussia, id.; mistakes and oversights of Custine and Ligneville in not preventing the passage of the Rhine, id.; deplorable condition of the army of Italy, 286; progress of the war in Spain, id. ii; 287; Ricardos gains advantage near Perpignan, 287; Servan commands in the western, and Delfens the eastern Pyrenees, 287; Ricardos attacks the French camp successfully, id. ii; general Dagobert keeps his ground, id. ib.; progress of the war in La Vendée, id. ii; 288; defeat of Chalbos and Sandos before Pontenay, 287, ii; (for all particulars of the Vendean war, see La Vendée, Vendeans, and Royalists); details of the victory over the Spaniards in the Roussillon, 293, ii; 294; Dubois-Crancé re-organizes the army of the Alps, 294; siege and capture of Mentz by the Austrians and Prussians, 306, 307; Meunier killed, 307; situation of the army of the Rhine and Moselle, 308; siege of Valenciennes, id. ii; 309; Condé surrendered to the allies, 309; Valenciennes surrendered, id. ii; retrospect of military operations, and consideration of the state of the armies, 310; the allies threaten Caesar's camp, 315, ii; the army of the north retreats from Caesar's camp; collects at the camp of Garvulle; Cambray and Bouchain abandoned, 316; movement of the armies in August and September, 1793, 326; description of the theatre of war, and the movement of the armies at that time, 327; bombardment of Lyons by the republicans, 328; Marseilles taken by Carteaux; Toulon betrayed and taken possession of by the English, 328, ii; 329; duke of York lays siege to Dunkirk; battle of Hondschote, and retreat of the duke of York from before Dunkirk, 331, 332; assault of Quenoy by the prince of Coburg; capitulation of the same, 332, ii; prince of Orange evacuates Menin, id. ib.; defeat of the republicans at Bisseghem, 333; Bodenthal, ineffectual attack on, id.; defeat of the republican army in the Upper Pyrenees, at Menin, Pirmasens, and Perpignan, id. ii; 334; retreat of Canclaux to Nantes, 336, ii; 337; appointment of a revolutionary army, 339, 340; review of Custine's campaign on the Rhine, 342, ii; 343; the continuation of the siege, and the reduction of the city of Lyons, 345—347; progress of the art of war; the influence of Carnot, 349, 350; the blockade of Maubeuge opened, 351; victory of Watignies, id. 352; loss of Weissenburg, 355; termination of the campaign of 1793, 382, et seq.; manœuvres of Hoche in the Vosges and conduct of St. Just at Strasburg, 383, 384; siege and capture of Toulon, 384—386; review of the campaign at the Pyrenees, 386; unsuccessful attack upon Rosas, id. ii; disasters at Côté; loss of the camp of St. Ferréol; Ricardos defeats the French at Ville-Languo; he seizes on Collioure, Port-Vendré, and Saint-Elme, id. ib.; blockade of Landau raised by Hoche, 384; the frontiers recovered, id.; operations of the army of Italy, id. ii, et seq.; siege and capture of Toulon, 384, ii; review of the campaign of 1793, 393—395; state of the French armies at the commencement of 1794, 432; opening of the campaign of 1794, 433; operations in the Pyrenees and Alps, id. ii; 434; capture of the camp of Boulou, 433, ii; Collioure, Port-Vendré, and Saint-Elme, blockaded, id. ib.; Bastian taken, 434; Bonaparte enters Orméa, id. ii; operations in the Low Countries, 435; engagements on the Sambre and the Lys, id. ii; victorious engagement of Turcoing, 437; operations at St. Domingo, 438; (and see St. Domingo); operations of the army of the North towards the middle of 1794, 458; formation of the army of the Sambre and the Meuse, id. ii; battle of Fleurus, and retreat of the Austrians, 459, 460; termination of the campaign in that quarter, 460, ii; junction of the armies of the North and of the Sambre and the Meuse, and the occupation of Brussels and Belgium by the French troops, 460, 461; continuation of the war after the battle of Fleurus, 468, et seq.; Landrecies, Condé, and Le Quesnoi, surrender of, 488, ii; number of the army of the North under Fiehegru, and of the army of the Meuse under Jourdan, September, 1794, 489; battle of the Ourthe, and of the Rêre, id. ii; passage of the Meuse, 490, ii; occupation by the French of the entire line of the Rhine, 491; situation of the armies at the Alps and the Pyrenees, 492; war of the Chonars, (see Chonars), id. ii; continuation of the war upon the Rhine, 509, et seq.; siege and capture of Nimègue by the French; absurd movement of the allies near Baderich, 510; reflections on the conquest of Holland, and the natural difficulties the French had to surmount, and were enabled to overcome, id. ii; 511; Pichegru crosses the Meuse on the ice, attacks and takes Bommel; the lines of Breda carried, 511, ii; the stadtholder offers terms, which are refused; the war is continued, 512; the French overrun Holland; enter Utrecht and Amsterdam, and gain possession of Zealand, 513, 514; the provinces of Friesland, Drenthe, and Groningen overcome by the French, 514; the conclusion of the campaign in Spain; camp of Piqueras taken; fortress of the same surrendered, 515; short review of the campaign of 1794, 515; situation of the armies at the North and on the Rhine, at the Alps and the Pyrenees, towards the middle of the year 1795, 564, 565; surrender of Luxembourg, 565; Jourdan passes the Rhine; Pichegru captures Mannheim, 579, ii; the armies accept the directorial constitution, 584, ii; proceedings of Pichegru and Jourdan; retirement of the latter on the Lower Rhine, 591; retreat of the army of the Sambre and the Meuse to the Lower Rhine, id. ii; Jourdan forced to recross the Rhine, 598; defeat of the armies of the republic by Clerfaut, and loss of the lines of Mentz, id. ii; Pichegru attacked by Clerfaut at Pfim and Frankendal, is driven back to Landau, 603; armistice concluded on the Rhine, 606; battle of Louno and defeat of the Austrians, id. 607; results of the campaign of 1795, 610, ii; 611; position of the republic in reference to its military operations, which are under Bonaparte's recommendation directed still further towards Italy, 620, 621; the armies of the coasts of Chorboung and of Brest, and the army of the West, consolidated and placed under the command of Hoche, and entitled "the army of the coasts of the ocean," 621, ii; reduction of La Vendée and Brittany by Hoche, 623, 624; (see also La Vendée, Brittany;) campaign of 1795, 624—646; conquest of Piedmont and Lombardy by Bonaparte, 624, et seq.; state of the army of Italy at the time Bonaparte took the command, 625; battles of Montenotte and Millesimo, 626; defeat of Liptai's division at Pombio; defeat of Beaulieu on the Po; capture of Lodi, and passage of the bridge, 632, 633; submission of the duke of Modena, 634; address to the army of Italy, 635; revolts at Milan and Pavia; the same suppressed, and pillage of the latter; Binasco burned, 636; Borghetto attacked and carried; passage of the Mincio, 637, id. ii; Verona entered, 638, ii; Leghorn taken possession of and garrisoned, 641, ii; observations on Carnot's plan of the campaign of 1794, and his plans for 1796, 642; passage of the Rhine by Moreau and Jourdan, 643; battles of Radstadt and Ettlingen, 644, 645; the army of Italy takes its position on the Adige, and the army of Germany upon the Danube, 646, 647; continuation of Bonaparte's campaign in Italy, 653—658; citadel of Milan surrenders, 653, ii; siege of Mantua continued, id. ib.; arrival of the Austrians under Wurmser on the Adige, 654, ii; the Austrians force the line of the Adige, and turn the line of the Mincio and the Lake of Garda; Bonaparte calls a council of war, 655; he abandons the siege of Mantua, id. ii; Austrians defeated at Salo and Lonato, id. ii; 656; Brescia entered, 656; general Valette broke; battle of Lonato, id. ii; battle of Castiglione, 657; operations on the Danube; battle of Neresheim, 659; the archduke Charles marches against Jourdan, id. ii; defeats him at Neresheim, id. ib.; defeats Bernadotte; and again defeats Jourdan at Wartensleben, 660; battles of Roveredo, Bassano, and St. George, 661, 662; Jourdan returns to the Maine; is beaten at the battle of Wurtzburg, and retreats to Armstein, 663, ii; 664; Moreau recrosses the Danube; beats Latour at Biberach and retreats, 664, 665; reflections on the termination of the campaign on the Danube and on Moreau's retreat, 665, ii; 666; state of the French army in Italy under Bonaparte, 669, ii; Masséna and Angereau obtain advantages over the Austrians before Bassano and on the Brenta; Vaubois beaten on the Upper Adige, and in the defile of Culliano, 673; Bonaparte declares that the thirty-ninth and eighty-fifth demi-brigades no longer form part of the army of Italy, id. ii; critical situation of the French in Italy immediately preceding the battle of Arcola, id.; Bonaparte writes to the directory, complaining of want of reinforcements, 674; battle of Arcola, and defeat of the Austrian army, id. ii; 675, 676; Kehl surrenders to the archduke Charles, 682, ii; marshal Wurmser besieged in Mantua, 683; preparations of Bonaparte for the final struggle with Italy, id. ii; battle of Rivoli, 684, ii; 686; battle of Favaria, 687; surrender of Mantua by marshal Wurmser, id. ii; reflections on the surrender of Mantua and conquest of Italy, and the close of the campaign of 1796 under Bonaparte, id. ib.; 689; state of the French armies at the opening of the campaign of 1797, 699; Bonaparte marches against the papal states, 700; the treaty of Tolentino signed, 701; renewal of the campaign against the Austrians, 701, 702; battles of Tagliamento and Tarvis, 703, 704; Bonaparte advances towards Vienna, 708; the Austrians are driven to Unzmarkt; preliminaries at Leoben, 709, successes of Hoche on the Rhine, 711, ii; passage of the Rhine by Degaix, 712; discontented state of the armies, 730, 731; addresses sent to the directory by the army of Italy; the same carried by Angereau, 738; the armies of the Sambre and the Meuse, and of the Rhine, consolidated under the name of "the army of Germany," and placed under the command of Hoche, 754; at his death Angereau appointed to the command, 755; the army of Italy under Berthier de-thrones the pope; the same under Masséna pillages Rome; it is divided into two armies, one part called "the army of Rome," 774; general Moutard crosses the Alps and encamps at Caruge; general Schawemburg ascends the Rhine and is stationed at Egerol; the French occupy the Pays de Vaud, 775; capture of Berne, 776; capture of Alexandria, 784; battle of Cairo and defeat of Murad Bey, and his mamelukes, 788, 789; the Roman states are invaded by the Neapolitan army; Championnet evacuates Rome, 805, ii; he conquers the kingdom of Naples and returns to Rome, 806; state of affairs with regard to the armies in January, 1799, 808, 809; levy of soldiers by conscription, 810; the relative plans and military means of the directory with the allied powers in league against France, 811; war declared with Austria, 818; Jourdan crosses the Rhine; the archduke Charles crosses the Lech, id. ii; invasion of the Grisons; Masséna passes the Rhine, id. ib.; battle of Pfälldorf and defeat of Jourdan, 814; battle of Stockach and defeat of Jourdan, 815; he retreats, 816; military operations in Italy, id. ii; 817, et seq.; battle of Magnano; defeat of the French and Schérer's retreat, 817, 818; continuation of the campaign of 1799, 823—830; Masséna consolidates the command of the Helvetic army and the army of the Danube, and occupies the line of the Limmat, 823; Suwarrow joins the Austrians, 824; Schérer resigns his command to Moreau, 825; battle of Cassano and defeat of the French, id. 826; Serrurier lays down his arms; Moreau retreats beyond the Po and the Apennines, 826—828; the archduke Charles attacks the lines of the Limmat, but is repulsed; Masséna retires to the chain of the Albis, 827, ii; Suwarrow defeats Macdonald at Trebbia, and forces him to retreat beyond the Apennines, 828, 830; Moreau defeats Bellegarde at Novi, 830; resumption of operations in Italy; Joubert appointed commander of the army of Italy in room of Moreau; battle of Novi; death of Joubert, and defeat of the French by Suwar-

- row, 830—840; conquest of Upper Egypt by Desaix, 845, 846; battle of Sedinnah, id.; capture of the fort of El-Arisch; capture of Gaza and of Jaffa by Bonaparte, 846, ii; 847; siege of St. Jean d'Acre, 847, 848; the same abandoned, 848, ii; battle of Aboukir; defeat of the Turks and capture of Mustapha-Pacha, 849—851; military operations in Europe, 852—856; the archduke Charles marches to the Rhine, and of Suwarrow into Switzerland, 852; movements of their armies preparatory to an attack on Masséna, 853; Masséna defeats the Russians at Zurich, id. ii; 854, 855; disastrous retreat of Suwarrow, 855; evacuation of Holland by the Anglo-Russian army, id. 856
- Military employments, all citizens admitted to, 30
- preparations round Paris, 19, ii
- Millesimo, battle of, 626, ii; 627
- Ministries of government abolished and replaced by commissions, 423
- Ministry of police established, 616
- Molits, his defence of the suburb of Saint-George, 687
- Mirabeau elected deputy for the tiers état, 9; his appearance in the states general, 10, ii; chief mover of the popular party in the states general, 12; introduces Sieyès to speak on the verification of the powers of the states general, 13; proposes a name for the assembly, id. ii; his speech at the royal sitting of the states general, 16; his speech to the marquis de Brézé, id.; proposes the inviolability of the persons of the members of the national assembly, id.; his speeches on voting, and on imperative mandates, 17; id. ii; proposes a demand on the king to dismiss the troops round Paris, 19, ii; his speech, 20; his reply to count de Crillon, id.; his address to the fifth deputaion, 23, ii; his history and character, 28, ii; 29; revives a rejected motion on the regency, 35, ii; is considered an agent of the duke of Orleans, 36; opposes Neckar's scheme of finance, 36, ii; inquiry into whether he was an agent of the duke of Orleans, 43; he is gained over to the court party, id. ii; further negotiations with, 47; concluded, id. ii; jealous of the popularity of Lafayette, id. ib.; his allusion to the massacre of Saint-Bartholomew, 49, ii; his speech on the permanence of the assembly, id. ib. 50; his speech on the right of the king to make peace and war, 52, ii; he is on no settled footing with the court, 57; repels the charges made against him in the assembly, id.; supports the second issue of assignats, 58, ii; his plan for obtaining a constitution more monarchical, 59, ii; his speech on the civil constitution of the clergy, 60, ii; 61; misrepresents the motive of Lafayette, 63; his speeches on the emigration act, id.; defends the liberty of emigration, id. ii; his illness, death, and funeral, 64; his remains placed in the Pantheon, id. ii; reflections on his death, id. ib.; consequences of to the court party, 65; his bust proposed to be destroyed, but covered up; his remains proposed to be removed from the Pantheon, 200, ii; 201; his remains removed therefrom, 488
- viscount de, announces civil war from the tribune, 50; his counter-revolutionary movements, 80; impeached, 84
- Miranda takes the citadel of Antwerp, 187, ii; his misconduct at Neerwinden, 236
- Mirandola, state of, in 1796, 630, ii
- Mironenil dismissed, 3
- Mitchell, admiral, the Dutch navy in the Texel surrenders to, 841, ii
- Modena, state of, in 1796, 630, ii; character of the reigning duke of, id. ib.; entered by Bonaparte, 641
- duke of, deposed, 871
- Moderates, their aversion to the new Jacobins, 842
- Moderatists arrested, tried, and executed, 415—420
- Modéré, 75, ii
- “Modeste” frigate, outrage on, by the English, 434; indemnity for, proposed arrangement of, 641; indemnity still discussed, 658; the ship taken by Nelson, 670
- Moira, lord, detained at Jersey, 430; his proposed landing in La Vendée, 432
- Moliterno, prince, represses the disorders of the Lazzaroni at Naples, 807, ii
- Mollewille, Berthand de, his opinion on the return of the emigrants, 77, ii
- Momoro, his efforts at the Cordeliers in favour of Vincent and Ronsin, 395; arrested, 411; tried and executed, 412
- Monarchical club, 75, n.
- Monarchy, considerations on the question as to the personal inviolability of a monarch in a free state, and its inclinations therein as to the competency of the national convention to try Louis XVI., 192, ii; 194
- Moncoy takes Bilbao and Victoria, 578, ii
- Monchy, marshal de, 102, ii
- Mondovi, defeat of Colli at, 628
- Monestier, proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
- Money and assignats on a par in value, 368; dealing in, other than for a value in assignats, punished, 328, ii; ordered to be kept out of circulation in certain places, 368, ii; gradual re-appearance of, in circulation, 1796, 617, ii
- Monge, minister of marine, 132; his characteristics and opinions at the time of the king's trial, 190, ii; sent to Rome to select the works of art destined for the Museum, 641, ii; with Berthier carries the treaty of Campo-Formio to Paris, 762; sent commissioner to Rome, 774; goes in the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii; appointed president of the Institute of Egypt, 792, ii; quits Egypt with Bonaparte, 851, ii
- Monopolies, every species of, made punishable with death, 323, ii
- Monopolists of corn, complaints against, 310, 311
- Monpensier, duke de, at the battle of Jemmapes, 183
- Monro, the American minister, his letter to the directory, 698
- Mons entered by Dumouriez, 184, ii; united to France, 222
- Monsieur, brother of the king, his popularity, 4; justifies himself before the assembly, 46; promises not to abandon the king, 62; proceeds to Flanders, 66; ordered to return or be deprived of the regency, 78; impeached, and absolutely deprived of the regency, 84; becomes regent, and fixes his residence at Verona, 493; assumes the title of Louis XVIII., 566, ii; the count d'Artois assumes that of Monsieur, id. ib. the term only permitted in Bernadotte's division of the army, 731
- Montaign, defeat of the Vendéens at, 336
- Monto Baldo, defeat of the Austrians at, 686, ii
- Montebello, negotiations at, for peace with the emperor, 730, ii
- Montelegino, defence of the redoubt of, 626
- Montenotte, battle of, 626
- Montferriat, duke of, his injudicious movements towards the relief of Lyons, 346, id. ii
- Montgaillard, agent of the prince de Condé in his offers to Pichegru, 566; his conversation on Pichegru's treason discovered, 729, and n.
- Months, alteration of the names of, in the revolutionary calendar, 370
- Montmorin, M. de, reported dismissal of, 20, ii; the medium of communication with the popular leaders, 58, ii; 59; prosecutes Carra, 91, ii; meeting at his house for the king's escape, 124; murdered at “La Force,” 145, ii
- Montreuil taken by the Vendéens, 257, ii
- Morard, de Galles, admiral, arrested, 433; commands the squadron on the expedition to Bantry Bay, 680, ii
- Moreau invests Menin, 435, ii; and captures it, 436; takes Slys, 439; enters Venloo; he is styled “the general of sieges,” 491, ii; succeeds Pichegru, 681, ii; passes the Rhine, 643; observations on his oversight after the passage of the Rhine, 644; defeats the Austrians on the Renchen, at Radstadt, 644, ii; 645;

- takes up his position on the Danube, 646, ii; his oversight on the banks of the Danube, 660; is defeated at Friedberg, id. ii; defeats Latour at Biberach; recrosses the Danube and retreats, 665; reflections on his retreat, id. ii; 666; the opinions of military men of his merit compared with that of Bonaparte, 666, ii; surrenders Kehl, 682, ii; his character; intrigues of the royalists to secure his services; his fidelity both to the republic and to Pichegru, 731, ii; declares the conduct of Pichegru; is removed from his command and ordered to Paris, 754; his subordinate military employment, 812; defeated at Cassano; retreats beyond the Po and the Apennines, 825—828; defeats Bellegarde at Novi, 830; his generosity towards Schärer, 825; and towards Joubert, 839; appointed commander of an intended army of the Rhine, 836; takes the command at the battle of Novi after the death of Joubert, 839; retreats to the Apennines, 840, 841
- Moreau de St. Méry threatens the brigands, 21, ii; his coolness and courage, 23, ii
- Morisson, his speech in favour of the inviolability of the king, 195
- Morveaux, one of the committee of public welfare, 245
- Moulins elected a director, 835; his proceedings in the events preceding 18th Brumaire, 859—862; refusing to resign as a director is placed under guard by Bonaparte, 865
- Moutier proposes an oath to the national assembly, 15, 16; proposes a name for the assembly, 13, ii; member of the committee of the national assembly to consider a constitution, 13; meditates establishing the English constitution, 19, ii; president of the assembly, 39, ii; retires to Dauphiné, 43, ii; his loss of popularity, 44
- "Mountain" party in the convention, 75, 76; its composition and strength, 167, ii; reception of Dumouriez, October, 1792, 173, ii; their violent speeches against the king, 195; succeed in condemning the king to immediate execution, 214; declare themselves menaced, 224; oppose the Maximum, 225; their struggles with the Girondist party, 224, 227, 228; proposed union of, with the Girondists, 238, ii; their alarm at the insurrection in La Vendée, 257, ii; final struggle with the Girondists, 267; their final triumph over the Girondists, 275—277; regret at the loss of Marat, 296; divided opinion and dissension among, 299; their elevation and enthusiasm, 315; their vengeance inflicted on all the great cities of France, 357; divisions in; some called Dantonists and others Hébertists, 375, ii; address to, in the convention from the section of Marat, 429, ii; many of its old members meet and devise plans for their safety from Robespierre, 456, ii; their efforts on 9th Thermidor against Robespierre and his associates, 456, 457; not destroyed by the fall of Robespierre, 476; opposed to a recognition of the liberty of the press, 479, ii; the party established after the reign of terror, how composed, 480; becomes again one of the dominant parties after the end of the reign of terror; 483, 484; several deputies arrested and sent to Ham, 534, ii; many deputies of, arrested in the convention, 1st Prairial, Year III., 557, ii; decree of accusation passed against, 559; arrest of several deputies decreed, 560, id. ii; the party entirely destroyed, 561, ii; its imprudent suggestions, 591
- "— Journal," the, 505
- Mountainers, see Mountain
- of Lyons, 251, ii
- Mount Thabor, battle of, 848
- Mourgues, minister of the interior, 95, ii
- Moutons, or spies, described, 452, ii. and n.
- Muiron, his conduct at the capture of fort Eguillette at the siege of Toulon, 835, ii; killed at Arcola, 675
- Municipal paper, debates on, 53, ii
- Municipality of Paris dissolved by the convention, 178; admitted to the honours of the sitting of the convention, 249
- Murad Bey, his preparations against the French, 788; defeated at the battle of Cairo, 789
- Murat presents twenty-one colours to the directory taken by the army of Italy, 623; commands the cavalry at Borghetto, 637, ii; Bonaparte exhibits his regard for, 638; joins the Egyptian expedition, 780, ii; his services at the battle of Aboukir, 850; is wounded by, and wounds Mustapha Pacha, and sends him prisoner to Bonaparte, 851; quits Egypt with Bonaparte, id. ii; heads the grenadiers to clear the hall of the council of five hundred, 867, ii
- Murders take place in the provinces, 163, ii
- of September, 144—148; renewed at Versailles, 158; defended by Marat in the convention, 166; laid to the charge of the Girondists, 363
- Muscadins, meaning of the term, 408, n.; the party so called meet at the Palais Royal, 486, ii
- Museum, pictures ordered to be collected in, 519
- Mustapha Pacha defeated, wounded, and taken prisoner at the battle of Aboukir, 850, 851
- Mutiny at Nancy, 58

N.

- Namur occupied by the French, 188; abandoned, 240
- Nanci, bishop of, his sermon before the opening of the states general, 10, ii
- Nancy, mutiny at, 58
- Nantes unsuccessfully attacked by the Vendéans, 293; the horrible massacres at, by Carrier, 453; the drownings at, investigated; the revolutionary tribunal of, ordered to attend at Paris, 503, ii; execution of Carrier and his associates for the massacres at, 508, ii; 509
- Naples bombarded, 189; hostile intentions of, supported by the intrigues of England, 539, ii; state of, in 1796, 630, ii; imbecility of the king and ascendancy of the queen; influence and intrigues of the English at the court, id. ib.; success for peace, 640, ii; preparations at, against the French, 654, ii; peace concluded with, 670; Trouvé, the French ambassador, insulted at, 772, ii; further insults to the French ambassador at, 781; preparations of, against France, 804, ii
- , king of, lays his royal ornaments at the foot of the altar, 640; enters Rome in triumph; quits it, and is expelled his kingdom, 806, ii
- , kingdom of, conquered by Ohamplionnet; the king expelled, 806; armistice at; the French become masters of, 807; the same converted into the Pantheon republic, 808
- Narbonne, his address to the assembly, 81; visits the frontiers, and directs the repairs of the fortifications, 82, 83; dismissed, 84, ii; his plan for the king's escape, 119
- National assembly, this title assumed by the tiers état, 13, ii; proposed by Logrand, id. ib.; issue a declaration of rights, 13, 14; their sitting prevented by an order of the king, 14, ii; they meet in the Tennis Court, id. ib. 15; binds itself by oath not to separate till a constitution is established, 15; meet at the church of St. Louis, id. ii; sit again, and declare the persons of its members inviolate, 16; refuse to separate, notwithstanding the order of the king, id.; joined by the majority of the clergy, id.; and of the nobility, 17; discussions concerning instructions to members, id. ii; they proceed to reform the constitution, 18; review of the difficulties of the assembly in forming a constitution, id.; appoint a committee of sustenance, id. ii; moderation of, in disturbances at the Abbaye, 19; deserted by the nobility, id. ii; discussions in, on the riots in Paris, 21, ii; declares itself permanent, id. ii; appoint Lafayette vice-president, id. ib.; rumours of designs against, by the court, 22; send deputations to the king, 21—23; the king and his brothers attend, 24; Liancourt elected president, 25; composition of, and numbers of parties in, 27, n.; declaration of the rights of man, 29, ii; abolish feudal rights and tithes, and provide for the expenses of public worship, 29—31; upper and lower chamber proposed, with a royal sanction, 33; opposed by Sleyda, id. ii; permanency of the assembly debated, 31, ii; the veto debated, 35; motion concerning a regency revived by Murbeau, 35, ii; 36; declares itself inseparable from the person of the king, 41, ii; removes to Paris, 43, ii; seizes the possessions of the clergy, 44, ii; divide France into departments, districts, and communes, 45; clergy and provincial parliaments join against the assembly, id. ii; conspiracy against, by the marquis de Fuyras, 46; the king attends, id. ii; vote of thanks to the king and queen, id. ib.; its members take the oath of civism, 47; debate on the proposed dissolution of, 49; its permanence decreed, id. ii; debates in, on the power of making peace and war, 52; the same conferred on it and the king, 53; debates in, on the king's flight, 63, 67; he is suspended from his functions, 68, ii; proceed to reinstate him; majority for moderate measures and monarchy, 70; decree the restoration of the king, 71; decrees that none of its members shall be re-elected, 71, ii; proceeds with the "Revision," id. ib.; approaching its dissolution, review the articles of the constitution, 72; closes its labours, id. ii; reflections on the assembly and its acts, 72, 73; comparison between it and its successors, 74; second national assembly, called the Legislative Assembly, which see

National Bank established, 612, ii

Convention is constituted, 159, 160; debates in, on the honours to be paid the president, 162, ii; decrees the abolition of royalty, id. ib. 163; the new era of the republic, 163; the new mode of dating, id.; debate on the means of repressing the massacres in the country, id. ii; parties in, divided into the Mountain and the Plain, 167; distribution and strength of the parties in, id. ii; proposed measures for its safety: departmental guard, id. ib.; decrees various changes in the executive power, 168; appoints administrative committees, id. ii; ministers not to be chosen from their body, id. ib.; their flattering reception of Dumouriez, 172; it exerts its influence against the commune, 175; receives the report of Roland on the state of France, 175; proceedings immediately preceding Robespierre's defence, 178; four decrees proposed by Barbaroux, id.; consulted a court of justice to pass sentence on conspirators, id.; complaints in, against Robespierre, id. ii; he defends himself against the accusation of seeking sole dominion, id. 179, 180; considerations on his defence, id.; its attention turned to the king's condemnation, id. ii; sends four commissioners to inquire into the state of the army in Belgium, 188; passes a decree of fraternization with all oppressed nations, 189, ii; report to, of charges against the king, and questions to which it gave rise discussed, 192, ii; 193; debates in, on the inviolability of the king's person, 193; summary of the debates on the king's trial, id. ii; 195; Saint-Just regards the question in a new light, id. ii; his argument against the king and regal institution, 196; the arguments of Fouchet upon the infliction of capital punishments with regard to the king, id. ii; 197; summary of parties in the convention on the question, id.; debates on the security, and on the corn question, 198, 199; debates on the revolts in the provinces, 199; speech of Robespierre on proposing the condemnation of the king without a trial, id. ii; declaration of the assembly that it will try the king, 200; reading of the papers found in the iron chest of Roland, id. ii; the king is summoned before the convention, 201; conducted there, id. ii; charges against him, 202; counsel allowed him, id. ii; violent scenes in the assembly during the interval of the preparation of his defence, 204; motion for the banishment of the duke of Orleans; the same adjourned, 205; declaration that religion should not be abolished, 198, ii; 199; decrees the banishment of the Bourbons, 205; proceeds with and concludes the trial of the king, 205—213; pronounces sentence of death on him without appeal to the people, 213; violent debates at the conclusion of the king's defence, 207; considerations expressed by Salles and others as to the consequences of the trial in a political point of view, and as to calling for an appeal to the nation, 208, 209; the consequences of sparing him considered and discussed, 210; debate on the appeal to the people closed, 211; motion for a delay of the execution lost, 212, 213; reading of the letter of Kersaint, 214; they refuse the application for three days' delay in the execution, id. ii; orders a report to be made of the conduct of England towards France, and of her relations with the stadtholder, 219, ii; 220; declares war against England and Holland, 220; decrees a levy from the national guard, 223; and the raising of three hundred thousand men, id.; also the issuing of eight hundred millions of assignats, and the felling of wood in Corsica for ships of war, id.; recall Dumouriez from the campaign in the Austrian Netherlands, and sends him to the army of the Meuse, 229; orders all officers to join their corps, id. ii; violent discussions in, 230; an extraordinary criminal tribunal agreed on, in the fear of a counter-revolution; the same decreed; its powers, id.; an extraordinary war tax decreed, id. ii; commissions decreed to accelerate the recruiting, id. ib.; other decrees, id. ib.; the right of making wills abolished, id. ib.; Girondist deputies of, threatened with assassination, 232, ii; violent discussions and mutual reproaches of the two parties, 233; a letter of Dumouriez sent to, but for a time suppressed, 234; the same read and debated on, 239; speeches of Danton and Robespierre thereon, id.; discussions in, for forming a committee for carrying on the executive government, id. ii; a decree requiring the names of the inhabitants of each house to be written on the doors, id. ib.; suspected citizens ordered to be disarmed, id. ib.; supreme authority vested in, 240; summons Dumouriez to the bar, 241; sends commissioners to arrest him, id.; declares its sittings permanent; sets a price on the head of Dumouriez; orders the relations of all officers to be detained as hostages, and orders a levy of forty thousand men for the protection of the capital, 242; decrees that its members may be tried on presumption of being enemies of the state, id. ib.; and that the duke of Orleans and all his family be arrested and confined at Marseilles, id. ib.; appoints a committee of public welfare, 244, 245; receives the petition of the section of Bonne-Nouvelle, 245, ii; and of the corn-market; violent debates thereon, id. ib.; 246; speech of Robespierre against the Girondists, 246; replied to by Vergnaud and Guadet, 247; imprisonment and arrest of Marat ordered and effected, 248; he is brought in triumph after his acquittal, 249; addresses the convention, 250; approves of a levy of men by way of conscription, 255; Cambon's scheme of a forced loan presented, 258; violent contest between the two sides of the assembly, id. ii; various letters read announcing the progress of insurrection in La Vendée, &c. 259; the petition from Bourdeaux approved by the majority, id.; Guadet's speech, and parallel of Pride's purge, id. ii; Isnard announces a supposed plot of Mr. Pitt to arm one part of the people against the other, 260; Marat's violent speeches against aristocrats, statesmen, &c. 259, ii; 260; Guadet proposes a new convention, id.; Barrère proposes and carries the appointment of a commission of twelve deputies to examine the acts of the commune, 260, ii; 261; measures taken by, for its protection against the violence of the Cordeliers, 262, ii; lecture from Pache, vindicating the meetings at the Mairie, read, id. ib.; commission of twelve present a decree of general safety, id. ib.; 263; other measures taken for its safety, id. ib.; three sections armed and equipped for its security, 264; debates in, on the liberation of Hébert, id. ii; decree for his release and for the suppression of the commission of twelve, 265, ii; violent debates on, and the decree declared void, and the commission reinstated, 266; news received at, from the north and La Vendée, of the defeat of the republican forces, id. ii; reports brought up to, of the state of the capital, 269; debates relative to the firing the alarm gun, id. ii; Valazé speaks against the conspirators of May 31, id. ib.; at the proposal of Vergniaud, oath taken not to abandon the public weal, id. ib.; depuration of the insurrectional commune introduced, and debates, 270, ii; gully of, proposed to be cleared, id. ib.; debates on the proposal of Barrère to abolish the commission of twelve, 271, ii; 272; suggestion of Garat, that the leaders of the contending parties shall voluntarily banish themselves, 273; adopted by Danton and the Girondists, but opposed by Robespierre, id. ii; 274; an armed multitude surrounds the national palace; the members imprisoned, 274, ii; Barbaroux takes his place; he and other Girondist deputies arrested, 275; proceeds to the armed force without, and demands free passage, 276; returns at the summons of Marat, and agrees to the arrest of the deputies complained of by the commune, id. ii; decrees for the same passed, id. ib.; the commission of the twelve suppressed, id. ib.; restores all the committees, 279; orders the committee of public welfare to prepare a draft of a constitution, id.; its different appearance since May 31st, id. ii; Barrère proposes a measure for the conciliation of the departments, 281; decrees that the proscribed Girondist deputies shall be committed to prison, id. ii; that all deputies shall be summoned to appear in their places, and that those who fail shall be expelled, and new ones elected in their stead, id. ib.; deputies sent into several of the revolted departments to inquire into the circumstances of the discontent, 282; steps taken by, to check the insurrection in La Vendée, 290; plan of a constitution proposed by Herault de Séchelles, id. ii; opposed by several members, but assented to, 291; authority of the convention re-established in Normandy and Brittany, 294, ii; receives the final letter of Marat, denouncing Custine and Biron, 295, ii; the president pronounces a funeral oration over Marat, the whole deputies attending, 297, ii; the absolute power of the convention, though an executive power and an administrative, allowed to exist, 298; observations on its proceedings since the 31st of May, 1793, id.; its sittings since the constitution of 1793, short and orderly, 299; charge made in, against general Dillon, of a conspiracy to place Louis XVII. on the throne, 301; debates upon the propriety of removing the members of the committee of general welfare, 302, ii; speeches of Bourdon, Chabot, and Robespierre thereupon, id. ib.; 303; debates on the defeats in the marine department; accusations levelled at Danton, who is defended by Robespierre, 303; decree passed for regulating the maximum price of corn, and for regulating the sale of bread, 311, id. ii; reception of the commissaries of the primary assemblies on accepting the constitution of 1793, 315; the president and deputies attend the third federation of August, 1793, 317; petitions presented to, from the commissaries demanding a levy en masse, 318; decrees prepared, id. ii; the same is decreed, and debates thereupon, id. 319; decree for the consolidation of the old national debt; the institution of the "Great Book of the Public Debt;" and the opening of a benevolence or forced loan, 319, ii; 320—322; decrees passed, imposing the penalty of death on all monopoly, 323, ii; maximum price of corn and commodities; laws relating to, id. ib.; decree passed that a war of extermination shall be carried on in La Vendée, 324, ii; decrees passed for the imprisonment without trial of suspected persons, 325; issues a decree condemning the English government, id. ii; that Custine, Biron, Lamarche, shall be brought to trial; that the Bourbons, except those detained, shall be banished, and that the royal tombs at St. Denis shall be destroyed, 326; decree passed for putting foreigners domiciled in France after 14th July, 1789, under arrest, id.; debates on the remodelling the committee of public welfare, 336, 339; Saint-Just, on behalf of the committee of public welfare, proposes a revolutionary form of government, and a dictatorship during danger, 339; the same and other decrees passed, id. ii; 340; the number of representatives in commission to the army reduced; the armies of Rochelle and Brest united, and called "the army of the West," and the war in La Vendée ordered to be successfully ended by 20th of October, 342; issues an address to the army of the West, id.; impeachment of the queen and of the Girondists ordered, 344, ii; the arrest of seventy Girondist deputies ordered; they are placed under charge of Fouquier-Tinville, id. ib.; decree of extermination passed against the city of Lyons, 348; proclamation issued to the armies of the North and of La Vendée, id. ii; a new law of the maximum decreed, 367, ii; 368; several members engaged in the stock-jobbing schemes, 369; bill brought in by Delanay for the abolition of the East India Company, 369; debates thereupon, id.; the same decreed, id.; caution as to laws regarding married priests, 371; the maximum of salaries to bishops fixed, id.; abjuration of Gobel of his episcopal authority is accepted, 372, ii; the bishop of Blois refuses to join in it, 373; plate and other valuables of the churches brought to the bar, id.; the church of Notre Dame ordered to be converted into the Temple of Reason, id. ii; the ceremonies of the Worship of Reason abolished, 379, ii; arrest of Vincent, Ronsin, Maillard, and others, 381; the ultra-revolutionists treat the massacres at Lyons as a matter of course, 395, ii; repeated petitions in favour of Vincent and Ronsin, 396; reports of Saint-Just and Robespierre, containing a declaration of their principles of democracy, 407, 408; report of Saint-Just against the Ilbertists, 410, ii; 411; on the suggestion of Robespierre it is determined that Danton shall not be heard before it, 415, ii; 416; numerous addresses presented to, on the energy of its acts, 422; ex-nobles and all foreigners banished from the republic, 423; revolutionary army disbanded; ministries abolished; and twelve commissions for government instituted, id. ii; in accordance with the report of Robespierre, the existence of a Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul acknowledged in the name of the French people, 426, 427; pension granted to the widow of Koussseau, 428, ii; proposal for a guard to protect the committee of public welfare, 443, ii; enthusiastic reception of Collot d'Herbois after the attempt at his assassination, id.; full attendance at the fête of the Supreme Being, 447; Robespierre elected president, id. ii; law of the 22nd Prairial, re-organizing the revolutionary tribunal; and debates to which it gave rise, 448, 449; motion made by Bourdon d'Oise, that members be exempt from the power of the revolutionary tribunal, except after impeachment, 448, ii; terror of many members in consequence of the law of the 22nd Prairial, 449, ii; report brought up by Barrère against the sect of Mère de Dieu; the principal leaders of the sect ordered to be sent to the revolutionary tribunal, 450; Guffroy denounces Lebon for his cruelties at Arras; Barrère reports in favour of Lebon, 454, ii; 455; decree passed that no English shall be taken prisoners, 460, ii; speech of Robespierre in, on the 8th Thermidor, 462, ii; 463; defence of Vadier, Cambon, Billaud-Varennes, Panis, and Amar, against the attack of Robespierre, 464, ii; the deputies resume their courage, and endeavour to overthrow the domination of Robespierre and his coadjutors, 464, 465; proceedings of 9th Thermidor; decrees of accusation against Robespierre, Couthon, Saint-Just, Robespierre the younger, and Lebas, 468; its sittings declared permanent, id.; adjourns, id.; again meets, and after addresses from Bourdon, Legendre, and Collot d'Herbois, resumes its authority, and ends the reign of terror, 469, ii; 470; Henriot and the Joputies who withdrew outlawed; Barras appointed to command the soldiers, 470; its magnanimity in the time of danger, id.; numerous addresses on the events 8th and 9th Thermidor, 473; provisional commission appointed, 473, ii; now members to the committees of general safety and of public welfare appointed, 474, ii; the law of 22nd Prairial repealed, 475; warm discussions as to the publication of lists of discharged persons, 476, 477; Tallien and others speak openly against the committee of general safety, 477; debates on the proposed recognition of the liberty of the press, 479, ii; declaration that the accusations of Lecointre against the old committee is scandalous, 484, ii; violent debates on the re-opening of Lecointre's accusation, 484, ii; 485; violent debates and accusations by each party after the attempt on the life of Tallien, 486; decrees for examining the petitions of traders and others, of prisoners and their relatives, on the issue of certificates of civism, and on education, 487, ii; continuation of the reforms in the administration of all the departments, 493; violent petition from the electoral club presented, 497, ii; debates thereupon, 498; decrees for purifying the popular societies passed, id. ii; 499; affiliated and corresponding societies abolished, 499, 500; modification of the maximum, and the requisitions decreed, 502; all accusations decreed to be referred to the committees, 503, ii; violent debates on the proposed exclusion of members for attending the Jacobin club, 505, 506; the convention and Jacobins are openly arrayed against each other, 506; violent scenes on the debate for closing the Jacobin club; the closing of the club decreed, 507, ii; the seventy-three proscribed deputies (May 31st) take their seats, headed by Desaulx, 508, ii; decrees that the Girondists shall not be further prosecuted, but shall not be at liberty to return to the body of the convention, id. ib.; decrees for re-opening the theatres and learned societies; for the establishment of primary and normal schools of law and medicine; for the relief of commerce and trade; and for the administration of justice and observance of religion, 510, ii; debates on, and abolition of the maximum and system of requisitions, 522, 523; sequestration of foreign securities removed, 523; free trade established, 522—524; different schemes proposed and debated as to calling in the assignats, 524; act of accusation agreed to against Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, Barrère, and Vadier, 525, ii; petitions received from the sections for the restoration of the constitution of 1793; revision of the constitution debated, 528, 529; discussions at the appearance of Barrère and three other members of the committee of public welfare on their accusation, 530; riotous assemblage of women, some of whom attend at the bar to complain of half rations of bread having been served out, 531; insurrectionary attack upon, by the mob, 12th Germinal, Year III., and demand for bread; violent debates and decrees of transportation passed against Barrère and his three colleagues, and for the immediate arrest of Choudieu, Charles, and Fausse-doire, 533, 534; and for the arrest of Leonard Bourdon, Huguet, Duhem, and Amar, and for their confinement at Ham, 534, ii; decrees passed that Paris is in a state of siege, id. ib.; decrees to disarm the patriots; for the arrest and confinement at Ham of Cambon, Thuriot, Cressons, and others, 536; ceremonial of the reception of foreign ambassadors, 547, ii; decrees that such of the members as had not obeyed the decree for their arrest should be transported for their disobedience, 549; laws against the emigrants; for the protection of religious worship; for punishing seditious writing, and all attempts for the restoration of royalty, id. ii; the hall besieged by the mob; extreme violence offered to the president, and the representative Féraud killed, 1st Prairial, Year III., 555; deliberations conducted in the centre of the hall surrounded by an armed multitude, 556; several decrees passed, id.; extraordinary commission appointed, id.; all the decrees forced from it annulled, 557; and arrest of many of the Mountain deputies, id. ii; decrees of accusation against them, 559; decrees passed for disarming the patriots, 557, ii; 558; petitions received from the armed mob for the constitution of 1793; and the release of the patriots, 558, ii; decrees for the trial and execution of the prisoners taken 1st Prairial, Year III., 559; order for the bombardment of the faubourg Saint-Antoine, id. ii; decrees for the arrest and accusation of several Mountain deputies, 560, ii; funeral sitting in honour of Féraud, id. ib.; decrees for re-organising the national guard; for restoring the churches to the Catholics; for abolishing the revolutionary tribunal, and for discontinuing the word "revolutionary" as applicable to institutions and establishments, 561, ii; disquisitions and debates on the sale of the national property; on the withdrawing or reducing the value of assignats, and on the sliding scale, 562, 563; decrees for disarming of the city of Lyons, 564; extraordinary commissioners sent to Brittany, 571; decrees of arrest of Leguinio and others, 581, ii; constitution drawn up by Lesage and others discussed and adopted, id. ib.; 582; decrees for establishing a council of five hundred; a council of ancients, and a directory of five; that the new legislative body shall be composed of two-thirds from the deputies, and that the army may vote upon the constitution, 583; decrees that the new legislative body shall meet 15th Brumaire, 585; meeting to hold a funeral solemnity in honour of the Girondists; decrees for the dispersion of illegal meetings of electors, 586; on the motion of Tallien a committee of five appointed to propose measures for preserving the revolution during the transition from one government to another, 592, ii; Tallien reports on the labours of the commission of five; laws decreed in conformity with the same; union of Belgium with France, and division of the same into departments decreed; capital punishments abolished, to commence from the time of the general peace; the alteration of the name of the Place de la Revolution to that of the Place de la Concorde, and an amnesty for all acts except the revolt of 13th Vendémiaire decreed, 593; the session is closed, id.; reflections on its labours, id. ii

National debt, consolidation of, and institution of the "Great Book," 320—322

— guard, original formation of, 21; Lafayette appointed general of, 24, ii; bear the tri-coloured cockade, 26; general enrolment of, 108, ii; conflict with the Marseillais, 120; their defection 10th August, 128; re-organization of, 561, ii; the same suspended, 751, ii

— property, plan of expediting the sales of, 321, ii; debates and plans for facilitating the sale of the, 552; plan for the sale of, suggested by Bourdon d'Oise, id. ii; 553; further debates on the sale of, 562, 563; ordered to be again sold by auction, 562, ii; of France and Belgium, and forests of both, amount and value of, available for the services of the republic, and to support public credit at the accession of the directory, 601

Necessaries of life, monopoly of, made punishable with death, 323, ii

Necker succeeds Turgot as minister; re-establishes order in the finances; retires, 2, ii; is banished, 3; succeeds Brienne as minister of finance, and re-establishes public credit, 6; reads a report on finance in the states general, 10, ii; 11; suggests moderate measures; his plan is thwarted by the court, 14, ii; agrees at the solicitation of king and queen not to resign, 16, ii; is dismissed, 20; his bust carried through Paris, id. ii; returns to Paris; his influence declines, 27; his report on the desperate state of the finances, 31, ii; submits a new scheme of finance, 36, ii; opposes the second issue of assignats; resigns and leaves France, 53, ii

Noorwinden, battle of, 235, 236

Nelson takes the "Modeste" frigate at Genoa, 670; defeats the French fleet at Aboukir, 793, 794; his influence at the court of Naples, 804, ii

Netherlands, second campaign into; scheme of the same, 222, ii; 223; abandoned by the allies, 460, ii; 461

Netherlands, Austrian, Dumouriez's campaign in, 228, 229
 Neuf-bisach proposed to be delivered up, 80
 Neufchâtel, François de, refuses the office of minister of justice, 168, ii
 Newspapers, none in Paris at the beginning of the revolution, 18, ii; of the several parties after the accession of the directory enumerated, 605, ii; licentiousness of, 681; the proprietors and editors of forty-two banished, 751, ii; extreme violence of; measures taken to restrain it; eleven editors of newspapers arrested, 842, 843
 New-year's day, ceremony of, abolished, 82, ii
 Nice, taken by Anselme, 171; ceded to France, 652, ii
 Nicholas, general, falls into the hands of the Lyonnese, 345
 Nimeguen, siege and capture of, 510
 Nîmes, massacres of the patriots at, 564
 Ninon forced to sign an order for the release of the patriots at Toulon, 560
 Nivêre resigns the mayoralty of Lyons, and is re-elected, 251, ii
 Nivose, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.
 Noailles, viscount, proposes the abolition of feudal rights, 29, ii; opposed to the court, 68, ii; resigns, and retracts his resignation, 88
 Nobility, conduct of, in the states general, 11; commencement of their misfortunes, 12, ii; 13; protest against the proceedings of the national assembly, 15; desert the assembly, 19, ii
 Nobles, emigration of, to Turin, 42; law relating to those who were formerly, 756, ii
 Nootka sound, English ships seized in, by the Spaniards, 51, ii
 Nonconformist clergy expelled, 61; perform service at the church of Théatins, id. ii
 Non-juring priests, their agitation, 78, ii; murder of them, 144
 Non-jurets, second bill against, 79
 Normandy, its attachment to the king, 252; meetings and insurrectionary armies in, 280, ii; central committee of resistance to oppression formed at, 282; returns to its allegiance to the convention, 294, ii
 North, army of the, see Military Affairs passim
 Notables, assembly of, proposed; convoked, 3; discussions of, ib. ii; declare themselves incompetent to consent to taxes, 4; convoked at Versailles, 6, ii; new assembly of, convoked, id. ib. declaration against the mode of voting in the states general, 7
 Notre Dame, procession to, before the opening of the states general, 10; celebration of the election of Bailly, Lafayette, &c. at, 24, ii; converted into the Temple of Reason, 373, ii
 Novi, battle of, 339
 Novomontiers seized on by Charette, 255.

O.

Oath of civism taken, 81, ii; taken by the assembly, 47; directed to be, and taken by the clergy, 60, ii; 61; ordered to be again taken by them, 78, ii
 — of hatred to royalty enjoined and taken, 614
 Ochs, his observations on the connexion between France and Switzerland, 539; heads the revolution at Bâle, 775; appointed a director of the Helvetic republic, 799, ii; October 4th, 5th, and 6th, 1789, events of, 39, 40
 Odéon, meeting of electors at the, and acts of the sectionists immediately before the insurrection 15th Vendémiaire, 586
 Offices, sale of, abolished, 30
 O'Hara, commander of the garrison of Toulon, surprised, wounded, and taken prisoner, 385, ii
 "Old Cordelier," the newspaper of Camille Desmoulins, its attacks on the ultra-revolutionists, extracts from, 387—401; further extracts, 407, ii; 408

Old Cordeliers continue to meet at the Evêché, 400
 Old men, tribune for, in the Temple of Reason, 373, ii
 Oneillo sacked by Prugnot, 171, ii
 Orange, prince of, his measures concerted with the other generals, 284; commands the Dutch before Dunkirk, 331; commands the allied army at Fleurus, 469; announces to the states general that he can do no more for the country against the French, 513, ii
 "Orateur du Peuple," the newspaper edited by Bérón, 496, ii
 Orators of the Palais Royal, 18, ii
 Oriani, his interview with Bonaparte, 641, ii
 Orleans battalions, constituted and sent to La Vendée, 288; retreat at Saumur, 269
 — duke of, interferes at the Séance Royale; is banished to Villers-Cotterets; solicits the good offices of the queen, 4, ii; considered leader of the popular party, 9; accused of instigating the fire at Réveillon's factory; his character, 9, ii; supports a motion for a decree against the tiers état, 16, ii; his supposed connivance in the excesses in the Palais Royal, 18, ii; his bust carried through Paris, 20, ii; goes to England, 42, ii; returns from London, 56; his popularity, 57; supposed to instigate the attacks on Vincennes, 62, ii; insulted by the countryers, 83; character assumed by him and his party, id. ii; assumes the name of Egalité, and is elected to the convention, 159, ii; his situation with regard to all parties, 204, ii; motion for his banishment, 205; the same adjourned, id.; votes for the death of the king, 212, ii; Dumouriez suspected of an intention to place him on the throne, 237, ii; the arrest of, and of all his family, decreed, 242, ii; his sons go to the Austrians with Dumouriez, 243; his elevation to the throne again suspected, 284; ordered to be brought from Marseilles to Paris to be tried before the revolutionary tribunal, 326; confined in the Conciergerie, 369; tried, condemned, and executed, 365
 — prisoners at, sent to Versailles and murdered, 158
 Ostend, failure of the English in an attack on, 804
 Ottolmi, his efforts against the French in Venice, 702; his endeavours to stop the revolutionary movements at Bergamo and other cities, 705, ii
 Ouat, deplorable state of the emigrant troops at, 599
 Oudinot, his services at Zurich, 854
 Ourthe, battle of the, 469, ii; 490

P.

Pache appointed minister of war, his character and habits of business, 181, ii; his hypocritical management as to supplies to the army, 187; his characteristics and opinions at the time of the king's trial, 190, ii; dismissed for incapacity, 217; nominated mayor of Paris, 224, ii; summoned to the bar of the convention, 227; refuses to receive the deputation of the Cordeliers and four nations, 232, ii; summoned to the bar of the convention, 233; presented with lists of suspected persons, 261; his speech on the subject of Hébert's release, 265; his indolence in his municipal duties, 269; issues an address to his fellow-citizens on the excesses of the population and its consequences, 311, ii; his evidence against the Girondists, 362, ii; his fear of every party, 404; meeting at his house; quarrel between Legendre and Vincent, 404, ii; he is reported to be intended as chief judge of the new government, 405; his accusation referred to the committee of general safety, 526; his arrest decreed, 557, ii; sent before the military commission, 560; he is liberated, 581
 Paine, Thomas, author of "Duchatelet's address to the French nation," 70, ii; member of the committee of the convention to form a constitution, 169, ii
 Palais Royal, gardens of, meetings of electors and of politicians held there, 18, ii; agitation at, 19; outbreak at, on the dismissal of Necker, 20, ii; demagogues of, 34

Palma-Nova taken possession of by Bonaparte, 704
 Paris, 19; member of the committee of surveillance, 142, ii; elected to the convention, 159, ii; repels the attacks of Robespierre, 464, ii
 Pantheon, inscription on the, 64, ii — club, 75, n.
 — society of, closed by order of the directory, 615, ii
 Papal government destroyed, and the pope forced to abdicate, 773
 Paper money or assignats issued, 53, ii; injurious effects of, 310, ii; great accumulation of, at the end of the reign of terror, 481, ii; the rapidity of the fall in value of, and observations thereupon, 551; discontinued, 648—650
 Pâques Véronaises, 713, ii; 714
 Paris, archbishop of, calls on the king to defend the rights of the clergy, 14
 — Journal, 109, ii, n.
 — Juigné, archbishop of, joins the national assembly, 16, ii
 Paris, his assassination of Lepelletier, 215, ii
 Parliament, meaning of the term, 4, n.; debates in, on the finances, 3, ii; declares itself incompetent to consent to taxes; banished to Troyes, 4; sits there; recalled; royal sitting of; passes an act against "lettres de cachet;" it is annulled by the king and re-passed, id. ii; declaration of; edicts for restraining its jurisdiction, 5; the same registered, id. ii — of Rheims opposes the edicts of Lamoignon, 5, ii Parliaments, powers and duties of, 1, ii — provincial, join the clergy against the assembly, 45, ii
 Parma, state of, in 1796, 636, ii — duke of, offers Bonaparte a million as a ransom for the picture of St. Jerome, 632
 Parthenopean republic created, 400
 Passeriano, the treaty of Campo-Formio signed at, 762
 Pastoret, his speech on the public danger, 108, ii; re-elected to Condorcet, 112
 Patriotic societies held by the sections, 266, ii
 Patriots, the old revolutionists, opponents of the Thermidorians, assume the title of, 504, 505; their conduct and proceedings before the events of 12th Germinal, Year III., 527, 528; the name assumed by the old revolutionists after the reign of terror, and particularly after the events of 12th Germinal, Year III., 527, ii; their conduct preceding the insurrection of 12th Germinal, Year III., 528, 529; their conspiracy of 12th Germinal, Year III., 532—535; seven deputies arrested and sent to Ham, 534, ii; attempt the rescue of Barrère and his fellow prisoners, 534, ii; 535; decree that they shall be disarmed, 535, ii; their increased exasperation against the Thermidorians after the 12th Germinal, 549; new conspiracy of 1st Floréal, Year III., 549; massacre of the, in the prisons of Lyons, id. ii; insurrection of, of 1st Prairial, Year III., and irruption of the mob into the hall of the convention, and murder of one of the representatives; and events of that and the succeeding days, 553, ii; 558; second attempt; they are besieged in the faubourg Saint-Antoine and disarmed, 558, ii; 559; create commotions at Toulon and Marseilles, 559, ii; 560; rescue the murderer of Péraud, 559; finally overthrown and disarmed, id. ii; their trial directed to take place before the tribunals of the departments, 581, ii; their influence under the directorial government, 597; form themselves into a club and meet at the Pantheon, 605, ii; form a secret directory of public welfare, 619; their designs against the government, 650, ii; their attack on the camp at Grenelle, 651; meet at the Old Ride, 841; their power in the councils and the directory, 842; are driven thence, id. ii; re-assemble in the rue du Bac; the meetings there prohibited, 848
 Paul, emperor of Russia, accession of, 698, ii
 Paulus, Peter, elected president of the states of Holland, 514, ii

Pavia, a revolt at, against the French; the same suppressed; the city given up to pillage, 636
 Payan endeavours to release Robespierre, 469; reads the decree of outlawry against Robespierre and his confederates, 471; he is arrested, 471, ii
 Pays de Vaud constitutes itself the Lomanie republic, 775, ii
 Peace, preliminaries of, with Austria, 709; negotiations for, with the emperor at Montebello, 739; between Austria and France, the treaty of Campo-Formio, 761, 762; with Holland, terms of the treaty, 537, ii; 538; with La Vendée, 541; notice of the alleged secret article in, 544, ii; with Naples and Genoa, 670; with Piedmont, 652, ii; with Prussia; its conditions, 538; with Rome, 701; with the king of Sardinia, 628, ii; with Spain, conditions of the same, 578, ii; with Tuscany; its terms, 539
 — prince of the, appointed minister of Spain, 218, ii — and war, power of making, debated, 53; conferred on the king and assembly conjointly, 58
 Pelletier de St. Fargeau apprehended, 620
 Pensions obtained without services abolished, 80
 Penthievre captured by Puisaye, 571, ii; attacked and carried by assault, 575, ii; 576
 Perche the principal station of the Chouans, 438
 Père Duchêne, edited by Hébert, 359, ii; the assumed name of Hébert, 263
 Percy, Jacobin envoy to Dumouriez, 240; denounced as a moderate; some account of him, 375, ii; 376; expelled the Jacobin club, 377, ii; tried and executed, 412
 Pérignon defeats the Spaniards at Salces, 334; wounded and taken prisoner at Novi, 840, ii
 Perpignan, reverses of the French army near, 287; defeat of the republicans at, 333, ii; 334
 Perré, his services in Egypt, 788, ii
 Personal distinctions abolished, 80
 Portre, forest of, the resort of the Chouans, 493
 Peschiera seized by Beauharnois, 637, ii; evacuated by him, 638
 Pétion, minister of war, his ability; his devotion to Carnot, 692, ii; dismissed, 734, ii
 Pétion deputed to bring the king back to Paris, 68; in favour of a republic, 70; is appointed mayor of Paris, 76; surnamed "Virtue Pétion," 99, ii; his opinions of the court, id. ib.; 100; his interview with the king after the insurrection of 20th June, 104, ii; suspended, 112; his intercourse with the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; his endeavours to stop insurrection, 120, ii; 121; demands the dethronement of the king, 123, ii; joins the attack on the Tuilleries, 127, ii; is placed under guard, 181; styled "Father of the people," 183; charged with the safe custody of the royal family, 185, ii; endeavours to stop the September murders, 148; elected to the convention, 169; his character, 161; head of the Girondists in the convention, id.; made president, 162; appointed one of the committee to form a constitution, 169; elected mayor of Paris by a large majority, but declines the office, 175; his moderation on the proposal for immediate condemnation of the king without trial, 200, ii; he is warned of danger by Louvet, 232, ii; demands measures to repress the calumnies in the petitions to the convention, 245, ii; 246; being one of the proscribed Girondists, wanders through Normandy and Brittany, 292
 Petition to the Cordeliers demanding a constitutional ministry, 338
 Petitions, variety of, presented to the assembly, 105, ii
 Petit Jean employed by Dumouriez, 186, ii
 Poyron, accusation against, 303, ii
 Peyssard arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559; sentenced to transportation, 561
 Pezaro, sent deputy to Bonaparte from the Venetian government, 706, ii
 Pfüllendorf, battle of, 814
 Philanthropists, society of, formed, 694
 Philippeau, his speech on the proposed trial of the

- king, 200; his attack on the ultra-revolutionists, 396; his pamphlet, and consequences resulting from it, 399; summoned before the Jacobins; defends his pamphlet, and defies Hébert, id. ii; arrested, and sent to the Luxembourg, 415, ii; tried and executed, 417—420
- Piave, passage of; Bonaparte rewards the bravery of a female suttler, 703
- Pichegru appointed commander of the army of the North, 434, ii; his plan of attack on the allies in the Netherlands, 460; crosses the ice, and takes Bommel, 511, ii; enters Amsterdam, 513, ii; his great reputation after the conquest of Holland, 514; sends artillery and cavalry to capture the Dutch ships frozen in on the Texel, 513, ii; 514; appointed commander of the armed force, while Paris, in a state of siege, prevents the rescue of Barrère; his flattering reception by the convention, 534, ii; 535; attempt by the English and emigrants to seduce him from the republic interrupted, 555, ii; 556; his communications with the prince de Condé, id. ii; passes the Rhine; summons Mannheim, which surrenders, 579, ii; observation on his perfidy or incapacity on the Rhine after entering Mannheim, 591; is succeeded by Moreau in his military command; refuses the embassy to Sweden, 621, ii; corresponds with the prince de Condé, 694; he resigns his command in order to favour the royalists, id. ii; 695; still intrigues with England; elected deputy, 721; his further intrigues; promises made to him, 723; his treason discovered by Bonaparte, 728, ii; 729; his report on the re-organization of the national guard, 736, ii; debates on it, id. ii; 737; arrested and sent to the Temple, 749, ii; 750; banished, 751, ii
- Pictures taken in Belgium sent to the Museum, 519; taken by Bonaparte as part of a tribute from Farnia, 682; form part of the tribute from the duke of Modena, 634, ii; the same from the pope, 641, ii
- Piedmont submits to Bonaparte, 629; peace with, 652, ii; abdicated in favour of France, 608
- Piedmontese, their attempted aid to the Lyonesse, 846; their army under Collin in 1796, 625, ii
- Pignatelli, prince, remains as viceroy of Naples after the flight of the court, 807
- Pilnitz, declaration of, 69
- Pinel tied, condemned, and executed, 508, ii
- Pinct, the elder, arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559
- Piore, his arrest decreed, 581, ii
- Piramasens, defeat of the republican army at, 333
- Pitt, Mr., Mirabeau's opinion of his policy, 64; his design to advance England, 218; digression on his policy with regard to the revolution, id. ii; his influence with the powers of Europe against France, 219; demands a secret envoy from Paris, id.; his complaints against France discussed, id. ii; relation to the convention of a plot ascribed to him, to arm one part of the people against the other, 260; supposed to have originated a foreign combination against France, 325; Prouli and others denounced moderatists said to be spies of, 375, ii; his attempts to crush France; his policy defended, 429; his injustices to augment his resources, and to aggravate the calamities of France, 430; charged by Barrère and Couthon as the instigator of Admiral, 435; his unpopularity with the French princes and the royalists; he is styled "the perfidious Englishman," 494; his welcome reception of Puisaye, 542, ii; his policy tending to carrying on what he termed "a just and necessary war," 545, 546; answer of the English opposition to his policy, 546, 547; promises negotiation with France when the government becomes settled, 611; attacked by the mob; his attempt to justify the Quiberon expedition; his policy in continuing the war considered, id.; his overtures to Barthélemy; his policy and motives in the same, 620, ii; his unpopularity on account of the war, 652, ii; his schemes in regard to France, 667, ii; 668; he opens a negotiation with the
- directory, 668, ii; his alarm at the condition of England in 1797, 720
- Place de la Révolution, its name changed to that of Place de la Concorde, 593
- Placentin, passage of the Po at, 632, ii
- "Plain," party of the, in the convention; its constitution and strength, 167, ii; its reception of Dumonier, 172, ii
- Plays suspended by order of the commune, but order revoked by the executive council, 211, ii
- Pléville le Peley appointed minister of marine, 734, ii
- Pluviose, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 370, ii
- Po, passage of, 632, ii
- Poignard, conspiracy of the Chevaliers du, 62, ii; 119
- "Police legion" organized by Bonaparte, 604, ii; legion disbanded and converted into a dragon regiment, 651; attempt of the patriots to seduce them, id. ii
- regulations of Sioyès; law relating to, debated and passed, 529, 530
- special ministry of, appointed, 616
- Polignac, duchess de, 22
- , duke de, agent of the French princes at Vienna, 494
- family quits France, 24, ii
- Political discussions held in the gardens of the Palais Royal, 18, ii
- societies re-established, 751, ii
- Politicians, their aversion to the new Jacobins, 842
- Politics, state of, in 1790, 50, 51
- Pons, (of Verdun,) one of the five commissioners for preserving the revolution in its transition to the new government, 592, ii
- Popo, the, disents from the civil constitution of the clergy, 60, ii; his peaceful intentions, 539, ii; his inveteracy against France; preaches a crusade against her, 630; sends the duke d'Azara to negotiate with Bonaparte, 641, ii; calls back the first installment of his tribute; sends a legate to Ferrara and Bologna, 654, ii; refuses to recall his pastoral letters against France, 667, ii; relying on Austrian assistance, refuses to pay the sum he had promised to pay Bonaparte, 664; his trepidation at the approach of the French, 700; prepares to quit Rome; enters into the treaty of Tolentino, id. ii; 701; forced abdication of, 773
- Popular party, state of, in 1792, 98, ii
- societies prohibited, 582, ii; limited to sixty members, 615, ii; 616
- and republican commission of the public welfare for the Rhone and Loire established at Lyons, 283, ii
- Portalis banished, 751, ii
- Porte, the, declares war against France, 795
- Port Libre, the seventy-three proscribed deputies at; case taken into consideration, 503, ii
- Portugal abandons the alliance of England, and joins in a treaty with France, 741, ii
- Powder mills at Grenelle blown up, 485, ii
- Prairial, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 370, ii; law of the 22nd, re-organising the revolutionary tribunal; debates thereupon, 448, 449; extreme terror in France in consequence of its enactment, 450, ii; 451; repeal of the same, 474, ii; 475; insurrection of the patriots, and irruption of the mob into the hall of the convention, and murder of one of the representatives, and events of that and the succeeding days, 553, ii; 558; second attempt at insurrection by the patriots after the 1st Prairial; they are besieged in the faubourg Saint-Antoine, and eventually disarmed, 558, 559; events immediately preceding the 30th, 832, 833; revolution of that day, by which two members of the directory are displaced, and a new directory is appointed, 833, 834
- Précy secretly devoted to royalty, 294, ii; wishes to hoist the white flag at Lyons during the siege, 346; quits Lyons by the faubourg of Vaise with two thou-

- sand inhabitants, 347, ii; they are pursued, and only eighty arrive at the Helvetic territory, 348
- Précy, M. de, his continued royalist intrigues, 693, ii
- Precipitant women, tribune for, in the Temple of Reason, 373, ii
- Press, liberty of the, proposed in the convention, 479, ii; freedom of, established, 582, ii; licentiousness of, 681; placed under the superintendence of the directory, 751, ii; irresponsibly free, 837, ii; extreme violence of; measures taken to restrain it; eleven newspaper editors arrested, 812, 813
- Pride's Purge, Guadet's historical parallel of, 269, ii
- Priests, twenty-four murdered in the court of the Abbaye, 141; two hundred murdered in the church of the Carmelites, id. ii; ninety drowned by Carrier at Nantes, 453, ii; return of many to the frontiers; their proceedings, 548, ii; return of many to France; their cordial reception, 728
- constitutional and refractory, meaning of the terms, 371
- married, the convention refuses to pass laws relating to, 371
- Prieur, of Côte d'Or, denounced, 560, ii
- of la Murne, orders the arrest of admiral Morard de Galès, 433; arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559
- Primary assemblies, commissaries from, arrive in Paris to accept the constitution of 1793, 314; internal meeting with, by the convention, 315; accept the directorial constitution of the Year III., 582, ii; 583
- Prisons for suspected persons, several houses hired as, 358
- of Paris, description of the scenes in, and remarks on the eminent persons confined therein; and account of the diversions of the prisoners as related by Riouffe, 358, 359; crowded state of, in 1794, 411, ii; rejoicings in, at the end of the reign of terror, 470, ii; and at the death of Robespierre, 472; crowded state of, with revolutionists or patriot prisoners, 563; thrown open at the close of the session of the national convention, 593, ii
- Prisoners, demands for their liberation after the end of the reign of terror; immense numbers set free, 476
- Privileges, oppressiveness of, on the people before the revolution, 8
- of cities and provinces annulled, 30
- "Procès verbal," mode of signature of the tiers état to, objected to by the nobility, 12, ii
- Proclamation of the Vendéens, 288, ii; 290
- Proconsuls sent from the executive council to Belgium; their violence and extortion, 221, ii; 222
- Proli or Proly, Jacobin envoy of Dumouriez, 240; denounced as a moderatist; account of him, 375, ii; 376; he is expelled the Jacobin club, 377, ii; tried and executed, 412
- Proscribed deputies, the seventy-three released, 508
- Proscriptions at Lyons, Marseilles, and Bordeaux, 357; removed, 503
- Protestants' collision with the Catholics, 50
- Provence, count de, proclaimed by the Vendéens regent during the minority of Louis XVII., 288, ii
- Provera at Millesimo surrenders to Augereau, 627; lays down his arms, 637, and id. ii
- Provinces, privileges of, annulled, 30
- Provisional committee established in lieu of the revolutionary tribunal, 473, ii
- consulate established, 868
- Provisions, scarcity of, and debates thereon, 197, ii; and dearthness of, in 1793, 224, ii; tumultuous petitions in consequence, 225
- Prussia, its lukewarmness in its opposition to France, 1794, 430, ii; refuses to acknowledge the regency of Monsieur, 494; sues for peace, 515, ii; treaty of peace with; its conditions, 536; its declaration of motives for the peace with France, 538, ii; ambassador from, arrives in Paris, 547, ii; policy of, regarding France in 1797, 698
- Prussia, Frederick William, king of, his policy, 50, ii; he attacks Metz, 285
- Prussians, rumoured approach of, 107; alarm of the public at, 108; take Longwy, 139, ii; take Grand Pré, 153; retreat, 156; driven back beyond the frontiers by the republicans, 394
- and Austrians besiege and capture Mentz, 306, 307
- Public safety, central committee of, 245
- welfare, committee of, established; its numbers, powers, duties, &c., 244, 245; see Committee of Public Welfare
- worship, expenses of, provided for, 31
- Puisnye, a royalist in disguise, 282, ii; secret leader of the Chouans; account of him, and his plans in favour of the royal family, 493, ii; repairs to England to confer with the emigrants and French princes, 516, ii; his further proceedings in England, 542, ii; his schemes and intrigues in London for the royalists, 568; directs the Quiberon expedition, id. ii; 569, 570; difference between him and d'Hervilly in the Quiberon expedition, 570-572; captures Penthievre, 571, ii; his perseverance at the expedition, 573, ii; his attack on Saint-Barbe, and defeat by the republicans, 574, ii; 575; leaves Quiberon, and goes on board ship to save his correspondence, 576; bitter and unjust accusations against, by the Chouans and emigrants, 577, ii; 578; attacks on him for the failure of the Quiberon expedition by the royalists, and particularly by M. de Sombreuil, 577, ii; 578, ii; returns to Brittany to prepare for further hostilities, 599; concealed in Brittany, 693, ii
- Puységur, M. de, reported dismissal of, 20, ii
- Pyramids, battle of the, 789, 790
- Pyrenees, occupation of, by the French, 434
- Q.
- Quadruple alliance, scheme of, 651, ii; 652
- Qualification for citizenship, 45
- Quasdanovich defeated at Salo and Lonato, 655, ii; 656
- Quatromaire, Quiney, banished, 751, ii
- Quenoy invested by and surrendered to the prince of Coburg, 332, ii; recaptured, 460, ii; surrender of, 488, ii
- Quélicau surrenders Thouars to the Vendéens, 265, ii
- Quiberon expedition, 569, 570; causes that led to the disastrous termination of the expedition, 577, 578; merciless mode of disposing of the prisoners, and justification of this revolutionary policy, 578, 579; prisoners taken at, shot, 578, ii; debates on the expedition in the English Parliament, 611
- Quiévrain, battle of, 90
- Quinette sent to arrest Dumouriez, 241; he is made prisoner, 242; on his return from captivity in Austria takes his seat, 614, ii
- Quinze-Vingts, the Jacobins join the society of, after their hall is closed, 508; the society closed, 521; dissolved, 527
- Quirini, M., his intrigues in favour of Venice, 719
- R.
- Rabaut, see St. Etienne
- Raffet, commandant of the national guard, rescues the convention 1st Prairial, Year III., 557
- Raffron proposes the trial of Lebon and David, 608, ii; proposes the reduction of assignats to the rate of exchange, 552
- Rambaud secretly devoted to royalty, 294, ii
- Rambaut killed at St. Jean d'Acres, 648, ii
- Ramol, one of the committee of public welfare, 298, ii; his character, abilities, and unpopularity, 692, ii; denounces the royalist agents, 695, ii; arrested, 743, ii; banished, 751, ii; retires from the ministry of finance, 836
- Ramond, 101, ii
- Rampon, colonel, his brave defence of the redoubt of Montelegrino, 626
- Rapinat, commissioner to the Helvetic republic, 799; 3 a 2

- his proceedings, 799, ii; his executions in Switzerland, 822
- Rastadt, battle of, 644, ii; treaty of Campo-Formio ratified at, 764; congress at, 769, 770; further progress of the negotiations at, 781, ii; 797, ii; 798; assassination of the French plenipotentiaries at, 819
- Rations, riots in consequence of only half rations being served out, 531; system of, abolished, 612, ii
- Re-actionists, massacres by, in the prisons of Lyons, 549, ii
- Reason, festival of, 373, ii; 374; goddess of, her appearance at the festival of Reason, 373, ii; temple of, the church of Notre Dame converted into the, id. ib.; worship of, preached by Anacharsis Clootz, 372; worship of, by the sections and communes of Paris; substituted for Christianity, 373; worship of, abolished, 379, ii
- Robespier, his character, 160, ii; accuses Robespierre in the convention, 164; joins in the accusation against him, 175
- Rebellion of Lyons and Marseilles against the convention, 509, ii; see also Insurrection
- Recruiting opposed in La Vendée, 253, 254
- Recruits fested in the corn market, 230, ii
- Red Book, publication of, 54
- cap of the Jacobins, the emblem of liberty, 36
- Refractory priests, meaning of the term, 371
- Regency, motion on, by Mirabeau, 35, ii, 36
- Regeneration, the fountain of, 316, ii
- Reggio, state of, in 1796, 630, ii
- Regulators, their proceedings, 562
- Reichenbach, peace of, 51, ii
- Reign of terror, 448—470
- Reinhard, appointed minister of foreign affairs, 336
- Rejoissance, meaning of the term, 405, ii, n
- Religion declared by the clergy to be attacked by the revolution, 48; the assembly declares that they do not intend to abolish, 198, ii; 199; alteration of, 371; all outward signs of, in comestories, abolished, 371, ii; 372; that of Christianity abjured by the communes and sections of Paris, and that of Reason adopted, 373; Robespierre alludes to the necessity of one, 377; the observances of, revived, 520; laws passed in favour of the worship of, 549, ii; of the Catholics recognised, and their churches restored to them, 561, ii; debates on, and on religious and funeral ceremonies, after the elections of the Year V., 724, 725
- Religious disturbances, 78, ii
- toleration recognised, 520; established, 582, ii
- Renard, Baptiste, his conduct at Jemmapes, 183
- , B., presented to the assembly, and receives a civic crown, 183, ii
- Renault, Cécilia, her suspicions, endeavours to obtain an interview with Robespierre, 443, ii
- Rencher, defeat of the Austrians on the, 644, ii
- Rennes, plot at, 238, ii
- Rents required to be paid in kind, to meet the wants of the levy en masse, 319, ii
- Representatives, commission of, its injurious meddling with the army, 298
- Republic, first notion of, suggested by the king's flight, 69, ii; notion of, gains ground, 70; and a new era established, 163; opinions of St. Just on, 195; third federation of the, 316, 317
- Republican era, its commencement, 163
- society in Paris, its simplicity, 173
- union formed by the sections, 288; its declaration of insurrection, id.
- Republicans, massacres of, in the Bocage, 254; defeated at Fontenay, 287, ii; repulse the attack of the Vendéens on Nantes, 293; defeated at Chatillon under Westermann, 305; distress of, at the siege of Mentz, 307, 308
- Requisitions, modification of, 502; abolished, 523
- Rescriptions issued by the directory, 612; meaning of the term, id. n.
- "Reveil du Peuple," prohibited from being sung in theatres, 605
- Royeillon, his factory burnt in the faubourg St. Antoine, 9, ii
- Revolt in Boengo occasioned by the draft of soldiers, 253, ii
- Revolts in the departments, 199
- Révolution, Place de la, changed to Place de la Concord, 593
- Revolutionary, the word as applied to institutions and establishments suppressed, 561, ii
- army appointed, 339, ii; disbanded, 423
- committee, 244, n.; established, its duties and salary, 339, ii; 340; see Revolutionary Tribunal
- government appointed, 339, ii; 340; one more energetic and absolute, prepared by the committee of public welfare, 380; modifications applied to alter the reign of terror, 473—475
- tribunal, (1792) 136; its powers, id. ii; established, 239, ii; 240; trial and acquittal of Marat by, 248, 249; appointed, 339, ii, condemns the queen, the Girondists, the duke of Orleans, and madame Roland, Bailly, Brunet, Manuel, Houchard, and others, 360—366; its wholesale condemnations and executions, 442; re-organised; its enormous powers, 448, 449; debates on the law by which it was effected 449; number of persons condemned by, 453; a provisional commission appointed to supersede, 473, ii; it is abolished, 561, ii
- Revolutionists, violent scenes between, and the Thermidorians, 497, ii
- , insurrection of, 1st Prairial, Year III., 553, ii; 558; second attempt; they are besieged in the faubourg St. Antoine, and eventually disarmed, 558, ii; 559; obtain the whole influence in the directorial government, 596
- Rowell, his speech on the proposed banishment of the Bonbons, 205; helps in the defence of Metz, 205, ii; promotes the treaty of peace with Holland, 537, ii; one of the secretaries of the council of five hundred, 595; elected one of the original five directors; his services and fitness discussed, 595, 596; his character; his hatred of Carnot and Barras, 690; remarks on his habits and ability, 821, ii; 822, retires by lot from the directory, 822, ii; he receives a sum from the secret service money, 823
- Rexpæde, battle of, 332
- Rey's division of the Austrians lays down its arms at Rivoli, 686, ii
- Rheims, parliament of, opposes edicts of Lamoignon, 5, ii
- Rhine, occupation by the French of the whole line of the (1794), 491; amount of force on the, in 1796, 642, ii; passage of, by Jourdan and Moreau, 643; passage of, by Desaix, 712
- and Loire, the popular and republican commission of the public welfare for the, established at Lyons, 283, ii
- Rhul arrested in the convention, 557, ii; stabs himself, 560, ii; 561
- Ricardos successfully attacks the camp before Perpignan, 287; his successful operations against the republicans in the Upper Pyrenees, 334; his successes against the French at Rosas, Céret, St. Ferréol, Ville-Longue, and other places, 386, ii
- Richard put to death at Lyons, 309, ii
- Richer-Serizy prosecuted, 605
- Ricord arrested, 560, 620
- Ride, the Old, the Jacobins meet at, and revive their club, 841; the same closed by order of the ancients, and the meetings prevented, 842, ii
- Riots in Paris on the dismissal of Necker, 20, ii; incited by Marat's writings, 226; on the formation of an extraordinary criminal tribunal, 231
- Riouffe joins the Girondist fugitives in Normandy, 292
- Rivoli, battle of, 684, ii, 686
- Roberjot attends the congress at Rastadt, 797, ii; is assassinated, 819
- Robert, general, killed at the battle of Arcole, 676, ii
- Robespierre opposes the introduction of martial law, 44; adopts the notion of a republic, 70; protests against the inviolability of the king, 70, ii; excluded from the legislative assembly, 76; "the incorruptible," id.; his power in the Jacobins, id.; opposed to the war, 83; opposes Louvet, 86, ii; his influence in the Jacobins, 98, ii; his early history, his character, and manners, 117; his high repute with the Jacobins, 134; chief in the commune of Paris, id.; demands of the assembly its assent to a tribunal to try the criminals of 10th August, 136, ii; one of the first elected from the Jacobins to the convention, 159; becomes the head of the Jacobins in it, 163; his reply to the imputation of seeking a dictatorship, 164, ii; 165; Louvet charges him in the convention of attempting sole dominion, 175, ii; 176; debate at the Jacobins on the charge, 177; proceedings of the assembly before his defence, 178; his defence, id.; 179; considerations on his successful defence, 180; his oration against the king on proposing a condemnation without a trial, 189, 200; his speeches against the Girondists, 204; his speech on the proposition of an appeal to the people as to the fate of the king, 209; opposes the maximum tax, 225, ii; his doctrine that the mob can do no wrong, 226, ii; his admission to Saint respecting his hopes of the revolution, 228; his suspicions against the Bourbons excited by the secession of Dumouriez, 239; opposes the proceedings of the sections, and of the central committee of public safety, 245; his vehement oration against the Girondists, 246; he opposes the violent suggestions of the Jacobins and Girondists, 256, ii; acquiesces in the preparations for the insurrection of 31st May, 1793, 267; his opinion on the liberty of the press, 279; he is suspected of being in the pay of England, or of the duke of Orleans, 284; supports the constitution of 1793, 291; account of his influence after the death of Marat, 298; he is the only public man un-suspected, 301; his politic management regarding himself and the committee of public welfare, id.; 302; his speech regarding the renewal of the committee, 302, ii; 303; defends Danton from the accusation levelled against him, 303, ii; his arguments at the Jacobins against the dissolution of the convention, 317, ii; 318; is appointed one of the committee of general welfare, 325; his speech in defence of the committee of public welfare, 330, ii; 339; decree procured by him to accelerate the verdict against the Girondists, 364; his policy, 376; he alludes to the necessity of religion, 377; recommends the purification of the Jacobin club, id.; exculpates Danton from the attacks of Hébert, 378; causes the expulsion of the foreigners from the Jacobin club, 377, ii; proposes sending several prisoners before the revolutionary tribunal, 399, ii; discountsenances the personal charges made by Desmoulins against Hébert, 402; his attack on the vices of the English government; he is accused of aiming at a dictatorship, 403; his report, containing a declaration of principles of democracy, 407; his policy in procuring the execution of the Hébertists, 413; his declaration against the factions as evidence of the policy of the committee of public welfare, 414; his insincerity towards Danton, and intrigues for his own advancement, id.; his perfidious disclaimer of Danton, 415, ii; presents a report to the convention, in which it declares on behalf of the French people a belief in a Supreme Being, and of the immortality of the soul, 426, 427; intended assassination of, by Admiral, and the same supposed to be intended by Cécile Renault, 442, ii; 443; his enthusiastic reception at the Jacobins after the affairs of Cécile Renault, 444; on behalf of his colleagues, declines the insignia of supreme authority, id.; his increase of popularity, especially among the women, 445; complains to the Jacobins of the flattery of the newspapers; he is surrounded by a kind of court, mostly composed of women, id.; he is one of the prophets of Maro de Dieu, id.; jealousies begin to arise of him among his colleagues, id.; he,

St. Just, and Couthon, form a party distinct from the others of the committee, 446; his appearance at the fête of the Supreme Being, id.; remarks upon his conduct, 447; complains to the committee of the insults offered him, id.; his plan for rendering the revolutionary tribunal more absolute and sanguinary, by abridging the powers of defence of prisoners, id.; quarrels with the committee of public welfare, and secedes from it, 450; he is still influential at the Jacobins, id.; appears nowhere but at the Jacobins; he there alludes to the dissensions in the committee of public welfare, 455, ii; consequences of his secession from the committees and government, and policy of himself and his coherents; keeps a watch over his adversaries by means of his police; retires for a time to Maisons-Alfort, 456; denounces Fouché of Nantes at the Jacobins, id.; 457; has a conference with the committees upon their political differences, 457; contest between him and the committee of public welfare, 461; he causes St. Just to return from the army, and detains his brother in Paris, 461, ii; his first movement towards attempting the supreme power, 462; proceedings of Eljas against Pyle, id.; his speech to the convention on 8th Thermidor, id.; denounces Amar and Jagot; declares that there is a conspiracy against public liberty, 463, ii; 464; attacked in the convention by Tallion and others; decree of accusation passed against him, 467, 468; he is arrested, 468; sent to the Luxembourg, 469, ii; his admission refused, and taken to the Mairie, id.; his affectionate reception at the Mairie, id.; shoots himself, but is not mortally wounded, 471, ii; carried wounded to the hall of the convention, thence to the hall of the committee of public welfare; his appearance and conduct, id.; he is executed, 472; reflections on his career, his character, conduct, and motives, 472, ii; fête held to commemorate his fall, 578

Rohespierre, the younger, elected to the convention, 159, ii; his speech in defence at the Jacobins on Louvet's accusation against his brother, 177; speaks again in favour of his brother, 178, ii; causes the municipality of Paris to be admitted to the honours of the sitting of the convention, 249; present at the siege of Toulon, 335, ii; decree of accusation passed against him by the convention, 468; his generous offer to share his brother's fate, id.; sent to the Maison-Lazare, 469, ii; refused admittance, and carried to the Mairie, id.; throws himself out of window, 471, ii; he is executed, 472

Rochambeau appointed a field marshal of the army, 81

Rochevoucauld, duke de la, member of the directory of the department, 79; see Delarochefoucauld, also Lurochefoucauld

Rochesjaquelein, M. de la, chosen one of the Vendean leaders, 255; attacks and captures Fontenay, 297, ii; extent of his military command in La Vendée, 335; appointed to the chief command, 339; having died, his command divided, 492, ii

Roderer, his address to the assembly, 101; his speech to the assembly, 129

Riber, battle of the, 489, ii; 490

Roger-Ducos elected a director, 835; his proceedings in the events preceding 18th Brumaire, 850—862; resigns his seat in the directory, 864; chosen one of the three consuls, 865

Roland, minister of the interior, 86, ii; his letter of remonstrance to the king, 93—95; reads it in the assembly; dismissed, 95, ii; encourages "the Sentinel," 99; confers with Bauroux on a refuge, if Paris is invaded, 99; restored as minister of the interior, 132; refuses to pay the assassins of September, 147; tries to stop the September murders; his letter to the assembly concerning the outrages, 147, ii; 148; complains of the excesses of the committee of surveillance, 158; states the condition of France and of Paris to the convention, 163; wishes to resign, but retains office, 163, ii; his reception of Dumou-

- riez, 172; his report on the state of France and the capital, 175; his characteristics and opinions at the time of the king's trial, 190, ii; complaints against, in the convention, 199; his discovery of the papers in the iron chest, 200, ii; resigns, 217; the Jacobins demand his impeachment, 224, ii; escapes to Rouen, 278; commits suicide, 365, ii
- Roland, madame, 86, ii; the composer of her husband's letter of remonstrance to the king, 93; her character; styled the "Circe" of her party, 160; the centre of the Girondist party, id. ii; select society held at her house, 173, ii; is thrown into prison, 278; confined in the Conciergerie, 359; is executed, 365; her conduct and character, id. ii; her exclamation at the place of execution, id. ib.
- Roman states invaded by the Neapolitan army, 305
- Rome, the agents of France insulted at, 654, ii; its appeals for assistance to Austria and other powers, 667, 669, 670; negotiations with, broken off on account of the pope refusing to recall his pastoral letters, 667, ii; treaty of peace with, 701; destruction of the papal government, 773; the city pillaged by the French under Masséna, id. ii; French form of government of; operations of the French commission in, 800, 801
- Romeuf goes in pursuit of the king, 66, ii; arrives at Varennes, 67, ii
- Romme proposes a larger allowance of rations to working men than to others, 526; arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation passed against, 559; condemned to death; stabs himself, 561
- Ronsin, the commissary, his difficulties, 186; denounces Berthier and Menou after the defeat at Vihiers, 305, ii; his rapid promotion; and associated with Rossignol in the war of extermination in La Vendée, 324, ii; placed at the head of the revolutionary army, 340; his violent proceedings at Lyons, 357; arrested by the convention, 391; set at liberty, 403, ii; his character and pursuits, 404; his conduct and ultra-revolutionary schemes, id. ii; again arrested, 411; tried and executed, 412
- Rosenberg defeated at Airolo, 855
- Rossignol, 98, ii; arrested by Westermann, 304, ii; appointed commander-in-chief of the army on the coast of Rochelle, 324, ii; dismissed by Bourdon and Goupilleau, but restored, 330; invested with the chief command of the armies of the West and of Brest, 390; offers to resign the command, 391; placed under arrest, 475
- Rothallier, his enlistment of emigrants, 563, ii
- Rothensol attacked and carried by Saint-Cyr, 645, ii
- Roucher, execution of, 466, ii
- Rouen, parliament at, called "the exchequer," 4, n.; its attachment to the king, 352
- Roussillon, victory over the Spaniards in the, details of, 293, ii; 294
- Rousseau, his remains transferred to the Pantheon, 429, ii; his widow presented to the convention and pensioned, id. ib.
- Roux, Jacques, his brutal conduct to the king, 216; opposes the constitution of 1793; is expelled from the Cordeliers, 291
- of the Marne, one of the five commissioners for preserving the revolution in its transition to the new government, 592, ii
- Rouzet, his speech in favour of the king, 196
- Royère reports to the convention on the conspiracy, 1st Floréal, Year III., 549; suspected of royalism, 592; his arrest decreed, id. ii; reinstated, 605; banished, 751, ii
- Roveredo, battle of, 661
- Royal committee, its members and their proceedings, 619
- family detained under guard at the Luxembourg, 133; transferred to the tower of the Temple, 335, ii; private and domestic life of, while there, 191; treatment of, there, id. ii; 192; rigorous treatment of, 326, ii; the situation of the three princes of, at the end of 1794, 493, ii; 494
- Royal and catholic armies of La Vendée, 208, ii; 209
- Royalist agents arrested, 696
- conspiracy suppressed, 751
- plot concocted by Condé, Pichegru, and others, 694; the same discovered, 695, ii
- Royalty, abolition of, decreed in the convention, 162, ii; 163
- Royou, author of "The Friend of the King," prosecuted, 91, ii
- Ruamps opposes the law 22nd Prairial, 448
- Russia, its indifference to France, 1794, 481; policy of, regarding France, in 1797, 694, ii
- the empress Catherine dies, and is succeeded by Paul I., 698, ii
- Russians defeated at Zurich, 853—855
- and Austrians gain the battle of Novi, 839, 840
- and English capitulate at Zyp, 855, ii; they evacuate Holland, id. ib.; 856
- S.
- Sabatier banished, 4, ii
- Saint-André, Jean Bon, his speech on the condemnation of the king without trial, 199, ii; appointed a member of the committee of public welfare, 300; and reinstated, 303; orders the arrest of admiral Morard de Galos, 433; proposes that corn be adopted as a measure of value, 552
- Antoine, faubourg, fire in, 9, ii; the patriots besieged in 1st Prairial, Year III., and disarmed, 558, ii; 559
- Barbe, attack on, by Puisaye, and defeat of the emigrants and Chouans, 574, ii; 575
- Bartholomew, massacre of, remarks on, 261, n.
- Cloud, the king is insulted on his road to, 65; decree for translating the government to, 864—867
- Cyr, defeat of Charlotte at, 600; his services in the campaign of 1796, 644, 645; his services at the battle of Novi, 833, 839
- Denis, royal tombs at, ordered to be destroyed, 326, ii
- Domingo, disturbances in, and their cause; Port St. Nicholas ceded to the English, 438, ii; Spanish port of, ceded to the French, 578, ii
- Etienne, Rabaut, appointed a secretary of the convention, 162; his speech on the condemnation of the king, 208, ii; one of the commission of twelve, 261; resigns, 266; justifies the commission of twelve, 270
- Firmin, murders at the prison of, 147
- Florent, young men in, refuse to enlist, 253, ii
- Fulgent, defeat of the Vendéans at, 254, ii
- Geneviève, church of, remodelled at the Pantheon, 64, ii
- George, battle of, 663
- Guilloine, lottery of, 452, ii
- Honoré, rue, conflict in, 20, ii
- Hurugue, marquis, joins the demagogues of the Palais Royal, 34; is imprisoned, id. ii; heads the mob of the faubourgs, 102
- Jean d'Acre, siege of, 847, ii; 848; the same abandoned, 840, ii
- Julien, admiral, declares Trogoff a traitor; assumes the command of the fleet off Toulon, but is forced to quit, and leave the place in the hands of the English, 329
- Just, his view of the question of the king's trial, 195; his violent opinions against him, id. ii; his arguments against the king and against regal institutions, 196; his speech after the defence of the king, 207; appointed a member of the committee of public welfare, 300; and reinstated, 303; proposes the impeachment of the Girondists, 344, ii; his report, containing a declaration of principles of democracy, 407; his report against the Hébertists, 410, ii; 411; proposes the arrest of Danton, Philippeau, Camille-Desmoulins, and Lacroix, 415; carries up a report

- against Danton, 416; his address against general Dillon, 419, ii; proposes the banishment of the ex-nobles and all foreigners, 423; thwarts Kléber in his military operations, 436, ii; forms with Robespierre and Couthon a party distinct from the others of the committee, 446; sends for Lebon to Cambay to try the aristocrats, 454, ii; his speech in favour of Robespierre at the meeting of the committees, 457; refuses to treat with the garrison of Charleroi, 459; his report against Billaud-Varennes and Carnot, 466; attack on him by Tallien and others in the convention; decree of accusation passed against him, 467, 468; sent to the prison Ecossais; refused admittance, and carried to the Mairie, 469, ii; he is executed, 472
- Saint-Lazare, attack on, 21
- Louis, meeting of the national assembly in the church of, 15, ii
- Pelagio, suspected persons imprisoned at, 358
- Pierre, chevalier, his services at Quiberon, 574, 575
- Priest, M. de, reported dismissal of, 20, ii; charge against, 57
- Sebastian captured by the French, 492, ii
- Vincent, defeat of the Vendéens at, 254
- Saintanax apprehended for threats against the committee of general welfare, 443, ii
- Saladin elected to the council of five hundred, 591; suspicious excited of his royalism, 592; his arrest decreed, id. ii; reinstated, 605
- Salicotti, the representative, present at the siege of Toulon, 385, ii; arrested, 560
- Salles, his proposal of an appeal to the nation on the detention or death of the king, 208; proposes an accusation against Marat, 225, ii; a fugitive in Normandy, 292
- Salut club, 75, ii; n.
- Salto, defeat of the Austrians at, 655, ii; revolutions at, 705, ii; murder of the patriots at, 707
- Salon des Arts closed by order of the directory, 615, ii
- des Princes closed by order of the directory, 615, ii
- Salvado proposes to limit the income of the clergy, 48, ii
- Saltpetre, deficiency of; mode of supply, 319, ii; manufacture of, encouraged, 432, ii
- Salpêtrière, murders at the prison of, 147
- Sambre, engagement of the, 436, ii
- and the Meuse, formation of the army of, 458, ii; see also Military Affairs, passim
- Sandoz is defeated at Pontenoy, 287, ii
- Sans-culottes, 102; suggestion of Danton for their employment, 257; army of, ordered to be raised, 258; at Lyons decreed to be maintained at the expense of the aristocrats, 357
- Sans-culottide, meaning of the term, 370, ii; the same altered to complementary days, 579, ii, n.
- Sauterre heads the attack on Vincennes, 62, ii; general of the mob, 71, ii; his influence with the mob, 98, ii; heads the mob of the faubourgs, 102; refuses to enter the king's apartments, id. ii; joins the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; invites the Marseillais to an entertainment, 121; charged with the safe custody of the royal family, 135, ii; the mode of performing his duty over the royal family in the Temple, 192; summoned to the bar of the convention, 227; opposes the insurrection of 10th March, 1793, 232, ii; rout of his division of the army at Coron, 336, ii; his proceedings on the 18th Brumaire, 865
- Sauthonax recognises the freedom of some of the blacks at St. Domingo, 438, ii
- Sapinaud, his command in La Vendée, 492, ii; submits on the part of the Vendéens to the republic on terms, 540; begs to lay down his arms, 610; his further proceedings in La Vendée, 622, 623
- Sardinia, treaty of peace between France and, 628, ii; treaty offensive and defensive with, executed, 701, ii
- king of, refuses an alliance, 652, ii; 653; abdicates Piedmont in favour of France, 808
- Saumur, attack on, and capture of, by the Vendéens, 289; besieged by the Vendéens, 329, ii; council of war held at, to arrange the command of the republican armies, 330, ii
- Sauret repulsed by the Austrians, 655
- Sausse, the king and family taken to his house, 67; the king appeals to him for protection, id. ii
- Sauvigny, Berthier de, murder of, 26, ii
- Savoie ceded to France, 652, ii
- Saxony becomes neutral, 646, ii
- Say or Sagun, meaning of the term, 407, ii, n.
- Scarcity, 8, ii; errors of the municipality in providing the means to obviate the same, 197, ii; severe effects of, 310; confused regulations to obviate, in 1794, 440, ii; of the year 1795, 520; in Paris increases, 525; at the commencement of the government of the directory, 597, ii
- Scépeaux, leader of the insurgents in Brittany, 493; submits to Hoche, 624
- Schaumburg, his military proceedings in Switzerland, 799
- Scheldt, the opening of, by France complained of, 219, ii
- Schérer defeats the allies at Loano, 606, 607; dismissed, 621, ii; appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Italy, 812, ii; defeated at Magnano, 817; his retreat, id. 818; his want of energy, 824, ii; resigns his command to Moreau, 825
- Sheridan, Mr., his opposition to the war with France, 429; his arguments and those of the English opposition to Mr. Pitt's policy in prosecuting "a just and necessary war," 546, ii; 547; his speech condemnatory of the Quiberon expedition, 611
- School of Murs re-established, 433
- Schools of law and medicine established after the end of the reign of terror, 519, ii
- Sclavonian soldiers in the service of Venice, their character, 715, ii
- Séance Royale of the parliament, 4, ii
- Séchelles, see Hornault, 290
- Secret directory of public welfare composed by the Jacobins, 619
- Sectionists, the state of the party on the commencement of the government of the directory, 594, 595; form themselves into societies, 605, ii
- Sedman, battle of, 846
- Seigniorial jurisdictions abolished, 30
- rights, power of commuting, 30
- Solz, conferences at, 796, ii
- Sénart arrests the members of the sect Mère de Dieu, 450
- Senio, the passage of, forced by the French, and the papal troops routed, 700
- "Sentinel," the, edited by Louvet, 99; supports Brissot, 160
- September murders suggested by Danton, 142, ii; prelude to, 148; they take place 144, ii; 148; amount paid for, 147; renewed at Versailles, 158; defended by Marat in the convention, 166; authors of, ordered to be prosecuted; the same abandoned, 224; laid to the charge of the Girondists, 363
- Septembrizers, 197, and n.
- Sequestration of foreign securities removed, 502, ii
- Serbelloni, duc de, commands the national guard at the reception of Bonaparte into Milan, 634
- Serfship abolished, 30
- Sergeant, 98, ii; member of the committee of surveillance, 142, ii; named Agathe, 159; elected to the convention, id. ii; proceedings commenced against, 560, ii
- Serres supports an appeal to the people on the fate of the king, 208
- Serrurier, notice of him, 625; his services at the battle of Favorita, 687; his interview with Klenau respecting the surrender of Mantua, 687, ii; with his division obliged to lay down his arms, 825
- Servan succeeds Degraives, 90, ii; proposes a camp near Paris, 92; is dismissed, 95; restored as minister at war, 132; resigns the war department, 168, ii; commands in the western Pyrenees, 287
- Sevestro, president of the Jacobin club at Lyons, tried and executed, 329

- Sages; see Military Affairs passim, and the names of places
 Sieyès, his speech in the states general, 13; his address to the national assembly, id. ii; 14; his speech on imperative mandates, 17, ii; his remark on the title debate, 31; member of the committee to form a constitution, 168, ii; his speech to the convention on the recalling of the Girondist deputies, 525, ii; a member of the committee of public welfare; his proposal of measures to suppress seditious meetings, 527; his great police law debated and carried, 529, 530; promotes the treaty of peace with Holland, 537, ii; declines to become one of the commission of eleven, for framing a constitution, 541, ii; proposes one of his own, which is not adopted, 542; chosen one of the five directors; he declines, and Carnot is nominated in his place, 555, 556; sent ambassador to Berlin; observations on his character, 797; elected a director, 823, ii; his proceedings in the events preceding the 18th Brumaire, 859—862; resigns his seat in the directory, 864; chosen one of the three consuls, 865
 Sillery tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365
 Simon, member of the insurrectional committee, 115, ii
 —, a shoemaker, takes charge of Louis XVII., 360; tried and executed, 421, ii
 "Sire," the title abolished, but decree revoked, 76, ii
 Sleep, the statue of, set up in the cometories, 371, ii
 Shilling-scale adopted, with regard to the value of assignats, 563
 Slays taken by Moreau, 489
 Smith, Sidney, his defence of St. Jean d'Acre, 847, 848
 Société des Echees closed by order of the directory, 615, ii
 Sociétés affiliées, 75, ii
 Sombroull, M. de, commandant of the Hôtel des Invalides, 22, ii; is saved from death by his daughter, 146
 —, M. de, his position at Quilboon, 576, ii; his letter to commodore Warren, accusing Painsye; he is shot, 570, ii
 Soubrany arrested in the convention, 557, ii; decree of accusation against, 559; condemned to death; stabs himself, and is afterwards executed, 561
 Souham, his defence of Dunkirk, 331, ii; obtains a victory over the allies at Turcoing, 437, ii; captures Courtrai, 485, ii
 Soult, his services at Zurich, 853, 855
 Spada, his house in Venice pillaged and sacked, 717, ii
 Spain offers to acknowledge the republic if the king's life is spared, 218, ii; d'Aranda succeeded by Godoy as minister of, 218, ii; the war of, against the convention, and its object considered, 287; its enmity to France, 1794, 431, ii; terms of accommodation offered by, 512; offers to acknowledge the republic if a small state is erected for Louis XVII., near the Pyrenees, id. ii; peace concluded with; its conditions, 573, ii; renewal of the family compact with, 651, ii; 652
 — and France, treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between, 651, ii; 652
 Spallanzani, the house of, preserved in the pillage of Pavia, 636
 Spaniards, victory over, in the Roussillon, 293, ii; 294; beaten at Boulon, 433, ii
 Spanish army, its successful operations under Ricardos in the Upper Pyrenees, 334; successfully defend the camp at Mas-d'Eu, 334
 Spagnochi, governor of Leghorn, seized by Bonaparte, and sent to the grand duke of Tuscany, 641, ii
 Spinola, Augustin, his mansion burned, 641
 — Vincent, sent envoy to Paris, to arrange the disputes between Naples and France, 641
 Stadtholder, enmity to him and his party in 1794; and friendship of the republican party to France, 511, id. ii; he offers to negotiate, 512; the same referred to the committee of public welfare, id.
 Stadtholdership abolished, 614, ii
 Stäel, Madame de, her plan for the king's escape, 119; returns to France; meetings at her house; she is denounced by Legendre, 581; introduces Talleyrand to Benjamin Constant, 733; her attempt to reconcile the Clichyans and the constitutional party with the directory, 745
 Stanhope, his opposition to the war with France, 429; his statement of the number of French ships captured, 433; the same corrected, id. ii
 States of the church, state of, in 1796, 630 — general demanded; suggested by a pan, 3, ii; suggested by the court, 5, ii; discharged for five years, 4, ii; relative proportion of the tiers état in, considered; mode of voting in, discussed, 6, ii; 7; discussion as to the relative proportion of deputies in, 6, ii; declaration against, by the notables, 7; convocation, and opening of, 10; procession on the eve of opening, id. ii; description of the mode of sitting in, id. and ii.; discussion on the verification of powers; separate chambers assigned to each order in, 11; conferences between the three orders, 12; their result, 13; royal sitting of, 15, ii; 16
 Stengel takes Malines, 187, ii
 Stockach, battle of, 815
 Stock-jobbing in Paris, 312, ii; its influence upon the value of assignats, 313; conspiracy to defraud the public by, entered into by some members of the convention, 369; arrest of the deputies engaged in, 391, ii; excessive practice of, in consequence of the repeal of the maximum, 551, ii
 Stoffet joins in the insurrection in La Vendée, 220, ii; second in command of the Vendéens, 389; commands the Vendéens in Anjou and Upper Poitou; orders M. de Marigny to be shot, 492, ii; proposes to organize a regular army in La Vendée, and issue paper money, 516; his violent proceedings at La Jaunaye; he refuses to join the other leaders in their submission to the convention, 540, ii; attacks Chalonais, and is repulsed, 541; signs a treaty of peace for the Vendéens at Saint-Florant, 544; his proceedings in La Vendée after the pacification, 567; is caught up in Anjou with his minister, Bernier, 610; his further proceedings in La Vendée, 622, ii; 623; betrayed to the republicans; sent to Angers, examined, and shot, 623
 Subsistence, committee of, 25
 Sun, companies of, at Lyons, 548, ii; their massacre of the patriots in the prisons of Lyons, 549, ii; re-appear at Lyons and other places, 564
 Surveillance, committee of, re-established, 224
 Suspected persons, general imprisonment of, determined on by the commune of Paris, 258; violent measure proposed at the Mairie and at the Cordeliers for their apprehension, 261, 262; decree passed for the imprisonment of, without trial, 325; decree against, passed; their imprisonment; allowed a short trial, 340; particulars of its enactments and manner of enforcement, id. ii; numbers sent to the prisons of Paris; who are to be considered such, defined by the notice of Chaumotte, 357, ii; 358; their mode of life and amusements in the prisons of Paris, 358, 359; the parallel drawn by Camille-Desmoulins in his "Vieux Cordelier," between the law against suspected persons and the proscriptions under the Roman republic, 397, ii; 398; immense numbers of, tried before the revolutionary tribunal, condemned and executed, 451—453; immense numbers of them discharged after the reign of terror, 474—476
 Sustenance, committee of, appointed, 18, ii
 Sutherland, duchess of, sends a present of linen to the queen in the Temple, 192
 Suwaroff commands the Russian troops in aid of Austria, 812, ii; joins the Austrians in Italy; his character, 824, ii; and Mélas defeats Moreau at Cassano, 825; attacks Macdonald at Trebbia, and forces him to retreat beyond the Apennines, 828, ii; 830; defeats

Joubert, and subsequently Moreau, at the battle of Novi, 835—842; defeated at Zurich, 853—855; his disastrous retreat, 855, ii
 Swabia becomes neutral, 646, ii
 Sweden, neutral as to France, 1794, 431; ambassador from, arrives in Paris, 547, ii
 —, Gustavus III., king of, assassinated, 38, and n.
 Swiss preserve an armed neutrality, Oct. 1792, 171, ii — guards at the Bastille, 22, ii; 23; massacre of, 129, ii; committed to prison, 133, ii; murdered at "La Force," 145, ii
 — soldiers, revolt of, 58
 Switzerland, policy of, in 1794, 431; observations addressed by M. Ochs of, to Barthélemy the French envoy, 539; view of the state of, in 1798, 774; revolution introduced into, 774—777; commotions in the new republics of, 798, ii
 Syria, expedition to, 846, ii; 849

T.

Tagliamento, battle of, 703, 704
 Talleyrand receives Mirabeau's papers or testaments, 64; a member of the constitutional circle, 730, ii; minister for foreign affairs, 733; introduces Bonaparte to the directory; also at the fête given on his return to Paris; and his speech on that occasion, 764, ii; 765; resigns, 836; procures the resignation of Barras, 864, ii
 Tallien subjects Bordaex to military law, 357; suspicions entertained of him, 446, ii; defies the spies of the committee of public welfare, 449; joins in an intrigue against Robespierre, 456, ii; his successful efforts, 9th Thermidor, against Robespierre and his confederates, 460—468; appointed a member of the committee of public welfare, 474, ii; proposes that the committee shall be renewed by the fourth part every month, id. ib.; liberates and marries a young woman who had encouraged his actions, 475, ii; the principal Thermidorian, 481; resigns his post as one of the committee of public welfare, 485, ii; attempt to assassinate him, 485, ii; 488; his attacks on the financial measures of Cambon, 501; his speech on the proposed re-establishment of the constitution of 1793, 524, ii; causes the arrest and imprisonment at Ham of Cambon, Thuriot, Lecointre, and others, 536; his speech against royalty, 550; his speech against the Jacobins, 587, ii; sent as extraordinary commissioner to Hoche in Brittany, 571; quits the Quiberon army, and returns to Paris; reads the report on that expedition; gives a banquet to the Girondists and Thermidorians, 578; one of the commission of five to preserve the revolution in its transition to the new government, 592, ii; moves and carries the expulsion of Job Aymé from the council of five hundred, 613, ii; his speeches against the government for its acts against the patriots, 650, ii
 — madame, her brilliant assemblies, 496, ii; 497; accusations against her by the revolutionists; she is defended by her husband, 521; her patronage of, and friendship for Bonaparte, 587, ii; 588; her influence in society, 617
 Talon co-operates in the schemes of Mirabeau, 59, ii; 60
 Talot, his violent quarrel with Jourdan in the council, 614
 Tannar, check of the Russians at the, 826
 Target, his message to the clergy in the states general, 12; selected by the king to defend him, but he declines, 202, ii
 Tariff, effects of the maximum, 366, ii; 367
 Tarreau completes the Vendean war, 438
 Tarwis, battle of, 703, ii; 704
 Taxes, their oppressiveness on the people before the revolution, 8; equalised, 30
 Temple, the king and royal family confined in the, 135, ii; report of the expenses of, 192
 Tennis court, sitting of the national assembly in, 14, ii; 15

Terrier de Mont-Ciel appointed a minister, 96 Terror, reign of, 448—470
 —, system of, promoted by Robespierre and others, 455
 Terrorists, a name given for the adherents of the late government of Robespierre and others, 480, id. ii; expelled by the sections, 508; order for disarming them, 557, ii
 Texel, Dutch fleet frozen in the, surrenders to the troops of Pichegru, 513, ii; 514; the Dutch navy in, surrenders to admiral Mitchell, 841, ii
 Thabor, battle of Mount, 843
 Theatres re-opened after the reign of terror, 519
 Theophilanthropists, the sect of, 691
 Théot, Catherine, foundress of the sect of Mère de Dieu, 445, ii; she is arrested, 450
 Thermidor, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.; commencement of the events of the 8th and 9th, 462, ii; events of the same, 463—467; real authors of the events of, 476; consequences of those events, 478, et seq.
 Thermidorians, party so called, 476, ii; established after the reign of terror; how composed, 480, ii; their particular principles as developed by the speech of Tallien, 481; their gaieties, the jeunesse dorée, and its effect on society, especially in the article of female attire, 496; their dress and manners, id. ii; re-action produced by their gaieties; their conflicts with the old revolutionists, 497; their attacks on the finance schemes of Cambon, 501; attack by a party of, and of jeunesse dorée on the Jacobin club, 503, 507; oppose the return of the Girondist deputies to the convention, 508, ii; their vehement quarrels in the convention with the Mountain, 521; their successful attack in the convention on the Jacobin deputies, and the arrest and imprisonment of them at Ham, 534—536; increased violence of, against the patriots after 12 Germinal, Year III., 548; their vindictive proceedings against the Mountain, Jacobins, revolutionists, and patriots, 561, id. ii; with the Girondists dominant in the convention, 1795, 564; deputies of the party impeached for alleged royalism; two of them arrested, 592, id. ii; become discontented, 650, ii
 Thervenot, his speech on Lafayette's letter, 98
 Thibaudet opposes the publicity of the constitution of 1793, 520, ii; 529; his speeches on the measures relating to the emigrants and religious worship, 550; one of the authors of the directorial constitution, 581, ii; suspicions entertained against him, 593, ii; 593; he is denominated by the royalists Barre-do-fer, 593; one of the secretaries of the council of five hundred, 595; his speech on the re-organisation of the national guard, 786, ii
 Thierry, valet de chambre of the king, murdered at "La Force," 145, ii
 Thionville, Merlin de, a Girondist, 75; deputy to view the outrages of the mob at the Tuilleries, 103, ii; his reply to the queen's speech to him, 104; aids in the defence of Metz, 285, ii
 Thouars taken by the Vendéans, 255, ii
 Thouin, the brothers, sent to Rome to select the works of art intended for the Museum, 641, ii
 Thouret, president of the constituent assembly, announces its dissolution, 72, ii
 Thuriot, one of the committee of public welfare, 303; resigns his place in the committee of public welfare, 325; his speech against the anarchists, 338; denounced as a moderate, 375, ii; renominated member of the committee of public welfare, 474, ii; decreed to be arrested, and sent prisoner to Ham, 536; his transportation decreed by the convention, 549
 Tiers Etat, meaning of the term, 1, n.; formerly appeared in the states general on their knees, and uncovered, 1, and n.; discussion as to the relative proportion of, in the states general, 6, ii; 7; relative proportion of deputies of, in the states general discussed, id. ib.; election of deputies for the, 9; sit covered in the states general, 10, ii; refuse to be considered

- a separate order in the states general, 11, 12; their rapid advance opposed by the court, the nobility, and the clergy, 12; assume the title of Commons, id. ii; assume the title of National Assembly, 13, ii; their appearance in the royal sitting of the states general, May 23, 1789, 15, ii
- Timber-tax and land-tax carried, 3, ii; registered, 4; abandoned, id. ii
- Tine, new division of, contemplated on the establishment of the revolutionary calendar; particulars of the same, 370, ii
- Tinténac, his mission to the Vendéans referred to, 493, ii
- Tinville, see Fouquier
- Tithes, amortization of, abolished, 30; debates on tithe abolition; they are abolished, id. ii; 31
- Titles of honour abolished, 55
- Tocain sounded, 89; the only one to be in the Tower of L'Unité, 527
- Tolentino, Bonaparte arrives at; executes the treaty with the pope, 700, ii; 701
- Toleration of all religious opinions recognised after the reign of terror, 520; of all religions, 582, ii
- Tolosa taken by the French, 515
- Tombs of the kings of France at St. Denis ordered to be destroyed, 320, ii
- Torlou, the defence of; Kléber at, 336, ii; 337
- Toulon, intrigues of the English at, 309, ii; betrayed by the inhabitants, and taken possession of by the English, 328, ii; 329; preparations for the defence of, 384; siege and capture of, 381—386; naval preparations at, before the campaign of 1794, 443; violent proceedings of the Jacobins at; attack on the arsenal and murder of seven persons; accused of emigration, 535, ii; the frightful and unjust executions of Fréron and Barras at, 454; riotous proceedings of the patriots at, 553, ii; 560
- Toulouse, archbishop of, see Brienne
- , parliament of, its constitution, &c. described, 280, ii, n.
- , disturbances at, created by the Jacobins, 495, ii
- Tournay, battle of, 90; destructive engagement at, 437, ii; recaptured, 461
- Toniol, madame de, governess of the king's children, 66
- Trade, deranged state of, at the end of the reign of terror, and its causes, 481, ii; 482
- Traders, frauds committed by, in consequence of the oppressiveness of the maximum, 365, ii; regulations made regarding them, 562
- Treasury orders or mandates issued, 617
- Treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between Spain and France, 651, ii; 652
- Trebbia, battle of, 828, ii; 830
- Troillard, one of the committee of public welfare, 245; his reception at Bordeaux, 283; renominated member of the committee of public welfare, 474, ii; sent to the conference at Lille, 757; is elected one of the directors, 778, ii; his election as a director annulled; he sends in his resignation, 833
- Trent entered by the French, 661, ii
- Treves, elector of, gives orders for the dispersion of the emigrants, 84, ii
- "Tribun du Peuple," the newspaper of Babeuf; its violence, 615, ii; several numbers of it seized by order of the directory, id. ib.
- Tribunal of 17th August established, 136, ii
- Tricolour, how formed, 26; trampled under foot, 83, ii
- Trinchard, foreman of the jury which convicts Danton, 420
- Triplo alliance, treaty of, 698, id. ii
- Trogoft, admiral, betrays the fort of Toulon to the English, 329
- Tronchet ordered to receive the declarations of the king, 68, ii; selected by the king as his counsel, 202, ii
- Trançon-Ducoudray defends the conduct of Custine, 344; meetings at his house, 735, ii; banished, 751, ii
- Trototin separates from Stofflet, 541, ii
- Trouvé, the French ambassador, insulted at Naples, 772, ii; his mission to Milan, to reform the abuses practised there under the French authorities, 801, id. ii
- Truguet, admiral, reduces Ville Franche, 170; sacks Onelle, 171; supports the plan of Hoche for an invasion of Ireland, 652; his plans in conjunction with Hoche to raise the character of the navy of France; his project with Hoche for injuring the power of England in India, 680; his character, ability, and unpopularity, 692, ii; he is dismissed; his character, 733
- Truth, letter-box of, 373, ii
- Tuileries, garden of, cleared by the prince de Lambese, 20, ii; attacked by the mob of the faubourgs, 102; organised plan of attack of, by the insurrectional committee, 115, ii; attacked by the faubourgs, 127, ii; taken by them, 130; incidents and circumstances attendant on the capture, 131; national convention held in, 162
- Tuncq defeats the Vendéans, 329, ii; he is dismissed, 330
- Turcoing, victorious engagements of, 437
- Turgot, ministry of, 2; dismissal of, id. ii
- Turin, emigration of the nobles to, 42; intrigues of the fugitive court at, 48, 50; further intrigues of the emigrants at, 61
- Turks, defeat of, at Aboukir, 850, 851
- Turreau, his devastating warfare in La Vendée, 492, ii
- Tuscany, peace concluded with; and its terms, 539; ambassador from, arrives in Paris, 547, ii; state of, in 1796, 629, ii; 630
- Tyrol, the defiles of, taken by the French, 681, ii
- U.
- Ultra revolutionists, the commencement of their existence, 380, ii; their two leaders Vincent and Ronsin imprisoned, 395
- United Provinces, war declared against, 220; acknowledged by the French republic as a free and independent power, 537, ii
- Urbino surrenders to Bonaparte, 641
- Utrecht abandoned to the French, 513
- V.
- Vadier joins the intrigues against Robespierre, 446; repels the attack of Robespierre, 464, ii; apprehended, 620; decreed to be transported, 534, ii
- Valazé a witness against the queen, 360, ii; nature of his evidence, 361; tried and condemned, 362—364; gives a pair of scissors to Riouffe; stabs himself with a dagger after the verdict, 364, ii. See also Dufliche
- Valeggio, perilous situation of Bonaparte at, 637, ii; 638
- Valence, march to, 182
- , general, desperately wounded at Neerwinden, 236
- Valenciennes besieged and reduced by the allies, 284, ii; 285; recaptured, 460, ii; surrender of, 498, ii
- Valentinois, duc de, liberated under a fictitious name, 475, ii
- Valenza surprised by Beaulieu, 632
- Valette, general, broken by Bonaparte for losing the heights of Castiglione, 656
- Valmy, cannonade of, 154, ii; 155
- Valteline, arbitration of the dispute between, and the Grisons, referred to Bonaparte, 759
- Vandamme defeats the Austrians by the Wesel, 510, ii; enters Arnhem, 513, ii
- Vannes, the remainder of the emigrant army conveyed to, and conquered by Hoche, 578
- Varennes, flight of the king and royal family to, 66, 67; reflections on, 68

- Varlet, gives notice of the arrest of Fournier, 233, ii; reported a promoter of the insurrection the 10th March, 234, ii; his proposal at the Cordeliers' for putting the remainder of the Bourbon family to death, 261; arrested by the commission of twelve, and interrogated, 263, ii; opposes the constitution of 1793, 291, id.
- Vauban, his vigorous efforts to rally the Chouans at Quiberon, 573
- Vaublane, his address to the king on the subject of the emigrants, 80, ii; his speech on the public safety, 109
- Vaubois beaten by Davidovich upon the Upper Adige; his position turned in the defile of Calliano, 673; abandons La Corona and Rivoli, falls back to Castel-Nova, 676, ii
- Vauchouse, mission of Maignet to, and his bloody executions of the federalists, 454
- Vaugeois, member of the insurrectional committee, 118, ii
- Vaughard, curé of, resigns his letters of ordination in the convention, 372, ii
- Vaugnyon, M. de la, 20, ii
- Vauvilliers elected deputy, 721
- Venaissin, Comtat, ceded to France, 701; account of its possession by the pope, id., n.
- Vendeans, commencement of the insurrection of, 253, 254; the chiefs of the party, 255; capture Thouars, 255, ii; and Loudun and Montreuil, 257, ii; proclaim the count of Provence regent during the minority of Louis XVII.; and appoint a council of government; and the leaders style themselves "commanders of the royal and catholic armies," 260, ii; 289; capture Saumur, 289; and evacuate it, 292, ii; unsuccessfully attacked by the republicans, 293; defeat Westermann at Chatillon, 305; and Laboulière at Vihiers, id., ii; their further successes, 306; they are defeated by the republicans, 329, ii; 330; they attack the division of Ligon, and force its retreat, 335; narrative of the further progress of the war of extermination against, 334, ii; 336; jealousy among the leaders, 335; their success against the republicans at the village of Goron; the republicans retreat to Vihiers, Doué, and Saumur; and are driven back to Brigné, 336, ii; they force Kléber to retreat, but he again drives the Vendeans back, id., ib.; 337; Caneleux retreats to Nantes, 337; their conquest decreed before 20th October, 342; immense slaughter of, at Chatillon, 353; they retreat to, and then evacuate Cholet; retreat to Beupréau; emigration of a hundred thousand peasants, id., ii; take to flight, and cross the Loire, 355; continuation of the war of extermination against; pursuit of them after crossing the Loire; battle of Laval, and defeat of the republicans, 387, id., ii; skirmishes and numerous battles with the republicans, in which the latter are defeated, 388—391; undisciplined and disorderly state of the army; its causes considered, 389, id., ii; obtain the bridge of Beaux, and become masters of Pontoisson, 390; they evacuate the same, and advance to Dol; repulse the attack of Westermann there, id., ii; their further successes, 391; they are defeated at Mans, and wholly destroyed at Savenay, 392; their misery after the defeat at Mans; they are entirely defeated at Savenay, id., ii; 393; termination of the war against the, 438; horrible massacres of, by Carrier, 455; children of many of them sacrificed by Carrier at Nantes, id., ii; 454; their courageous defence against the devastating war, 492, ii; generally abandon their leaders, who disagree among themselves, 516; terms of submission of, to the republic, 539, ii; 540; the peculiarity of their mode of warfare, 609
- Vendée, see La Vendée
- Vendémiaire, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 370, n.; insurrection of 13th; events immediately preceding, 586; revolt of the sections against the convention, and the events of the 13th, 588, 589; band of, 736, ii
- Venetian states, revolution in, 703, 706; continued disturbances in, 712, 713; the republic dissolved, 716, 717
- Venice, peaceful intentions of, 539, ii; ambassador from, arrives in Paris, 547, ii; state of, in 1795, 631; debates at, as to the propriety of taking part with Austria or France; unarmed neutrality determined on, 636, ii; 637; preparations of the government of, against the French, 653; government of, asks for assistance from France to suppress the revolution at Bergamo and other cities, 706; faithless conduct of the government towards Bonaparte; the senate threatened with war if satisfaction be not made, 707, ii; 708; attack on a French lugger in the port of Lido at, 714; terror of the government at the massacres of Verona, and the outrage at Lido, 714; war declared against, 715; military situation and resources of, at the time of the declaration of war, id., ii; the senate sends commissioners to treat with Bonaparte, 716; its republic dissolved, id., 717
- Venloo, entered by Moreau, 491, ii
- Ventose, meaning of the term in the revolutionary calendar, 370
- Verdier wounded at Arcola, 675
- Verdun, capture of, 150
- Vergniaud, orator of the Girondists, 75; his speech in the assembly on Lafayette's letter, 98; his address on the insurrection of the faubourgs, 101; his speech on the public danger, 109, 110; letter to the king, 119, ii; his speech on the arming of the populace before the September murders, 143, ii; 144; his character, 160, ii; appointed a secretary to the convention, 162; speaks against Marat in the convention, 168, ii; one of the committee to form a constitution, 169; his speech on the political consequences of the execution of the king, 209; presides at the scrutiny of the votes on the king's sentence, 213; his speech against the extraordinary criminal tribunal, 231; replies to the attack of Robespierre on the Girondists, 247; his address, swearing not to abandon the common weal, 269, ii; proposes that the gallery of the convention shall be cleared, and tumult thereon, 270, ii; praises the conduct of the people of Paris, 271; tried before the revolutionary tribunal and condemned, 362, ii; 364, ii; and executed, 365
- Vermont, abbé de, suggests a new minister, 8
- Verne, wounded at Arcola, 675
- Verona, the residence of Monsieur, 493, ii; distrust of England at the emigrant court at, 542, ii; attack on by the mountaineers and general Laudohn; massacre of the French; the town bombarded from the citadel by general Dalland, 713; surrounded by French troops, 713, ii; surrendered and pillaged, 714
- Veronese, Easter, id., 714
- Versailles, march to, proposed in the Palais Royal, 84, ii; entertainment at, by the officers of the life-guards and the Flanders regiment, 98; attacked by the mob, 41, ii; murders of September renewed at, 158
- Veto, arguments on the suspensive and absolute, 35; of the king discussed, 78; determined on, against the second non-jurors' bill, 79
- Victor, his services at the battle of La Favorita, 687; and during Moreau's retreat, 826, 827; and at the battle of Trebbia, 828, 829
- Vienna, mission of general Clarke to, 672, ii; attack on the house of the French ambassador at, 781
- Vienne, archbishop of, meets the national assembly at the church of St. Louis, 15, ii; his speech concerning voting in the national assembly, 17
- "Vieux Cordelier," newspaper published by Camille Desmoulins, extract from it, 397; consequences arising from the publication, 398, 399; further extracts from, 400, 401; further extracts, 407, ii; 408
- Vigée tried and condemned, 362—364; and executed, 365

Vibiers, defeat of Labarolière at, 305, ii
 Villaret-Joyeuse, admiral, appointed to the command of the Brest squadron, 433; his engagement with the English under lord Howe, 438, ii; 439; elected deputy, 721; banished, 751, ii
 Ville Francho reduced by Truguet, 171; surrendered to Crespo, 333, ii; 334
 Villeneuve, rear-admiral, his irresolution at Aboukir, 793, ii; 794
 Vimeux appointed to the command in La Vendée, 503
 Vincennes, attack on the dungeon of, 62, ii
 Vincent, his turbulent management of the war department under Bouchotte, 364, ii; frames a petition to the Cordeliers, demanding a constitutional ministry, 338; appears as a witness against Custine, 344; arrested by the convention, 381; set at liberty; his character, 403, ii; 404; his conduct and ultra-revolutionary schemes, 404; again arrested, 411; tried and executed, 412
 Virgin Mary, images of, suppressed, 372
 Vilen, 21, ii
 Vittoria taken by Monecy, 578, ii
 Volta, the house of, preserved in the pillage of Pavia, 636
 Volini, repulse of Laharpe at, 626
 Voluntary enlistments, 152
 ——— exile of the leaders of the contending parties in the convention proposed, 273, ii
 Vosges, insurrection against the convention at, 286; retreat of the allies from the, 492
 Voting in the national assembly, mode of, protested against by some of the clergy, 17
 Vouland joins the intrigue against Robespierre, 446

W.

Walmoden retreats towards Hanover, 513
 War declared with Austria, 813; threatened against the emigrants, 31; of extermination, continuation of the, in La Vendée, 334, ii; 336; further progress of, 492, ii; 493; declared against the king of Hungary and Bohemia, 89; the same against England and Holland, 220; the same against Spain, 286; declared against Venice, 715. See further Military Affairs, passim
 ——— art of, observations on the progress of, 349, 350
 ——— power of making, debated, 52; conferred on the king and assembly conjointly, 53
 ——— division of parties on the question of, in 1792, 83
 Warren, commodore, commands the ships on the Quiberon expedition, 569; his strenuous, but ineffectual assistance to the emigrants at Quiberon, and his humane endeavours to save them after their defeat, 576, 577; gives to Olerfait the stores remaining after the Quiberon expedition, 599, ii
 Washington, his policy against France in 1797, 798
 Watignies, victory of the republicans over the Austrians at, 351
 Weights and measures, new system of, adopted, 369, ii; 370
 Weissenburg, the lines of, forced by the French, 355, ii
 West, army of, composed by the union of the armies of

Brest and of Rochelle, 342. See further Military Affairs, passim
 Westermann commands the Marseillais, 130; proceeds to the Vendean war, 304; he is defeated at Châtillon, 305; is restored to his command; enters Châtillon, 352, ii; advances to Mortagne; is driven back; abandons Châtillon; enters the town in the night and commits immense slaughter, 353; defeated at Laval by the Vendéans, 387, ii; attacks the Vendéans in the town of Mans, and routs them, 392; tried and executed, 417—420
 Wickham, his overtures to Barthélemy, 620, ii; intrigues with Pichegru, 621; conducts the intrigues of the English in Switzerland in favour of the royalists, 694, ii
 Wills, right of making, abolished, 230, ii
 Willot arrested and sent to the Temple, 749, 750
 Wimpfen, Felix, proposal to, to deliver up Neuf-brissach, 80; appointed general of the departmental army of Normandy and Brittany, 202; he refuses to go to Paris; is a royalist in disguise, 262, ii; his command in La Vendée, 238; his proposal to the proscribed deputies; the federalists under him repulsed at Evreux, 292
 Withdrawing rooms of Paris, their brilliancy after the end of the reign of terror, 497
 Worms captured by Custine, 169, ii; 170
 Worship of Reason abolished, 379, ii
 Wukassovich defeated at the delfe of San Marco, 661
 Wurmsers takes the bridge of Neckar, and shuts Pichegru up in Mannheim, 699; arrives at the head of an army on the Adige, 654, ii; arrives before Castiglione, 656, ii; defeated there, 657, 658; and at Bassano, 662; retreats to Mantua; he is defeated at St. George, and shut up in Mantua, 663; besieged there, 663; informs Bonaparte of a plot to poison him, 686
 Wurtzburg taken by Jourdan, 646, ii; battle of, 663, 664

Y.

York, duke of, his measures concerted with the other generals; his command; his elevation to the throne of France suspected, 284; summons Valenciennes to surrender, 309; summons Cambrai, 316; lays siege to Dunkirk; retires from before the town after the battle of Hondschote, 331, 332; has the command of forty thousand men in the Netherlands in 1794, 430; his precipitate retreat at Turcoing, 437, ii; retires to the Lower Meuse and the Rhine, 489; retires to Bois le Duc; is driven across the Meuse at Grave, id. ii; driven from the banks of the Wal, 491, id. ii; his command of the expedition against Holland, 541
 Young men's league against the Jacobins, 488, id. ii
 Ypres captured, 458

Z.

Zealand, province of, taken possession of by the French, 514
 Zorzi, his house at Venice pillaged and sacked, 717, ii
 Zurich, victory gained by the French over the Russians at, 853—855

A SELECTION

FROM

Catalogue of Popular and Standard Books

PUBLISHED BY

WILLIAM P. NIMMO, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

~~~~~
* * Complete Catalogues of Mr. NIMMO's Publications, choicely printed and elegantly bound, suitable for the Library, Presentation, and School Prizes, etc. etc., will be forwarded gratis, post free, on application.
~~~~~

'Mr. Nimmo's Books are well known as marvels of cheapness, elegance, and sterling worth.'—OBSERVER.

HUGH MILLER'S WORKS.

~~~~~
CHEAP POPULAR EDITIONS,

In crown 8vo, cloth extra, price 5s. each.

1. My Schools and Schoolmasters ; or, The Story of my Education. Twenty-Sixth Edition.
2. The Testimony of the Rocks ; or, Geology in its Bearings on the Two Theologies, Natural and Revealed. Profusely Illustrated. Forty-Four Thousand.
3. The Cruise of the Betsey ; or, A Summer Ramble among the Fossiliferous Deposits of the Hebrides. With Rambles of a Geologist ; or, Ten Thousand Miles over the Fossiliferous Deposits of Scotland. Eleventh Edition.
4. Sketch - Book of Popular Geology. Eighth Edition.

[Continued on next page.]

HUGH MILLER'S WORKS.

CHEAP POPULAR EDITIONS,

In crown 8vo, cloth extra, price 5s. each.

5. First Impressions of England and its PEOPLE. Fifteenth Edition.
6. Scenes and Legends of the North of SCOTLAND; or, The Traditional History of Cromarty. Fourteenth Edition.
7. The Old Red Sandstone; or, New Walks in an Old Field. Profusely Illustrated. Twentieth Edition.
8. The Headship of Christ and the Rights of the Christian People. With Preface by PETER BAYNE, A.M. Eighth Edition.
9. Footprints of the Creator; or, The Asterolepis of Stromness. With Preface and Notes by MRS. MILLER, and a Biographical Sketch by Professor AGASSIZ. Profusely Illustrated. Eighteenth Edition.
10. Tales and Sketches. Edited, with a Preface, by Mrs. MILLER. Ninth Edition.
11. Essays: Historical and Biographical, Political and Social, Literary and Scientific. Seventh Edition.
12. Edinburgh and its Neighbourhood, Geological and Historical. With the GEOLOGY OF THE BASS ROCK. Sixth Edition.
13. Leading Articles on Various Subjects. Edited by his Son-in-law, the Rev. JOHN DAVIDSON. With a Characteristic Portrait of the Author, fac-simile from a Photograph, by D. O. HILL, R.S.A. Sixth Edition.

* * Hugh Miller's Works may also be had in complete sets of 13 Volumes, bound in half-calf with extra bands, price £4, 17s. 6d., or elegantly bound in roxburgh style, gilt top, price £3, 18s., or in cloth extra, gold and black printing, new style, gilt top, price £3, 5s.

HUGH MILLER'S WORKS.

NEW CHEAP RE-ISSUE.

IN announcing a NEW CHEAP EDITION of the WORKS of HUGH MILLER, the Publisher does not consider it necessary to add anything by way of commendation. The fame of Hugh Miller is securely established throughout the world, and his works, by universal consent, take rank among the highest in English Literature.

To the higher and more cultivated classes of society, he appeals by the purity and elegance of his style, as well as by his remarkable powers of description, and his profound knowledge of the marvels of nature. To the humbler classes and the working man, the story of his life—himself originally a working man in the strictest sense of the word, pushing his way upward to the distinguished position which he attained—must possess a peculiar charm, and to them his writings cannot fail to prove of special value.

At the present time, the works of Hugh Miller, one of the most gifted of our self-taught and self-made men, are peculiarly suited to exercise a most powerful influence in promoting the great cause of the progress of Education; and this new Edition, while elegant enough to command a place in the libraries of the rich, is cheap enough to be within the reach of the student and the working man.

Although many of his books have already attained an immense sale notwithstanding their high price, the Publisher feels assured that they only require to be offered to the general public at a moderate rate to ensure for them a very widely increased circulation.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

'This attempt to bring the works of so distinguished an author within the reach of all classes cannot fail to be universally appreciated.'—Morning Star.

'Hugh Miller's writings have long passed the period of criticism, and taken rank among standard works. From the times of the British Essayists and Oliver Goldsmith, no literary man has shown a greater mastery of the English language than the author of The Old Red Sandstone. The size of the page and the letterpress are suitable for the library, while the price is a third less than the original edition.'—Daily Review.

'The moderate price at which the series is now offered, however, will enable thousands of readers to acquire for themselves those volumes which they have hitherto only found accessible by means of the circulating library. From the pure, manly, and instructive character of his writings—whether social, moral, or scientific—and from the fascinating attractions of his style, we do not know any works better deserving of a vast circulation than those of Hugh Miller. The edition is clearly printed, and altogether well got up.'—Glasgow Herald.

'This cheap re-issue by Mr. Nimmo will enable tens of thousands who have yet only heard of Hugh Miller soon to learn to appreciate and admire him.'—Bell's Messenger.

'This cheap edition of Hugh Miller's works deserves, and will doubtless secure, a very extended public support. No one knew better than Hugh Miller how to combine amusement with instruction; and all his works exhibit this most important combination.'—Public Opinion.

'The works of Hugh Miller cannot be too widely known or studied; and the publisher deserves our thanks for his cheap re-issue of them.'—The Standard.

'A new cheap issue of Hugh Miller's admirable works will be hailed with pleasure by all who desire to possess a really valuable collection of books.'—The Observer.

'A marvel of cheapness and excellence, even in this age of cheap literature.'—OBSERVER.

NIMMO'S
Library Edition of Standard Works.

In large demy 8vo, with Steel Portrait and Vignette, handsomely bound, roxburgh style, gilt top, price 5s. each.

1. Shakespeare's Complete Works. With a Biographical Sketch by MARY COWDEN CLARKE, a Copious Glossary, and numerous Illustrations.
* * * This Edition is based on the Text of Johnson, Steevens, and Reed, which is allowed to be one of the most accurate; and, so far as regards mechanical correctness, it will contrast favourably with many high-priced and ambitious editions.
2. Burns' Complete Works. Containing also his Remarks on Scottish Song, General Correspondence, Letters to Clarinda, and Correspondence with George Thomson. With Life and Variorum Notes, and full-page Illustrations by eminent Artists.
3. Goldsmith's Miscellaneous Works. Including 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' 'Citizen of the World,' 'Polite Learning,' Poems, Plays, Essays, etc. etc.
4. Lord Byron's Poetical Works. With Life. Illustrated with full-page Engravings on Wood by eminent Artists.
5. Josephus: The Whole Works of FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS, the Jewish Historian. Translated by WILLIAM WHISTON, A.M. With Life, Portrait, Notes, and Index, etc.
6. The Arabian Nights' Entertainments. Translated from the Arabic. An entirely New and Complete Edition. With upwards of a Hundred Illustrations on Wood, drawn by S. J. GROVES.
7. The Works of Jonathan Swift, D.D. Carefully selected. Including 'A Tale of a Tub,' 'Gulliver's Travels,' 'Journal to Stella,' 'Captain Creighton,' 'Directions to Servants,' Essays, Poems, etc. etc. With a Biography of the Author, and Original and Authentic Notes.
8. The Works of Daniel Defoe. Carefully selected from the most authentic sources. Including 'Robinson Crusoe,' 'Colonel Jack,' 'Memoirs of a Cavalier,' 'Journal of the Plague in London,' 'Duncan Campbell,' 'Complete English Tradesman,' etc. etc. With Life of the Author.
9. The Works of Tobias Smollett. Carefully selected from the most authentic sources. Including 'Roderick Random,' 'Peregrine Pickle,' 'Humphry Clinker,' Plays, Poems. With Life, etc.
10. The Canterbury Tales and Faerie QUEENE: With other Poems of CHAUCER and SPENSER. Edited for Popular Perusal, with current Illustrative and Explanatory Notes. With Lives of the Authors.

[Continued on next page.]

NIMMO'S Library Edition of Standard Works.

CONTINUED.

11. The Works of the British Dramatists.
Carefully selected from the Original Editions. Including the best Plays of BEN JONSON, CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE, BEAUMONT and FLETCHER, PHILIP MASSINGER, etc. etc. With copious Notes, Biographies, and a Historical Introduction.
12. The Scottish Minstrel: The Songs and Song Writers of Scotland subsequent to Burns. With Biographies, etc. etc. By the Rev. CHARLES ROGERS, LL.D.
13. Moore: The Poetical Works of Thomas MOORE. New Edition, carefully revised. With Life. Illustrated with full-page Engravings on Wood by eminent Artists.
14. Fielding: The Writings of Henry FIELDING. Comprising his Celebrated Works of Fiction. With Life, etc.
15. Sterne: The Works of Laurence STERNE. New and Complete Edition. Including 'Tristram Shandy,' 'A Sentimental Journey,' Sermons, Letters, etc. etc.
16. Boswell's Johnson: The Life of Samuel JOHNSON, LL.D. By JAMES BOSWELL. New and Complete Edition, carefully revised from the most authentic sources, with Notes, etc. etc.
17. Mrs. Hemans: The Poems of Felicia Hemans. Complete Copyright Edition. With Portrait, Notes, Appendix, Index, etc.
18. Cowper: The Complete Works of WILLIAM COWPER; including his Letters, Poems, and Private Correspondence. With Memoir. Edited by the Rev. T. S. GRIMSHAW, A.M., F.S.A., M.R.S.L. Illustrated with full-page Engravings on Wood by eminent Artists.
19. Cicero's Life and Letters. The Life by Dr. MIDDLETON; Letters to his friends, translated by WM. MELMOTH; Letters to Atticus, translated by Dr. HEBERDEN. With Portrait, Notes, etc.
20. Xenophon's Works: The Complete Works of Xenophon. Translated into English by ASHLEY, SPELMAN, SMITH, FIELDING, and others. A New Edition. With Portrait, Notes, Index, etc.
21. The Works of Samuel Johnson, LL.D. With Introductory Essay on his Life and Genius by ARTHUR MURPHY, and Thirty-two Portraits on Steel.
22. The English Essayists: A Comprehensive Selection from the works of the great Essayists from LORD BACON to JOHN RUSKIN. With Portraits, Biographical Notices, Critical Notes, Index, etc.
23. The Tatler and The Guardian. Complete in one Volume. With Portrait of Sir Richard Steele, Notes, and a General Index.

* * * This Series is also kept bound in cloth extra, full gilt side, back, and edges, price 6s. 6d. each; and in half-calf extra, marbled sides, edges, and end papers, price 8s. 6d. each.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

NIMMO'S ELEGANT GIFT BOOKS.

Small 4to, beautifully printed on superior paper, handsomely bound in cloth extra, bevelled boards, gilt edges, price 6s. each.

I.
ROSES AND HOLLY:

A Gift Book for all the Year. With Original Illustrations by eminent Artists.

II.
PEN AND PENCIL PICTURES FROM
THE POETS.

With Choice Illustrations by the most eminent Artists.

III.
GEMS OF LITERATURE:

Elegant, Rare, and Suggestive. Illustrated by distinguished Artists.

IV.
THE BOOK OF ELEGANT EXTRACTS.

Profusely Illustrated by the most eminent Artists.

V.
THE GOLDEN GIFT.

Profusely Illustrated with Original Engravings on Wood by eminent Artists.

VI.
THE POETICAL WORKS OF EDGAR ALLAN POE.

With Twenty-Eight Original Illustrations by eminent Artists, and a New Memoir.

VII.
THE LITERARY BOUQUET:

GATHERED FROM FAVOURITE AUTHORS.

Profusely Illustrated by eminent Artists.

VIII.
THE TREASURY OF LITERATURE AND ART:

A SELECTION FROM THE BEST WRITERS.

With numerous Illustrations by eminent Artists.

IX.
THE GARLAND OF POETRY AND PROSE.

BY CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

With numerous Engravings by eminent Artists.

X.
THE CABINET OF GEMS.

GATHERED FROM CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

With numerous Illustrations by eminent Artists.

Just ready,

ENTIRELY NEW CLOTH BINDING,

WITH BEAUTIFULLY ILLUMINATED IMITATION IVORY TABLET ON SIDE, PRICE
3s. 6d. ALSO KEPT IN CLOTH EXTRA, GILT EDGES, WITHOUT TABLET.

IN FINE MOROCCO, PLAIN, PRICE 7s. 6d.

NIMMO'S POPULAR EDITION OF THE WORKS OF THE POETS.

In fcap. 8vo, printed on toned paper. Each volume contains a Memoir, and is illustrated with a Portrait of the Author engraved on Steel, and numerous full-page Illustrations on Wood, from designs by eminent Artists; also beautiful Illuminated Title-page.

-
1. Longfellow's Poetical Works.
  2. Scott's Poetical Works.
  3. Byron's Poetical Works.
  4. Moore's Poetical Works.
  5. Wordsworth's Poetical Works.
  6. Cowper's Poetical Works.
  7. Milton's Poetical Works.
  8. Thomson's Poetical Works.
  9. Goldsmith's Choice Works.
  10. Pope's Poetical Works.
  11. Burns' Poetical Works.
  12. The Casquet of Gems. Choice Selections from the Poets.
  13. The Book of Humorous Poetry.
  14. Ballads: Scottish and English.
  15. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and Holy War.
  16. Lives of the British Poets.
  17. The Prose Works of Robert Burns.
  18. Poems, Songs, and Ballads of the Sea.
-

* * This Series of Books, from the very superior manner in which it is produced, is at once the cheapest and handsomest edition of the Poets in the market. The volumes form elegant and appropriate Presents as School Prizes and Gift-Books, either in cloth or morocco.

'They are a marvel of cheapness, some of the volumes extending to as many as 700, and even 900, pages, printed on toned paper in a beautifully clear type. Add to this, that they are profusely illustrated with wood engravings, are elegantly and tastefully bound, and that they are published at 3s. 6d. each, and our recommendation of them is complete.'—Scotsman.

NIMMO'S NATIONAL LIBRARY.

In crown 8vo, with Steel Frontispiece and Vignette, handsomely bound, cloth extra, price 5s. each; also in full gilt side, back, and edges, price 6s. each.

I.

Seventh Thousand.

The English Circumnavigators: The most remarkable Voyages round the World by English Sailors. (Drake, Dampier, Anson, and Cook's Voyages.) With a Preliminary Sketch of their Lives and Discoveries. Edited, with Notes, Maps, etc., by DAVID LAING PURVES and R. COCHRANE.

'An admirable reprint of the well-known narratives of the voyages of Drake, Dampier, Anson, and Cook. . . . An attractive, well-bound, illustrated, and indexed book about the adventures of the old English sailors—literally the most thrilling of all romances of the sea.'—N. B. Daily Mail.

II.

The Book of Adventure and Peril: A Record of Heroism and Endurance on Sea and Land. Compiled and Edited by CHARLES BRUCE, Editor of 'Sea Songs and Ballads,' 'The Birthday Book of Proverbs,' etc. Illustrated.

'A wholesome book for the young, well put together, full of judiciously selected instances. . . . To the healthy stimulus given by such books as this we owe the possession of not a few of our best soldiers and sailors, who have thence caught the enthusiasm of heroism, and worked it out in their own lives.'—Athenæum.

III.

The Great Triumphs of Great Men. Edited by JAMES MASON. Illustrated.

IV.

Great Historical Mutinies, comprising the Story of the Mutiny of the 'Bounty,' the Mutiny at Spithead, the Mutiny at the Nile, Mutinies in Highland Regiments, and the Indian Mutiny. By DAVID HERRERT, M.A.

V.

Famous Historical Scenes from Three Centuries. Pictures of celebrated events from the Reformation to the end of the French Revolution. Selected from the works of Standard Authors by A. R. HOPKINSON MONCRIEFF.

VI.

The English Explorers; comprising details of the more famous Travels by Mandeville, Bruce, Park, and Livingstone. With Map, and Chapter on Arctic Exploration.

'An entrancing volume, and one that can be recommended.'—Publishers' Circular.

VII.

The Book for Every Day; containing an Inexhaustible Store of Amusing and Instructive Articles. Edited by JAMES MASON.

VIII.

The Book of Noble Englishwomen: Lives made Illustrious by Heroism, Goodness, and great Attainments. Edited by CHARLES BRUCE. 'The selection made is as wise as the sketches themselves are satisfactory.'—The World.

IX.

A Hundred Wonders of the World in Nature and Art, described according to the latest Authorities, and profusely Illustrated. Edited by JOHN SMALL, M.A.

Other Popular and Standard Volumes in Preparation.

'Mr. W. P. Nimmo should rank high among those who produce books for presents. He has a strong sense of the particular subjects that are likely to be at once amusing to youngsters, and of service to them in an informative way.'—Scotsman.

NIMMO'S SELECT LIBRARY.

New Series of Choice Books, beautifully printed on superfine paper, profusely illustrated with original Engravings by the first Artists, and elegantly bound in cloth extra, plain edges, price 3s. 6d. each, or richly bound in cloth and gold, and gilt edges, price 5s. each.

THIRD EDITION.

1. Almost Faultless: A Story of the Present Day. By the Author of 'A Book for Governesses.'

'The author has written a capital story in a high moral tone.'—The Court Journal.

SECOND EDITION.

2. Lives of Old English Worthies before the Conquest. By W. H. DAVENPORT ADAMS.

'The author's aim is to illuminate, what may be regarded as obscure, certain periods of historic England, accompanied with biographical sketches. The book is beautifully bound and printed, and cannot fail to command popular support.'—Courant.

SECOND EDITION.

3. Every-day Objects; or, Picturesque Aspects of Natural History. By W. H. DAVENPORT ADAMS.

FIFTH EDITION.

4. My Schoolboy Friends: A Story of Whitminster Grammar School. By ASCOTT R. HOPE, Author of 'A Book about Dominies,' 'Stories of School Life,' etc.

"My Schoolboy Friends" is a most interesting book. It has many attractive qualities, which are sure to win for it a wide and lasting popularity among the best sort of readers. Boys, for whom it is especially written, will thoroughly enjoy it.'—Westminster Review.

SECOND EDITION.

5. Drifted and Sifted: A Domestic Chronicle of the Seventeenth Century.

'The author of this interesting, and we may add pathetic, story appears to possess the art of reproducing bygone times with much ability.'—The Record.

6. Warrior, Priest, and Statesman; or, English Heroes in the Thirteenth Century. By W. H. DAVENPORT ADAMS.

7. Totty Testudo. The Life and Wonderful Adventures of TOTTY TESTUDO. An Autobiography by FLORA F. WYLDK.

'The book is of engrossing interest, and the reader will be astonished, as he lays it down, to find that he has been able to get so much entertainment and instruction from the personal adventures of a tortoise.'—Inverness Courier.

8. On Holy Ground; or, Scenes and Incidents in the Land of Promise. By EDWIN HODDER, Author of 'Memories of New Zealand Life,' 'The Junior Clerk,' etc.

10 WILLIAM P. NIMMO, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

---

IMPORTANT WORK ON ENGLISH SPELLING.

Just ready, in crown 8vo, cloth extra, price 2s.,

ENGLISH SPELLINGS AND
-SPELLING RULES:

Being an attempt to systematize the chief difficulties of English Orthography; to which is added Dictation Exercises and Rules for the Syllabication of Words. Designed for general use and for Schools. Forming Part I. of the HANDY ENGLISH WORD BOOK.

BY THE REV. JAMES STORMONTIL,

Author of 'The Etymological and Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language,'
'The School Etymological Dictionary and Word Book,' etc.

'This small work forms Part First of a larger work, entitled "The Handy English Word Book." It is published in this separate form, as it is believed that such a publication is much needed, not only for private study, but for use in Schools. It is an attempt to unravel, in a simple way, many of the real difficulties of English Spelling.'—Extract from Author's Preface.

---

Demy 8vo, cloth, price 10s. 6d.,

JAMIESON'S SCOTTISH DICTIONARY.

Abridged from the Dictionary and Supplement (in 4 vols. 4to) by JOHN JOHNSTONE. An entirely New Edition, Revised and Enlarged, by JOHN LONGMUIR, A.M., LL.D., formerly Lecturer in King's College and University, Aberdeen.

---

In Four Volumes bound in Two, roxburgh style, crown 8vo, cloth, price 12s.,

THE PEOPLE'S EDITION OF TYTLER'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND,

FROM THE ACCESSION OF ALEXANDER III. TO THE UNION.

---

COMPLETION OF THE COPYRIGHT EDITION OF WILSON'S TALES OF THE BORDERS, AND OF SCOTLAND:

HISTORICAL, TRADITIONAL, AND IMAGINATIVE.

EDITED BY ALEXANDER LEIGHTON,

One of the Original Editors and Contributors.

The new Edition is comprised in Twenty-four Volumes, sewed in elegant wrapper, price 1s. each. Each volume is complete in itself, forming an independent collection of stories. The work may also be had in Twelve Double Volumes, handsomely bound in cloth, price 3s. each, or in roxburgh, gilt top, 4s. each, and in substantial quarter-calf and half-calf bindings, suitable for libraries, etc.

Popular Works by the Author of 'Heaven our Home.'

Aggregate sale of the following popular works, 168,000 copies.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt side and edges, One Hundred and Seventh Thousand, price 3s. 6d.,

1. HEAVEN OUR HOME. We have no Saviour but Jesus, and no Home but Heaven.

'The author of the volume before us endeavours to describe what heaven is, as shown by the light of reason and Scripture; and we promise the reader many charming pictures of heavenly bliss, founded upon undeniable authority, and described with the pen of a dramatist, which cannot fail to elevate the soul as well as to delight the imagination. . . . Part Second proves, in a manner as beautiful as it is convincing, the DOCTRINE OF THE RECOGNITION OF FRIENDS IN HEAVEN,—a subject of which the author makes much, introducing many touching scenes of Scriptural celebrities meeting in heaven and discoursing of their experience on earth. Part Third demonstrates the interest which those in heaven feel in earth, and proves, with remarkable clearness, that such an interest exists not only with the ALMIGHTY AND AMONG THE ANGELS, BUT ALSO AMONG THE SPIRITS OF DEPARTED FRIENDS. We unhesitatingly give our opinion that this volume is one of the most delightful productions of a religious character which has appeared for some time; and we would desire to see it pass into extensive circulation.'—Glasgow Herald.

A CHEAP EDITION OF 'HEAVEN OUR HOME,'

In crown 8vo, cloth limp, price 1s. 6d., is also published.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt side and edges, Thirty-first Thousand, price 3s. 6d.,

2. MEET FOR HEAVEN. A State of Grace upon Earth the only Preparation for a State of Glory in Heaven.

'The author, in his or her former work, "Heaven our Home," portrayed a SOCIAL HEAVEN, WHERE SCATTERED FAMILIES MEET AT LAST IN LOVING INTERCOURSE AND IN POSSESSION OF PERFECT RECOGNITION, to spend a never-ending eternity of peace and love. In the present work the individual state of the children of God is attempted to be unfolded, and more especially the state of probation which is set apart for them on earth to fit and prepare erring mortals for the society of the saints. . . . The work, as a whole, displays an originality of conception, a flow of language, and a closeness of reasoning rarely found in religious publications. . . . The author combats the pleasing and generally accepted belief, that DEATH WILL EFFECT AN ENTIRE CHANGE ON THE SPIRITUAL CONDITION OF OUR SOULS, and that all who enter into bliss will be placed on a common level.'—Glasgow Herald.

A CHEAP EDITION OF 'MEET FOR HEAVEN,'

In crown 8vo, cloth limp, price 1s. 6d., is also published.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt side and edges, Twenty-second Thousand, price 3s. 6d.,

3. LIFE IN HEAVEN. There, Faith is changed into Sight, and Hope is passed into blissful Fruition.

'This is certainly one of the most remarkable works which have been issued from the press during the present generation; and we have no doubt it will prove as acceptable to the public as the two attractive volumes to which it forms an appropriate and beautiful sequel.'—Cheltenham Journal.

A CHEAP EDITION OF 'LIFE IN HEAVEN,'

In crown 8vo, cloth limp, price 1s. 6d., is also published.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt side and edges, Eighth Thousand, price 3s. 6d.,

4. CHRIST'S TRANSFIGURATION; or, Tabor's Teachings. A Glimpse of Christ's Glory and Intercourse with His People for Ever.

'The main subjects discussed in this new work are, Christ's glory and eternal intercourse with His people. These are developed with great power of thought and great beauty of language. The book is sure to meet with as flattering a reception as the author's former works.'—The Newsman.

NIMMO'S CROWN GIFT BOOKS.

Crown 8vo, beautifully printed on superfine paper, profusely illustrated by eminent Artists, in cloth extra, plain edges, price 3s. 6d. each, or richly bound in cloth and gold, and gilt edges, price 5s. each.

THIRD EDITION.

1. Sword and Pen; or, English Worthies
in the Reign of Elizabeth. By W. H. DAVENPORT ADAMS.

'A more wholesome book for young readers we have seldom seen.'—The Athenæum.

SECOND EDITION.

2. Norrie Seton; or, Driven to Sea. By Mrs. GEORGE CUPPLES, Author of 'Unexpected Pleasures,' etc.

'Mrs. Cupples has given to the boys in this volume just the sort of sea-story with which they will be delighted.'—The Scotsman.

SECOND EDITION.

3. The Circle of the Year; or, Studies of Nature and Pictures of the Seasons. By W. H. DAVENPORT ADAMS.

'Its purpose is to tell both young and old, but especially the former, how much of interest there is in everything connected with nature.'—Bell's Messenger.

SECOND EDITION.

4. The Wealth of Nature: Our Food Sup- plies from the Vegetable Kingdom. By the Rev. JOHN MONTGOMERY, A.M.

'It would be difficult to put into the hands of any boy or girl a volume which more equally combines the instructive and interesting in literature.'—N. B. Mail.

FIFTH EDITION.

5. Stories of School Life. By ASCOTT R.
HOPE.

6. Stories of French School Life. By ASCOTT R. HOPE.

'We were among the many who greatly admired Mr. Hope's "Stories of School Life" and "Stories about Boys," and when we found that he had undertaken to illustrate French school life, we gladly opened the volume. The stories are interesting in the highest degree; they appeal to the best sympathies of the lads for whom they are written. They set forth the right and the true against the false, and they are full of good, hearty humour.'—Public Opinion.

The Court Journal says: - 'It would be difficult to select a more desirable volume for birthday or marriage presentation.'

FIFTH EDITION.

In demy 8vo, cloth elegant, richly gilt, price 7s. 6d., or in Turkey morocco antique, 21s.,

THINGS A LADY WOULD LIKE TO KNOW,

CONCERNING DOMESTIC MANAGEMENT AND EXPENDITURE, ARRANGED FOR DAILY REFERENCE.

By HENRY SOUTHGATE,

Author of 'Many Thoughts of Many Minds,' 'Noble Thoughts in Noble Language,' 'Gone Before,' 'The Bridal Bouquet,' etc. etc.

NIMMO'S BIRTH-DAY BOOKS.

10th Thousand.

Just ready, in crown 32mo, limp cloth, price 2s., or in cloth extra, bevelled boards, gilt edges, price 2s. 6d.; also kept in imitation ivory binding, chaste design, price 4s. 6d.,

CUPID'S BIRTH-DAY BOOK:

ONE THOUSAND LOVE-DARTS FROM SHAKESPEARE,

Gathered and arranged for every Day in the Year.

By GEORGE JOHNSTON.

'As a collection of the immortal poet's best and choicest saws on love, the charming little volume before us is unequalled. Where it is possible to suit the quotation to a particular day or period of the season, this is done admirably.'—Standard.

'A pretty close examination of the book shows that the work has been done with great care and excellent taste. Shakespeare, it has been said, wrote for all time and for all men; he may be said also to have written for all birth-days, for the application of passages from his works here made is singularly felicitous. The book is very handsomely got up, and should be one of the most acceptable presents.'—Scotsman.

'The selections well made, the paper and print good, and the result of the combined efforts of Editor and Publisher choice and tasteful.'—The World.

10th Thousand.

In crown 32mo, cloth limp, price 2s.; in cloth extra, gilt edges, price 2s. 6d.; also kept in imitation ivory binding, chaste design, price 4s. 6d.,

THE BIRTH-DAY BOOK OF PROVERBS:

Consisting of a Serious, Satirical, or Humorous Sentence, Proverb, and Verse of Poetry for every Day in the Year.

By C. B.

* * Elegantly printed, and interleaved so as to form a Diary for the entry of Birth-days, etc.

In foolscap 8vo, beautifully printed, with coloured title-page, cloth limp, price 2s.; in cloth extra, gilt side and edges, price 2s. 6d.,

THE LITTLE FOLK'S BIRTH-DAY BOOK;

Or, Something Good about Children, Child-life, Flowers, etc., for every Day in the Year.

SELECTED AND ARRANGED BY C. B.,
Compiler of the 'Birth-day Book of Proverbs.'

NEW EDITIONS OF
VALUABLE STANDARD WORKS,
In royal 8vo, handsomely bound in cloth extra, price 6s. each.

1. The Spectator. Complete in one Volume. With Portrait of Addison, Notes, and a General Index.
2. The Rambler and the Idler. By Samuel Johnson. LL D. The ADVENTURER. By John Hawkesworth, LL D. The CONNOISSEUR. By Mr. Town, Critic and Censor-General. Complete in one Volume. With Notes and Portrait of Dr. Johnson
3. The History of the French Revolution. By M. A. Thiers. Translated from the last Paris Edition, with Notes.
4. The History of the Consulate and the Empire of France under Napoleon. By M. A. Thiers. Translated from the last Paris Edition, with Notes

USEFUL AND ATTRACTIVE GIFT-BOOKS.

Crown 4to, cloth extra, gilt edges, price 6s.,

THE NATIONAL MELODIST:

Two Hundred Standard Songs, with Symphonies and Accompaniments for the Pianoforte.

EDITED BY J. C. KIESER.

** This Volume consists of a Collection of the most popular English, Scotch, Irish, and American Songs, and is at once the cheapest and best published

12th Thousand.

In crown 8vo, beautifully bound in cloth extra, full of Engravings and Coloured Pictures, price 3s. 6d., or gilt edges, price 4s.,

THREE HUNDRED BIBLE STORIES

AND

THREE HUNDRED BIBLE PICTURES.

A PICTORIAL SUNDAY BOOK FOR THE YOUNG.

‘A pictorial Sunday book for the young, which will interest many a child, and tend to make the perusal of the Bible a pleasure and a profit.’—Daily Review.

In crown 8vo, beautifully bound in cloth extra, with Memoir and 16 Illustrations, price 3s. 6d., or gilt edges, 4s.,

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS AND HOLY WAR.

Uniform with ‘Three Hundred Bible Stories.’

CHEAP EDITION OF THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

In crown 8vo, beautifully bound in cloth extra, price 2s., in gilt side and edges, price 2s. 6d.,

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

BY JOHN BUNYAN.

With Memoir and Twelve Illustrations.

